Mr. COSTIGAN. The change has been correctly stated by the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat. The reason for repealing that portion of section 2 providing for public competition is to make it more convenient to establish such ferries. When I say establish, I use the word in a very limited sense, because all of these licensed ferries are now established, although it is quite possible that some few may be established hereafter. A new application might be made for an international ferry at some point where one does not now exist. The Act of 1872 provided that the Governor in Council could give leases for ferries all over the country, international as well as Canadian ferries; and in most cases they were given to the corporations of towns in the immediate vicinity of which those ferries were established. Government leases were given in some cases to the extent of 50 years without competition, and some of these leases are still running. We have not full control of these international ferries. The only right we can sell by public competition is the right connected with our own side of the river; we can give no rights to land on the opposite shore, and in many cases the arrangement will have to be made between the two parties. There is no power taken by the Governor in Council to interfere with existing leases, many of which have several years to run; but in many cases a large amount of capital has been invested in the maintenance of these ferries under a lease for a certain number of years, and it is thought wise to give the Governor in Council power to extend that time, for not more than ten years (although twenty years was asked), on being satisfied that the parties had performed their service satisfactorily to the public and had invested, perhaps $100,000 in boats and other plant. That does not apply to Canadian ferries now under lease. On the first establishment of a ferry, tenders would be called for, and there would be competition as at present; but even in the case of Canadian ferries, that have performed their service satisfactorily to the public, and in which large amounts of capital have been invested, there is no reason why they should be taken from the people who have them and put up at public competition. When a lease expires, if tenders were called for, there might be dozens of tenders put in at a price that the existing licenses could not afford to pay, and these might be used as levers for the purpose of extorting money or imposing unfair conditions upon him. Therefore we think it would be safer to leave the extension of the time in the hands of the Government in Council. Of course, the Act as it stands, gives the Government in Council power to make regulations as to the toll that may be charged (which differs according to the localities), as to the time of crossing and the capacity of the boats. In most cases these ferries are not sources of revenue. The ferries generally established in the Provinces, or between one Province and another, are for the convenience of the public and not for revenue, and I am sure that in many cases the parties carrying them on derive little or no profit from them. I have been asked about arrearages. We have to take steps to collect in some cases, but I do not think the House would justify us in taking arbitrary means to collect the license fees from those people who, in many cases, make little or no profit out of the money they have invested, especially in view of the fact that these fees are not imposed so much for revenue purposes as for the public convenience. So far as the present leases are concerned they will expire at the times fixed in the leases.

Mr. EDGAR. In answer to the enquiry I made about the reason for abolishing competition for the licenses of ferries between Canada and a foreign country, the hon. gentleman has gone into the whole subject of the amendments. As he has referred to these clauses of the Bill, I will refer to them also to show the extraordinary nature of the amendments. In the first place, he proposes that competition should not be required at all for licenses for ferries between Canada and foreign countries. That is one safeguard of the public that is proposed to be removed. Then, in the 3rd section, he provides that instead of ferry licenses being renewable for only five years, they may be granted or renewed by the Governor in Council for ten years without competition. That is a strong provision, and not at all in the public interest that I can see. Then, there is another attack upon the system of competition where, in cases of ferries between two Provinces, it is provided that without seeking for tenders, the Government may authorise the extension of a license for an additional period of five years. Now, that is entirely new, as is the provision for a license for ten years in a case between a Province and the foreign country. That is entirely new. The hon. gentleman has spoken about the difficulty is collecting fees from ferries and the unprofitable character of many of the ferries. But there is nothing in that to explain the reason why he asked Parliament to authorise these changes. He has not told us of any particular case in which it was not in the public interest to call for competition. It requires a very strong argument to convince any man that advertisements calling for applications for licenses for public institutions, like ferries, is not in the public interest. I cannot see any justice for any one of these changes. They put more power in the hands of the Government in connection with a matter in reference to which has heretofore taken the power out of their hands, to the extent of requiring tenders to be called for in the public interest.

The committee rose and reported.

Bill read the third time and passed.

[CHIGNECTO MARINE RAILWAY COMPANY.]

The House resolved itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that the time for the completion of the works of the Chignecto Marine Railway Company, shall, as respects their title to receive the subsidy heretofore authorised, be the 1st July, 1890, instead of the 1st July, 1889; also that the company may be accorded a further delay of twenty-four months for such completion, on the condition of the payment of a monthly penalty of $5,000 for each month during which the works remain uncompleted after the first above-mentioned date, and also that the amount of capital mentioned in section 2 of the Act 49 Victoria, chapter 18, as that on which the payment of the subsidies limited so as to make up the net earnings to seven per cent. per annum, shall be $5,500,000 instead of $5,000,000.—(Sir Charles Tupper.)

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The committee is so well acquainted with the subject, which has been before the House on a number of former occasions, as to make it unnecessary that I should take up the time of the committee explaining it now. It will be remembered that when the question of constructing and enlarging the canals was brought under the notice of the Government, a very able commission was organised, comprising the most able commercial as well as engineering talent in the country, and they reported that among the first canals which ought to be constructed in the interests of the Dominion was one to connect the waters of the Bay of Fundy with the Gulf of the St. Lawrence. A survey was made of that work and an estimate formed, that it would cost about $5,000,000. Parliament adopted that estimate, and both the Government of the right hon. gentleman and the Government of Mr. Mackenzie, at a subsequent period, placed a million dollars in the Estimates for the purpose of proceeding with that work. In the meantime, Mr. Page revised the estimates, rock was discovered, and he increased the estimated cost from $5,000,000 to $9,000,000 or $10,000,000. In this case, hon. gentlemen opposite will remember that while they felt the work would warrant an expenditure of $5,000,000, it would not warrant such a large expenditure as $9,000,000 or $10,000,000, and its construction was abandoned. Subsequently the proposition was brought forward to accomplish the same object by the transport of the vessels from the Bay of Fundy to the Gulf of St. Lawrence by means of a ship railway, and Mr. Ketchum, an engineer of considerable ability, who gave a good deal of attention to that subject, took the work in hand. He brought forward a proposition to the Government, and he was told the only terms upon which we would submit it to the consideration of Parliament was that the entire risk should be borne by the capitalists who undertook the construction of the work. And subject to that it was provided that a sum of $150,000 a year should be granted for twenty five years for the purpose of securing the construction of this ship railway, which was a work to take the place of the canal which was originally contemplated and for which Parliament had agreed to provide an expenditure of $5,000,000, a work which would not only connect the waters of the St. Lawrence with the Bay of Fundy, but would bring the ports of Quebec and St. John 500 miles nearer together than they are now. But the commissioners, the very able engineers who first reported on the canal and took a large amount of testimony as to the traffic which would be promoted by the construction of that canal, led one to suppose that the trade and commerce of the country would be greatly facilitated by the construction of this work. The result was that Mr. Ketchum endeavored to float his scheme in the great money market of the world, but he was met by the difficulty that a ship railway of that extent was a novelty. In the London Docks, the means of lifting ships fully loaded by hydraulic pressure was exemplified every day. Every slip showed the feasibility of drawing up a large ship on rails. But the scheme which Mr. Ketchum submitted was a novel one. The question of the engineering difficulties was laid before the ablest engineers, and Mr. Fowler, who is an engineer second to none in London, gave the project his enthusiastic support.

Mr. COSTIGAN,

Mr. LAURIER. Who was that engineer?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Fowler, a man of the highest engineering talent in London. There were many engineers who had the same opinion, but I referred to Mr. Fowler especially because I had it from himself. He is a man of world-wide reputation, and he assured me that, having gone thoroughly with Mr. Ketchum into all the details of this scheme, he was prepared to pledge his professional reputation on its success, provided the capitalists were prepared to embark their money in a scheme which was altogether unprecedented. While I was absent from this Parliament, the terms were revised, and, instead of giving the company $150,000 a year for twenty-five years, the amount was increased so as to give them the same sum, according to actuarial calculation, in twenty years. Mr. Ketchum, who has spent a large amount of money and of time in regard to this matter, who has expended his own private means in endeavoring to bring this work to a completion, and has met with difficulties of a financial character in connection with it, owing to the novel character of the work, has reason to believe that he has now found capitalists who are prepared to carry the work to a successful completion, but they ask that this change shall be made in the terms. They ask that there shall be an extension of time of one year for a completion of the work, and that there shall be a further time of twenty-four months allowed, subject to the payment of a penalty of $5,000 a month for every month during which the work is uncompleted after July, 1890. It appears that twenty-four months is a large extension of time, but practically it is only an extension of twelve months, because there are only six months in the year available for the work, and if you gave an extension of twelve months it would really be only an extension of six months, which is the working period for the operation of the contract. Under the terms of the engagement made by Parliament with this company, all the responsibility rests upon the capitalists and upon the company. They are not only obliged, before they receive a dollar of public money, to complete the contract to the satisfaction of the Government, but they then receive the subsidy per annum only during the successful operation of the work. The extension of time amounts simply to this, that, if any untoward circumstances arose in regard to the completion of the contract, if they were prevented from completing it, if they were a month behind the time, they would have to abandon the entire contract after incurring the expenditure of this large amount of money. The extension of time is, therefore, practically only for twelve working months, and that is made in order to meet any unforeseen contingencies. I do not think it is necessary for me to say more at present than that Mr. Ketchum is very sanguine that, if this extension of time is granted, he will be able to raise the necessary capital and to proceed with the work vigorously.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not wish to discuss the question to-night, or to offer any strenuous opposition to the enlarged time which is proposed to be given, but I must say that I regret that the Government continue to give their countenance to this scheme. Of course, I accept the statement that eminent engineers have given their adhesion to this scheme, but at the same time I have never been able to meet any practical man in the Maritime Provinces who believes that the scheme will be of any real utility. Two or three years ago, it was proposed to give an additional subsidy to this company, I think by the Minister of Agriculture at that time, the Hon. Mr. Pope.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No additional subsidy was proposed.

Mr. DAVIES. It was proposed to change the terms very much in favor of the company.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was simply making it 20 years instead of 25 years.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) At that time the scheme was characterised by such practical gentlemen as the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and others, as a chimerical scheme, and it was stated that, even if it were accomplished, at an immense expense to the people of this country, it would be of very little advantage to the people of the Maritime Provinces. I have failed to meet, either in Prince Edward Island or in Nova Scotia, anyone who has any opinion that this could lead to much benefit to the people of the Maritime Provinces. It is no doubt possible to build a marine railway, and to carry a vessel over it, but I have questioned captains and shipowners in regard to it, and those who are interested in the export of produce, and I have not met anyone who did not laugh at the scheme. Perhaps, when the Bill is brought in, we may discuss it further, but the hon. gentleman has omitted to discuss the most important part of this resolution. The first section of the Act provides that the term during which a subsidy may be granted from the consolidated revenue fund of Canada to this Chignecto Marine Railway Company, under provisions of the Act 47 Victoria, shall be for 20 instead of 25 years, and the amount shall be $170,602, instead of $150,000. That is one of the changes to which I referred increasing the subsidy, as provided for by the Act passed in 1886. I see the hon. gentleman proposes to make that $5,500,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is a clerical error. The substitution of $5,500,000 instead of $5,000,000 is a clerical error, and it is to make the Act conform with the contract.

Mr. DAVIES. As it is printed here it is for $5,500,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In my resolution for $5,000,000, I proposed to provide the limited subsidy, so as to make up the net earnings to 7 per cent. per annum, shall be $5,500,000 instead of $5,000,000. I say that is simply to correct a clerical error, and does not alter the agreement with the Government at all.

Mr. DAVIES. It certainly alters the liability under the Act.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, it is no liability at all. The liability is precisely limited to the amount per annum to be paid for the 20 years, but this, instead of being a liability, is the very reverse; it is a provision by which, when the profits reach a certain figure, the Government shall be relieved, it is a relief from liability. It is a provision that when the profits reach 7 per cent. on a certain amount, the Government shall share equally the profit, and shall only be called upon for the balance between that and the amount we originally proposed to give.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will find that in one part of the Act it is correctly stated.

Resolution reported.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved for leave to introduce a Bill founded on the said resolution.

Motion agreed to, and Bill introduced and read the first time.

THE REVISED STATUTES RESPECTING CUSTOMS.

Mr. BOWELL moved that Bill (No. 92) to amend chapter 32 of the Revised Statutes respecting the Customs, be read the second time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. BOWELL. I think if the House will allow the Bill to be read a second time now, it will be much more convenient, as it contains a large number of clauses with a good many amendments, to discuss the particulars of each amendment in Committee. It will take some little time for me to explain the changes. I propose to take the second reading to-night, and refer it to committee to-morrow, and then move the resolution which has been placed upon the paper, and refer it to a committee, and we can enter into a full discussion in committee of each clause. If the House desires at that time, before going into committee, that I should make any lengthy explanation of the Bill, I shall be prepared to do so.

Mr. JONES. I think there will be no objection to that, but I would repeat the suggestion that it would be advisable to print this Bill with the exceptions in brackets. It is not easy to follow the discussion when so many sections are repealed and substituted by other sections. It appears to me that we could discuss this much more intelligently if the hon. gentleman will have this Bill printed with the sections he proposes to omit, and substituting the new sections.

Mr. BOWELL. I think I can meet the hon. gentleman's proposition. I have an explanation of every clause before me, and the reason for the change, and as he has made the suggestion, I will have these printed before going into Committee so that each hon. member may get a copy.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT.

House resolved itself into Committee to consider a certain proposed resolution (page 527 of the Debates) respecting the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BOWELL. We desire, in the first place, to explain what the word "value" means. In different sections of the Act at present the word "value" of goods occurred, sometimes the dutiable "value," and the object of this amendment is to provide that wherever the word "value" occurs it shall mean the duty-paid value of the goods in this market. This occurs now in some portions of the Act and in other portions it does not, leaving it open to discussion, particularly with lawyers, as to the particular meaning to be given to the word in particular cases in which it occurs. The second proposition is to change the penalty which is imposed for undervaluation. If a merchant imports an article, and enters it at 20 per cent. undervalue, he will be liable to a penalty of 50 per cent. of the duty. In other words, if an article is imported and entered at an undervaluation of 20 per cent., if the article is dutiable at 25 per cent. it pays 37½ per cent. I propose to change that so that when the value of the article is entered commencing at 10 per cent. under its real value in the market where it was purchased, the penalty, instead of being 50 per cent., will be only 10 per cent. of the duty, and so on in proportion as the value is increased. Under this proposition an article will have to be entered at 50 per cent. below its marketable value in the country where it is purchased before the penalty now imposed is enforced.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You are relaxing the regulations.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes. If the amount runs over 50 per cent. then it would be higher. I see the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Wright) smiles; he does not think this can be possible. The hon. gentleman draws a distinction between making a law and administering it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I was about to ask whether it was in the direction of relaxation or stringency.

Mr. BOWELL. In the direction of relaxation.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am glad of it.

Mr. BOWELL. The next proposition in this resolution is one which affects the revenue. If the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) will direct his attention to clause twelve of the Act he will see that this proposal provides that the damage done to any article shall be based upon a valuation. That cannot apply equitably to damage which is done to sugar that pays duty upon its strength as proved by the polariscope. There is a certain reduction given when sugar is tested in the laboratory if it has salt water in it. Under the present system as the law reads a doubt has arisen as to whether the merchant is not entitled in addition to the allowance which is made when the strength of the sugar is tested by the polariscope, for whatever might be given by way of appraisement. I might give an illustration, a case that occurred in Montreal some time ago. There was certain damaged or supposed to be damaged sugar, and the valuers and underwriters who had insured it paid the importers 3½ per cent. as damage. They made a like demand on the customs for a reduction. Upon testing the sugar by the polariscope, and after making a thorough investigation as to what was supposed to be the damage done to the sugar, we found that no damage had actually been done at all, and the consequence was that we saved to the revenue by that investigation a very large sum, amounting into the thousands. I desire to put that matter at rest in future by changing the law in this particular.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). With respect to changes applicable to sugar—does the hon. gentleman propose to make any change in the polariscope test of sugar?

Mr. BOWELL. No, we do not propose to make any change as to the mode of levying the duty. This change is in order to prevent importers from being paid more than they should be paid in case of any damage being done to sugar by salt water or otherwise.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is this extra power taken to determine the value? Does it do away with the clause providing for appraisement?

Mr. BOWELL. No. It is to meet a case of this kind. A gentleman goes to a foreign country and buys an article, for which he pays say $600. I give the hon. gentleman an actual case. Then he pays to the inventor $200 a year for the use of it for ten years, and at the end of that time the article is not his property. Now, what is the value of the article for duty? That is only one among thousands of cases that arise all the time. The last provision provides for the abolition of giving bonds for the ex-warehousing of goods from one warehouse to another and transferred from one port to another. Under the present system every merchant, if he transfers any bonded goods from one warehouse to another at another port, has to supply bonds. When I tell the House that in Montreal, in one year, over 10,000 bonds are given, hon. gentlemen will readily understand the amount of work and expense attending the giving of those bonds. I propose to add to the Customs Act a provision which makes the owner of the goods liable in the penalties the moment he makes an ex-warehouse entry of the goods. It will relieve the trade of an immense amount of trouble, annoyance and expense, and at the same time will protect the revenue just as well as is done at the present time.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The original importers?

Mr. BOWELL. Any one who ever owned the goods, the original importer or a trader to whom the goods were transferred. If goods were transferred from Halifax to Brantford the merchant would have to give a bond. Under the proposition now before the House he would not have to give a bond, but the fact of his making an ex-warehouse entry would make him as liable.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I certainly think the Minister cannot be found fault with in this regard. It has been charged by traders and merchants that the hon. gentleman is a little severe at times, but the last provision is certainly in the interests of trade no less than the custom house officers. If the revenue is secured there is no reason why this cannot be done, and any one in trade can understand what the relief will be. He deserves the smiles of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Wright) on this ground. The only danger I see is whether the Minister being given power to place value for duties, which he seems to think is necessary in some cases, there was danger of the exercise of arbitrary measures in some cases.

Committee rose and reported resolution.

Mr. BOWELL moved that said resolution be now read a second time, concurred in and referred to the committee with this Bill.

Motion agreed to.

THE ADULTERATION ACT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved the second reading of the Bill (No. 47) to amend the Adulteration Act, chapter 107 of the Revised Statutes of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11:45 p.m.

House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Wednesday, April 18, 1888.

No. 37.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 18th April, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 102) to enable the Central Ontario Railway Company to alter the location of their line of railway and to mortgage their road to a greater amount than $20,000 per mile.—(Mr. Wood, Brockville.)

Bill (No. 103) to provide for the examination and licensing of persons employed as engineers elsewhere than on steamboats.—(Mr. Cook.)

Bill (No. 105) to prevent the practice of fraud by tree peddlers and commission men in the sale of nursery stock."—(Mr. Boyle)

THE TERRITORIES REAL PROPERTY ACT.

Mr. THOMPSON (for Mr. WHITE, Cardwell) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 104) further to amend chapter 51, Revised Statutes, "The Territories Real Property Act." He said: One of the purposes of this Act is to authorise the appointment of an inspector of registration offices in the North-West Territories, in order to secure uniformity of practice in regard to the registration of deeds. The other provisions of the Bill are principally intended to reduce in several particulars the expenditure connected with the registration and the practice of procuring certificates of titles.

Bill read the first time.

INONDATIONS DU SAINT-LAURENT.

M. BERNIER (pour M. PRÉFONTAINE) demande: Est-ce l'intention du gouvernement de mettre à exécution prochainement les moyens suggérés par diverses personnes, et entre autres par le capitaine Léger, en construisant des piliers sur le lac Saint-Louis, pour diminuer les dangers et les dommages de l'inondation du Saint-Laurent sur la rive sud dans les comtés de Laprairie, Chambly et Verchères? Si oui, un montant suffisant sera-t-il mis dans les estimés pour faire ces travaux dans le cours de la prochaine saison?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN: En réponse à l'honorable député, je dois dire que le gouvernement a dû employer des experts relativement à cette question, et que nous ne sommes pas maintenant en position de dire quelle sera la décision du gouvernement à cet égard.

37-1888-1

KINGSTON DEPUTY POSTMASTER.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, 1. Whether the deputy postmaster of Kingston, William Shannon, was detected by the deputy inspector, or by any other officer, in the act of opening certain letters? 2. Why said deputy postmaster was not forthwith arrested? 3. Why the said deputy postmaster was allowed to depart to Cape Vincent, the succeeding day, without any interference? 4. Why no attempt was made by the Post Office authorities to arrest the said deputy postmaster, on his return to Kingston, some days since?

Mr. McLELAN. It has been reported to me that the deputy postmaster was detected in treating letters improperly; and when that report was made to me, it was also reported he had left the country. As soon as I saw this notice intimating that he had returned, I gave orders that he be proceeded against.

ONTARIO COUNTY JUDGES' SALARIES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to propose any addition to the salaries of the County Judges of the Province of Ontario?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is not their intention.

DUTY ON BOOKS FOR MECHANICS' INSTITUTES.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Is it the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to remove the duties on books imported for use by Mechanics' Institutes?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not.

RICHARD MONCK, OF CHATHAM.

Mr. EDGAR (for Mr. LISTER) asked, When did Mr. Richard Monck, of Chatham, cease to be in the employ of the Government, and what is the total sum paid to him during the past year for services and disbursements?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the absence of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, I would say that Mr. Monck ceased to be in the employ of the Government in 1886; the exact date I have not got. There has been no money paid to him for services during the past year.

W. F. O'DONOGHUE.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) asked, 1. When was Mr. W. F. O'Donoghue engaged as extra clerk in the Department of Agriculture? 2. When did he obtain leave to engage as Tory canvasser in the County of Russell? 3. Is his salary as extra clerk assured to him during his absence?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. O'Donoghue was engaged as extra clerk in the Department of Agriculture in November last, and he is still receiving salary as such. He did not obtain any leave to engage as Tory canvasser in the County of Russell.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then he went of his own accord.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). And drew his pay.

SAUVAGES DE CAUGHNAWAGA.

M. DOYON demande—

Copie de toutes lettres, télégrammes et requêtes adressés par des Sauvages de la réserve de Caughnawaga au ministre de l'Intérieur, demandant une élection de chefs suivant les dispositions de l'Acte des Sauvages, et de toutes correspondances échangées à ce sujet entre les dits Sauvages, le ministre de l'Intérieur et l'agent de la réserve.

M. l'Orateur, je désire faire quelques observations au sujet de cette motion, et je le ferai aussi brièvement que possible. Au mois de décembre 1887, j'ai reçu une requête des sauvages de la réserve de Caughnawaga, portant cinquante-quatre signatures. J'ai présenté cette requête à l'honorable ministre de l'Intérieur (M. White), accompagnée d'une lettre la recommandant à sa sérieuse attention. Comme cette requête énonçait en entier les griefs des sauvages, je m'en vais en donner communication à cette honorable Chambre. Elle est rédigée en anglais, et je la lirai de même.

"To the Honorable
The Superintendent General of Indian Affairs,
Ottawa.

"SIR,—At a general meeting held this day, fourteenth of November, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven,

"We the undersigned members, braves of the Caughnawaga Reserve, solicit to be granted us to represent to you most respectfully:

"That from time immemorial, and since the establishment of our settlement here, in all occasions where our common interests are involved, and that the want is felt to be redressed, it is customary with us to implore your interposition as father and protector of our community, who is always willing to comply with our desires, being, as one should say, the representative of our noble mother, 'Queen Victoria,' for whom we have the profoundest veneration, and the Crown of whom our ancestors have so oftentimes defended;

"That in this instance the motive of our urgent prayer is of the most eminent character, which is the alteration in the Council of Chiefs; that is to say, a general election of a suitable number of chiefs, if not for the term of three years, as provided by law hereinafter mentioned, at least temporarily. The actual council is defective on account of its quorum being insufficient;

"That we deem it unnecessary to state in detail the extent of our grievances towards our chiefs; in a word, be it given us the humble expectation that the benefit of 'section 74 of the Indian Act of 1880' be applied to us;

"And your petitioners will ever pray.

"(Signed)

| | |
|--------------------------|------------------------|
| "Chas Kanatase, | Moses Niwennitaa, |
| "Martin Theahiashe, | John Thawennate, |
| "J. B. Anonsawenrate, | Francis Sakohentetha, |
| "J. B. Absentonni, | Joseph Thantakete, |
| "Peter Shoketowane, | Joseph Ariwaken, |
| "Thomas Ahiewate, | Jean Tehonwatase, |
| "Ignace Thahokathe, | Peter Katsitsakeron, |
| "Louis Tharonhatie, | Lazar Tharonhiorens, |
| "Louis Karonhontie, | Peter Shakorewatha, |
| "Chas Tekanbiatarekwen, | Joseph Thanonsokotha, |
| "Matias Shatekarenhes, | Peter Thawennoken, |
| "Louis Tekahonwake, | Peter Takatsitsaneken, |
| "James Karenhoton, | Joseph Shorakowane, |
| "Thomas Tekarenhontie, | Joseph Onetotako, |
| "Thomas Kahiaha, | Moses Mailloux, |
| "Ignace Tehonnatamhen, | Felix Thonitatie, |
| "John Shakowihe, | Joseph Karontasa, |
| "Toussaint Tionkwaronni, | Matias Tsatakentha, |
| "Francis Kaneratiich, | Wm. Shaonwentsowane, |
| "Louis Shoniatarowane, | Peter Niioherasa, |
| "Louis Wisekowa, | Francis Anonehitha, |
| "Louis Thairi, | René Shatekaronhies, |
| "Joseph Thiaaweron, | Francis Shawentanen, |
| "Louis Tekentashen, | Louis Thawennaienton, |
| "Ignace Aronhiakens, | Ignace Kanento, |
| "Peter Warenhiaki, | Ignace Thaseraren, |
| "Francis Thanonsokotha, | Louis Aronhiensere." |

Comme on le voit, ces Sauvages de Caughnawaga demandent, par leur requête au ministre de l'Intérieur, qu'il leur soit permis de faire l'élection de chefs pour leur tribu. Ils allèguent que depuis sept ans, ils n'ont pas eu telle élection; que plusieurs des chefs, qui dirigeaient les affaires de la tribu, sont morts ou inhabiles à agir comme tels, et que, par conséquent, il ne leur reste plus que deux chefs, actuellement, à Caughnawaga. Voilà ce sur quoi ils se basent pour demander au gouvernement la permission, ainsi qu'il appert par la requête ci-dessus relatée, faire l'élection des chefs.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Je citerai encore l'art. 75, de l'Acte des Sauvages qui se lit comme suit :

Lorsque le gouverneur en conseil jugera à propos, pour le bon gouvernement d'une bande, d'introduire le système de l'élection des chefs, il pourra prescrire que les chefs d'une bande seront élus, comme il est ci-après prévu, aux temps et lieu que le surintendant général fixera; et ils seront, en ce cas, élus pour trois ans, mais pourront être déposés par le Gouverneur en Conseil pour cause de malhonnêteté, d'intempérance, d'immoralité ou d'incapacité; et ils pourront être dans la proportion d'un premier chef et de deux seconds chefs ou conseillers par chaque deux cents Sauvages.

Les détails n'y font rien. Aussi par leur requête, ils ne demandent pas une loi spéciale; mais ils demandent que la loi qui a été passée, en 1880, pour leur bénéfice, soit appliquée.

Au mois de janvier 1888, ils ont présenté une autre requête, signée par cent soixante Sauvages de Caughnawaga, tous gens habiles à voter. Cette requête se lit comme suit :

"To the Honorable THOS. WHITE, Minister of the Interior,
Ottawa.

"We the undersigned, members of this tribe, humbly request the Indian Department to be allowed an election of chiefs while pending the decision of the government to grant us the Indian Advancement Act.

"Signed,
KANADA KE, Jan. 21st 1888.

"I se ne onkde on de se ra kde kon se iats te ris ta Ottawa ts sa te ri on te

"Kda ne ken ni as kda ri on ta ia kden ni tio kda ken ni a on sa ia ki ia ta ra ko (chiefs) ra ti ko da neus a hon ten tia te na o ten io ri da ien ne ken to.

"Tsi ni io re ias kda ri on na ia ki ia ta ra ko ne (Councillors)

"Da a kda tats hen na ren ne ia kda non des.

"RoBi ThaBeiakenra, Tier Katsitsiakera, Sose Anenarotunk8as, Tosen x Athienk8anonni, Sose x Anontsakare, Tier Sakore8atha, Sose Tiorakh8isen, Sa8atis x Soronia, Ennias Shaetati, RoBi renuierio, Sakarie Kanentoton, Ennias x Karoniaratie, Marten Thiashe, RoBi x Tha8ennainton, Rasar x Iekaratemsele, Sose x Thauonsoneotha, Arenne x Satekaronies, Ennias x Kament. Sa8athies Oheroskon, Tiev Karoniare, Ennias Otsinek8ar, Sak Karakontie, Tisian Ari8a-kenha, Sose Anetotake, Sishe x Kavoniore, Aton8a Taronko8a, Sente8on8a x Tase, Sishe x Taioroniote, RoBi x Thaironiote, Tier Karatohon, Aton8a x Nikana8aa, RoBi x Nonrakete, Sishe x A8enra-thon, William Shaonontsiotane, Tier x Onakharakete Ennias x Kentokake, Marten x Kaneratoare, Aton8a x Te8ennintashen, Sa8atis x Nonsa8enrate, Ennias x Te8ateron8aronkotha, Marten x Rak8atiion, Sa8atis x Atsitsiaks, Sose x Orite, Ennias Arhotonk8as, RoBi Tekanavataneken, Savo x Tekanbiatarek8en, Ennias x Aroniakens, RoBi Thiaientaneken, Tiev x Kanatoave, 8athias x Thatokenthia, Vo8i x Shoniatavo8ane, 8athias Satekavenes, Suk x Kanatsiakiaion, Tiev x Kentiokhon, Saksavie x Saennatie. Sose x Nikavontasa, Tien x AKhidirabe8, Sadati8 x OondateKen, WiShe Non8anoven, Sak-Savie x KatSiv8Kevon, Vodi x Dis8Koda, Sadati8 x SaKodie, SaKSavie x Sadantenan, Tien x Kanatiio, Tien x Aienta8, Dishe x AvidaKauha, Ennias x Nikavonta8a, Dishe x Taden8akati, Ennias x OSKenontona, Ie8-ent x Tekavataneken, Dishe x KanetaKon, SaK-Savie x Tio8u Kden, SoSe x TatovaKavon, SoSe Teniatie, Ennias Saatie, Tiev x Thiveta, Ennias x Tekanadati Kden, Sadati8 Saatie, Tisian x Vais, SoSe x Saiodi8aKevon, SaKSavie x SaKokennionKda8, Vodi x Darlrave, Sadati8 x Kaua8ati-vhon, Ennias x Kontitie, KaSar x Thavoniovon8, Sadati8 x Vaienton-ri8, Vodi x Thavondatie, Ennias x AtadaKhon, Atonda Avata8, SaK-Savie, x AtKdivoton, SaKSavie x Sontavon8Khon, Sadati8 x Adennacienta8, Sadati8 x Odi8ateKen, Ennias x Anont8iaKervo, Vodi x Anu-lea, SaK x Tekanon8oKen, Dishe x KavoniaKevon, SaKSavie Te8ona-venion, SavoKanen x VaKe, SoSe x ThaotaKenva, SaK x Kavhnoton, Sadati8 x OnasaK-nva. Atonda x Tekavenonta, Atonda x Kachias, SaK x Anatovena, AveK x Anenavoton, Dishe x Kadeniio, SaKSavie x Thiaidentonte, Ennias x Atevhiton, SaKSavie x Niade8ace, Atonda x Avoniot8, Vodi SaKodenmenadi, SoSe x AKhienentonko, Atonda x IaKevitontie, Sadati8, Thaenvate, Soce x TaentaKenva, Sadatis x IovaKdenton, SoSe x Thiaidevon, Vodi x T. Kentavashen, Dishe x Sothienton, SaKSavie x Kanevatitio, Sadati8 x Adennaniion, SaK x Ska-8eKov8aKen, Vodi x Kent8ioKoda, SoSe x Anenvi8eve, Ennias x SKennetati, Atonda x Athiatavonne, Tiev x Kanata8e, Entden x Tio-nataKdente, Dishe x Tha8ennontie, Sadatis x Atedennavikhon, Dishe x Tedata8haviaKe, Ennias x TeKeniavutov8Ken, Vodi x Sholstrenodane, Marten x Ovoniakete, Dishe x Tekanadatek-den, Aveksent x Teon8akanere, Ennias x T8iseveken, Savo x Sakahese, Tiev x Tekatsitsaneken, Vodi x Onuonkoton, Savo x T8ioniti, Marten x Sakovaiatakda, Saksavie x Anonsiatha, Saksavie x Thavoniakethon, Ennias x Thasevaren, Tiev x Katinontie, Dishe x Kanentakevon, Sose x Kavoniakevon, Vodi x Avirhon, Mavten x Tekatsitsenseve, Atonda x Taawavishoa, Dominik x Tioakiente, Sose x Sovakodane, Sose x Thontakete, Saksavie x Non Sakenthéake, Aton8a x Anenvente, Tiev x Daveniliaki, Sose x Katavativon, Tiev x Soket8ane.

Caughnawaga, Jan 21st 1883, P. Q.

Ils ont attendu pendant deux semaines la réponse de l'honorable ministre de l'Intérieur, mais en vain. Croyant, ou supposant qu'on avait oublié leur humble requête, ils lui ont télégraphié, et vo ci ce qu'ils demandaient à l'honorable ministre :

"CAUGHNAWAGA, Feb., 10th, 1883.

"To Hon. THOS. WHITE,
"Ottawa.

"Is petition received demanding election of chiefs.

"(Signed) JOSEPH FOSTER.

Voici la réponse qui a été faite par le département :

"OTTAWA, Feb. 10th, 1883.

"JOSEPH FOSTER.

"CAUGHNAWAGA, Quebec.

"Petition received, and agent will be written to.

"(Signed) R. SINCLAIR.

Le 11 février, ils ont envoyé un nouveau télégramme à l'honorable ministre de l'Intérieur, ainsi conçu :

"CAUGHNAWAGA, Feb 11th 1883.

"To Hon. THOS. WHITE,
"Ottawa.

"Whenshall we expect a definite answer to our petition.

"(Signed) JOS. FOSTER."

Voici la réponse :

"OTTAWA, Feb. 11th, 1883.

"JOS. FOSTER,

"Caughnawaga, Que ,

"Will write Agent on Monday about proposed election.

"(Signed) L. VANKOUGHNET."

Plus tard, le 1er mars, un autre télégramme fût adressé à l'honorable ministre de l'Intérieur, se lisant comme suit :

"CAUGHNAWAGA, March 1st, 1883.

"Hon. THOS. WHITE, &c.,
"Ottawa.

"Anxious for an answer to our petition.

"(Signed) JOS. FOSTER."

Voyons la réponse :

"OTTAWA, March 1st, 1883.

"To Jos. FOSTER.

"Telegram received. Department taking no action.

"(Signed) THOS. WHITE."

Ainsi, après avoir adressé deux requêtes, dont une en décembre dernier, et l'autre en janvier, donnant les raisons à l'appui de leur humble demande, les Sauvages de Caughnawaga étaient dans l'anxiété ; et après deux semaines d'attente, n'ayant reçu aucune réponse, ils télégraphièrent à l'honorable ministre de l'Intérieur. La première réponse qu'ils reçurent du département, comportait qu'on allait entrer en correspondance avec l'agent des Sauvages à Caughnawaga. C'est-à-dire qu'on allait s'entendre avec l'agent et voir ce qu'il y aurait à faire. Et plus tard, le 1er de mars, après un nouvel échange de télégrammes, on répond finalement : "Department taking no action..." C'est-à-dire ne s'en occupe pas.

Eh bien ! M. l'Orateur, je comprends que, d'après la section 75 de l'Acte des Sauvages, que j'ai citée, ces derniers n'ont pas le droit absolu d'élire leurs chefs, il faut qu'ils s'adressent au département pour en obtenir la permission ; mais je suis surpris de voir dans le statut, un acte passé en 1880, disant que lorsque le gouverneur en Conseil jugera les Sauvages assez avancés, ou assez éclairés, il leur permettra de faire les élections de leurs chefs.

J'ai eu à ce sujet certaine entrevue avec l'honorable ministre de l'Intérieur, et la réponse qu'il m'a donnée a été si peu satisfaisante que j'ai cru de mon devoir, ou plutôt, que je croirais manquer à mon devoir si je ne m'adressais pas à cette Chambre afin de savoir si ce qui a été consigné dans les statuts révisés est une farce, ou si on l'a fait sérieusement. Ce qui me paraît étrange, ce sont les réponses mêmes du département, dans lesquelles on dit qu'on va se mettre en rapport avec l'agent ; et plus tard, l'honorable ministre de l'Intérieur—avec qui j'ai eu plusieurs conversations à ce sujet—m'a dit : Je veux prendre des renseignements auprès de l'agent des Sauvages de Caughnawaga pour savoir s'ils sont assez avancés pour leur appliquer la loi municipale telle qu'elle existe dans les autres parties de la province ou du pays ; c'est-à-dire de leur permettre d'élire des conseillers ; et s'ils ne sont pas assez avancés, on leur permettra d'élire des chefs.

Je dois faire remarquer qu'il y a trois ans, on donnait à entendre la même chose à ces bons citoyens de Caughnawaga. Ce que je trouve de plus étrange, c'est la réponse que m'a donnée l'honorable ministre de l'Intérieur, qu'il allait consulter l'agent pour savoir si ces Sauvages étaient assez avancés pour leur appliquer le système de lois municipales.

Quand, en 1885, le gouvernement passait le bill des franchises, octroyant le droit de vote à un grand nombre de tribus sauvages de la Puissance, j'espère bien qu'il avait consulté les agents de ces tribus ; mais ce n'est pas sur la foi des réponses qu'il a reçues de ces agents, qui étaient ses employés, qu'il a octroyé le droit de vote aux différentes tribus sauvages du Dominion. Et je trouve fort étrange, si ce n'est pas une farce sinistre que l'on veut faire, que l'on dise : "avant de permettre à ces citoyens de Caughnawaga, ou d'ailleurs, d'élire des chefs et des conseillers, l'on va consulter notre agent pour savoir s'ils sont assez avancés." Comment le gouvernement qui a fait ces tribus sauvages les égaux des autres habitants de la Puissance peut-il dire sérieusement qu'il n'est pas assez renseigné pour savoir s'ils sont capables de faire leur cuisine tout seuls.

Je ne blâme pas le gouvernement d'avoir donné le droit de vote aux Sauvages, d'avoir conféré tous les droits des citoyens aux tribus sauvages de la Puissance. Je ne parle pas de toutes les tribus de la Puissance, je m'abstiendrai à parler en particulier de la tribu de Caughnawaga, que j'ai l'honneur de représenter et que je connais plus particulièrement. Je dis que le gouvernement a fait, en leur accordant le droit de vote, non-seulement un acte de générosité, mais un acte de justice ; et il ferait de même en leur permettant d'élire des chefs et des conseillers quand le besoin s'en fait sentir. Ce n'est pas une faveur que ces bons citoyens demandent, c'est un acte de justice. Et quand je dis que je parle plus particulièrement au sujet des Indiens de la réserve de Caughnawaga, c'est parce que je les connais plus intimement ; parce que je les ai vus en relations journalières depuis nombre d'années avec les bons habitants des comtés de Laprairie et de Châteauguay, et de la ville de Lachine. Je suis convaincu par l'expérience qu'ils ont hérité de leurs mœurs et de leurs coutumes, et par conséquent, il devrait leur être permis de jouir du bénéfice des lois qui régissent les autres citoyens du Dominion.

Pour toutes ces raisons, M. l'Orateur, je pense que le gouvernement se fera non-seulement un devoir de déposer sur le bureau de la Chambre les documents qui sont mentionnés dans ma motion, mais qu'il répondra d'une manière satisfaisante à ces différentes requêtes, et qu'il prendra en considération les observations que je viens de faire. Je fais cette demande non pas comme représentant les Indiens de Caughnawaga, mais au nom de la justice, du droit et de l'équité.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN: M. l'Orateur, en l'absence de mon collègue, le ministre de l'Intérieur qui, je regrette de le dire, est sérieusement indisposé, je dirai quelques mots en réponse aux représentations que vient de faire l'honorable député.

Il n'y a pas d'objection à accorder sa demande, c'est-à-dire, à déposer sur le bureau de la Chambre les documents mentionnés dans sa motion. Je ne suis pas au fait de la question qui concerne l'élection des chefs ou des conseillers par les tribus sauvages. L'honorable député paraît en connaître presque aussi long que moi sur cette question, et même un peu plus, parce qu'il a déjà en mains tous les papiers qu'il demande. Cependant, je crois qu'il n'a pas eu tort de les demander, parce qu'il pourra ainsi faire participer les autres membres de la Chambre à la connaissance qu'il possède.

Je suis convaincu que si l'honorable ministre de l'Intérieur était ici, il aurait de bonnes raisons à donner à l'honorable député pourquoi il n'y a pas encore eu de décision sur ce sujet. Le fait qu'à deux reprises le département des Sauvages a déclaré en réponse aux questions posées par télégrammes, que le département allait consulter l'agent, et la dernière réponse que le gouvernement n'agirait pas dans le moment, me portent à croire que la question a été référée à l'agent pour renseigner le département. Il est impossible que le ministre de l'Intérieur puisse savoir dans quelle condition sont les Sauvages de Caughnawaga ou d'une autre tribu sans consulter les agents. On peut bien savoir généralement qu'il y a des sauvages qui sont très avancés, très intelligents, et nombre d'entre eux, très instruits. J'en connais même que l'on ne prendrait pas pour des Sauvages, qui sont aussi blancs que des blancs et qui, par leur intelligence, pourraient certainement lutter avec n'importe quel blanc. Mais cela ne veut pas dire que toutes les tribus devraient être affranchies et autorisées à élire des chefs et des conseillers. L'honorable député ayant attiré l'attention du département sur cette question, je suis convaincu que le ministre de l'Intérieur la prendra en considération aussitôt qu'il lui sera possible de le faire.

M. LAURIER: M. l'Orateur, si mon honorable ami a réussi à stimuler ce que j'appellerais l'indolence du gouvernement sur cette matière, il sera justement arrivé au point où il voulait en venir. Il est évident que mon honorable ami avait en vue, non seulement d'obtenir les papiers qui sont mentionnés dans sa motion—parce que je crois qu'il a déjà ces documents en main—mais il voulait savoir pourquoi une requête qui paraît aussi naturelle que celle-là, une requête par laquelle les Sauvages demandent d'élire des conseillers ou des chefs aux termes de la loi, n'a pas encore été accordée.

Il y a une singulière anomalie dans la loi au sujet des Sauvages. On leur donne droit de vote sans consulter l'agent, par un acte du parlement, comme l'a fait remarquer mon honorable ami; on leur donne droit, par conséquent, de se prononcer sur toutes les questions qui peuvent affecter le pays en général; et cependant, comme l'a dit mon honorable ami dans un langage assez pittoresque, quand il s'agit simplement d'administrer leur propre cuisine; quand il s'agit d'élire des chefs et des conseillers, le gouvernement ne peut pas se décider à leur accorder ce droit de lui-même; il est obligé de consulter l'agent. Je soupçonne qu'il y a peut-être au fond de cette affaire-là de la mauvaise volonté de la part de l'agent, et l'obstacle vient peut-être plus de la part de l'agent que de la part du gouvernement. Il est un fait bien connu que s'il y a des Sauvages qui sont arrivés à un certain diapason de civilisation dans le pays, ce sont certainement les Sauvages de Caughnawaga, et je ne crois pas que l'on trouve, dans Ontario ou dans Québec, des Sauvages qui sont plus avancés qu'eux sous aucun rapport. Mon honorable ami a fait cette demande parce que les requêtes de ces Sauvages ne reçoivent pas de réponse. Ils pétitionnent et on leur dit qu'il faut consulter l'agent; ils pétitionnent de nouveau, et on leur fait la même réponse. L'objet de mon ami est de connaître les faits, parce qu'il y a raison de croire qu'il y a de la mauvaise volonté de la part de cet officier-là.

Motion accordée.

Mr. DORON.

NOEL FORTIN.

M. Fiset demande—

Copie de la correspondance entre J. C. Pottinger, écrivain, surintendant du chemin de fer Intercolonial, et M. Noël Fortin, de la paroisse de St-Fabien, concernant l'accident et les dommages causés à ce dernier par suite du mauvais état des passages à niveau du chemin de fer.

M. l'Orateur, je dirai quelques mots seulement au sujet de cette motion, et je crois que cela sera suffisant pour attirer l'attention du gouvernement, afin d'éviter le retour de pareils accidents.

Le pétitionnaire, M. Fortin, se plaint des traverses du chemin de fer de l'Intercolonial. En effet, presque chaque printemps, dans le comté de Rimouski, où il y a beaucoup de neige, des accidents arrivent. Je crois que les concessionnaires n'entretiennent pas assez bien les passages publics, ils se contentent d'ouvrir la ligne sans ôter la neige sur la voie de chaque côté. L'accident dont se plaint M. Noël Fortin est arrivé l'année dernière. Cette année plusieurs accidents sont encore arrivés, notamment à Cyrilas Dastous, Auguste Berger, Philippe Coulombe, et à d'autres dont les noms m'échappent.

Il me semble que le seul fait d'attirer l'attention du gouvernement sur ce point sera suffisant pour l'engager à remédier à cet état de choses.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN: M. l'Orateur, je ferai observer à l'honorable député que sa motion devrait s'arrêter à ces mots: "concernant l'accident et les dommages causés à ce dernier." Car il nous fait dire que c'est en conséquence de l'état défectueux des traverses du chemin de fer, que l'accident est arrivé. Nous ne savons pas cela. Mais la première partie de sa motion, c'est-à-dire la correspondance qui a été échangée au sujet de cet accident,—et je présume que c'est tout ce que l'honorable député veut avoir,—il ne peut pas y avoir d'objection à la produire.

M. Fiset: Je ferai remarquer à l'honorable ministre qu'il me semble que ma motion est bien rédigée: "Concernant l'accident et les dommages causés à ce dernier par suite du mauvais état des passages à niveau du chemin de fer."

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN: L'honorable député ne m'a pas compris. La première partie de sa motion qui se termine aux mots: "accidents et les dommages causés à ce dernier,"..... jusque là est correcte. Ensuite il nous fait dire la cause de l'accident, et c'est à cette dernière partie que je m'oppose, parce que ce serait nous faire admettre une chose qui, peut-être, ne sera pas justifiée par les documents du département. Par conséquent, je lui demanderais de retrancher les mots: "par suite du mauvais état des passages à niveau du chemin de fer"..... De cette façon il atteindra le même but, et il ne nous mettra pas dans la position d'admettre une chose que nous ne connaissons pas.

M. LAURIER: Je crois que l'honorable ministre des travaux publics a raison. Mon savant ami est probablement d'opinion que l'accident dont il a parlé a été causé par le passage à niveau en question; peut-être que le gouvernement est d'une opinion contraire. Dans tous les cas, ce que veut mon honorable ami, c'est d'avoir ces papiers, et il les obtiendra pareillement en supprimant ces mots. Si plus tard il juge à propos de faire une autre motion au sujet de ce passage à niveau, il pourra le faire.

La motion est adoptée telle qu'amendée.

EASTERN EXTENSION RAILWAY.

Mr. KIRK moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Government, or any member thereof, and the municipal councils of the counties of Pictou, Antigonish and Guysboro', N.S., and any other persons; together with copies of resolutions passed by the said municipal councils relative to the repayment by the Government of moneys paid by the said municipal counties for the right of way for the Eastern Extension Railway, now owned and in possession of the Government.

He said: This is a question in which, as the resolution indicates, these three counties, embracing four municipalities, are interested. The law in Nova Scotia provides that, wherever a company or the Government build a railway, the municipality, or the inhabitants of the municipality through which the railway is built, must supply the right of way, and they do that as well as making grants to the companies. That is a law which existed, I believe, long previous to Confederation, and, as far as I am aware, it is still on the Statute-book. The Cape Breton and Halifax Railway Company, under a contract with the Local Government, built a line of railway from New Glasgow to Port Mulgrave, on the Strait of Canso, being a distance of about eighty miles. The company afterwards transferred that to the Local Government. The company, however, had built the road on the condition of receiving a subsidy in money from the Local Government and the transfer from this Government of the Pictou and Truro Branch Railway. Before the Pictou and Truro Branch was transferred, the company transferred its right in the road to the Local Government, and the Local Government, in consequence of some difficulty between themselves and this Government in reference to the transfer of the Pictou and Truro Branch, compromised the matter and sold their right to this Government at Ottawa, which thus became the owners of the whole line to the Strait of Canso, which is now operated as a part of the Intercolonial. The terms of the compromise with this Government do not secure for the municipalities the amount of money which was paid by the people for the right of way. The people feel a deep interest in the matter, and the municipalities in the different counties have moved in the matter, and I believe have had some communication with the Government in regard to it. I notice that the municipality of Pictou passed the following resolution:

"Whereas this county has been for some years paying, and there is still a large amount due, for the right of way for the Eastern Extension Railway, which latter amount, although the proprietors have been paid, is still a liability of the county, as county debentures have been issued for the same; and whereas the Dominion Government have become the proprietors of this railway and it is part of the I. O. R.; and whereas in all other cases of Government railways in the Dominion it is the policy of the Dominion Government to pay the cost of the right of way; therefore resolved, that the members of the county in the Dominion Parliament be requested to represent our case to the Dominion Government and request that Government to refund to this county such amounts as we have paid for that purpose and also assume the balance that this county is responsible for."

I believe this resolution was passed unanimously by the municipal council, of which I believe the senior member for Pictou is a member. I have no doubt that the hon. gentlemen who so worthily represent the county of Pictou have been pressing upon the Government to refund this money in accordance with the resolution which I have read. I understand that the municipal councils of the other municipalities have passed resolutions somewhat similar in purport. I have not seen them, and this came to me by accident, as someone happened to send me the minutes and proceedings of the Pictou Council. I believe the other municipal councils have been pressing upon this Government the necessity of their refunding the money which has been paid for the right of way, inasmuch as it is and has been the policy of this Government wherever it has built branch railways, to buy the right of way, and not to require the municipalities through which the railway passes to pay anything for it. I feel that it is only necessary to bring this matter before the Government, as not only are the hon. gentlemen who represent Pictou interested in this matter, but the Minister of Justice himself represents one of the counties which has been taxed very fully for the right of way.

Motion agreed to.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH JAMAICA.

Gen. LAURIE moved for:

Copies of correspondence and proposals connected with the visit of the delegates from the Island of Jamaica to Ottawa, in 1885, and of proposed delegations from other West India Islands, whether for the purpose of considering closer political relations or solely with a view to closer commercial relations. Also correspondence from the Imperial authorities on the same subject.

He said: In reference to this motion I would say that whilst all parties in this country are desirous of obtaining a market for the products of our manufactures, I think we hardly give sufficient attention to a proposal that appears to have been made for closer commercial relations with us, if not actual political relations, by a very important portion of Her Majesty's dominions, at least important to us, because we already trade largely with them—I refer to the West Indies. I hold in my hand the proceedings of the Legislative Council of Jamaica for 1884, in which I find that the question was submitted for more intimate and closer commercial and political relations between Canada and the West Indies. That subject was discussed, but it did not receive the approval of the Legislative Council to any great extent. But the matter was also discussed by a very influential body of property holders in Jamaica, the Jamaica Planters' Association in London, and they highly approved of the scheme for the entrance of Jamaica as a province into the Canadian Confederation. They desired that it might be brought before the Dominion Legislature, but I am not aware that any further steps were taken. But the following year it was again brought up in the Legislative Council of Jamaica in another shape, expressive of a desire for closer commercial relations with the Dominion of Canada. Then the scheme met with hearty approval, and I find that in discussing the sending of a delegation to Canada, strong expressions were made in its favor. One of the members of the Legislative Council said that he was satisfied the day would come when they would burn bonfires at the prospect of having closer commercial relations with us than they have now. Every member expressed the same view, practically, and the resolution passed unanimously. In 1885, accordingly, a delegation visited Canada, but from various causes the matter appears not to have met with much encouragement in Canada. I conceive, Sir, that at the present time when we are desirous of developing our trade relations, we might reasonably consider this proposition. It is well, at any rate, that we should ascertain the position in which we stand, and the proposal that Jamaica has made to us. Now, Sir, I find that although a delegation from Jamaica only visited Canada, a delegation from the Leeward Islands were also prepared to come here, but the intimation was given, I understand, from the Colonial Office, that Her Majesty's Government would not view with approval any proposition for the admission of a portion only of the West Indies into the Canadian Confederation, or into closer commercial relations with Canada, but that if any proposal was made, it should include the West Indies as a whole. Now, to show that the Home Government do not disapprove of the idea, I may say that Lord Derby, then Colonial Secretary, stated that:

"It was difficult to conceive of any arrangement between Canada and the West Indies to which the British Government could raise an objection."

Other than, of course, that the West Indies should make separate and isolated arrangements. Now, Sir, without taking the House through all the details of the trade of the whole of the West Indies, I may refer more particularly to the Island of Jamaica, and we may enquire whether its trade offers any prospect that would render it desirable for us to encourage them in their proposal for closer trade relations. The population of the Island of Jamaica is about 580,000; of the Leeward Island, 120,000.

Mr. DAVIES. How many whites in that 580,000?

Gen. LAURIE. I can ascertain by the census, but I have it not before me. I am at present discussing the trade question; I am not discussing Confederation with the West Indies. I suppose a black man's money is as good as a white man's.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman said that the population was 580,000. I merely desired to know how many of those are whites, and he has not answered me.

Gen. LAURIE. No, because I do not think it bears particularly on the point I am discussing. But at the same time, if the hon. member desires it, and if the House will not object to my detaining them, I shall be happy to furnish the information. But, at the present moment, I am only discussing the trade relations, and I am dealing more particularly with the imports and exports of Jamaica. I suppose it is immaterial to us, when we are seeking in all quarters markets for our goods, what color the people are with whom we trade, I do not think that we enquired, in a former discussion in this House, whether the population was white or black among the 60,000,000 that have been talked about. Now, I take Jamaican trade as an illustration of the trade of the West Indies. The imports of Jamaica are $6,500,000. The imports from the British Possessions are $871,000, and from the United States, $2,301,000. Now, Sir, analysing this trade to ascertain what articles we could supply, I will give you a few items. I find that the total amount of breadstuffs imported into Jamaica is $2,695,000; of this amount they import from the British Possessions only $800,000, and from the United States $1,599,000. Of liquors—as long as we manufacture them, and until prohibition comes into force, we may discuss that item—they import $235,000; of these the British Provinces furnish only $873, and the United States $5,515. Of tobacco they import $55,000, of which the United States furnish $48,000, and we furnish none. Of furniture they import $105,000, of which the British Possessions, who certainly manufacture furniture in abundance, only furnish $40, while the United States furnish $28,610. Of clothing Jamaica imports $1,755,000, of which the British Possessions furnish $6,000, and the United States $57,235. Of hardware they import $340,000, of which the British Possessions furnish only $2,560, and the United States $71,635. Of building materials they import $240,000, of which we furnish only $34,000, and the United States $172,000. Machinery and tools, $195,000, of which only $7,555 worth came from British Possessions, as compared with $58,000 from the United States. Coals and coke, $190,000. Of this sum only $825 worth came from British Possessions, and $3,075 from the United States. Books, $48,000; British Possessions, $1,700, United States, $6,000. The next item is miscellaneous, a portion of which we might not be able to furnish; but I claim that all the preceding items we could furnish. The value of miscellaneous goods was $750,000, of which the British Possessions sent only $20,000 and the United States $250,000. I have thus shown that out of total imports of $6,500,000 we send in far less than $1,000,000 worth, while the United States sends in nearly $2,500,000. I will not detain the House by giving comparative statements, and entering more fully into details, but I may mention that of cotton goods—and the West Indies form a desirable market for them—we send in only $10,000 worth, while the United States send in $930,000 worth. In dealing with this question it will be asked, What are we to take in return? Every article we desire to take, I maintain. They produce what we want just as we produce what they want. It is commonly believed, too commonly, that the business of Jamaica is mainly sugar and that sugar is the main export. But the sugar export of Jamaica is really only one-sixth of the total export, there remaining five-sixths being largely made up of logwood and other articles of commerce, so that Jamaica would not alone overload our market with its sugar. Our consumption of sugar is 100,000 tons a year, while their production is only about 25,000 tons; so we have to go outside Jamaica to obtain the sugar we require. The total exports, of course, from the whole West Indies aggregate much more than our present consumption; but if we entered into commercial relations with them the duty on sugar would be taken off and our sugar consumption would be very largely increased. This would no doubt be the case if sugar was as cheap as it is in England, where the consumption is nearly double what it is in Canada under our present system by which a large revenue is collected from sugar, and as a luxury it is considered an article from which it is considered reasonable to collect a revenue. But the consumption is increasing very largely,—but this has only taken place within the last year, the increase having been no less than 20,000 tons. This shows that with our increasing population and with our increased prosperity, should such commercial relations be entered into as is proposed in the resolution, the consumption of sugar would be very largely increased. I do not say we could take the whole production of the West Indies for some time to come, but we could approach it, and they would retain the facilities for marketing their product in those markets we possess now, so that the objection raised that we could not consume the whole sugar of the West Indies I conceive fails to the ground. There is a serious question involved, and that is the question of the duty on sugar, this being such an important part of our revenue, and the further question as to how that amount should be made up. I do not hesitate to recognise the fact, and face the difficulty that is involved in this question. I believe, however, that is practically the principal difficulty in connection with the entering into commercial relations with the West Indies. Difficulties there may be in connection with having closer political relations, difficulties that have been pointed out by the hon. member for Queen's P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), but I believe we have statesmanship in this country, as in the country to the south of us, to deal with that difficulty. I believe we might most reasonably enter into closer commercial relations with those islands. I hold that as a large amount of money has been spent to develop the country to the west of the Provinces which first formed the Dominion, which expenditure has given great impetus to the trade of the western Provinces, it is highly desirable that we in the east should have an impetus given to our trade, and I conceive nothing would give it greater impetus than bringing the West Indies into closer commercial relations with ourselves. I believe it would stimulate our commerce and stir our heart blood, it would stir up commercial enterprise, and I believe far greater life would pervade the eastern Provinces than we now find there. There is plenty of room for it, and we desire this result to be brought about, and, therefore, I have not hesitated to bring this matter before the House, especially because I know that the products in which we are chiefly interested are the products that the West Indies largely consume. But while I believe that is of great material, of momentous importance to the Maritime Provinces, I conceive it is also a matter of very great importance to the upper Provinces. I believe, moreover, that one of the great causes of success to the country to the south is that they possess within themselves the products of the temperate and practically of the tropical zone, and if we could bring the West Indies into closer commercial relations with ourselves, which they themselves have proposed—for remember we are not going after them, but they have come to us and made this proposition—it would materially advance the interests and prosperity of the Dominion as a whole.

Gen. LAURIE.

Mr. BROWN. I think both the House and the country are under a debt of gratitude to the hon. gentleman for bringing this important subject before the House. I do not intend at this time to enter into any discussion of the subject, but as one engaged in commerce I think we cannot over-estimate the importance of the question which the hon. gentleman has presented. I know it is surrounded with many difficulties and would require to be closely investigated; at the same time the requirements of the West Indies are to so very large an extent for articles the product of Canada, that I feel satisfied arrangements might be made of the character indicated in the resolution.

Mr. SKINNER. As seconder of the resolution I hope the result of the statements placed before the House and the country by the hon. gentleman, and the resolution moved by him, will be that the Government will turn their attention towards that portion of the British Dominion, with a view to opening free commercial relations between them and us. Whilst I favor free unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, I cannot forget that trade should be opened up with the British West Indies and British Possessions in America, and that this would be of paramount importance to the interests of the whole Dominion; and, as has been intimated, we on the seaboard feel that if we could have a fair share of that trade, which we certainly could have if we had free commercial relations with them, it would not only benefit us on the seaboard, but it would place us in a position to have more advantageous trade with the western portion of Canada as well. At the present time Ontario and Quebec have to be paid for the products they send to us largely, by money rather than by interchange of goods, though, of course, we send a good deal from the Maritime Provinces to western Ontario; but if trade with the West Indies was opened up their purchasing power would materially increase, and the increase of that power would enure to the benefit of Canada. Therefore, it is not an isolated nor a local question, but it is one of the greatest importance to the interests of the whole Dominion. I am very much gratified that this question has been brought up, and I have pleasure in seconding the resolution. I hope the Government will pay attention to what has been said with reference to it, and that we may look forward to speedy action on their part, having in view the opening up of commercial relations in the reciprocal sense with the West Indies particularly, and with the whole of the British Possessions in America.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I desire to express my own gratification at the action taken by the member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie), in bringing this matter to the attention of the House and the country. I regard a motion of this kind with regard to more intimate trade relations between the West Indies, or even any outside country, and Canada as the natural outcome of the efforts of the Conservative party in this country in the direction of the National Policy. It was my pleasure to visit a portion of Central America last fall, and in British Honduras and Guatamela, where the climatic conditions are somewhat similar to those of the West India Islands, I found that the Americans were making large advances in promoting their commercial interests in that direction. It did occur to me while there that something might be done by the Government of this country in seeking and acquiring more intimate trade relations with that portion of the world. I believe that of all the outside countries that purchase the surplus products of this country, the West India Islands rank fourth. That being the case the subject cannot be overestimated as to the importance of encouraging trade with these countries which are so anxious apparently to trade with us. Another thing in my opinion is this, that in those countries it must not be supposed that because a small percentage of the population is white, that therefore the rest of the population are useless so far as being producers and useful members of community is concerned. On the contrary, Sir, a large proportion of the colored population of those countries are energetic, hard-working, intelligent business men, and that fact being taken into consideration, as is shown indeed by the trade statistics quoted by the member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie), I repeat again that the importance of this subject is one which cannot be overestimated. I regard it as the natural outcome of our support of the National Policy in this country, that it is our duty to extend our outside market as much as possible, and I think if we do extend our outside market as much as possible, that possibly we will find that the manufacturers of this country will not manifest any desire for a further extended trade, although it is possible, if we do not take some steps in that direction, some manufacturers themselves may desire to see that outside market extended. I wish to express my own views individually upon the Government that this matter is of very great importance. I took occasion to write to the Government, on my return from Central America last fall, as to the importance of this subject, and I was glad to receive in reply a letter which told me that already steps had been taken and that Mr. Jones, a gentleman well fitted for that purpose, had been sent from St. John to the Argentine Republic. I may say, furthermore, that I think the manufacturers of this country and those largely engaged in commerce might of their own accord show a little more enterprise than they have yet displayed in encouraging our trade with that portion of the country. Those countries produce many things that we require, and in all articles of woodenware particularly I do not see, with the facilities which we have in the way of shipping, why we cannot, at all events, compete with our neighbors to the south.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The subject brought to the attention of the House by the member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) is of a very interesting character but one that involves very heavy responsibilities on our fiscal policy, which the Government of the country would have to take charge of and be responsible for. This subject of trade with the British West Indies is not a new one. It has been discussed in this House on previous occasions and it was discussed in 1884 when delegates were sent from the Island of Jamaica to confer with the Government of this Dominion. On that occasion I had the opportunity of meeting those gentlemen, with all of whom I am well acquainted, and they returned to Jamaica with the feeling that they had not received from the Government of the Dominion that courtesy which they thought they had a right to expect. It appeared from their representations that the Government of Jamaica had received communications from the Government of this country intimating that this Government would be prepared to discuss with the delegates, any question relating to an exchange of products, or the larger question of trade generally between the two countries. When those delegates arrived at Ottawa they were put off from day to day by the Government and had to return to Jamaica without ever having elicited from the Government of this country any opinion as to the course they were prepared to adopt on the subject. It was a regrettable affair, because I know those gentlemen returned to Jamaica very much disappointed, and they did not hesitate to express, at public meetings in various places where they addressed the merchants, their great disappointment in that matter. It must not be forgotten in this connection that the Government had a rather difficult question before them. On that occasion I took the ground that the Government had to consider the matter very seriously, because any action looking to a free exchange of products with the West India Islands involved a very large loss of revenue as would be the case if the Government admitted sugar into this country duty free. Of course the delegates from the West Indies would only open negotiations on that basis and nothing but the free admission of their products into this country would be of any service to them. Therefore, they were naturally anxious to know at once whether the Government were disposed to entertain a proposition on that basis. One can very easily see that the Government would hesitate a long time before they would adopt a policy under which they were going to lose a large amount of revenue and sugar. The product of the Island of Jamaica taken alone is about 40,000 tons a year, and if such arrangements were adopted that would only supply one-half the consumption of the Dominion. Therefore, under those circumstances, the planters of Jamaica would have a benefit of the duty which we now levy on sugar, because we have to be driven outside to make up the balance, and the Government I presume naturally looked at it in that light and made up their minds that they could not under those circumstances afford to lose the revenue. I do not blame them for it because they were responsible for the management of the affairs of this country, and they had to look at the question in all its aspects. But the people of Jamaica were not so very anxious for union with Canada as they were for a union with the United States. They in fact voted down a resolution proposed by Mr. Solomon, the leader of that view in their Legislature, for a union with the Dominion, and by a very large majority they voted a resolution in favor of opening up negotiations with the United States. They go on to show in a report of some length, which I need not detain the House by reading, but which is signed by Mr. Farquharson, Mr. Walker and Mr. Bennet, three members of the Legislative Council, that in the event of the United States agreeing to their proposal and admitting their products duty free, they would have to admit the products of the United States free to the same extent, and they proceed to show how the loss of revenue could be made up. The imports of Jamaica are about $6,600,000, and the exports $7,750,000; the total revenues amount to $3,000,000, the expenditure to $2,845,000, and the debt to $15,750,000. Its imports from the Dominion of Canada amount to about 11 per cent., from the United States 27 per cent., from England 58 per cent., and from other countries 3 per cent. The people of Jamaica considered this question, and they were quite willing that a proposal of that kind should be made, provided their products were admitted free into the country with which they should negotiate. With reference to the observations of the hon. gentleman who spoke last, looking to the shipment of our manufactured articles not only to Jamaica but to all of the West Indies, under our present fiscal policy it is utterly impossible for the manufacturers of this country to attempt to compete in Jamaica with the English manufacturers. If it requires from 25 to 50 per cent. of duty to keep English goods out of the Canadian market, hon. gentlemen, I think, will see, without much explanation, under what disadvantages our manufacturers would have to compete with goods manufactured under the free trade policy of Great Britain. Therefore, however desirable it may be—and I do not deny that it is desirable—that we should increase the exports of our manufacturers, it is utterly impossible that they can compete with the manufacturers of Great Britain in those markets when we have to put on such a high tariff to keep them out of our own. With regard to exports in natural products, there are no doubt many articles which might find a market in the West Indies at certain times of the year; but our chief product along the coast, which is fish, now finds a market there to as large an extent as the needs of those countries require; and when the hon. gentleman who introduced this resolution said that it was a matter of vital importance to the people of the Maritime Provinces, he was perhaps hardly aware that that trade was developed at present to its fullest extent. If the consumption increased, we should find merchants with sufficient enterprise and knowledge of trade to take advantage of it, and they were only sorry that those markets do not take our products to a larger extent than they do. I should like to see our trade increased with the West Indies if it could be done in any legitimate way; but any trade that is forced, must necessarily be forced at the expense of the community, and I do not think that is a fiscal policy in accordance with the spirit of the age. In relation to the admission of sugar from the West Indies, the Government sent a delegate to the West Indies the year before last, and his report was submitted to this House last year, but it has never elicited any public notice, and has not been referred to by any of the gentlemen who have spoken on that subject in the House. I say nothing about the suitability of the gentleman who made that report for the undertaking, but he was not able to show that there was any field there for the development of our trade beyond the gradual development that was already going forward, because everything that we were producing applicable to the wants of those people was being supplied to them in a regular, expeditious and economical manner, and meeting all the wants of the people. Therefore, no further action was taken in regard to that. A great deal is said nowadays about fostering this trade, and no one would like to see it increased more than I; but the wants of a people are the test of the extent to which trade can be developed; and if the country cannot receive more than it now receives in a regular way, any money expended for such a purpose would only be a waste of the public revenues of the country. I presume the Government will have to consider any proposition of this kind with very great care, because if it is carried out it will entail the loss of a very large amount of revenue. At the same time, judging from the reports which I hold in my hand, and the proceedings in the Legislature of Jamaica, the people there appear to be looking to the United States rather than to us, because the United States furnishes a market which will take all their products, while we can take only a portion of them. All their fruits, spices, logwood, lignum vitae and rum would find a market in the United States, while we could only take their fruits to a small extent. Therefore, if they could get their sugar free into the United States, it would be of much greater advantage for them to send the whole of their products there, and that is the direction in which they are looking at the present time.

Mr. JONES, (Halifax.)

Mr. McNEILL. I am quite sure that the House, and, I think, the country, will thank the hon. gentleman who has introduced this resolution for the course he has taken here to-day. I am sure we all admired the practical and able manner in which he laid his views before the House with reference to a subject the importance of which to the people of this country I think can scarcely be exaggerated. I confess that I was surprised when I found that the consensus of approval which seemed to exist in the House, as to what the hon. gentleman had said, was broken by the observations which have fallen from the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. I am very sorry indeed to find an hon. gentleman on that side of the House set about deliberately to throw cold water on a movement in this direction. I think a movement which has for its object the drawing closer of the bonds which unite the various parts of this Empire together ought to be one which would commend itself to the approval of the members of this House. The hon. gentleman seemed very much oppressed with the difficulties that would arise in connection with the loss of revenue which might accrue from the adoption of the policy suggested by the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution. I perceived that he was not so tremulous about the loss of revenue a few days ago when a very much greater loss of revenue was imperilled by the proposition he then supported. I very much regret to find that so soon as a proposal of this kind is brought before us, there should be a party in this House who are prepared to belittle it and stunt it and prevent its development. When I say a party, I do not refer to the Reform party; but there are individuals connected with that party who seem to take a special pride and pleasure in doing all they can to prevent that unity which we desire to see maintained and strengthened in the Empire to which we are proud to belong. My hon. friend who moved the resolution pointed out that there was a great deal of trade which might be fostered between Canada and the West Indies. He pointed out that this trade had fallen into the hands of our natural commercial rivals, and the hon. gentleman in reply spoke of the competition of Great Britain. My hon. friend did not refer to the competition of Great Britain; he referred to the competition of the United States, and he pointed out the requirements of the people of Jamaica which were being filled by the United States, and which we ourselves could supply. I am glad to find that, at all events, there was one gentleman on that side prepared to support the resolution. He said it would benefit the people of the Maritime Provinces, and that he believed it would also benefit the people of western Canada. I am quite sure that anything which would benefit the people of the Maritime Provinces would be hailed with pleasure and approbation by the people of the west. We are one people and one Dominion as we are one Empire, and I am satisfied that the policy my hon. friend has suggested is a policy which will be approved of by the people of this country. I sincerely hope that the Government will do all that they can to promote that policy, and thus develop the natural trade which ought to exist between Canada and our near neighbors and fellow-countrymen in the West Indies.

Mr. ELLIS. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has referred to the cold water thrown on this movement, but in doing so he laid the blame on the wrong quarter. The hon. gentleman ought to know that the cold water was thrown by the Government he follows. I was a member of the Board of Trade of St. John when these delegates came to St. John, fresh and warm from Ottawa, and it is impossible to give any idea of the indignation they felt at their reception by the Government. Whether the Government was right or wrong, I do not say, but I say that such was the feeling these gentlemen had when they came to St. John.

Mr. McNEILL. The more necessary then the hon. gentleman should move his resolution.

Mr. ELLIS. Precisely; but I do not think my hon. friend ought to be so very unfair as he is with regard to a matter of this kind, and should have informed himself of the exact facts before making the statement he did.

Mr. KENNY. I regret exceedingly I was not in the House when this discussion began with reference to the trade relations between the Dominion of Canada and the West Indies. This is a matter, the importance of which has been frequently recognised in this Legislature. I have simply this opinion to express upon it, that, in endeavoring to secure this important outlet for our products, we must be in a position to compete on equally favorable terms with our neighbors of the United States. Formerly that business was done exclusively by sailing vessels, and it is still conducted in that manner in the Province of Nova Scotia. Now, I hold strongly to the opinion which I expressed last Session that it is impossible for us to compete on advantageous terms for that valuable trade unless we employ steamers. Last year, in my place in Parliament, I urged the Government, to the best of my ability, to subsidise a line of steamers to open and develop trade with the West Indies. I was told then that no line of steamers then plying between the United States and the West Indies was subsidised. I do not know that to-day even any such line is subsidised. But I do know that when the Atlas line of steamers first began to ply between Jamaica and New York, it was subsidised by the Island of Jamaica to the extent of £5,000 a year, which was afterwards reduced to £2,000, and which finally, when the trade increased and developed to such an extent as to become self-supporting, was withdrawn. I contend that a subsidy would be advantageous; I contend that a line of steamers plying between the Province of Nova Scotia and the West Indies would be very largely advantageous to our fishermen. I think we recognise to-day that all business must be conducted with regularity, and that we cannot hope to secure regular traffic without employing steam. To-day business is very largely done by cable with the West Indies. When a cargo is shipped or prepared to be shipped to the West Indies, the merchant who sells the goods there knows of it, and it is that knowledge which regulates the price of fish in the West India market. The price is regulated, in order words, by supply and demand. We had at one time steamers plying between Halifax and Jamaica; but, unfortunately for Halifax and for the trade of the Dominion at large, they were withdrawn in 1886. They only commenced running in 1880 and they ceased to run in 1886, so that steam communication between the West Indies and the Dominion has not had a very fair trial. In discussing this matter, I labor under the very great disadvantage of not having heard what hon. gentlemen who have spoken before me said on this question. I simply rise to say that in my opinion, at least, if we are to conduct this business advantageously for the Dominion and for ourselves, we must conduct it by steam. Already a large portion of the fish exports from Halifax which formerly went by sailing vessels or by the steamers to which I have referred, find their way to the markets of the West Indies through the port of New York. I find that between the 1st January, 1887, and the 31st December, 1887:

| | |
|----------------------|---------------------------|
| Casks, dry fish..... | 6,225 or 24,900 quintals. |
| Boxes " "..... | 13,662 or 13,000 " |
| Drums " "..... | 61,343 or 61,343 " |
| Total..... | 99,243 " |

were exported from Halifax to Boston and New York, and that we also sent 40,850 barrels of mackerel and 21,055 barrels herring to those cities, a large proportion of which ultimately found a market in the West Indies. I notice that before the Labor Commission, in a recent sitting at Halifax, some evidence with reference to this important trade was taken, and that a gentleman, who is conversant with the business, testified that a large amount of this fish trade went by way of New York. Not knowing that this discussion was going on this afternoon, I have not the papers referred to, but in the course of his evidence, this gentleman mentioned that the rate per barrel from New York was something under 15 cents while from Halifax it was over 50 cents. We all know that it is exceedingly difficult to get goods shipped from Halifax to the West Indies. The merchants who are engaged in that trade use vessels of small tonnage for their own particular business, and they want all the space for their particular trade, and are not prepared to accept cargoes from outsiders, or from those who are engaged in other branches of business. Consequently, not only has fish had to be sent to these West India markets through New York, but many articles of manufacture have had to be sent the same way. It may be said that this very low rate of freight per barrel which exists between New York and the West Indies would be difficult for us to compete with, and that must be admitted; but are the merchants of Montreal prepared to say that, because freight between Liverpool and New York may be lower than it is between Liverpool and Montreal, they do not want steamers to come to Montreal, but are prepared to do their business in sailing vessels? We have this advantage in competing with American ports, that we are nearer the fishing grounds, and can secure our fish on better terms and at cheaper rates than they do, and therefore we can afford to pay a trifle more for freight. During the discussion which took place on that very important reciprocity resolution, great stress was laid, especially by hon. gentlemen on the Opposition benches, on the great advantages which would ensue for Canada by giving us a larger market for our exports. That is exactly what we want, and there is a market in the West Indies which requires the very articles we produce. I do not know whether this afternoon any reference has been made to the large amount of flour which is shipped from the United States to the West Indies. I forget the exact figures, but I know that to Brazil and South America generally, there are nearly three quarters of a million barrels of flour shipped from the United States, besides a very large amount to the West India Islands. I contend that we could do a share of that business from western Canada, and it would be in the interests of the whole Dominion that we should seek to find an outlet there for all our products. Our whole energy should be turned to improve our markets and increase the facilities for transporting our exports. In reference to this matter, an article appeared in a recent number of a Halifax paper, which deals with this West Indies question, and it reads as follows:—

"The serious blunder made by some of our merchants in petitioning the Imperial authorities to withdraw the subsidy of the Cunard line of West India steamships, is daily more apparent. Instead of benefiting the trade of our vessels, the fish now largely finds its way to the West Indies by United States steamers via Boston and New York. Enquiries in the Dominion Senate have elicited the facts that fish to the value of $1,250,000 annually were exported from the Maritime Provinces to South America through the medium of American middlemen, 'who make huge profits thereby.' Mr. Abbott said: 'The Government recognized the importance of direct steamship communication with the West Indies and South America, and had now under consideration, &c.' A few of our merchants by their insane action deprived us of the benefits of a direct steamship line to the West Indies, which was subsidized by the Imperial Government, and now the Dominion authorities will have to rectify the mistake at the expense of our own exchequer. The stoppage of the Cunard line entailed heavy loss on the part of Halifax, and the movers in the petition are deserving of severe censure."

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What paper is that?

Mr. KENNY. The Critic. This is a matter which concerns us very much in the lower Provinces. The last occasion on which I had to address the House was on the subject of the Fishery Treaty. I thought that was a matter in which we in the Maritime Provinces were specially concerned, and in which the constituency which I represent had very much at stake. My hon. friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), addressed the House on that matter, and it is true that I followed him. It happens—it may be unfortunately for the House—that Halifax is represented by one gentleman on the opposite side of the House and by one gentleman on this side. The hon. gentleman on the other side of the House is a man of long parliamentary experience and of recognised debating power, while the gentleman on this side, unfortunately, has none of those qualifications; but, such as they may be, I consider it my duty, when my hon. colleague expresses views in opposition to those which I entertain and which I believe the majority of those whom I represent entertain, to give expression, no matter how imperfectly or how feebly I may do so, to my views. I was rather surprised, at the close of that day's proceedings, to hear the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) intimate that in doing so I had been guilty of some transgression—I do not know whether it was of parliamentary etiquette or that I had done something unusual. I think I was within the strict line of my duty. It was a question, like the present one, in which we in the lower Provinces are especially interested. It vitally concerns us. And I have no apology to offer to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) or any one else for following any hon. gentleman with whom I may differ in the views he places before Parliament.

Mr. KENNY.

Mr. EISENHAEUER. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has addressed the House in favor of the resolution, but I think it is quite evident that in many points he does not understand what he has been talking about, and that he would probably be a better authority on dry goods than on fish. He has endeavored to lead the House to believe that the large quantity of fish exported to the United States by steam has found its way to the West Indies.

Mr. KENNY. I am sure the hon. gentleman does not desire to misrepresent me. What I said was that a large proportion of the dried fish, I believed—I would be sorry to say all—found its way to the West Indies, and that a portion of the pickled fish did so also, but I did not say all.

Mr. EISENHAEUER. I think it is easy to show that a very small portion either of dried or pickled fish finds its way to the West Indies by that route. The hon. gentleman has also referred to the great loss that Halifax and the Maritime Provinces have sustained by the withdrawal of that steamer, but he has failed to tell us why the steamer was withdrawn. As soon as the subsidy was withdrawn, the steamer was withdrawn, because she could not get freight enough outwards and homewards to pay. Very often a steamer on the outward voyage takes but half a cargo, also on the home voyage the cargo is sometimes almost nothing. Does not that go to show that it is a waste of public money to subsidise a steamer to the West Indies? Now, I cannot see why these manufacturers and other people cannot do as I am obliged to do. I am obliged to build my own vessels and sail them, and ship my fish and other articles that I send to the West Indies. The road is open for every person who feels inclined to trade with the West Indies, to put on their steamers if they choose; but they prefer to wait until the Government will grant them a large amount of money for the purpose of giving them an undue advantage over other people who are obliged to sail their own craft without assistance. The hon. gentleman has also referred to the rate of freight. Now, he is entirely mistaken with regard to the rate of freight from Halifax and New York—I think he said it was 15 cents a barrel. I have shipped a little in that way, and I think the rate is about 75 cents from New York to Cuba, or nearly that. This question was very fully discussed last year, and I think the hon. gentleman told us about the same thing last year that he did to-night. I am inclined to think that some of his friends down in Halifax propose to ask a subsidy from the Government this year. I will just say to the Government, as I said last year, that it will be a complete waste of money, in my opinion.

Mr. WELSH. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny) spoke strongly in favor of steamers and in favor of a subsidy. I object to the idea in toto. I say that we have got other risks to look after besides steamboat interests. In Nova Scotia we have employed a large fleet of sailing vessels to carry on trade with the West Indies. I have been engaged in that business for the last thirty years, and have a number of ships running between the West Indies and the Maritime Provinces; but I have no subsidy. Do hon. gentlemen want to destroy the marine interests of this country? I say if it will pay men to put on steamers, let them put them on. Let us have a free course, don't let us handicap sailing ships. If you give steamers a subsidy you must give sailing vessels a subsidy. The hon. gentleman has also spoken about withdrawing the subsidy from the Cunard line that was subsidised by the British Government, as I understand. They ran for a number of years, and what good did the subsidy do them? Did any one ever see a steamer of that line take full cargo out of Halifax and bring a full cargo back to Halifax? Will the hon. member for Halifax tell us that? I object, on principle, to Government subsidies to any steamer, or to any service, except for carrying passengers and mails in connection with the traffic with Government railways; but as for mercantile competition, I say, leave the road open, and if steamers can drive sailing vessels out the route, let them do it; if sailing vessels can drive steamers out the route, let them do it. My hon. friend must know that Halifax has been the centre of West Indies trade for the last fifty years. They have got a large fleet of ships, and can carry anything they want from Halifax to the West Indies in fifteen days, or twenty, at the furthest. I shall, in all cases, oppose any subsidy for any steamboat service for commercial purposes. I want to see steamers and sailing vessels try and compete with each other on a free trade basis. I do not want to subsidise one man and leave another out. Now, the hon. member spoke of the freight rate between New York and England. It is very low, and you can get grain carried for one cent a bushel. Sometimes a ship is very anxious to get ballast to take back home, and they will carry grain as ballast at one cent a bushel. Of course, if shippers had to depend upon that alone they would lose money, but these large steamers make their money by carrying the mails and passengers, and they only take the grain for ballast. There is a great deal of competition in that line, which makes the freight rates low. The law of supply and demand rules in that case, and there is no lack of steamers every year to do the passenger trade. There is a large fleet of steamers running between the United States and the West Indies without any Government subsidy. I think the only steamers that get any subsidy doing West Indies trade are the mail steamers; they do get a subsidy for carrying the mails, and I do not object to that. But I certainly will set my face against mercantile companies coming here and asking the Government to tax the people to pay them subsidies to enable them to compete with the marine interests of the Dominion.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). As representing a maritime constituency, I desire to say that I fear a great many members of Parliament do not realise how important the measure is that is now before the House. The hon. member who has spoken last seems to contemplate, as a necessity, an antagonism between the sailing vessel and the steamer; he speaks as if we were asking the tax-payers to subsidise steamers at the expense of sailing vessels. That is a harsh and unfair way of stating the question. Our real object, by subsidies for these steamers, is to procure and hold for our own people, the trade that is now largely enjoyed by middlemen in the United States. I think it will be found to be a matter of very great importance, and not prejudicial to the owners of sailing vessels; it will be of great importance to St. John and our other maritime cities, that we should have enlarged and new facilities for the West Indies such as my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny) says the Americans have. I desire in the strongest way, as representing a county largely interested in this matter, to urge the importance of this traffic upon the Government.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The inference to be drawn by the hon. gentleman's statement is, that the line of steamers which carry on the traffic between the West Indies and the United States are subsidised in some way by the Government. Such is not the fact. The line of steamers between the United States and the West Indies run on purely commercial principles, and are owned by private citizens, and receive no bonus or subsidy from the United States.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They were started by subsidies, were they not?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think not. I shall read to the hon. gentleman a statement which practically supports the opinion I have given.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). I think I was right in my statement, that these companies were first aided by Government subsidies from the United States.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the hon. gentleman is wrong. I was reading, a short time ago, Mr. Froude's book upon the West Indies; I only speak from memory, but I think, from his statement, that the hon. gentleman is wrong. These steamers were put on for an increasing and ever growing trade. During the past few years the trade between the United States and the West Indies has been rapidly increasing, and the people of the West Indies, if Mr. Froude is to be taken as an authority, are yearly looking more and more, not only for closer commercial relations, but for political relations with the United States. The difficulty is that the United States do not want to receive them politically, although they are perfectly willing to deal commercially with them. The hon. and gallant gentleman who moved this resolution seems to think that I had some desire of impeding his speech by interpolating the question I did. I had no such desire. I listened with great interest to the hon. gentleman's speech, and was very glad to hear him give his views to the House. I have not the slightest desire to quarrel with him. He mentioned the population of Jamaica as being 580,000, and I supposed he mentioned it for the purpose of impressing upon his listeners the idea that it would be a desirable thing to traffic with half a million of people. Very well; I recollect that the white population of Jamaica is about 14,000. The hon. gentleman knows quite well that it does not matter very much whether a man is white or colored for the purpose of trade; still, he knows that a colored population, as a rule, do not consume such goods as we export to the same extent as a white population. So far as the position before the House is concerned, my hon. friend knows that the Government sent a commissioner about two years ago to visit the West Indies, and that gentleman made a report, and so far as one can ascertain from reading the report, about the only recommendation he had to make, as is generally the case I find in these attempts to force artificial trade, was that we should put our hands into the public exchequer and grant a subsidy to some line of steamships. There is always a call to be made upon the Government. I do not belong to that class of politicians who believe that trade could be obtained by granting subsidies. I believe that trade, as a rule, follows natural channels, and that the Government best promotes trade by removing any hindrance in the way of trade following its natural course. I believe there could be no better way of promoting trade with the West Indies than by removing some of the artificial barriers we have erected against it. Our trade with the West Indies is not very large. I believe it only amounts to three per cent. of our total imports and exports. But when a Government commissioner went to those Islands and laid before the people a scheme to promote trade with Canada, what answer did they give him? It was that they did not want to join in giving any subsidy. The Colonial Secretary of Barbadoes, Hon. C. C. Knollys, told Mr. Wyld:

"I was informed by Mr. Knollys that the finances of the Island were in such a state that they could give no encouragement whatever as regards the granting of the subsidy; the Government having to practise the utmost retrenchment in order to make ends meet."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is inability.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is only one of the quotations I wish to read; and I say that so far as the Island of Barbadoes is concerned the Colonial Secretary said they were unable to do anything owing to their financial position,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite so.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Council of the Jamaica Society of Agriculture and Commerce did not confine itself simply to the statement that they were financially unable to grant any subsidy, but they went further and said they were opposed to granting such subsidies on principle. At all events that is the way I understand the answer they gave. I will read the answer, as showing the view that the commercial people of the West Indies take of this question. It is as follows:—

"Sir,—I am directed by the Council of the Jamaica Society of Agriculture and Commerce to acknowledge the receipt of your statement respecting direct steam communication between Canada and the West Indies, and to inform you that at a meeting of the council held on the 24th inst., the following resolution was, after due consideration of the subject, unanimously adopted:—

"Resolved—That the Council, having duly considered the proposals made by Mr. Wyld, regret that it cannot recommend the Government to aid by a subsidy the promotion of steam communication between Canada and the West Indies. The council, however, is quite alive to the advantages which such a line as that proposed would confer and would give it its cordial support.

"I am further directed to call your attention to the fact that, at the present moment, there is no subsidised line of steamers running between this Island and the United States, all the lines at present in operation being purely private enterprises; it is the opinion of the council that the commercial community of this Island is adverse to the granting of subsidies, such as that suggested. The council, also, while fully alive to the great advantages to be derived both by the Dominion of Canada and by Jamaica, by the establishment of a direct steam service, considers that Canada would derive much greater benefit than Jamaica from such service. In illustration of this it is sufficient to refer to the eleventh paragraph of your statement, in which are named the various articles of export which Canada could furnish Jamaica, which articles are at the present time imported from the United States."

"The council desires me also to remind you that the two principal fruit exports of the Island are bananas and oranges, the former of which is the larger of the two. Bananas also are admitted free of duty to the United States. In the absence of any statistical information respecting the consumption of fruit in Canada, the council is unable to compute what the value of this trade is likely to be.

"There likewise seem to be to the council two great drawbacks to the increase of the fruit trade with Canada, should the proposed line of steamers take the route suggested in your statement:

"(1.) The passage from Jamaica to Halifax would occupy from ten to twelve days, much too long a time for perishable articles.

"(2.) If sugar and molasses are to be stowed in the same hold it will be found impossible to carry fruit with any prospect of profit to the shippers.

"The council directs me, in conclusion, to convey to you its sincere thanks for your able statement, and to assure you of its hearty co-operation in aiding the establishment of direct steam communication between Canada and Jamaica.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"J. B. ELLIS,

"Secretary.

"JOHN T. WYLD, Esq.,

"Commercial agent of the Government of Canada to the West Indies."

Talk about throwing cold water on the proposition, I think that the Council of the Jamaica Society of Agriculture and Commerce threw as much cold water as they possibly could. They said the distance is so great, that the time occupied in the voyage from the West Indies to Halifax is so long that fruit will be spoiled, and that it could not be carried in the same hold with molasses and sugar. The fact is that anybody who reads Mr. Froude's late work on the West Indies, will find that he states that the great export from the West Indies for many years back, namely, sugar, is being grown less and less every year; that a feeling akin to despair has seized the planters and those heretofore engaged in the growing of sugar; and the only hope, in Mr. Froude's opinion—he seems to take rather a pessimistic view of the situation—for the West India Islands lies in their abandoning sugar growing and developing the cultivation of fruit. The best fruit in the world can be grown in those islands, and there is an abundant market in the United States. He further states in his book, rightly or wrongly, that all the business men of the West Indies look to the United States for their market; and no doubt the great distance we are from the West Indies, even supposing a treaty was entered into, would act greatly to our disadvantage in competing with the United States. Where people send products there they will buy. The United States seems to be their natural market, and if they sell their sugar or fruit there they will buy a return cargo of such articles as they require. The junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) has stated that it is possible to open up a market for our flour in the West Indies. I am not sufficiently well acquainted with the subject to be able to express an opinion, but I have heard from men of experience that our flour will not keep in that climate. I do not know sufficient about that point to be able to express a definite opinion.

Mr DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. KENNY. With the permission of the House I wish to make a correction. In my remarks I referred to the evidence given before the Labor Commission at Halifax as to the rate of freight that prevailed between New York and the West Indies. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer), referring to my statement that it was 15 cents a barrel, said that instead of such being the case it was only 5 cents a barrel between those points. With the permission of the House I will quote from the evidence taken by Mr. Carney, of James Butler & Co. That gentleman said:

"There are now several large steamers running out of New York, belonging to lines established in later years, which carry fish very cheaply. He instanced the fact that it cost 53 cents to send a barrel of fish from here, while it only cost 12½ cents from New York by these steamers. The decrease in trade was due to no fault of the Government."

So, Sir, instead of it being 75 cents it is only 15, and I think I was nearer the mark than my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer).

Mr. EISENHAUER. I can say that they do not give us those rates. They may have rates for favorites in New York, but I have paid 75 cents for even less than a barrel.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Mr. Speaker, I desire to bear a few words of testimony on this matter, as I consider it important to us in the Maritime Provinces. It is no new subject. In my constituency they have especially been anxious about this matter, and the people of Annapolis saw the necessity for some better communication with the West Indies and other portions of the world and they organised a steamship company. That steamship company to-day is only a company in name, inasmuch as they own no steamships, but it has been a company that has done a great deal for the people of that part of Nova Scotia in the way of increasing the trade. That company went so far as to charter a steamer to run to the West Indies and they went so far as to get the merchants of the West Indies to take shares in the company.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). And they lost all their capital.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I beg your pardon, they did not lose all their capital.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I beg yours, I know it.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). And I beg yours again; I know it. I know what I am talking about, and I know perfectly well the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) does not know what he is talking about. I happen to be the secretary of that company at the present moment, and I am in a position to know what I am talking about. If, by reason of some past internal mismanagement of that company, there were losses incurred, that is no argument against the fact that there is a trade between the Maritime Provinces and the West Indies, and a very valuable trade to my constituents as well as to the other constituents in the Maritime Provinces. We have in the Maritime Provinces grand facilities for communication with the West Indies, and I see no reason why those facilities should not be taken advantage of as well as the facilities have been availed of that obtained between the United States and the West Indies. The hon. member for Prince Edward Island, (Mr. Davies) says that the trade between the West Indies and the United States is increasing. To be sure it is, and it is increasing because trade has been opened up between the two countries; and what are Governments for unless for the encouragement of, and the opening up of new avenues of trade? I contend that there will be sufficient trade between the Maritime Provinces and the West Indies to warrant any government in giving a subsidy to a company to develop it. We entered into that trade in Annapolis without any subsidy whatever. The Government gave us some money to build a wharf and warehouse. We have that wharf and warehouse at the present time, and we have facilities for shipping all kinds of merchandise and all kinds of products from Annapolis to the West Indies. Those facilities should be utilised and they cannot be better utilised than by a line of steamers being put on from Annapolis or St. John or Halifax to the West Indies. I understand that parties are asking the Government for a subsidy for a line of steamers from St. John to the West Indies. I agree with that entirely, but I do not agree that it should entirely be confined to St. John. There are other places in the Maritime Provinces besides St. John and if they place their steamers to run from St. John let them take in Annapolis and Halifax as well. I see no reason why the Government cannot have a line of steamers and I see no reason why that line of steamers should not only pay the parties interested in it directly, but also the country and the Dominion at large.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman said I made a misrepresentation with regard to the Annapolis Company. I wish to explain. The hon. gentleman is correct in saying that they formed the company at Annapolis and I am also correct in saying that it was a company without money being paid up and merely a company on paper. One gentleman, a friend of my own, was induced to take five hundred pounds sterling in that company and he lost every cent of it and never got a cent to the present moment.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I am in a position to know that there is not one single gentleman who took stock in that company but who paid up every single dollar that he took stock for, and there is not a single gentleman who took stock in that company but who has received and will receive something for that stock. I am interested in that company myself to the small extent of $1,000 and I paid it all up. I have received something on that stock—

Some hon. MEMBERS. How much?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I know perfectly well that the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Jones) himself has taken stock in other companies that have not paid nearly so well as that company.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, with regard to this West India trade, I remember that in 1878 that it was stated by hon. gentlemen opposite that the want of a National Policy had caused the West India trade to decline. I believe the Finance Minister and the First Minister told the people throughout the country during the political canvass that if they got possession of the Treasury benches the West India trade would be revived, and that Halifax would be made the centre of that trade from North America as it had been at a previous period. The Trade and Navigation Returns show that the West Indian trade has declined notwithstanding the promise of those hon. gentlemen, and that the effect they said they could produce by the alteration of the fiscal policy upon the trade between Canada and the West Indies, has not been produced and that trade is in a worse position to-day than it was ten years ago. Then, Sir, we were reminded by the member for North Bruce (Mr.

McNeill) that in this matter Canada could successfully compete with the United States if only facilities were furnished to carry on trade between the two countries. He is confident that we could drive the people of the United States out of the West Indian market. I thought the hon. gentleman not very long ago declared that we would not be able to hold our own market against the United States if we were to put upon the footing of equality.

Mr. McNEILL. Excuse me a moment.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You can explain later on.

Mr. McNEILL. Will the hon. gentleman have the fairness to allow me to put him right?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am right.

Mr. McNEILL. If he will not have the fairness to let me do so, all right.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman can make that correction by-and-bye. He is confident of our ability to beat our neighbors in a market 2,000 miles away and he is not confident of our ability to compete with them in our own market. I do not take so hopeless a view of our capacity or our enterprise as the hon. gentleman did a little while ago. It would be an extraordinary way of carrying on trade with the West Indies if we were to adopt a sort of communistic principle, for that is what the hon. gentlemen are advocating, and undertake to subsidise, at the expense of the entire country, a trade that can only be of advantage to a very small number. In fact, Sir, it is not in the interests of the trade generally that it is proposed to grant those subsidies. It is simply in the interest of parties who have property in certain vessels. Those parties would be benefited while those who own ships who are sailing them and taking risks of all kinds of loss in the enterprise they are engaged in would be subject to an unfair competition with subsidised lines of steamers. That is what the hon. gentleman proposes. He expects to build up here a great commercial community upon the principle of taxing the people generally for the benefit of these few. Sir, I do not think the people of this country will be disposed long to submit to that policy. I think the Finance Minister has done a very great deal within the past fortnight to destroy it, and I trust he will lend us his powerful assistance to further discountenance it, and to encourage the people of this country to depend on the habits of self-reliance, energy and enterprise to accomplish those advantages for the country which alone can be of a permanent character.

Gen. LAURIE. I should like to say a few words in reply to one or two observations that have been made. My hon. friend, the member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), pointed out that a motion was brought up in the Jamaica Legislative Council and was there voted down, in favor of closer political relations with Canada. That is so, and so I stated when I moved for the address. But I wish to say, as I stated before—and I hold in my hand, not merely a newspaper report, but the official report of the proceedings in the Royal Gazette—that a motion was carried, with but one dissentient, asking that negotiations for closer commercial relations between Canada and Jamaica should be opened, and those who had opposed the motion for closer political relations, voted in favor of closer commercial relations.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The United States would not have them.

Gen. LAURIE. I am not discussing that, I am stating what the people of Jamaica desired. I also stated that the sugar product of Jamaica was 25,000 or 26,000 tons. The hon. member for Halifax stated that it was 40,000 tons; but here is the statement made in the Legislative Council of Jamaica that the product is 25,000 or 26,000 tons.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It varies.

Gen. LAURIE. Certainly. With reference to the broader question of a subsidy, and the larger effects upon our trade, which I did not introduce, it is asserted that certain products of our country went by a steamship line from the Dominion of Canada to the United States, and thence to the West Indies. That is disputed. Here are the Jamaica returns of the imports into Jamaica from the United States, which state that £25,000 sterling worth of fish went from the United States to Jamaica, while from Canada there went only £134,000 worth; but according to the United States returns, they did not send more than one-third of that value to Jamaica. Well, where did the other two-thirds come from? They came from Canada, but because they went by those steamers from the United States, they were credited to the United States. That opens the question, which I did not open, whether it would be desirable that we should have a direct communication with the West Indies. Now, we have heard very often that the United States is the only market we have for our potatoes. It is very extraordinary if that is the case, for I find that while Canada sent to the West Indies and British Guiana 153,000 bushels, the United States sent twice that quantity, 321,000 bushels. It is evident, then, that they buy our potatoes, for the purpose of selling them again. If they do, would it not be in the interest of our shippers that we should sell direct and get the benefit of the handling? I think it certainly would.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before that motion is carried, I should like to say one word or two. I recollect, as well as my hon. friend beside me, the very extravagant statements that were made by the First Minister and the Minister of Finance as to the great benefits and the great extension of trade with the West Indies that were going to come to the Maritime Provinces from the National Policy. Here in two words is what it has done: In 1878, our exports to the West Indies amounted to $3,314,000, and in 1887 they amounted to $2,075,000, or a loss of a million and a half under the beneficent operation of the National Policy and the wise Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite; and that is the natural result, Sir, of making the production of our articles dearer. So long as you continue to impose these exorbitant taxes, so long as you continue to mass up your debt by hundreds of millions, so long as you continue to put our people at a disadvantage beside the people of the United States, so that to-day our debt is nearly treble the debt of the United States, and our necessary taxes 50 per cent. higher than the necessary taxes of the United States—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, every penny of that, and it will be more if we go on in the same foolish, reckless course that we are taking—so long as we do that it is the idlest folly to talk of opening up new markets. If you want new markets, reduce your taxes and arrest the increase of your debt, and you will not have this result, that at the expiration of ten years of your so-called National Policy, your trade with the West Indies is reduced nearly 50 per cent.

Mr. McLELAN. If the hon. gentleman had taken the column opposite that to which he referred, he would have found that there is a very large increase in the exports to South American countries, of about $800,000; and taking the West Indies along with these, he will find that there is an increase of about $1,000,000, notwithstanding what has been shown in this debate, that a very large quantity of our exports go through the United States and are credited to the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And so they were before, and probably in a larger degree.

Gen. LAURIE.

Mr. GILLMOR. A large part of our exports to the West Indies necessarily go through the United States. The cargoes are made up of a great variety of articles, and it is quite impossible to get a vessel of the smallest capacity loaded sufficiently from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to constitute a cargo. In my own county we put up probably 1,750,000 boxes of smoked herrings which we ship to the West Indies through the United States. The small ports cannot furnish enough articles to make up a cargo; it is only the large ports that can do so. What is meant by these closer commercial relations of which we hear so much? Is it intended to bring the islands nearer to us? Have we not plenty of opportunities for commerce now? Has not the trade been going on for fifty years between Canada and the West Indies? If you want closer commercial relations, adopt the policy of Great Britain, and then you will have the closest commercial relations with all the world. The hon. member for Annapolis suggests that steamers said be subsidised. I grant you that if you will undertake to carry goods for nothing and make the public pay, you will increase the trade. But the hon. gentleman says you must not subsidise steamers to touch at St. Johns and Halifax alone; they must also touch at Annapolis. Well, I want them to touch at St. Ann's also. If they are to be paid out of the public treasury for doing the trade, is not my claim a just one? That shows the absurdity of these speeches calling for Government assistance to encourage trade. What we want is free trade. We want a low tariff, and we want to follow the example of that country to which we are all proud to belong and to which we are all so excessively loyal.

Motion agreed to.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

DETROIT RIVER WINTER BRIDGE.

The following Bill was considered in committee and reported:—

Bill (No. 31) to incorporate the Detroit River Winter Railway Bridge Company.—(Mr. Ferguson, Welland).

THE SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HALL moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 54) to incorporate the South-Western Railway.

Motion agreed to, Bill considered in Committee and reported.

On the third reading,

Mr. BERGIN. I move that this Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be read the third time this day six months. I make this motion because I believe that the action of the committee yesterday was not one which ought to be approved by this House. It is, I think, in direct violation of the principle established by the Railway Committee last year, and it is interfering with the vested rights of the Montreal and Champlain Railway. It is now known to many members of this House, perhaps to all the members of this House, that the Montreal and Champlain Railway Company have invested a very large sum of money in the construction of that road, a road which has afforded the very best possible service to the people in that section of the country through which it passes. It was stated last year, and not contradicted at the time, that application was made by the people of the country through which the Montreal and Champlain Junction passes, to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the construction of a line to Beauharnois and Valleyfield, from some point at or near Caughnawaga. That proposition was refused by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and consequently another effort was made by the people of these counties to induce the Montreal and Champlain Railway Company to listen to their request. Finding that the people of that country were really desirous of a railway, that they were in good faith, and were willing to assist in promoting its construction, the Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway Company undertook, with the assistance of the people, to build the line that they required. They came to Parliament and obtained a charter and proceeded with the construction of the road. The Canadian Pacific Railway, under the name of the South-Western Railway Company, came to Parliament last year and asked for a line which practically was parallel to the line of the Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway. This the committee refused, and the principle adopted by the committee is one which, I think, ought to have been adopted with regard to this Bill. We affirmed the principle that unless there was a real necessity for a competing line of railway, it was not proper or wise to grant a second charter over the same territory. If it could be shown there was any possibility of a second line being made in that section of country, if it could be shown that there was really a necessity for it, then I confess that circumstances would be altered, and we might properly be asked to grant a second charter over the same line. But those who know that section of the country, know that it is not at all required there. They have ample railway service for that section of the country, and they do not require this. True, since last year, another reason has been discovered why this road should be constructed, a reason which, I venture to say, has no solid foundation. The reason now given, one which did not occur to these people last year who framed this Bill, is that it is required for the purpose of taking American trade over the Short Line to the Maritime Provinces. Now, Sir, I, for one, do not believe that there will be a ton of American freight attracted over that line to the Maritime Provinces. Let any one look at the map and see for themselves, and ask whether it is possible that American trade, for any place but Montreal or Quebec, will be attracted from northern New York in preference to their own seaports, which are so much nearer than the Maritime Provinces. I, for one, place no faith whatever in that proposition, and if I did, I do not think I would be warranted by the facts as they appear and looking at the map in supporting this Bill. For this reason, and for the further reason, that I believe it is a contest between a small railway company and a gigantic railway company, attempting to crush out the smaller one, I feel bound to move that this Bill be read this day six months.

Mr. SHANLY. As the time allowed us for discussing Private Bills is limited, I shall only follow my hon. friend from Cornwall in a few words. I entirely agree with the motion he has made, and I do not think this Bill should pass. And my reasons for so thinking are these: Last year the Canadian Pacific Railway Company came before the Railway Committee of this House and asked for the passage of a similar Bill. It was very thoroughly canvassed in the committee, and it was rejected by a very strong and emphatic vote, and the Bill was not reported to this House. If the reasons given last year for refusing to pass the Bill were sound and good reasons, they are doubly and trebly so now. Last year when this Bill was before the Railway Committee the Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway Company pledged themselves to proceed at once with the construction of a line over the same ground as that through which the South-Western Company desired to obtain a charter for a line. The Montreal and Champlain Company have honestly fulfilled their pledges, and hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent since this time last year in constructing that branch of railway, alongside of which it is now asked we should grant a charter to another company. For what purpose? To destroy the investment made in the Montreal and Champlain Junction Road. As I have said already, hundreds of thousands of dollars have been expended in this branch railway, and the capital put into the road is not our money, Canadian money or public money, but it is money that came from abroad, borrowed money. If before there has been time to test whether or not this road will pay as an investment, we grant a charter to another company to build a line alongside of this road, it evidently must prevent the company earning dividends, then I say we are doing great injury not only to those people who have invested their money in the enterprise, but we are doing a great deal to injure this country, because after money has been honestly invested as this has been on the face of what was done by Parliament last year, if the same Parliament this year destroys the security it then offered those people, and which Parliament practically did offer—put your money into this road and you are perfectly safe—I say if we now give a charter, which would destroy the security, that sort of legislation is wrong legislation, it is wicked legislation and it is legislation that must react injuriously on this country. I know that part of the country thoroughly well, I might say I know every one hundred acre lot and I say this second road is not required either for the purpose of local traffic or through traffic. The country is now splendidly served by the railways already constructed. I repeat that the effect of granting the charter proposed must be to destroy the road which was built upon the good faith of the charter we granted last year. I have no desire to discuss the matter at any great length, nor do I think after the very clear exposition of the case given by the hon. member for Cornwall and Stormont (Mr. Bergin) it is necessary I should speak very long. I speak as a Canadian jealous of the honor of his country, and I say if faith is broken by granting a charter to destroy the road Parliament authorised to be built last year, and in which capital was invested by people abroad on the good faith of this Parliament, we will do an act that will reflect most injuriously upon Canada. I trust, therefore, that the motion of my hon. friend from Cornwall and Stormont (Mr. Bergin) will be accepted by this House, and will be passed by a good majority.

Mr. WILSON (Argenteuil). I think this is not a question between the two great railway companies altogether, although it appears so now and would be made to appear so by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. It is a matter that is very important to the merchants and manufacturers of Montreal as well as to Canada. There are two views to be considered apart from the view of the railway companies, and I might be twitted with being a partisan of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but I beg to state from my place in this House that I have no sympathy with them in this matter whatever, but that I speak in the interests of the people of my locality as well as in the interests of the people of Montreal, especially the merchants and manufacturers there. I can overlook the interests of the two railway companies and speak of the matter from the standpoint of the two interests I have named. We have had a great deal of dust thrown in our eyes in regard to the Grand Trunk Railway and the small Beauharnois Junction Railway Company, and they wish to unite the two interests in the one issue; but we must divide them. We are told that the Grand Trunk Railway or the Montreal and Champlain Junction Company have spent between $300,000 and $500,000 in this enterprise since the passing of that charter. Let me correct the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and let me remind the House that Parliament did not grant the charter under which the company is now operating, and, let me also remind the House that if we grant a charter now we are not stultifying ourselves as regards any action of the House previously. In regard to the matter of expenditure, it should be stated to this House frankly and fairly, and if the hon. gentlemen who have spoken will not do it, someone else must do it, that this money was not spent and has not been spent under the charter referred to and granted last year by the Quebec Legislature for this same Beauharnois Railway Company, but the major portion of it, two-thirds, of the $300,000 or $500,000 has been spent on the old Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway to connect that system with Fort Covington and Messina Springs, and it has no reference whatever to the small line spur, or branch which comes in from St. Martine to the town of Beauharnois and then to Valleyfield. I can go over this line, because, as the hon. member who last spoke, said he knew every foot of the ground, so I may say that I know every foot of the ground. I am told that the line has been graded from the Montreal and Champlain Junction to Beauharnois, a distance of six miles, or I will say seven. This line is constructed through a perfectly flat and level country. To say that the road cost $10,000 a mile is a fair calculation. I grant that seven miles at $10,000 a mile is $70,000. I know I am right in stating that the bridge at St. Martine cost the company a sum not exceeding $50,000. These two items involve an expenditure of $120,000 on the Beauharnois Junction Railway. If you add three miles of grading at $2,000 a mile, you have a total expenditure since last year of $126,000 upon that railway. Granting that this sum has been expended—I regret very much that I have to rise and speak against this company, but as I said I am not speaking against the Grand Trunk Railway and for the Canadian Pacific Railway, but for the interests of my locality and the interests of the city of Montreal—I hold that if this company expended that money, it has only itself to blame. Why? It has been stated in this House and in the committee that the committee had stultified themselves in view of their action last year. I hold that we have a right to change our opinion, especially when the truth dawns on us, as it has dawned on many hon. gentlemen since the question came before the House last year.

An hon. MEMBER. Passes.

Mr. WILSON (Argenteuil). In connection with the question of expenses and the letter sent by the people of that locality to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company I may say, that the people went to that company when they first heard of the bridge spanning the St. Lawrence below Lachine. If the Canadian Pacific Railway Company refused to entertain the application of the people of that locality then, they did it in good faith and all earnestness. The people of that locality asked a railway for local purposes and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company did not see their way to build a local railway. You cannot blame them for that. If they see at this later day, as they do see, that they will be able to give those people a railway for local purposes and give themselves a line for far greater and more important purposes, hon. gentlemen cannot say under those circumstances that they have not treated the people in good faith, or that they were playing with them. The people of the locality have now a perfect right to come and say to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company: Gentlemen, we understand your position now. You want a through line, we want a better connection than the Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway can ever give us and we will sustain you in running your line in this locality. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company are not only actuated by a desire to afford better Railway accommodation to the people of that locality but they are moved by the far greater consideration of having a line to the United States border. I would like every hon. gentleman in this House to know that the present line is like going round a horseshoe instead of taking the two nearest points from Montreal to Valleyfield. In going to the village of St. Martine and across the Beauharnois Junction Railway the people have to travel a distance of 44½ miles from Montreal or at least 42 miles. Under the line which is proposed to be built by the Canadian Pacific Railway, the people of the town of Beauharnois can reach the city of Montreal by traversing 20½ miles or 21 miles at most. Why will hon. gentlemen compel them to travel double the distance that it can be done in? Have those people no rights? Why should we compel those people for all time to come, for it is not a matter of a year or two, to travel at least double the distance to get to the city of Montreal than they would have if this charter was granted and this railway built. I am sure that if this House considers the position of the people of that locality they will entertain the petition which they have sent in favor of this Bill and which is signed by a couple of thousand names from the lower part of Chateauguay County, from the County of Beauharnois and from portions of the County of Huntingdon. Is this House not to listen to the demand of those people, and are they not going to grant this railway, when, remember, it is not going to cost the Government one cent to construct it? They are not going to ask you for any subsidy for this company and why refuse them this grant? This branch railway and the little scheme that gave birth to this was like this: In 1886 the people came to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and asked them for the railway. The company refused it. Just at that time the Grand Trunk Railway Company saw the importance of the matter and they said: If we allow the Canadian Pacific Railway to build this railway they will have trade connection with New York city and the northern portions of the State of New York and we must checkmate them. It was a very simple matter to go to the Quebec Legislature previous to this House being called together, and to get a charter to run a separate railway to Beauharnois and from there to Valleyfield. That railway will never pay and it would not pay the shovelling of the snow in winter. The people are deceived because this Beauharnois Railway Company is an independent railway company and it will not run in connection with the Montreal and Champlain Railway, but they will have to get out of their cars at Chambly and take the Montreal and Champlain Railway to come to Montreal. Now the company comes before this House and claims the sympathy of the members on the ground that they should not grant a charter for two parallel lines. It is a fallacy to imagine that they are parallel lines. The point where this railway starts from the river at Caughnawaga is seven miles from the Montreal and Champlain Railway, and as it passes up the river it still remains seven miles apart. From Beauharnois to Valleyfield it will be parallel to that line. That is only a distance of fourteen miles, but the Beauharnois Junction Railway ends in the town of Valleyfield, 55 miles from the city of Montreal, whereas this company asks for a charter to run to the boundary line of the Province, which is 74 miles from Montreal. The argument of its being a parallel line must fall to the ground, because it only parallels a little junction railway for a distance of 14 miles. It does not parallel the Montreal and Champlain Railway. It only runs to the same point, and it would be as well to use the argument that the Grand Trunk parallels the Canadian Pacific Railway from Montreal to Toronto. They both start in Montreal and end in Toronto. Those two companies start in Montreal and end in Fort Covington or Dundee. But the greater question is this. Are we the merchants and manufacturers of the city of Montreal to be deprived of connection with the city of New York because the Grand Trunk Railway wants to hold the whole trade between those two cities? Is it not known by the hon. gentlemen that the Grand Trunk controls the traffic over the Delaware and Hudson Railway? Is it not well known also that the same company controls the traffic over the Central Vermont Railway Company, and where is the other railway company that runs between New York and Montreal? Shall we have no competing lines between the cities of New York and Montreal? I say it would not only be a hardship on this locality but a hardship on the city of Montreal and upon the merchants and manufacturers of that city who import their raw material and their merchandise if we refuse to grant this charter asked for.

Mr. WILSON (Argenteuil).

Mr. HALL. Whether or not the House will adopt the very unusual course of giving the six months' hoist to a Bill reported on by the Committee of Railways rests with the House to decide. As the member in charge of the Bill I must oppose any such action as strenuously as lies in my power. The remarks made in supporting the motion by the hon. members on the other side lead me to make a reference to the matter before the House which is somewhat of a repetition to the members who heard the discussion in another place. I will make those remarks as briefly as possible so as not to weary the House. They referred, in the first place, to a petition that was brought up last year; that is that the application of the present promoters of this road is not in earnest so far as an ultimate design of constructing the railway is concerned, but that it is rather for the purpose of obstructing a company that has already made an expenditure in that direction. To that the answer already made is correct and probably complete. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company were approached two years ago to build a local railway for the purpose of reaching Beauharnois and Valleyfield. They declined then and I may say that so far as a local road at present is concerned they would again decline to build it. They have no motive to build a railway in that section of the country for local purposes simply. Since that application was declined by them their larger schemes have been completed or nearly completed; their construction in the west has been finished; their bridge across the St. Lawrence has been built; their short line to the Atlantic sea ports is nearly completed and they were approached by powerful railway companies in Northern New York to know if they would establish a through line which would enable the freight that comes from New York city and State to Montreal to reach that latter city under much more favorable circumstances than at present. The company looked upon that application as a very much more important one than the one previously made for local purposes, and therefore they applied to the House last year for the right to construct such a railway. They were opposed, and the objection I am sure which induced the committee to throw out that Bill was the impression that they were not serious in their application. As I have previously stated in another place, there could be no greater confirmation of their sincerity in their desire to build a through line of railway than their application again this year, after the Grand Trunk Railway have obtained their subsidies from the municipalities, and have actually constructed their road. It can no longer be said that they only desire to obstruct the Grand Trunk. Their desire is to construct a more direct line in the public interest, and they ask the House for the authority to do so. The only other point which has been raised is the question of existing right, and that point has been very ably dealt with by the hon. member who has preceded me. This Bill brings before this House a principle which is to me very much more important than any of the details which have been referred to, this is, the principle whether the right of this House, give competing railway facilities in different sections of the country is to be restricted in any way. On the North Shore of the St. Lawrence there are two important lines of railway which run so close together that a stone can be thrown from one to the other. Is there any reason why the same thing should not exist on the south side of the St. Lawrence, especially when we consider that this line would shorten the distance fourteen miles, and that the people interested have petitioned in favor of the road? It seems to me it would be a retrograde step for the House to decide that because a railway already existed, no other should go through the country. I think we should desire to see in every settled portion of this country a healthy active railway competition, and I am sure this House will not adopt the principle that because a railway already exists, therefore they are going to refuse the application of another railway company, which is presenting its application in good faith, and proposes to carry out the work without asking for any Government assistance whatever.

Mr. WATSON. It may seem strange that one who is so much in favor of free trade in railways should oppose this Bill; but I do so as representing a class of people who are greatly in need of railway accommodation which has been promised them for years by the promoters of this Bill, and many of whom have to haul their grain a hundred miles or more for the want of it. Deputation after deputation has waited on the general manager of this company and asked that they should fulfil the pledges that they made years ago, and the reply has always been that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have no money with which to build those branch lines; and yet we are told that they want to parallel an existing road in the east. Therefore, on principle, and in the interests of those people to whom these promises were made, I oppose this Bill. I believe that a company that has received such large assistance from the Dominion of Canada for opening up the North-West, ought to fulfil the pledges they have made to construct branch lines in the North-West, before they take the money which has been granted by this Parliament to parallel lines of railway for opening up and developing, as has been said, the State of New York. Now, we are told by the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Wilson) that the expenditure on the existing road has only been some $126,000. The railway company was informed, and it is not disputed, that the Grand Trunk or this local company has spent something in the neighborhood of $400,000 on that piece of railway; and I feel as others feel who have spoken, that if we granted this charter we should be breaking faith with men who have put their money into this enterprise. This House gave these people assurances a year ago that their investments would be protected. They claim that it is against the settled principle of this House to allow parallel lines of railway to be built. That principle has been carried out during the present Session. It is only a week or two since a charter was asked for a railway to traverse the same ground as a railway which was chartered some three years ago from Calgary in the North-West, and the committee refused to grant that charter on the ground that the people who controlled the other railway have certain rights that should be protected, although the only evidence given to the committee was that they had graded one mile of railway. There was no evidence that they had spent $500. As one who opposed this Bill last year, I feel that I have equal reason for opposing it to-day.

M. PRÉFONTAINE: M. l'Orateur, en me levant pour appuyer la motion de l'honorable député de Stormont et Cornwall (M. Bergin), j'aimerais à donner les raisons de la position que je vais prendre sur cette question. Les raisons qui ont été données en langue anglaise par ceux qui m'ont précédé pour s'opposer à la passation de la mesure maintenant sous considération sont, à mon point de vue, tellement fortes que ceux qui supportent cette mesure n'y ont pas répondu. L'argument le plus fort c'est certainement celui basé sur le précédent de l'année dernière. Lorsque les deux compagnies qui sont devant la Chambre à l'heure qu'il est, l'une s'opposant au bill actuel et l'autre demandant sa passation, sont venues devant le comité des chemins de fer l'année dernière, le bill que l'on demandait alors a été rejeté par la grande majorité du comité, et la raison qui a décidé le comité à rejeter ce bill existe encore aujourd'hui. Cette raison était que la compagnie du Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway était à faire des instances auprès de la législature locale pour obtenir la passation d'une loi l'autorisant à construire l'embranchement que cette compagnie a commencé à construire depuis. Et pour cette seule raison, le comité des chemins de fer, l'année dernière, a rejeté un bill semblable à celui qui est maintenant sous considération. Agissant de bonne foi, la Compagnie du Montreal and Champlain Railway a obtenu de la Législature de Québec les pouvoirs nécessaires; elle a commencé ses travaux, et elle a dépensé des sommes considérables pour construire cet embranchement qui était demandé par les localités spécialement intéressées à la construction de ce chemin de fer. Maintenant que cette compagnie a dépensé un montant considérable,—on ne s'entend pas sur le chiffre, les uns disent $300,000, d'autres disent $125,000, mais j'aime mieux prendre l'autorité de l'honorable député de Grenville (M. Shanly) qui est un homme expérimenté en construction de chemin de fer et qui nous dit que lorsque la compagnie du Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway prétend avoir dépensé $300,000 il croit qu'elle a dépensé cette somme,—je le demande, serait-il juste, serait-il raisonnable de donner à une compagnie rivale les pouvoirs qui lui ont été refusés l'année dernière?

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. The time for Private Bills is expired.

Mr. SPEAKER. The time for Private Bills having expired, the House will pass to Public Bills.

DEFECTIVE LETTERS PATENT.

Bill (No. 4) to amend the Act respecting defective letters patent and the discharge of securities to the Crown, considered in committee and reported.

Mr. McCARTHY moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. As the Bill interferes to some extent with the rights of the Crown, and has been considered by the Executive, I am authorised to state that it has received the assent of the Crown.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

PROTECTION OF RAILWAY EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. McCARTHY. I understand, from reading the discussion that took place when this Bill was before the House on Thursday last, that the hon. the Minister of Finance proposed it should stand over until the Railway Bill in the hands of the Minister of Railways should be brought down and discussed. I do not object at all to that course, but I desire to have it understood that if this is the course which the House approves of, an opportunity will then be afforded of taking the opinion of the House on the provisions of this Bill. I do not desire that it should be left in the hands almost entirely of my hon. friend to say whether or not the Government will incorporate the provisions of this measure in the Government Railway Bill. I desire to press the Bill, or, at all events, some of its provisions, and I believe they ought to be passed, though perhaps not exactly in the form in which they are to be found in the Bill I have had the honor to introduce. This Bill deals with three matters. It deals with the packing of frogs, as it is called; and from the discussion that took place, I understand there is no serious objection on either side of the House against that provision.

Mr. PRÉFONTAINE.

On the contrary, it was thought by one hon. member at all events, who I see spoke on that occasion, that in that regard the Bill did not go quite far enough, and I may say that I would be quite prepared to accept or to propose an amendment embodying the provision which that hon. member suggested as to the packing of the wing rails, as it is called, so, as far as possible, to give protection to the employés in whose interest this Bill is intended. There is another provision which I do not think ought to meet with very serious opposition. That is contained in the 5th clause, and is that the oil cups used for oiling the valves of the locomotive shall not be placed outside. It is possible that that may be the only method to attain the desired end. That may be amended by saying that this should be done by that means or by some other means which would be equally effective in order to obtain the end which it is desired to attain. I am not at all wedded to the exact provisions of the Bill. I have taken it, as hon. gentlemen must have observed, mainly from the statute of the Province of Ontario, where it has been in force for five or six years; but since that time there have been improvements, and other suggestions are now made, and I think the proper way to deal with the subject would be to say that the end we seek should be attained, but the means should be left to each and every Railway Company, that this Parliament should enact that the Company should so oil the machinery that it should not be necessary to oil it in motion, and that steps should be taken to prevent danger to the employés in the discharge of their duty. There is a provision of the Bill, however, in regard to which there is more difficulty, that is in regard to the running boards on the roof of the freight cars. While this Parliament is, of course, quite competent to enact that all the freight cars belonging to the railways of Canada shall have these running boards, we have no control over the freight cars, which I fancy are a majority of those which pass through the country, which pass over our roads in the carriage of freight and come from the United States, and we cannot say that they shall be built in any particular form or that they shall give any particular protection; but it is quite plain that some of the States on the other side are moving in this direction, and I think, on the whole, perhaps, the better plan would be to have this Bill sent to a small Select Committee to consider its various provisions, and I have here dozens of suggestions which have been made since the Bill was placed before the country. Then, these might be embodied in the report of the committee, and the House might afterwards put as many of them as they saw fit into the Bill of which the Government has charge. I quite agree with the view that whatever we do should be put into the Government Bill. We should have only one Railway Bill, which, if possible, should embrace all these provisions. If the Minister of Finance will agree to that suggestion, and the House approves of it, I will ask the House to read the Bill a second time and then refer it to a committee, and then, when it emerges from the committee, the House can amend it, as I have no doubt it may, in several particulars, and especially in making the enactments general instead of particular in regard to the forms which are to be used. I may say that we do not occupy, in Canada, a very enviable position if I am to judge from certain statistics which I have seen in regard to the management of our railways, both in regard to the carriage of our passengers, and the number of employés who are killed and wounded yearly. That number is very large indeed, and is much larger in Canada in proportion to the number of persons carried than it is in any of the neighboring States of the Union. I am not going to say that the railway companies are specially to blame for that, but I do not think they have been very active or diligent in adopting means for the protection of their employés. It was stated here by an hon. gentleman of great experience in railway matters that there was a certain parliament dealing with this question which was more competent than this House could possibly be to deal with it, and we ought to await the result of the deliberations of that body. I do not quite agree with that proposition. I think perhaps we may speed that body, and we may speed the motions of the railway companies which have the power to deal with these matters if we take steps, not at once, and not at all in disregard of the interests of the railway companies, but in a reasonable time to call upon them to put as much of these improvements in force on their cars as may to a large extent limit the danger to which railway employes are necessarily exposed in their hazardous occupation. Let me point out some of the matters which are being dealt with in the neighboring States. There is, first, and I believe it is at this moment in use, what is known as a power brake on freight cars. I understand that at this moment that power brake is in use on the Pacific roads, on the Denver and Rio Grande, on the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and St. Louis, on the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, and on the Topeka and Santa Fe. If it is in force on these railways now, it is not impossible that in time it might be put on our railways. At the same time the automatic couplers are gradually coming into use under the legislation of different States of the Union, and those are of the greatest importance. I know, of course, that we ought not to move too speedily in this direction. We ought not to insist upon cars which are in use being altered or changed, but we might say that within a limited time any cars which may be constructed or repaired should have these reasonable and necessary appliances. At present in the States of Connecticut, New York, Michigan and Massachusetts, these automatic couplers are required to be put on all cars under a penalty after a given date. We would be going somewhat in that direction, and would be insisting upon the carrying out of what we must all desire, if we were to enact similarly that the railway companies in this country which are subject to this Parliament should also apply these improvements within a certain time. I am very glad to hear from what an hon. gentleman said the other day that possibly the necessity which I think we must all feel of affording some protection to the brakemen—those unfortunate men who have at great danger and at all seasons of the year to run on the top of the freight cars—is likely to be done away with, and certainly it is not before it was necessary. Still, perhaps the greatest danger exists in the coupling of cars. I find that in this country, in 1885, 285 men were killed in coupling cars, and in 1886, 222.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that in Canada alone?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, in Canada alone. Then there were those who were killed by falling from engines or cars in 1885, 117; and I am glad to say that there is a great reduction in 1886, when the number was 67. I am deducting the number of passengers who were reported to have been killed in that way, the number of whom was reported in each year to be eight. I think, therefore, that the subject of this Bill is worthy of the consideration of the House, and that it cannot be said that we are moving too hastily, or are proposing to act in any unfair manner towards the companies. I perfectly recognise that we ought not to do anything of that kind, and that we might interfere very seriously with their traffic if we made an arbitrary provision that no car should run through Canada except under the enactments which we might make here; but I think it is worthy of the careful consideration of a committee to which I ask the House to refer this Bill, and afterwards the House could, under the direction of the Government, take such action as they pleased on that report.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There can be no objection at all to the second reading of the Bill, but I would suggest that, instead of sending it to a special committee, it should be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and should be brought up at the time when the Bill which has already been introduced by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways comes under consideration. I will say to my hon. friend who has just taken his seat and who takes such a deep interest in this matter, and has so long taken such an interest in this important question, that every opportunity will be given for the discussion of the matter, and that, when the Government Bill comes to be considered, every provision of this Bill will be taken as a notice of motion, so that any of the provisions of this Bill can be introduced as an amendment. If they are not included in the Government Bill, they can be taken as a notice, and I hope that will be acceptable to the hon. gentleman, and I think it would be better than to send the Bill to a select committee.

Mr. LAURIER. I would be disposed to agree with the suggestion of the Minister of Finance, and I think the hon. gentleman should accept it. I believe that a large number of members on both sides of the House are disposed to favor the Bill of the hon. gentleman, and I can see no reason for referring it to a special committee. If there were a large difference of opinion in regard to it, there might be some reason for referring it to a committee, but in view of the consensus of opinion, I might say the almost unanimous consensus of opinion, I think the suggestion of the Minister of Finance is a reasonable one.

Mr. McCARTHY. After what has fallen from the hon. the Minister of Finance and the hon. the leader of the Opposition, I will not press what I thought was the best course to adopt. It was not because of any difference of opinion in the House that I proposed to refer this Bill to a special committee, but in order that it might give consideration to the various suggestions which have been made. I have a large bundle of them here, principally from the owners of patents, who desire to put forward their particular panaceas for these evils, and I thought that in a special committee we could perhaps deal with them more conveniently than we could in the Committee of the Whole. Of course the Bill has to come before the Committee of the Whole when it comes from the special committee, but if both my hon. friends think this is the better course to adopt I will not press my view further.

Bill read the second time.

WRECKING IN CANADIAN WATERS.

Adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Kirkpatrick for the second reading of Bill (No. 7), to permit American vessels to aid vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters, resumed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Government have very carefully considered this measure, and there is a great deal in it. The general principle and the general features of the measure entirely commend themselves to the Government as wise and desirable, but at the same time the Government feel that this is connected with a larger and a still more important question, which would probably be prejudiced by the adoption of this Bill. It is very well known that there is a great desire on the part of the Congress of the United States that a measure of this kind should be adopted. On the other hand, the policy of the Government of Canada has been, when gentlemen opposite were in power, as also under the present Government, to use every possible means of obtaining the common registration of vessels between the two countries, and the common enjoyment of reciprocity in the coasting trade of the two countries. Now, Sir, there is, perhaps, no immediate prospect of our being able to obtain the larger measure embracing the whole coasting trade between the United States and Canada, but I think there is very good reason to believe that if we do not accept this measure at the present moment, which is greatly desired by the Congress of the United States, they will be prepared to go a step further, and, at all events, adopt the coasting trade as far as the inland waters of Canada are concerned. I think, under these circumstances, we may fairly ask the House to pause in the consideration of this measure, and allow us to ascertain if it is not possible to get the larger measure which would absorb this, and which would give all the advantages this measure proposes to give, and upon terms which would be more fair and equal between the two countries. I hope, under the present circumstances, this measure will not be pressed, and that we shall have an opportunity of seeing whether we cannot obtain the same principle of reciprocity in the coasting trade, or at all events, the inland waters of Canada.

Mr. LAURIER. I would have been disposed, for my part, to urge the hon. member to go on with his Bill, but since, as the hon. Minister suggests, by pausing we may have before us the prospect of an enlarged measure of reciprocity, I think that is an adequate reason why we should pause. It is evident that reciprocity is in the air, it is moving all the time. We have been making progress this very Session, we have obtained reciprocity in seeds, in trees, in shrubs and fruit.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We have sown the seed.

Mr. LAURIER. And it will bear fruit by-and-bye. We may not get it all at once, but we will get it piecemeal.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I am very sorry to hear the decision of the Minister of Finance that he does not think this Bill should pass at the present time. I must say that I cannot agree with his reasoning. I do not think that if we want reciprocity in wrecking, we should decline to enjoy the advantages and privileges of that reciprocity, in order that we may try and get a larger measure of reciprocity in some other matters. I believe that if we pass this measure and meet the United States Government in a friendly spirit, showing them that where they held out the hand of fellowship, where they offered reciprocity in any one or more subjects, we are ready to meet them in the same spirit, I believe it would lead to reciprocity in coasting and to further reciprocal trading rights hereafter, more easily than if we say: We will not trade with you at all, we will not meet you half way, we will not meet you even in this little matter of wrecking. I think a very large number of people throughout the country are earnestly desirous of seeing this Bill pass. I do not think my hon. friend who comes from down by the sea, fully realises the extent of that interest, the number of ships that we have trading upon our inland lakes, the number of men that are there employed, the capital invested in it. All these men are deeply interested in this Bill; they are anxious to have greater facilities to render aid to vessels wrecked or in distress, greater privileges to assist in the saving of life and property. The hon. members of this House, I think, have had communication from every part of the Province of Ontario, the Province which is chiefly interested in this Bill, urging that it should become law. To night, the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) came to me and said he was very sorry he had to go away by the train, but he desired me to say that he had received a letter from the mayor of Owen Sound, stating that he had been communicating with the shipping men and people interested in marine in that town and neighborhood, and that they all urged him to support the Bill, and hoped that it would pass. He gave me a telegram from Mr. Simpson, managing director of the Owen Sound Dry Dock and Ship Building Navigation Company, in which he says:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

"Am decidedly in favor of the Act. The want of such an Act, to my own knowledge, has been the cause of much inconvenience and delay to vessel owners, and of times of loss of life and property. The only advantage has been to a few tug owners who will be fully compensated, in my opinion, if equal rights are accorded to them in American waters as to our vessels in Canadian waters. It is not so much, however, a matter of sentiment and advantage as of humanity."

Sir, another ground upon which this Bill has been opposed is that taken by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who opposes it because it will interfere with the wreckers. Who are these wreckers? One or two companies that own some inferior wrecking appliances, men who are unable to render the assistance which wreckers ought to be able to give. But it is injurious to our men, because our own people do not come forward and invest money in better plant because they have such a limited field for their operations. But if this Bill was to pass and reciprocity in this matter was granted, I know, as a fact, that considerable capital would be invested in wrecking apparatus, that money would be invested by Canadians in wrecking, not only in our Canadian waters, but also in American waters. Sir, I state as a fact that the largest number of wrecks, by far the largest number, have been in American waters, and also the greatest value of wrecks has been in American waters. If that is the case, it is very important to our own wreckers that they should get American waters to operate in. My hon. friend from North Norfolk made a long speech the other night during which he read from papers that had been brought down to this House to show that when application had been made for permission to use American tugs and American vessels in Canadian waters on our side, it had been granted by our Minister of Customs, and he defended the Minister of Customs for granting this permission for allowing these wreckers to come in. He stated that in no case when application had been made to the Minister of Customs, had it been denied. Sir, if that is the case, and if the Americans can come into our waters, why not pass this Bill and get the reciprocal right to go into their waters? The hon. member said that when application was made by our shipowners to Washington to have the right of going into American waters with our tugs, the answer came: "No;" and he instanced the case of the Algoma, wrecked near Thunder Bay, where they had to get a tug and wrecking apparatus from 600 miles away to render assistance to that vessel, although the Canadian owners had vessels of their own to do it, but they were refused the privilege. That is what I contend, that in every case when we have a wreck in their waters and we apply to them for permission to use our Canadian tugs or wrecking apparatus, they refuse it; but if application is made to our humane, courteous and affable Minister of Customs, he immediately says: "Yes," or if he does not say so, he ought to. He ought to allow the first wrecking vessel that offers to render assistance, and he does so, I believe. Sir, I say that we do not want to ask, as a matter of favor, permission to go into American waters, but as a matter of right. We ought to have a law upon our Statute-book, such as has been placed upon the Statute-book of the United States, that there should be reciprocal rights in this matter. The cause of humanity demands it, the interests of our shipowners and of insurance men demand it. I hope this Government will allow this Bill to pass, and show that the opinion of this House and this country is that we are ready to meet the United States Government, so far as necessary, in all such reciprocal matters. We have shown it by our readiness in putting seeds, trees and shrubs on the free list. Why should we not meet them in this matter also? Why do the Government withhold reciprocity of wrecking in order to try and draw something greater with it? If that is the policy of the Government, I would ask why they did not withhold reciprocity in trees, and seeds, and shrubs, in order to try and get reciprocity in all natural products? Why did they grant the one until they had the larger measure granted too? I do not think the reason for the refusal is correct, and I hope the House will pass the Bill through its second reading.

Mr. EDGAR. I was very much surprised to hear the Finance Minister put the veto of the Government on this Bill, because I thought if there was one question the House might be allowed to deal with without being influenced by party considerations or considerations effecting the Government or the Opposition this was the question. I thought too this was a question, and I have looked at it rather carefully, respecting which I do not blame the executive of the country. I frankly say I do not blame the Government of the day, or the former Government, for their conduct in this matter, and I think this Parliament is to blame, if any one is to blame. Every hon. member who had a right to introduce a Bill to meet the American Act of 1878 in the spirit in which this Bill meets it, is to blame, and not any member of the Government in particular. I find that in 1878, when a circular was issued by the former Government drawing the attention of the officers of the department to the law on the subject of wrecking, the American law had not been passed then, and I find that when the American Act of 1878 offering reciprocal privileges was passed, the present Government took an early opportunity to inform their officers that they desired that no harsh measures be enforced under the law. On 12th June, 1879, a report was made by the Minister of Customs to the Privy Council on this subject, which was adopted, in which it stated:

"With respect to the circular of March, 1878, that no Canadian officer ever interpreted the circular or the law, as justifying interference with the efforts of vessels of any nationality to succor vessels in distress and save human life or property, while there was a possibility of preventing their loss, nor has any such case of interference ever occurred."

I accept that as the opinion of the Government, and I ask, when they stated this to be their view, why Parliament should not pass an Act placing it on the Statute-book. I can see no reason why this should not be done. They go on further, and in a circular issued in September, 1879, a departmental circular of the Minister of Customs, they instructed their officers as follows:

"It is not to be understood that the circular of March, 1878, has any application to cases wherein life may be in danger or where property may be jeopardised by delay, such, for instance, as the grounding of a vessel in circumstances in which immediate assistance would prevent a wreck; nor is there any possible case in which vessels of any nationality should be prevented from going to the rescue of persons in peril of their lives, or of vessels in danger of being lost."

I say again when the Government went so far as that in September, 1879, what objection can there be to passing this Bill, which proposes merely to place upon the Statute-book the interpretation which the Government themselves very properly chose to put upon the customs law? Then again on 15th November, 1880, commenting on some complaint by the Americans as to the refusal of our authorities to permit their wreckers to go to the assistance of vessels in distress, the present Minister of Customs says:

"The above statement of facts the Minister admits clearly establishes the fact that there was not, at any time, the least obstruction placed in the way of Mr. Evans, nor of his tug to perform such part of the work as it was fitted for, but, on the contrary, the evidence shows that his interests were carefully considered, and every facility offered by the Collector Barrett, of Port Dover, Ontario, to protect his property."

Why did not the Government bring in a Bill asking Parliament to accept the American terms? What is the only reason put forward by the Government against accepting this Bill? It is that by refusing it we may perhaps obtain coasting privileges which would be very valuable. Did not the Government have some experience in trying to force reciprocity upon the Americans; did they not try during a great many years to force it on them; did they not especially try in 1880 to force the Americans to make concessions to us in the direction of admitting our fish free by making reprisals on their vessels, and surely hon.

gentlemen opposite know full well that those efforts will have no effect on our neighbors, and that our resisting this law will not make them more likely to grant us additional concessions. Another reason was urged by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) the other evening against this House adopting the Bill. The hon. gentleman used these words:

"I say that the advantage which we enjoy in the matter of wrecking is very great."

I wonder who enjoy this advantage? Surely they are not the owners of the commercial marine of Canada, surely not the owners of the cargoes, and surely not Canadian underwriters who enjoy any advantage from the present condition of the law. They can only be the owners of wrecking craft on the lakes, and surely the interests of a small class like that cannot be considered to be the interests of the whole people. I have no doubt that the wrecking business is a very honest and proper calling and a very necessary one, but surely the country cannot be called upon to feed them with wrecks in order to enable them to make a living. If this matter were left to the simple, honest, open, untrammelled vote of this House to-night no doubt this Bill would be carried by a large majority. This is not an executive matter in which the Government has announced any policy on any former occasion or taken any ground except in this very direction, and this is a case where the House should be left to exercise its legislative functions without the interference of the Executive. If there ever was a case in which the House should be allowed to be free surely this is a case, and I add my appeal to that of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) to the Minister of Finance representing the Government on this occasion, and I ask him to let the House have a free vote on the matter.

Mr. BOWELL. Before the question is put to the House I desire to offer a few remarks. I do not know particularly what the leader of the Opposition meant when he said he could smell reciprocity in the air. It was quite evident, at least to my mind, that he was unaware of the fact that on this question of reciprocity in wrecking and coasting there has been a law on the Statute-book since 1867 offering the United States the freest possible intercourse in those matters. More than that. If the hon. gentleman who has just spoken had taken the trouble to read a little further on in the despatch to which he referred, he would there have ascertained that in the despatch sent from our Government, emanating from the Customs Department, that we pointed out, as long ago as 1879, that this Government was prepared to enter into wider commercial relations, in so far as the coasting trade and wrecking were concerned. He might also have informed the House that an order was issued even by the Government of which he was a supporter, and by my predecessor until repeated refusals had been made by the American Government to allow a Canadian vessel or tug to enter its waters and render assistance to any Canadian wreck. It was for these reasons that the late Government issued their order to prevent American tugs and wreckers from coming into Canadian waters in order to save their property. Under that regulation which was issued by the late Government many persons in Canada invested their means in wrecking and tug plant for saving not only life, but all property of wrecks of our own country and of others that take place on the north side of the great lakes or on our rivers. I do not know what the hon. gentleman meant, nor to whom he referred, nor do I propose to enquire, when he insinuated that wrecks had to be supplied in order to keep alive certain parties in this country who own wrecking plant. This I do know from my experience in the department, that until the law was enforced by the late Government and followed up by the present Government in this respect that we had no wrecking plant of any consequence in Canada. Now that we have wrecking plant that is quite prepared to do all work in our waters, we find that the American Government, as they do upon all occasions where their own interests are at stake, pass a law giving reciprocity in this particular subject alone. But they studiously refuse to extend it any further where it would by any possibility interfere with any interest of their own. It is a question for this House to say whether we should upon all occasions, whenever any particular subject or act of theirs will give to them the advantage over those which are possessed by Canadians, that we should at once accept it, whether it is to our own interest or not. My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) says it is in our own interest. It may be in the particular locality in which he lives. It is not so in the west. If this is passed now without our asking for further concessions to our marine, we shall destroy a large amount of interest which our people have in this industry, and in which they were induced to invest their money only after the refusal on the part of the Government of Canada to allow American vessels to come into our waters. So late ago as 1878 when this question first came under the notice of the Government, and when complaints were made at the Canadian Government enforcing the provisions of this order, which was issued by my predecessor, I find it was scarcely a month after we had assumed office, when we reply to a despatch from Washington:

"The undersigned has carefully considered the suggestion of Mr. Everts in his despatch of the 13th June, in which he suggests a modification of the instructions given in the circular of the 5th March, 1878, relating to wrecking in Canadian waters, and finds that said orders were not issued until after repeated refusals on the part of United States officials to allow Canadian tugs to assist or interfere with British vessels wrecked in United States waters and not until instructions were sent from Washington preventing said aid being rendered by British tugs of which the following is a copy:—

"WASHINGTON, 14th June, 1877.

"Vessels ashore in American waters pass into hands of United States customs authorities, cannot be taken possession of by alien wreckers."

"H. F. FRENCH,

"Assistant Secretary."

These orders having been continually enforced the Canadian Government deemed it in the interests of their own property holders and of that particular trade in this country to enforce the law as it stood on the Statute-book. The present Government have upon all occasions extended the fullest privilege to American tugs and American wreckers available. Even where those tugs may have been available and when there was danger of immediate loss of property and of life—in no cases have those privileges been denied, and it is only where vessels have gone on the shore and remained there for a short time, or a long time without any danger of destruction that a refusal has been extended to the Americans. Such liberality has not been extended by the American Government to Canadian tug owners or to Canadian wreckers, and I see good reason for adopting the suggestion made by the Finance Minister that we should not give this privilege without some return, particularly in a case of this kind where it is in our interest, as I believe it to be in the interest of the American shipowners as well, that we should have the freest possible intercourse in coasting trade in inland waters at least, and if it is possible on the sea coast. It was only last January, if I may refer to it, that in sending a despatch to the department of Washington on this very subject, on the charges which are imposed upon vessels in making entries inward and outward that the Government called the attention of the American Government to the existence of the provision in our present law. The law was quoted, and they were asked to extend to us the rights and privileges which we were prepared to extend to them in the coasting and wrecking trade. Now, if we adopt the reciprocity as suggested by the Bill before the House, they will have attained all that they want and all that they ask; together with the destruction of our wrecking industry, and, most certainly, refusal will follow in respect to reciprocity in the coasting trade of the country. I am rather sorry that my friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) has taken up this subject so warmly and thinks it so absolutely necessary in the interests of the country, and more particularly the interests of the neighborhood of the outlet of Lake Ontario that we should accept the proposition which has been made. I believe it to be in the interests of the wrecking industry, in the interests of the country and in the interests of the coasting trade that we should hold the position we are in at present. I may refer to three or four instances, within these last six or seven years, in which the Americans legislated directly against the carrying trade of this country, and when we adopted the same policy, if they found it affected their immediate interests, they at once passed Bills repealing the clause in their Acts which prevented certain trade with this country, and asked us at once to accede to their request to do likewise. If we did that in one or two cases to which I might call the attention of the House, the result would be the destruction of certain industries in this country. I find no fault with the action of the American Government in this matter. They have acted as I believe every Government should act; for whenever they found it to their interest that to repeal a law or a portion of law would give greater trade to their own people, and would assist in the development of their trade, they at once repealed that law. But I do not believe, neither does it follow, that we should adopt a similar policy when we know that the adoption of that policy would injure our own trade and certain interests which we have built up under this and other systems.

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Why do you injure the seeds and small fruits?

Mr. BOWELL. We should not have done it. If the law had not been on the Statute-book, I do not suppose it would have been done.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex.) It seems to me that the wise and statesmanlike policy, enunciated by the hon. Minister of Finance, is one that should commend itself to the good sense of this House. We who are not taken into the inner confidence of the Executive are not in a position to dabble in legislation of this kind wisely. While the generous and disinterested speech of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), may command our sympathy, I do not think it commands our reason. He is proceeding entirely on false premises. Somebody has led him to believe that this a question in which humanity is involved, and that these wrecking regulations affect the lives and properties of those engaged in our inland marine. It has been pointed out again and again to-night very ably by the hon. Minister of Customs, and also by my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that that is a fallacious idea; and I trust that no member of this House will vote on this Bill should it come to a vote, under the impression that there is any question of humanity involved. The late Mackenzie Administration were compelled, under the pressure of circumstances, brought about by the action of the American Government, to pass certain Orders in Council which now govern our wrecking system. Before these Orders in Council were enforced, the wrecking business in Canadian waters was almost exclusively in the hands of American tugmen; but after they were passed, our tugmen at various points in our inland waters, invested their money in wrecking tugs, hydraulic pumps and other wrecking appliances, and trained a class of men who have become skilled in that work, and who will be useful citizens to the Dominion in other directions should their services be required; and having established this system, we are now asked, for an empty sentiment which has no foundation in fact, to repeal our own policy, and throw these men out of employment and give the business in which they are engaged to our American cousins. If we are to adopt this policy, I believe in going the whole length. I do not believe in giving our neighbors one little item of privilege which they desire, and thereby entirely place ourselves in their hands. If we have anything to exchange, let us give them something which will be worthy of their acceptance so that it may bring about the reciprocity which I believe we all desire. I think if we had that reciprocity which the hon. Minister of Finance has spoken of in our inland waters at least, all those engaged in the wrecking business in our Canadian trade would be well able to hold their own with their American competitors; but while our neighbors offer us reciprocity in wrecking they at the same time withhold from us the small privilege of the coasting business—the one small item of being permitted to tow into an American port a wreck which has been saved by a Canadian tug. I would ask my hon. friend who has distinguished himself in the cause of humanity not to quarrel with his best friends, but to submit to their superior wisdom; but if the Bill is to be pressed to a second reading, I propose to move a rider to the first clause to this effect: As soon as the Government of the United States shall accept the statutory offer respecting the coasting trade, contained in chapter 5 of the Revised Statutes of Canada so far as the same may apply to the inland waters of Canada contiguous to the United States." If the Bill with this provision is allowed to pass, we shall then see whether the American Government and shipowners are sincere in their desire to meet us in this matter, or whether they are throwing dust into the eyes of Canadians in pretending to give us something which is valueless to us in order that they may get something from us which is valuable to them. I live in a part of the country where there is a great deal of wrecking done and where there are several wrecking companies, and I have never known a case of the Minister of Customs of Canada refusing the privilege to an American tug to wreck in Canadian waters, not merely where life and property were in imminent danger, but where there were not, on its being proven that a Canadian tug was not at hand and immediately available. I myself have applied a dozen times within the last ten years on behalf of American wrecking tugs and obtained for them permission to wreck in Canadian waters where life and property were not in imminent danger, because at the time Canadian tugs were engaged at a distance, either in Lake Huron or the Georgian Bay. The policy of the Canadian Government in this matter has been humane, liberal and generous, while that of our American neighbors has been inhumane, illiberal and ungenerous. Their conduct to us in these matters has been of a character to rouse the indignation of those who live on the borders, and who see the petty way in which Canadians are harassed, not merely in this matter, but in every matter in which United States officials can harass Canadian citizens. I do not say that this is done by the United States Government. I think many of these things are done without the knowledge of the United States Government, to affect local interests; but it is in my personal knowledge, and almost in my daily experience that the Canadian Government and Canadian officials, in all their dealings with Americans, set an example for courtesy and kindness that would be well worthy of their imitation; and to talk to-night of this being a generous offer on the part of the Americans is only an assertion made by one who has not studied the subject with his head, but has only given to it the warm impulses of his heart. It was only yesterday that I received a letter from a gentleman who has lived many years on the Detroit River, and who is familiar with the wrecking business, in which letter he says:—

"When I wrote you some time ago regarding the wrecking business and stated that a much larger number of disasters occurred in Canadian waters than in American waters, I meant in the waters of this vicinity.

"I have spoken to all parties interested in navigation in this part of the country and they all agree that it would be much better to let the wrecking laws remain as they are, for the very sound reason that the Americans will benefit much more than the Canadians by the change.

"The talk of inhumanity regarding the present wrecking laws is all nonsense. In my twenty years' experience in this business I have never known the customs authorities to refuse a permit to American steamers to render assistance when life and property were in imminent danger.

"The only occasions that permits were refused were when Americans wanted to do the work themselves instead of employing Canadians. I hope Mr. Kirkpatrick will withdraw his Bill for you may be sure that the Americans would not be so willing to give reciprocity in wrecking if they were not sure that it would be more to their advantage than to the Canadians. Do you not think that it is pretty cheeky on the part of the Americans to include in their Bill, the Welland Canal? I presume they would also take in Georgian Bay and all Canadian inland waters. I see that quite a number of petitions favoring this measure, but I am very strong in my opinion that it would be better for Canada to let the wrecking laws remain as they are."

I trust my hon. friend having achieved his object in bringing his Bill before the House and the country, will allow it to stand and mature for future legislation, when the seeds which he has planted, and which have been referred to more than once to-night, will bear fruit; later on he will recognise the wisdom of this action, and will find that when the Government advise him to take a certain course, there is more in it than meets his ear and appears on the surface, and next year the hon. gentleman will be glad he took the advice of the Minister of Finance and thus gained on a larger scale the objects which he desired and retained for himself the confidence and respect of his colleagues.

Mr. CURRAN. I desire to say but a very few words on this subject. The hon. gentleman who spoke last told us that it is merely a question of sentiment or humanity which is involved in this matter. I may say that I have received from persons in whom I have very great confidence letters urging me to support the Bill and to do my utmost to make it become the law of the land, and they pointed out to me that there was a great deal more than mere sentimental interest at stake. In fact, they said that persons who have large interests in this country are very much in favor of the passing of such a law as that proposed by my hon. friend from Frontenac. However much these people may be interested in a pecuniary sense, I know that each and every one of them is a patriotic Canadian citizen, and that although their own interests may suffer for the time being, the reasons of public policy given by the members of the Administration who have spoken to-night will cause them to approve of the vote I am about to give. I am satisfied that they will take into consideration the fact that the motives which induce the Government to call upon their friends to withdraw their support from the Bill, are motives worthy of the consideration of every patriotic Canadian, and for that reason, and for that reason alone, I will have to vote against the proposition of my hon. friend.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire, Sir, to add a few words—

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. The hon. gentleman has spoken on the motion for the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to make a personal explanation.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I object to the hon. gentleman making a speech.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand the hon. gentleman wishes to make a personal explanation.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will leave you, Sir, to decide whether it is strictly a personal explanation or not.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I object to another speech from the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has already spoken.

The House divided on motion of Mr. Kirkpatrick.

YEAS :

Messieurs

| | | |
|-------------------------|--------------------|---------------------|
| Amyot, | Fiset, | Mitchell, |
| Armstrong, | Fisher, | Paterson (Brant), |
| Bain (Wentworth), | Gauthier, | Perry, |
| Béchar, | Gillmor, | Platt, |
| Bell, | Girouard, | Préfontaine, |
| Bergeron, | Godbout, | Rinfret, |
| Bergin, | Guay, | Robertson, |
| Bernier, | Hale, | Rowand, |
| Borden, | Holton, | Ste. Marie, |
| Bourassa, | Kirk, | Scriven, |
| Bowman, | Kirkpatrick, | Semple, |
| Cartwright (Sir Rich.), | Labelle, | Shanly, |
| Casgrain, | Lang, | Smith, (Sir Donald) |
| Choquette, | Laurier, | Somerville, |
| Cook, | Lovitt, | Sutherland, |
| Coulombe, | Macdonald (Huron), | Thérien, |
| Desaulniers, | McIntyre, | Trow, |
| Dessaint, | McMillan (Huron), | Turcot, |
| Doyon, | McMullen, | Watson, |
| Edgar, | Meigs, | Wilson (Elgin).—61. |
| Ellis, | | |

NAYS :

Messieurs

| | | |
|-------------------------|------------------------|-----------------------|
| Bain (Soulanges), | Foster, | Moncreiff, |
| Baird, | Freeman, | Montague, |
| Baker, | Gigault, | O'Brien, |
| Bowell, | Gordon, | Patterson (Essex), |
| Boyle, | Grandbois, | Porter, |
| Brown, | Guillet, | Robillard, |
| Bryson, | Henderson, | Roome, |
| Cameron, | Hesson, | Rykert, |
| Cargill, | Hickey, | Skinner, |
| Carling, | Hudspeth, | Small, |
| Carpenter, | Ives, | Smith (Ontario), |
| Caron (Sir Adolphe) | Jamieson, | Sproule, |
| Chapleau, | Kenny, | Stevenson, |
| Charlton, | Langevin (Sir Hector) | Taylor, |
| Cimon, | Laurie, | Thompson, |
| Cockburn, | McGilla, | Tisdale, |
| Colby, | McDonald (Victoria), | Tupper (Sir Charles), |
| Coughlin, | McDougald (Pictou), | Tupper (Pictou), |
| Couture, | McDougall (C. Breton), | Tyrwhitt, |
| Curran, | McKay, | Vanasse, |
| Davin, | McKeen, | Wallace, |
| Davis, | McLellan, | Ward, |
| Dawson, | McMillan (Vaudreuil), | Weldon (Albert), |
| Denison, | McNeill, | Wilmot, |
| Dickinson, | Madill, | Wilson (Argenteuil), |
| Dupont, | Marshall, | Wilson (Lennox), |
| Ferguson (Leeds & Gr.), | Mills (Annapolis), | Wood (Brockville), |
| Ferguson (Renfrew), | Moffat, | Wright.—84. |

Motion negatived.

M. Fiset : L'honorable député de Verchères (M. Geoffrion) n'a pas voté.

M. GEOFFRION : M. l'Orateur, j'ai pairé avec l'honorable député de Bonaventure (M. Riopel) de sorte que je n'ai pas le droit de voter sur cette question.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all correspondence, statements, petitions and other documents received by the Government, or any department thereof, with reference to the assumption by the Government of the cost of deepening the channel of the River St. Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec, and with reference to the return of moneys expended in respect thereof, from out of the revenues of the port of Montreal, to a corresponding provision for the improvement of that port.—(Sir Donald A. Smith.)

Correspondence and petitions regarding a grant of public money to aid in the construction of a bridge over the Bay of Quinté at Belleville.—(Mr. Platt.)

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What do the Government propose to take up to-morrow?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We propose to take up the business on the Paper.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do they propose to go into Supply?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Not likely.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to mention to the Government that to-morrow, in the way of a motion, either a motion with respect to a matter of privilege or a motion of adjournment, I proposed to call the attention of the House to certain facts affecting the conduct of the returning officer for the county of Haldimand.

Mr. JAMIESON. I would very much prefer if we could dispose of the next Order on the list of Private Bills to-night. We reached the other day the same stage as to-night, and it was then suggested to me by a member of the Government that it would be better to allow it to stand until to-night. I do not wish that this matter should stand over any longer.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think I would meet the wishes of the large majority of the members of this House by moving the adjournment of the House. It is nearly eleven o'clock, and we may expect that to-morrow and the next day, being Government days, we will have to sit late. I have no doubt my hon. friend will have more than two or three opportunities to have his Bill considered by the House. He need not be uneasy about that, for we will see that the opportunity is given him.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to put a question to the hon. the Minister of Finance, though I am not quite sure if he will give me an explicit answer or not. Several enquiries have been made to me, which, not being in the confidence of the Government, I could not answer, as to whether or not the Government intend to continue the lavish expenditure made for railway purposes during the current season.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid my hon. friend will have to wait for the Estimates for that answer.

Mr. FISHER. I think in view of the fact that this is the second time the next Order on the Paper has been reached and the Government have taken upon themselves to prevent discussion on it, they should promise some definite day on which that Order may be reached and thoroughly discussed. It has been frequently asserted that the temperance people have not brought this question up sufficiently early in the Session to have it thoroughly discussed and passed by this House; and if the House adjourns at this early hour to-night, just as this Order is reached, I cannot refrain from throwing upon the Government the responsibility of thus blocking amendments to the Scott Act.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am certain the hon. gentleman did not hear the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, in which he stated to my hon. friend behind me that he proposed to adjourn because the House was greatly fatigued by late sessions, but that he would take care a full opportunity would be given to bring this question before the House.

Mr. FISHER. If that is the promise of the Government, it is quite sufficient, but I would like to know when it is likely we will have that opportunity. The Government should fix a day.

Motion was agreed to; and the House adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Printed by McLEA, ROGER & Co., Parliamentary Printers, Wellington Street, Ottawa.

House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Thursday, April 19, 1888.

No. 38.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 19th April, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE INDIAN ACT.

Mr. THOMPSON (for Mr. White, Cardwell) moved first reading of Bill (No. 106) to amend "The Indian Act," chapter 43 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. He said: The object of the Bill is to make some stringent provisions as to the commission of half-breeds to treaty privileges, and the retirement of half-breeds from treaty privileges; also to make Indian lands in the different Provinces amenable to assessments for municipal taxes, and to enable them to be sold and conveyed by tax deeds; likewise to make more stringent provisions with reference to the sale of intoxicating liquors to Indians, and to make provision in British Columbia for authority for the Governor in Council to appropriate to the Provincial authorities the proceeds of fines for the sale of intoxicating liquors.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

DEPUTY RETURNING OFFICER, CO. HALDIMAND.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to invite the attention of the House to a matter of which I gave notice last night; and I may say that I propose to close my remarks with a motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. What motion does the hon. gentleman propose to make?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A motion for adjournment. I dare say the House will recollect that a few days ago I addressed a question to the Government in these words:

"Whether Government are aware that one Charles Young, one of the deputy returning officers at the two elections held in the county of Haldimand, in February and November, 1887, and one of the parties at whose polls certain irregularities are alleged to have occurred, has served a term of imprisonment for theft in the gaol of the county of Brant, prior to being appointed deputy returning officer as aforesaid?"

To which the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Thompson) gave the following reply:—

"The Government are not aware that Charles Young served a term of imprisonment for theft in the gaol of the county of Brant prior to being appointed deputy returning officer. They are informed that he has not. Mr. Charles Young, as deputy returning officer, was not in any sense an officer of the Government; but we are informed that he is a respectable man, who has held several offices of trust and honor in the county of Haldimand, and that he was recommended for this office by several persons of credit, including a prominent Grit politician. The only charge with regard to irregularities at his polling place was investigated and dismissed."

I will call the attention of the House to some remarkable features of that reply before I get through. In the meantime I would like to submit a few statements bearing on the question. The first of these is the sheriff's, dated from the sheriff's office, county of Brant:—

"BRANTFORD, April 4th, 1888.

"This is to certify that from the regular gaol books kept for the county of Brant, it appears that one Charles Young, of the county of Haldimand, farmer, was sentenced by Her Majesty's regular court of Assize, on the 2nd of May, A.D. 1879, for the offence of stealing wheat, to six months imprisonment in the common gaol of the county of Brant, and duly served his term of imprisonment in accordance with the said sentence, and at and during the said period he was sentenced by the county judge's criminal court to a similar period of imprisonment on another charge, both sentences being concurrent.

"H. J. SCARFE, Sheriff of the county of Brant.

"ALFRED KITCHEN, Gaoler."

It will be observed this merely establishes that a certain Mr. Charles Young has served a certain term of imprisonment in the county gaol. I have here also the statutory declaration from the Dominion of Canada, county of Haldimand, as follows:—

"I, Charles, Wesley Colter, of the town of Cayuga, county of Haldimand, Barrister-at-law, do solemnly declare that, in or about the month of March, A. D. 1887, I had a conversation with John A. Langrill, Esq., M. D., who was returning officer for the electoral district of Haldimand at the Dominion elections, held severally on the 22nd day of February, A. D. 1887, and on the 12th day of November, A. D. 1887, at the office of James Mitchell, Esq., and in the presence of James Mitchell aforesaid, in the court house, in the village of Cayuga, in the county of Haldimand aforesaid, and during such conversation, I censured said John A. Langrill for appointing improper and unfit men to act as deputy returning officers at said elections.

"The said John A. Langrill asked me to name any improper appointments made by him, and I then and there named Charles Young, who I then informed him had been convicted of stealing wheat, and had served a term of imprisonment therefor.

"The said John A. Langrill professed to be surprised at my information, and pretended he had no knowledge of this, but subsequently he appointed said Charles Young as deputy returning officer in November last.

"And I make this solemn declaration believing the same to be true, &c.

"C. W. COLTER."

It will be noticed that affidavit No. 2 pretty well establishes the identity of Charles Young; but, for fear of any possible accidents, I have here a third affidavit made by a certain Timothy McMonagle, of the township of Oneida, in the county of Haldimand, who says:

"I well know Charles Young who was imprisoned in the Brantford gaol for the larceny of wheat in or about the month of May, A. D. 1879. In conversation with the said Charles Young on the 14th day of April, 1888, as to his imprisonment in the Brantford gaol for the larceny of wheat, aforesaid, the said Charles Young informed me that he had been imprisoned in the gaol at Brantford for the larceny of wheat for a term of six months. That the said Charles Young so imprisoned in the gaol at Brantford as aforesaid is the same Charles Young who acted as deputy returning officer at No. 4 polling sub-division in the township of Oneida, at the Dominion election held on the 15th day of November, A. D. 1887. I have lived in the township of Oneida, a near neighbor of the said Charles Young ever since the said Charles Young resided in the said township of Oneida, and I know of no other Charles Young. The said Charles Young never held any office of trust or responsibility in the said township of Oneida since he was imprisoned as aforesaid in the Brantford gaol.

"And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the 'Act for the suppression of extra-judicial oaths.'"

"TIMOTHY McMONAGLE."

Now, I have one or two things to say with respect to the answer I have received. It appears to me that there is no loophole of escape from these affidavits, and that it is clear and certain as anything well can be that Mr. Charles Young had served a term of imprisonment in the Brantford gaol for theft, prior to his being appointed as returning officer, first of all in February, and secondly in November.

Mr. THOMPSON. Will the hon. gentleman state the time of his imprisonment?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have already stated it three times. It was in May or June, 1879. I think, when evidence of this sort is placed before the Minister of Justice, he might take the trouble to enquire or to communicate with the keeper of the gaol or the sheriff, or any other parties he sees fit, in order to find out the state of affairs, and if the hon. gentleman had done so, he would not be in the position he now occupies when he states that due enquiry has been made, because no other deduction can be taken from his answer, and that this Charles Young had not served a term of imprisonment for theft. Moreover, I take issue in the strongest possible manner with the Minister of Justice in regard to this point. He states that Charles Young, as deputy returning officer, was not in any sense an officer of the Government. I say that is altogether an unworthy equivocation. The Government of this country, for their own purposes, for purposes which I am not going to characterise now but which the House can imagine, took the power of appointing the returning officers into their own hands. They took those offices away from men who had discharged the duties fairly and well, men who were known to the people and were responsible to the people; and are we to be told that the Government can appoint returning officers at their own will and pleasure, and can repudiate any responsibility for the action of the deputy returning officers who are appointed by those returning officers? Quod facit per alium facit per se applies here, at all events, whatever its application else where may be. The Government are responsible in the highest degree for the conduct of the returning officers and the deputy returning officers whom they may appoint. That is a doctrine which must commend itself to the common sense of every one in this House, and it is a doctrine upon which they must be judged. The affidavit of Mr. Colter, the affidavit of the sheriff and the affidavit of a neighbor of Charles Young contradict the statements of the hon. gentleman in every particular except one. They do not contradict his statement as to the fact that Mr. Young was recommended by persons of credit, including a prominent Grit politician, I should like to see, and I think the House would like to see, and I know the electors of Haldimand would like to know, who was the prominent Grit politician who recommended an ex-convict as a deputy returning officer in that county. Perhaps he was a practical humorist, and wanted to play a practical joke on the returning officer and those who appointed the returning officer for the county of Haldimand. Perhaps he was a cynical party, and, having seen the previous practice in the county of Haldimand, he thought that an ex-convict would necessarily be a good deputy returning officer for that county. But, as I do not know who he is, perhaps the hon. gentleman will give us his name, and then there may be other affidavits in store for us. I shall not pursue that part of the subject any further. We called the attention of the Government to the facts which have been disclosed as to the conduct of the returning officer. We have Mr. Colter's sworn affidavit that he went to the returning officer and remonstrated with him on his appointing a person of this class to a semi-judicial office. We find that the returning officer, according to Mr. Colter's affidavit, pleaded ignorance, and intimated that he would not do it again, and we find that, when November came, Mr. Charles Young was there as large as life discharging the duties of deputy returning officer. It appears to me that a returning officer who has so little regard for the decencies affecting his position, ought to be held to task by this House and by the Government who appointed him, and I think there will be a failure in the plain duty of the Government and especially in the duty of their judicial officer, the Minister of Justice, unless steps are taken to teach this returning officer that this House does not entirely endorse his action in appointing a man with the antecedents of Mr. Young to the responsible position to which he was appointed. I understand further that Dr. Langrill has also been an applicant for office, that he applied for the position of Superintendent of an Indian reserve which has been vacated by the death of Mr. McKinnon. Why has there been this delay in rewarding a gentleman who has been such a faithful servant of the Government? Is it possible that it is because there is danger of a third election taking place in the county of Haldimand, and that Mr. Langrill and Mr. Charles Young are too important in their offices to be so soon dispensed with? I suggest to the Minister of Justice, as I understand he has some amendment to the Election Act under consideration, to introduce a new clause providing that where two parties are applying for a position of deputy returning officer, both being equally competent on other grounds, the preference should be given hereafter to ex-convicts, or, at all events, that ex-convicts should be allowed to rank next to secretaries of Conservative associations of the pattern of Mr. Dunn. Perhaps, Sir, it may be their intention to institute some new decoration, some badge or other, to distinguish these worthy persons. I recollect my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) suggesting, when Mr. Dunn's case was before us, that they might receive, with some propriety, a coat of arms, equal parts tar and feathers, in recognition of their services. Now, I would be sorry to have it supposed that I think Mr. Charles Young very much worse than his employers; for all I know to the contrary, Mr. Young may be a true penitent, and he is quite as likely to be a true penitent as many other persons much more highly placed. Sir, Government are now seized of the facts, Government now know, if they did not know before,—and I am surprised that they were so very ill-informed—they now know—I think there is hardly any escape to be had from these affidavits which I have read to the House—Government now know that a gentleman who, whatever his present state of penitence may be, had at one period of his existence so far forgot himself as to serve six months in a common jail, and this man was appointed twice over deputy returning officer for the county of Haldimand, in a very closely contested election, where it was known that the manipulation of a single vote might change the whole contest. And Sir, this was done by the returning officer, Dr. Langrill, who, be it remembered, as I am informed, is an applicant for office under this Government; it was done by him under formal remonstrance. If we were very charitable, we might suppose that it may have occurred once in ignorance, but it is clear from these facts to which I have called attention, that it was done after formal and repeated warning—warning in the presence of witnesses. Now, Sir, it is in the power of the Government—they have ample power, they lead this House, they have a large majority in this House—it is in their power to purge themselves from all accusation of complicity with their returning officer, if they so saw fit. If they chose, on this statement of facts, to inflict some proper punishment on the returning officer, such as I think he deserves for appointing such persons, why, Sir, no more need be said; if they fail to do that, Sir, we will know the reason why, and the country will know the reason why. For myself I await the explanations, such as they may be, of the Minister of Justice. I reserve my right of further action, and I will now bring my remarks to a close by moving the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. THOMPSON. The statement which the hon. gentleman has read in the Hansard of the 9th April, is a correct statement of what I said on that occasion with the exception of a single word; I am not correctly reported in the expression that this gentleman was recommended by a prominent Grit politician; the expression I used was "a prominent Liberal politician." Now, Sir, I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman in the criticism which he made upon the Government generally, with respect to these returning officers. I presume he expects from me a statement of how far the facts which he has laid before the House this afternoon—I rather hesitate to call them facts at present—the allegations which he has laid before the House this afternoon, were within my knowledge on April 9th, when I made the reply which seems to have given the hon. gentleman umbrage. I may say, in the first place, as the hon. gentleman has been told before, that with reference to his general attack upon the returning officers in this country, with respect to his insinuations that convicts will be proper returning officers under the system that prevails to-day with regard to elections in this country, the statement is a somewhat extraordinary one, in view of the fact that although unusual numbers of petitions in controverted elections which took place a year ago, have been filed in the courts of this country, and have been investigated, out of the very few, if any, charges that have been made against returning officers, not one, so far as my memory serves me, has been sustained. That, of course, does not deprive the hon. gentleman of the right which he exercises here; and on every opportunity, of attacking the Government, and insisting that they appoint unworthy persons to that position, and that they appoint partisans to that position, and that the persons whom they appoint exercise their powers unscrupulously on behalf of the Government of Canada; but it will convince the country that unless hon. gentlemen opposite are able to show in some case which has been adjudicated on, in which they have had the courage to make a charge, and they have had the proof to sustain it—it will convince the country that these charges are not quite worthy of the hon. gentleman from whom they come.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As in the case of Mr. Dunn.

Mr. THOMPSON. As in the case of Mr. Dunn, whom the hon. gentleman and his friends had at the bar of this House, and against whom, after they had attacked him week after week, they had not the courage to offer a resolution of condemnation. Now, I may be entirely mistaken as to the duties and responsibilities to be attached to the Government with respect to deputy returning officers in this country, but it does seem to me that neither under any principle of the constitution, nor under any enactment on our Statute-book, has the Government any control with respect to the appointment of these officers, or any responsibility with regard to them. The Government, it is true, have the choice of returning officers, but when the returning officers have been appointed, the choice of something like eight or ten thousand deputy returning officers, not one hundredth part of whose names ever reach the Government, and over whom the Government have not the slightest control—the responsibility with regard to these officers, I claim, rests entirely upon the returning officer who has appointed them, and not the Government that has appointed him. The remedy that is given, either to the candidate aggrieved or to any elector that is aggrieved, is simple and plain. Any public officer, returning officer, or deputy, is liable to indictment if he violates the statute or violates his duty, and every charge that can be made against him is to be investigated under a petition in which the accused shall have the advantage, that the hon. gentleman has taken good care this officer should not have this afternoon, the advantage of answering himself all charges that are formulated and prepared for him to answer. Now, Sir, while I claim with respect to these eight or ten thousand officers that we have no responsibility, we can have none as to their fitness or the reasons for their choice. I disclaim responsibility likewise for the information which may be given to any gentleman in this House who asks information as to their antecedents. When an hon. gentleman puts a question which the Government require me to answer, I am bound to give him the best information in my power. I gave on April 9th the full information which I had with regard to this returning officer. I did not state that I had made an elaborate enquiry, I did not feel bound to do so. If no information had reached me with regard to this officer, I would have told the hon. gentleman that we had no information on the subject; as the information reached me, so I communicated it to the House. I gave the hon. gentleman all the information that I had, conceiving at the same time that it was as much out of place for the hon. gentleman—I say it, of course, with deference to his superior parliamentary knowledge and experience—as much out of place for the hon. gentleman to ask the Government if they knew that one James Young had served a term of imprisonment for theft, as if he had asked that question about any other private citizen of the country who was not an officer of the Government at all and for whom we had no responsibility. Now, I do not propose to say anything this afternoon with regard to the affidavits which the hon. gentleman has read. His own sound sense and his sense of fair play will surely indicate to him that in so far as they are imputations against the returning officer, who was an officer of the Government, that officer ought to have an opportunity to reply to them, and I shall be very much surprised, after the information I have received and after the information that has been laid before the House this afternoon, if the returning officer will not be able to give the hon. gentleman an answer that will make him feel he has been a little unjust in the statement he has made to the House this afternoon both as regards that officer and as regards the general attack which has been made on the Government. As regards the question which I answered on April 9th, the hon. gentleman has not this afternoon called the attention of the House, if my memory serves me, to any ground at all for the imputation conveyed in that question. The House will remember that this person was a deputy returning officer, as the hon. gentleman has stated, in the elections in February and November of last year. The ground, and the only ground surely, upon which the hon. gentleman could fairly put a question upon the paper reviving a charge of theft against this person, ten years old and for which he served the full penalty that was put upon him, the only ground surely actuating any person of ordinary humanity and with any ordinary sense of justice was this, that the deputy returning officer had committed some wrong in the conduct of the election which justified the reproach of his former misfortune being called up against him and the conduct imputed to the Government even for its indirect connection with his appointment as returning officer. But I failed to hear this afternoon, although the imputation was conveyed in the hon. gentleman's question the other day—because he intimated in the question that at this officer's poll certain irregularities had occurred—vigorously as the returning officer was attacked and the deputy returning officer, I failed to hear the slightest justification for the hon. gentleman's attack upon the character of either of those men or upon the Government that appointed the returning officer, arising from any alleged irregularities in the course of the conduct of those elections. I need not remind the House that if any irregularity occurs the amplest opportunity exists for redress, and I suppose I need hardly remind the House that the hon. gentleman has made this impetuous attack and this unscrupulous insinuation at the very time when he gives us to understand these matters are sub judice and the conduct of these persons is being investigated in the courts.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will answer the last remark made by the hon. gentleman. I am informed that irregularities occurred; I am informed that ballots were improperly rejected at that poll; I am informed that the county judge, on the recount, restored to Mr. Coulter the votes of which Charles Young had deprived him.

Mr. LAURIER. The Government cannot get rid of the responsibility which properly belongs to them and which is charged against them to-day by my hon. friend. The fact, the shameful fact we have to-day that an ex-convict has been appointed the representative of the majesty of law and justice in an important election, is altogether in keeping with the system that has been adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite of selecting returning officers at their own sweet will and selecting irresponsible persons for the position. Common sense and common justice alike would require that those returning officers, those who by the nature of their office are to hold the scales of justice between contending parties, who are to give their fiat at the election, should be permanent officers of the law, sheriff's registrars, or such like persons who have characters to maintain and positions to uphold. But the Government have acted otherwise. Such, indeed, was the practice at one time; but in 1880 it was a feature of the Gerrymander Act that the Government should repeal that system and take to themselves the power to select their own men, their own creatures and their own favorites as the persons to stand fire between the contending parties. We have had that system in operation, and now have the result in the occurrences that have taken place. If we had permanent responsible officers of the law as returning officers, then the answer given by the Minister of Justice would apply; then he would say: The responsibility does not rest with the Government, but it rests upon the officers of the law who filled the position. But if the Government insists upon choosing their own creatures as returning officers they must be held responsible for the appointments made and for the result of those appointments. This is the true doctrine which my hon. friend has laid down to-day, and the Government stand convicted of having had as one of their officers a man who at one time was an ex-convict, and he it was who was selected to stand fire between contending parties in a hotly contended election. If we desire to have a proper system prevail, we must revert to the system that prevailed at one time, and have permanent officers of the law as returning officers. What was the reason the old practice was abandoned? We had an explanation given at the time when the law was amended, we had an explanation given during the present Session. The reason given on both occasions has been that Conservative candidates would fail to receive justice at the hands of registrars and sheriffs, because they would be appointed by the Provincial Government, who might be men not favorable to the Dominion Government. The First Minister stated the reason several times. He said that if returning officers were to be registrars and sheriffs appointed by the Grits of Ontario, Conservative candidates would have a scanty measure of justice. We can see what measure of justice is to be obtained by Liberals when returning officers are appointed—by whom? Not by the Dominion Government, but actually by ministerial candidates. We had this proved to be the case last year; Mr. Dunn was appointed returning officer at the instance of the ministerial candidate for Queen's, N.B. Mr. Dunn applied to the ministerial candidate for the office, the candidate applied to the Government, and Mr. Dunn was appointed, and we saw the result. We have heard the statement of the Minister of Justice, that, had Mr. Dunn been here, we would not have dared to attack him. Even if we did not dare to attack him, it did not follow that he was not guilty.

Mr. THOMPSON.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LAURIER. So guilty was he that the man who sat in this House by virtue of his warrant did not dare to come to Parliament a second time on that warrant, but went to his constituents again. Under such circumstances, so long as we have the present system prevailing, and so long as the Government will insist on appointing their returning officers, we are bound, we are justified in holding them responsible for whatever appointments are made under those circumstances. Since the Minister of Justice did not care to justify the acts of the returning officer, the Government stand responsible for the charges made against those officers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government accept the full responsibility for the alteration of the law and for that provision of the law by which returning officers are selected by the Government of the day, on their responsibility and subject to their responsibility to Parliament for the appointments being proper appointments. That charge was forced upon us by our experience. We found that the Conservative party had no fair play in the Province of Ontario.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; the Government found in the selection of the returning officers, at all events in the Province of Ontario, that the screws were put by the Provincial Government on their officers, and that in the choice of a deputy returning officer they were compelled to select the sheriff or registrar with very few exceptions, and this, in their view, justified an alteration of the law. Those officers were chosen for the purpose and with the object of their political antecedents and political proclivities. The deputy returning officers were selected as if for the purpose of defeating the Conservative candidate. We had this experience of 1878 and 1882, and we were obliged, in self-defence, to alter the law. We are responsible to the people of Canada, we are responsible to this House for making improper appointments, and as my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, has stated, the proof that we have not made improper appointments is shown by the fact that although every kind of charge has been brought against the Conservative members and against other gentlemen interested in elections, for corrupt practices, and that though they tried to make out irregularities of every possible kind, yet in those petitions no charge has been brought against the returning officers who were selected by the Government. Can there be a more conclusive proof of the correctness and the propriety of the selection of the returning officers than that fact? Surely amidst all those improper appointments as hon. gentlemen opposite allege; surely if the returning officers were selected for the purpose of favoring the Conservative candidate, one returning officer might have been found who had committed wrong. Surely the hon. gentlemen opposite who have raked up those who they say were opposed to their candidates, some would have found some returning officer in whose conduct there was a fault and against whom there could be brought a charge. Sir, consider for one moment, forsooth, that the Dominion Government are to have no choice in the returning officer and that the returning officers are to be instead the appointees of the Provincial Government. Now, there was a good ground for appointing registrars under the old system in Ontario and Upper Canada, when the registrar held office during good behavior, but that does not apply to the present case. The registrars are not appointed during good behaviour now. They are the mere tools of the Government, or they may be made mere tools of a Government of strange political feelings who are resolved to exercise those feelings against those opposed to them. The sheriffs and registrars of Ontario are at the present time mere officers at the pleasure of the Provincial Government. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a check in Provincial elections against the impropriety of the conduct of those men in their capacity as returning officers, for the Provincial members, if there is any impropriety, can complain, and the Government of the day are responsible to the Provincial Legislature. But the Provincial Government are perfectly irresponsible in any action that may be taken or any instructions that may be given to any returning officer, be he sheriff or registrar. They are not responsible to this House. We can arraign a returning officer, but we cannot arraign at the bar of this House the Government of a Province, if they use their power over those officers while holding office during pleasure by saying: You must appoint Reform deputy returning officers, you must do this and you must do that. They cannot be held up to the bar of public opinion; they can be held up to a responsibility before this House. As servants of the Local Legislature, they are not responsible to us; and I say there are gentlemen behind me who have felt in their own constituency the injustice they have suffered by this fact of the returning officers being politically opposed to them and as being under a Government and holding office at the will of a Provincial Government also opposed to them. I say we are perfectly justified in self-defence in making that provision, and until it is shown that the choice of the Government has been improperly used; that the returning officers have acted illegally; that they have acted unfairly; that they are liable to any one of the charges that can be brought against them; if they have acted unfairly, until that is shown our justification is complete. I state here in my place that the Government are aware, from the reports received from constituencies in previous elections, that the screw was put on by the Provincial Government and by members of the Provincial Government upon their own officers, as to the appointment of deputy returning officers, and that it was merely in self-defence that the Government have acted as they have done in applying to Parliament. They have got the sanction of Parliament—of a previous Parliament to this—and if the Government have acted improperly I have no doubt that this Parliament representing the people will repeal that law. Until that is done and so long as the law remains as it is now the Government are perfectly justified. They must do it, they must make the selection of a returning officer, and as long as they make that selection with so little objection as to the personnel of the returning officers and the conduct of the returning officers, I do not think the representatives of the people in the Dominion Parliament will hand over that power to the Provincial Government who are quite irresponsible as respects their action towards returning officers if appointed from Provincial nominees.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) The right hon. gentleman, like an old parliamentarian, in making his rather impassionate address to the House, has been exceedingly astute and careful to avoid the special matter before the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I answered the speech made by your leader.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) He has not referred even indirectly to the charge made by the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and he has not attempted to justify the Government for having sanctioned the appointment of this convict as deputy returning officer by Dr. Langrill. What has the hon. gentleman said? In his answer he has said that no charges were prosecuted in the courts against the returning officers, and therefore the system would be supposed to be a good one.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say anything about courts.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) That in none of the petitions filed by members relating to the elections have any charges been brought against returning officers, and the hon. gentleman asked us to conclude from that that the system which prevails at the present time is an excellent one. The hon. gentleman knows that he did not change the old system whereby the officers of the Legislature were appointed as returning officers, because of any charges filed in the courts against those officers. No charges were filed in the courts against those officers under the old system.

An hon. MEMBER. In 1878.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) None were successful. The hon. gentleman cannot point out one where it was proven where there was any wrongdoing on the part of the returning officer.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not so sure of that.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) The hon. gentleman turns round and he justifies the change he made in those appointments because he did not believe they were fair. How does he know?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. gentleman will find that in the case of the election of Mr. Laframme, the returning officer was complained of.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) That was not a returning officer. If you allow me, the hon. gentleman will see that it was not a returning officer at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, yes.

An hon. MEMBER. He was a deputy returning officer.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) He was a deputy returning officer, and the hon. gentleman will see that he was appointed to his official position as deputy returning officer by a Government favorable to himself.

Mr. GIROUARD. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Yes.

Mr. GIROUARD. The returning officer in that case was not the one designated by law, but he was the one selected by the ministerial candidate.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Which shows conclusively, if it proves anything positively, that the system of allowing members to nominate returning officers is a bad system. I accept the explanation given by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier as the most convincing condemnation of the present system. But, Sir, the hon. First Minister sought to bolster up his rather weak argument by a statement which I regretted to hear him make. He tried to lead his followers to believe that he had to change the whole system of appointment of returning officers because he could not bring them to the bar of this House and punish them if they had done wrong. The hon. gentleman knows well that if a sheriff or other officer is appointed as returning officer, he is under our law and is amenable to the jurisdiction of this House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say that. What I said was that we could not bring the Government of Ontario.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Of course I am bound to accept the explanation of the hon. gentleman, but I wish to tell him that he was universally understood on this side of the House—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, I could not be so understood.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) On this side of the House he was universally understood, and my ears entirely deceived me if he did not expressly say that one of the reasons why he had to change the law was that under the old system the returning officer could not be brought to the bar of the House and punished.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; Hansard will prove it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman says—and in that he follows the line of argument taken by the hon. Minister of Justice—that we ought to be satisfied with the present system because as a matter of fact, in the petitions which have been filed, no charges have been made against the returning officers; but the hon. gentleman knows right well that the partisanship which a returning officer can exercise and the injustice which he can inflict on one of the candidates, can be very great and very reprehensible and still may not be such as to bring him within the provisions of the criminal law. The hon. gentleman knows right well that returning officers were censurable and censured, one after another, for improperly returning or withholding returns for partisan purposes. The hon. gentleman knows that days and days were taken up by hon. gentlemen of this House complaining of the injustice with which they were treated. The deputy returning officer is not a semi-judicial officer, but he is a judicial officer, and is very often much more important than the returning officer, because he decides what votes shall be accepted and what rejected, and his decisions cannot be appealed from except to the county judge. But this is to some extent a departure from the main question before the House. I think there was one universal feeling of regret when the hon. Minister of Justice resumed his seat because he refused to condemn the appointment of this returning officer or to express regret that such a man had been appointed. It is surely desirable, in the interest of good government and common decency and justice, that those who have been punished as common rogues should not be appointed to positions of honor and credit; and when such a deplorable thing takes place, and no language that can be construed into condemnation and censure falls from ministerial lips, what will the public believe, and what will that man himself believe? He will believe, as Dunn believes, that his conduct is such as meets with the approval of the Government. The hon. First Minister asked us, when Dunn was brought before the bar of this House, why did you not move a motion of censure upon him? Because the hon. Minister of Justice told us beforehand what would be the fate of any resolution that we should move. He told us that the case was sub judice, and when we challenged the correctness of his decision, our motion was voted down. There has been no public scandal or disgrace in the history of Canada for twenty-five years which has sunk so deep as that scandal of that man Dunn, who, in defiance of all law and decency, returned a man to this House who was 75 votes below the other candidate; and the conduct of that returning officer, if it was not openly justified, was palliated and excused when he was brought before the bar of this House. What would have been the use of our moving a vote of censure? He was condemned by every man who wants to see fair play and justice. The newspapers everywhere have condemned him; and it remained for the hon. Minister of Justice alone to palliate and excuse such conduct in this House. There has been no answer, or attempt at an answer, to the charges brought by my hon. friend. The only apology the hon. gentleman made to the House was that the reporter had reported him as having stated that this man was recommended by a "Grit politician," while he had used the expression, "Liberal politician." The hon. gentleman was challenged to name him, and he has not named him yet; although having made the statement he did, I think he was bound to give the name to the House, in order that the party with which we have the honor to be connected may know whether this man was recommended as the hon. gentleman says, or whether the hon. gentleman was misled in his statement, and is misleading the House in making it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend has said that it was left to the hon. Minister of Justice alone to defend the conduct of returning officer Dunn who was at the bar of this House. I think it was not left to the hon. Minister of Justice alone, but it was left to the people of the constituency who have defended him in the verdict they have since rendered. My hon. friend said further that hon. gentlemen opposite had bitterly complained of the conduct of returning officers for not sending in the returns of candidates, and because on that account the returns were not registered as they ought to have been. Why, Sir, we heard hon. gentlemen opposite get up one after another and denounce the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery because he withheld the returns which they alleged the returning officers had sent in. It is very difficult to know what would be satisfactory to these hon. gentlemen. I happen to know that in the case of my own election contest, the Government went out of the constituency and selected the sheriff of the county as the returning officer. One would suppose from what hon. gentlemen have said that would have been eminently satisfactory to the Reform party; but what did we find? We found the members of the Reform party in my constituency solemnly meeting in convention and passing a resolution denouncing the partiality of the sheriff. So that it is absolutely impossible to imagine what is to be done to satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite. The appointment of the sheriff, which they say ought to be done, is not satisfactory to them. Perhaps some hon. gentleman will now rise in his place and tell us exactly what the Government ought to do.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I should like the friends of the Opposition in the Province of Quebec to hear the fiery denunciations in this House of anything that is not strictly correct, for we see in the bye-elections that are now going on that the Local Government, although bound to appoint returning officers according to the law, are going behind the returning officers, and forcing them by threats to change every one of their deputy returning officers who are not of the stamp they need to carry the elections. I could cite precisely what has happened yesterday. A very respectable man in Sault au Recollet had been appointed deputy returning officer, but was notified by the returning officer that he could not continue him in office because the Liberals were not satisfied with his political creed.

Mr. LAURIER. Who was the returning officer?

Mr. DESJARDINS. Mr. Philatreault, and the deputy returning officer who was forced out was Mr. Cyprien Corbier.

Mr. LAURIER. What is Mr. Philatreault?

Mr. DESJARDINS. He is the registrar of the county, and he was forced by the Liberals to appoint their own tools. This is the way hon. gentlemen opposite act, who are so ready to denounce the Government.

Mr. CARGILL. I regret very much that the names of these people should be brought up here when no proof is brought that they are guilty of wrongdoing. They do things differently in Ontario. Let hon. gentlemen opposite examine the record of the Government of Ontario, and he will find that they not only appoint returning officers who have been convicts, but also justices of the peace who have been inmates of the penitentiary. It is all very well for a man to have the power to take money out of your pocket, but these men, occupying a quasi-judicial position, have the power of depriving a man of his personal liberty. No men should be selected to administer the law who are not men of honor and capability. In addressing a meeting in my county, I made the statement that the Government of Ontario had not only appointed as justices of the peace men who could not write their own names, but they appointed men who had been inmates of the prison and the penitentiary. Well, I was interrupted by a man at the meeting who complained to the chairman that I had no right to expose him, because he was a justice of the peace and had been an inmate of the penitentiary. He said that happened years ago and that I should not have exposed him. His case was one of those that confirmed the statement I made. Hon. gentlemen opposite are supporting this motion for the purpose of exposing a man who may have at one time in his life been unfortunate and yet be a good man to-day—and I believe the men the Government appointed to these positions were not the worst appointments the Government made in that matter.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There is one point to which I desire to call attention in connection with this matter. I do not wish to follow in the wide range that has been taken, but simply to call the attention of the House to this fact. It is evident that in the matter now under discussion, the House and the country were, at a previous date, misled by the answer the hon. the Minister of Justice gave to the question then put. I thought to-day that the hon. gentleman would have stated he had been misinformed, as he practically, I think, accepted the statement set forth in the affidavit. I thought he would have regretted having led the House and the country to believe, from the information he had received, something which was not strictly in accord with the facts; but I regret to find he took the line of rather seeming to justify his answer. I think the House is entitled to know from whom the hon. gentleman received his information. Of course, it was open to him at the time to have taken the ground that the question was not a proper one to be asked, and have declined to answer; but he answered it, and answered in such a way as to lead the country to believe that the hon. member for South Oxford, who put the question, had been misinformed. Now we find that the statement of the hon. member for South Oxford is supported by affidavits, the correctness of which the hon. the Minister of Justice does not pretend to deny, but expresses his willingness for the time being to accept. We are therefore entitled to know on what information he based his answer. Was it the returning officer for Haldimand who gave it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will answer the hon. gentleman when he sits down.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The answer which the hon. gentleman gave leads me to believe that there must be some misapprehension in the whole matter. When he told us that he was informed Charles Young had not served any term of imprisonment, and that he was further informed he had held several offices of trust and honor and was recommended for that office of deputy returning officer by several partisans of the Grits, he must have received his information from some one. That person should have been careful to give the correct information, and we cannot but regret that he did not do so. The hon. gentleman will have to be more careful the next time as to whom he addresses for information. I do not wish to enter into the charges made with reference to the action of the Ontario Government with regard to appointments of magistrates or with reference to other questions that came up. I do not think the hon. the Minister of Justice will take that line. We are dealing with a certain question that ought to be decided on its merits; and if wrong has been done in any other case, that does not make this right. The hon. the Minister of Justice will hardly venture frankly to say what the answer he gave would imply; he would hardly attempt to justify the conduct of the returning officer for the county of Queen's. I do not believe there is a respectable gentleman in this House who will justify, in his heart of hearts, the conduct of that returning officer. The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Cargill) tells us we changed our base. He tells us we first complained that the returning officers did not do their duty, and then that the returning officers did do their duty but that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery did not. Well, both charges were made. We claim that the writs were delayed by the returning officers in many cases, and then we charged the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery with delaying the publication of these writs. The hon. gentleman then says that we are never satisfied, and that there is no way of pleasing us, and would lead the House to believe that we were finding fault when there was none to be found. He asked what would please these hon. gentlemen. Well, Sir, nothing less will please us than that justice and fair play should be done. That is what they ask, and if they are enabled to secure that by reason of a majority on the other side, they are prepared to vote down what is right and just and fair, they can at any rate maintain their rights as members of Parliament and rise in their place and protest against the unfairness which is manifested, against the injustice which is done to them severally and collectively, as has been done by this Government. The Government, as we have it here, in view of the numbers supporting them, ought to be able to do right, they ought to be able to discharge their duties in a proper way; and, if it is correct that this returning officer was notified prior to the appointment of this individual, before the last general election, and, as it appears, agreed that, if the charges which were made against him were true, he was not a fit person to be appointed, the Government must see that they appointed a gentleman whose appointment it is admitted was not in the public interest. I do not desire to say anything more on this question. I did not know that my hon. friend had any affidavits in reference to this matter, but, in common with other members, I have heard the testimony which has been adduced, I have heard the answer of the Minister of Justice, and I think, in the light of the affidavits which have been produced, it would be right for the Minister of Justice to say that he accepts them or that he does not accept them, and if he does accept them, that he should express his regret that he was misinformed, and that he consequently misled the House in regard to this matter, if the facts which have been recited are correct.

Mr. FREEMAN. I would not have risen to say one word on this subject but for the accusation which these gentlemen have thrown out to this side of the House. The hon. gentleman says that a majority on this side of the House are prepared to vote against justice and right. I am one of that majority. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that I am prepared to vote and that I do vote for justice and right just as often as he does, and that these accusations are not only ungentlemanly but are unwise, and should not be thrown across to this side of the House, that we should not be told that we are prepared to vote against justice and right. Let us examine the record, and it will be found that we uphold justice and right as much as they do on the other side. Last Session I listened with some amazement to the accusations which were thrown against us, and against the Government especially, as to their conduct in the election of February, 1887. I presumed, as a matter of course, that those hon. gentlemen had some grounds for those accusations, and I thought that, when they got the opportunity, they would substantiate those accusations. They declared that all they wanted was the opportunity. They said: Give us the opportunity, and we will show you how you have behaved, we will show you that the constituencies have been deceived and that they are now waiting for the opportunity to return members to support the Opposition in place of the members now supporting the Government. They got the opportunity in many cases, and how many more have they now than they had last Session? Have they one more? On the contrary they have less. Did they get any more voters in the constituencies in which they returned the same members as they had before? Were any more votes recorded in favor of the Opposition than there were in favor of the Government? No, Sir, it was on the contrary. Wherever an opportunity was offered to the people, there was a larger number of voters who recorded their votes for those sitting on this side of the House, and I may say also that in every case those hon. gentlemen have failed to substantiate their charges or their contentions. Does that show that they have justice and right on their side? It is just the opposite. When they brought up this returning officer from Queen's, N. B., they made a spectacle of themselves when they had that man before the House. With all the legal power and legal knowledge and legal wisdom which they had arrayed against that man, they showed themselves to be perfectly imbecile in regard to that charge. I contend that, with all these facts before them, it is unwise and it is improper and it is insulting for them to throw their charges against us, and to say that we vote for what we know to be wrong and unjust. What is the charge which is brought against this deputy returning officer? It is that at one time of his life he did wrong, and he was punished for it. Perhaps if every hon. member on that side of the House had been dealt with according to his deserts, many might have been punished. At any rate, if this man was guilty, he paid the penalty, he paid it to the public and to the law, and there has been no charge that he did not do right since that, there is no charge that he did not discharge his duties properly as a deputy returning officer. What do the hon. gentlemen assert that the Government should do? The last speaker said that he wished the Minister of Justice to say, I have done wrong, and I am sorry. Did he suppose that the Minister of Justice would take that course? For several years I was returning officer, and I made my own appointments, and I never asked the Government whom they were pleased or displeased with as regards deputy returning officers. All I studied was to see that I had deputy returning officers who would do my work well. That is what I looked after. I never asked what the man had done before, but was he prepared at that time to do my work well, so that the Government would bring no charge against me, and the candidates would bring no charge against me, and the public would bring no charge against me. That was the object I had in view, and I venture to say that this returning officer who has been referred to in this case had the same object in view, and, if this man who was appointed as a deputy returning officer did his work well, the returning officer was justified in appointing him, and these hon. gentlemen have nothing to complain of. If the deputy returning officer has done wrong, let him be brought to the proper tribunal, and no man would be more desirous than myself to see that he was punished if he did not carry out his duty. These deputy returning officers should always do their duty, and should be punished if they do not. I think this discussion is a thorough waste of the time of the House. If this man, at some time or other, stole anything or committed any other crime for which he was punished, he paid the penalty; but, if he has done any wrong in this particular case, bring him before the proper tribunal and punish him. The cause of my rising to-day, however, was the continual throwing out from that side of the House of statements that we are frauds on this side, that we support injustice in place of justice. Dare hon. gentlemen tell me that outside of this House? They dare not do it, and what they dare not do outside of the House, as gentlemen they ought not to do inside of this House.

Mr. FREEMAN.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman opposite has asked me a question. He has said in effect that he expected me to state to the House that I had been misled in the statement which I made and that I had accepted the statement which was put before the House this afternoon. If he had followed my remarks, he would have observed that I expressly reserved myself from accepting the statements which were put before the House this afternoon, and which was sprung upon the House by the hon. gentleman, because I think the persons who are referred to ought to have an opportunity of answering those statements. I do not want to be misrepresented as to anything I may have said, and I may therefore state that I gave the best information to the House which was in my possession at the time. I do not think the question which the hon. gentleman put is one that should have been asked. I think it is not a question in regard to which the Government has any responsibility, but, notwithstanding that, I should be very sorry to have misled the House, but if the statements which have been put before the House now are correct, I was misled myself. Still, I think that these people should have an opportunity of replying to them before we come to any conclusion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With the permission of the House I will lay on the Table these three affidavits so that hon. gentlemen may inspect them.

Mr. RYKERT. You had better keep them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; I leave them for the information of the Minister of Justice, who desires, as I understood him, to investigate the matter.

Mr. RYKERT. They don't amount to much.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They simply amount to this, in my opinion, that they are the clearest possible proof that a man whom it was a disgrace to place in a position of justice, has been placed there. With regard to some remarks that have been made on the other side, particularly by the last speaker or two, I will just simply say, that they are tantamount to a declaration within the minds of those hon. gentlemen that ex-convicts are fit and proper returning officers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Oh, they do not think ex-convicts are fit and proper persons for returning officers; then let the Government deal with this returning officer who has appointed such. The First Minister, however, asked a question of this House to which I will venture to offer a suggestion. The First Minister declared that Provincial Governments were not fit persons to be intrusted with the selection of men to act as returning officers, that they put pressure on returning officers to appoint proper deputies—that, I think, was his contention;—that therefore, in self-defence, he had taken it into his own hands, which is the same as saying that he had assigned to the ministerial candidates the task of selecting the returning officers who were to sit in judgment on them, and that was his preference. He asked the House, what is the alternative? Well, I say there are several alternatives. It would be possible, I think, although, I do not desire to mix up our judges too much with these things—it would be possible to allow officers of the judiciary to select the returning officers; it would be possible to allow such a court as this: a court composed of the warden, representing the people of the county; a judge, representing the Dominion Government; and the sheriff of the county, or the registrar of the county, an appointee of the local Government, to select a returning officer; with either of such reasonable impartiality would be obtained. That impartiality will be obtained under the present system, no human being believes.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to make a personal explanation. I wish to say with regard to the remark of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), that I never heard until to-day, neither did any hon. members sitting near me hear until to-day, the charge against returning officers that they had withheld returns. On the contrary, we understood that the chief charge against the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery had been that the returns had not been sent in, and that he had withheld them.

Mr. EDGAR. The Minister of Justice has risen twice in his place and addressed the House, since the charge was made by the hon. member for South Oxford, and he has not, so far as I have heard, nor has any member of the Government expressed the slightest regret, that a returning officer of the Government, after he had been formally notified of the character of this deputy returning officer, should have appointed him again. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is all very well to say that we must wait till the other side is heard. But surely when an hon. gentleman of the position and standing of the hon. member for South Oxford in this House, makes a statement of that kind, in his place—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And he knows it.

Mr. EDGAR. And when, more than that, he brings affidavits and shows a prima facie case, surely the Minister of Justice who holds that high position in which he has great responsibility before the people of the country, surely he ought at least to be able to say. Well, if that be true, I exceedingly regret it. But we have not had one word of that kind from the hon. gentleman or from any of his followers in this House. The First Minister has seemed to justify the whole thing from beginning to end, his followers have done the same. The hon. gentleman from Nova Scotia, who made such a warlike speech a moment ago, states that he would not find fault with any returning officer, and he could not be found fault with, so long as he did his work well. Of course, this man in Haldimand did his work well, therefore he should not be found fault with. But the debate took a little wider range, and the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Madill) told us about some appointments to office made by the Ontario Government in his county. Well, Sir, perhaps hon. members may have observed that in the Province of Ontario, when the Treasurer was making his budget speech the other day, he announced that certain defalcations had been discovered in the Treasury, and he was pressed urgently by the leader of the Opposition, Mr. Meredith, in that House, to say what he had done upon discovering the defalcation, and when he was pressed he said, without giving names—I do not know the names myself—that an officer had been dismissed from the service on account of that defalcation, and he had since been taken into the service of the Dominion Government.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). My hon. friend has referred to the remark of the First Minister. He forgets that my hon. friend from Oxford made a certain charge, which was in reply to the Minister of Justice. They both confined themselves to a specific case. Then the leader of the Opposition got up; he did not touch on that case, but he went into generalities, enlarging on that subject, and the First Minister, in reply to the leader of the Opposition, confined himself to that reply. Now, I do not know about the other Provinces, but I challenge any member of the Opposition from the Province of Ontario to stand up in his place and name the appointment of a returning officer at the last general election that he considers objectionable. I would like him to get up and enumerate a case where the present Government did not select officers who were worthy to be selected. I recollect, in the debate in 1882, when the law was changed, that the First Minister stated then that it was not his intention to exclude the sheriffs and the registrars, except in cases where these men, appointees of the Local Government, had proved themselves unworthy partisans. And they have not been excluded. In my part of the country they are invariably chosen, and I shall not sit here and allow to go to the country these general statements, without getting up and contradicting them. As an illustration, there are two by-elections pending to-day in the Province of Ontario, and I ask, Who is the returning officer in the riding of Kent? Who is the returning officer for Russell? In Kent, it is the sheriff of the county, and in Russell, it is the registrar, and these men are appointed, not because they are Ontario officials, but because their moral character and standing in the community justify this Government in selecting them for the position. That is the true ground upon which the Government are acting, and I believe they are thoroughly justified.

Motion to adjourn the House withdrawn.

THE AUDITOR GENERAL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the report of the Committee of the Whole on resolution respecting the salary of the Auditor General, be now received.

Motion agreed to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the said resolution be now read the second time and concurred in. He said: As I stated to the House, the Government held very strongly, indeed, the necessity of the Auditor General occupying an entirely independent position. He was a parliamentary officer, and did not occupy the position that other officers occupied, and the moment my attention was drawn to the fact, that, in bringing him under the operation of the Superannuation Act, it appeared to have the effect of placing a certain amount of governmental control over that officer, I felt that it was a matter that required further consideration. It was suggested, subsequently, that in the meantime we should ascertain what measures were necessary in order to remove entirely any such objection, and I suggested that the object would entirely be accomplished by placing the officer under the operation of the Superannuation Act, except as regards two clauses which appear to give a certain amount of governmental control. But I was greatly surprised to find, on referring to the discussion that had taken place in this House, that hon. gentlemen opposite and not this Government were entirely responsible for having placed the Auditor General under the operation of the Superannuation Act. I hold in my hand the original Act passed in regard to the Auditor General. The Act is to be found in the Acts of 1878, page 47:

"The Acts 33 Vic., c. 4, and 36 Vic., c. 32, and 38 Vic., c. 9, providing for the superannuation of officers employed in the public service of the Dominion, shall apply to the Auditor General and officers, clerks and other persons employed in his office."

So there was no necessity, so far as the present Auditor General was concerned, for any Bill. He had the benefit of the Superannuation Act, and under the authority of the Act placed on the Statute-book by hon. gentlemen opposite when he was appointed, he has been paying regularly his amount; but it was in relation to his successor, as this Act had been dropped out of the Revised Statutes, that it became necessary to re-enact it. I now propose to meet the difficulty by providing in this Bill that the Superannuation Act shall apply to the Auditor General, except to two clauses which seem to give the Government a certain amount of control over officers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that is decidedly desirable. Of course it is very desirable that the Auditor General should have the benefit of the Superannuation Act, but care should be taken to provide that occasion could not be seized by any Government to deprive that officer of his position; it is very important, I am bound to say, that this care should be exercised.

Mr. EDGAR. I am sure the Finance Minister must admit that when explanations were made with respect to the provisions of this Bill neither he nor any of his colleagues were able to give the explanation he has just made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is so; our attention had not been drawn to it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I confess that I was not aware that the Auditor General was entitled to superannuation under the Act of 1878, under which he was appointed. I think hon. gentlemen opposite will admit that it is sufficiently difficult to bear in mind the statute laws, without being able to recall Acts repealed. The Act was repealed in the revision of the statutes, the view of the revisers being that the Auditor General was under the Civil Service Act, and therefore the Superannuation Act applied. But that was a mistaken view, because he is not a member of the civil service and is not covered by the Superannuation Act without being especially mentioned.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Supposing, as it is possible, that the Auditor General became too infirm or too old to properly discharge his onerous duties, how would you act in that case?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think in that emergency the Government would be compelled to take action and assume the responsibility of appointing some officer to discharge the duties of the office until Parliament could be consulted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You would call upon Parliament finally by formal Act to dispose of him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think so, no doubt of it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because it is important that the Auditor General should be strictly an officer of Parliament and only be removable as judges are removable.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Exactly so.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSOLIDATED REVENUE AND AUDIT ACT.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 89) to amend the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, chap. 29 of the Revised Statutes of Canada.—(Sir Charles Tupper.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 4,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How exactly is that Treasury Board now composed? Are there not some considerable alterations in it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It consists of the Minister of Finance, who is ex-officio chairman of the Board, the Minister of Justice, the Secretary of State, the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Inland Revenue.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that all?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And one to be appointed by the Government, who at present is the Minister of Public Works.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is in fact a committee of the Privy Council composed of four members and one holding office on what I shall term "good behaviour."
Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At least one removable officer.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

On section 6,

Mr. EDGAR. With reference to that clause there is a large and important omission I think. Some words are omitted from the old thirty-fifth clause. There is an alteration in the month, and the date is changed from the 31st of October to the 30th of September. I suppose that is a matter of convenience. Several words are left out after "June preceding." The words left out are: "For the interest and management of the public funded and unfunded debt, for the civil list, and all other issues in the financial year."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The only alteration is to provide for sending to the Auditor all accounts before the 30th of September instead of the 31st October.

Mr. EDGAR. There is evidently a clerical mistake because some very important words are left out of the old section after the words "June preceding." I suppose that one of the greatest advantages of having the Auditor General's report was that he should comply with the section as it stood?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I shall consider that matter and we will postpone that clause in the meantime.

On section 7,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is referring to public accounts to be laid before Parliament, and it is amended by striking out the words, "Such accounts to be countersigned by the Auditor General." That is according to the present practice.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the reason or the object of the countersigning?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It never has been done, as the Auditor General considers it unnecessary, and it has not been done because it has not been found of any advantage.

On section 8,

Mr. EDGAR. What is the change?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The department prepares the appropriation account on the 30th September instead of the 31st of October.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This makes the report a month earlier. Is that the only change?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes. It omits by what department such accounts should be prepared and rendered to the Auditor. There is no reason for that, as each department is bound to prepare its own accounts.

Mr. EDGAR. In the amended section 40 there is an omission of the words, "provided always that the Auditor General may, if he thinks fit, require the said department to transmit to him, in lieu of said balance sheet, a certified statement showing the actual disposition of the balances."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This amended section omits the special statement, and requires that outstanding balances shall be accounted for not later than the next financial year. It is more clear and positive than the old section. The amended section 43 enacts by what officer the appropriation account of each department shall be signed. The old section merely stated that it should be signed by the proper officer. The old section 44 provides that the accounts shall be examined to see whether the payments are supported by vouchers or proofs of payments. The amended section is more explicit. Under it payments are to be supported by vouchers required by this Act, and by proofs of payment.

On section 10,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This section amends section 48 of the Act. With regard to the matters to which the Auditor General shall call the attention of Parliament, the old Act states that he shall report cases in which it appears to him that a grant has been exceeded. The words, "it appears to him," are omitted in the amended section, so as to require him to report all cases. It leaves no option to him.

Committee rose and reported progress.

THE ADULTERATION ACT.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 47) to amend the Adulteration Act, chap. 107 of the Revised Statutes of Canada.—(Mr. Costigan.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. COSTIGAN. The first change is made on the recommendation of the chief analyst, so as to provide that such articles as baking powder shall be included in the term "food." According to the ruling of some of the judges that term does not include such articles, and therefore, we could not reach baking powder that might be found to be of a dangerous character. The second change makes the term "analyst" include any member of the examining board and any assistant analyst to the chief analyst at Ottawa. It is considered that the members of the board ought to be as well qualified to give evidence in the courts as the analysts to whose qualifications they certify. The reason for taking the power under clause 5 is that the vote given by Parliament from the administration of this Act is a limited vote for the services to be performed. It is necessary to obtain these samples all over the country, and have them sent either to the local analyst or to the chief analyst at Ottawa. Instead of appointing a new class of officers outside of the service, to whom salaries would have to be paid, it is proposed to take the power of designating some officer already in the service whose salary might be supplemented by a small appropriation from this vote.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me you take larger powers under the Bill. Under the Act, as it exists, you are limited to employing only inspectors and deputy inspectors of weights and measures. By this Bill you take power to appoint special officers.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Sure that power is there; cases do occur where it is necessary to exercise that power, and we find it very inconvenient not to have it. I am quite willing, however, that this should be struck out. Where you could not get a suitable man in some localities, it would be well to have the power of appointing one, but I do not insist upon this.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not know whether the amendment is called for or not, but the amendment does not seem to be consistent with the explanation given by the hon. Minister.

Mr. COSTIGAN. This Bill would give the power to add these additional duties to the duties of any of the officers, and this power is not given in the Act. The Act does not give the power of doing what it is the intention of the Government to do; that is, to take a portion of the amount appropriated by Parliament for the administration of the Act to pay for this additional service. Clause 51 of the Civil Service Act provides that no additional sum can be paid to any member of the Civil Service.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It would be better if the hon. gentleman would explain each section by itself.

On section 1,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Has the hon. gentleman not got the power under the Act to add any article that he wants by Order in Council. I would like a definition of the word food. For instance, the hon. gentleman speaks of baking powder. Does that come under the term food?

Mr. THOMPSON. A decision was given that the article of food could only be defined to be something that could be consumed in its then condition.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Every article that can be consumed in its then condition would come under this definition?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think so.

On section 2,

Mr. EDGAR. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that this amendment was introduced in order to enable the Government to appoint existing officers to do this work, rather than appoint new officers. The amendment, however, does not agree with that explanation, but gives the power to the Government to appoint any person for that purpose. That would be giving the Government rather a dangerous power. Is it desirable to take up people all over the country and appoint them for this purpose, giving them compulsory powers of inspection? The Government is asking for power to give to anyone at all, without discrimination, these complete powers.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman objects to that part of the clause which proposes that the Government shall have the power of appointing others besides those named. When the leader of the Opposition called my attention to that, I said that I did not consider that feature of the Bill important and I would strike it out.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That will strike out the whole clause.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I wish to add something to the clause. I was explaining the whole matter when I was asked to take this section by section. I am quite prepared to strike out these words:

And any person specially appointed by the Minister of Inland Revenue.

But I stated before that we have the power to give these additional duties to the officers named in this Act, but, on account of section 51 of the Civil Service Act, unless we make some provision here, we have no right to take any money to pay them out of the money which is voted in regard to the adulteration of food, and other things. I propose to add this:

The prohibition contained in the first paragraph of section 51 of the Act concerning the Civil Service of Canada shall not extend to officers rendering service under this section.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does the Minister propose to give these officers any extra pay?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Certainly.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You propose to give extra pay to your own officers?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Certainly.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain?

Mr. COSTIGAN. When I add these additional duties to those already performed by those officers, by using them I save the necessity of creating a staff of new officers, and the duties can be performed much cheaper than they could by appointing new men. It is the same principal which I have adopted in regard to the inspectors of gas. I do not think I have appointed an additional inspector of gas, or if any, very few, as the duties have been performed by the officers already appointed. Whenever the position of a gas inspector was open, I appointed an officer of my department, if there was one in the locality, and paid him $100 or $150 or $200 to discharge the duties of gas inspector in that district. Under the Act gas inspectors might be appointed at salaries ranging from $800 to $1,200 or $1,400 a year. I have not disturbed those officers who were already appointed, but, instead of creating new appointments, I have added these new duties to the local officer, with some advantage to him and with a saving to the country.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But this is only, as I understand, for the procuring of samples. That is all which this covers?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). How many samples are procured in any one year in any special division? Take the Paris Division of Inland Revenue, how many samples were procured there during the last year?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I might say a few words more in order to obviate the necessity of all the objections which may be raised. The hon. gentleman is mistaken if he is under the impression that such an officer is to be appointed in every Inland Revenue division throughout the country. That would involve a considerable expense, and the quantity of samples obtained would not justify the extra remuneration; but it is not intended to apply that principle all over the country, even in the employment of our own officers. The appointment will perhaps be confined to one man for a Province. There may be one for Ontario, who will do the whole of that work for the additional amount paid to him; and there may be one for Quebec and one for the Maritime Provinces. Surely the hon. gentleman cannot see anything objectionable in that.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But I understand that the Minister has struck this provision for a special officer out. We are now discussing the payment of the officers of Inland Revenue. Surely it is not the intention to allow one officer to go all over the country and procure samples.

Mr. COSTIGAN. An officer will go where it is necessary for him to go.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Suppose the case of Hamilton, the Minister would not ask an officer to go from Ottawa to Hamilton, for instance, but he would tell the officer in Hamilton to get the samples. That officer would not require any additional salary for doing that.

Mr. COSTIGAN. If I require samples in the city of Hamilton, I certainly want to have the power to send an officer from the city of Ottawa; and if I require samples in Montreal, I want to have the right to send an officer from Toronto to Montreal to get the samples. An officer in Montreal might do the work, but there may be cases where the officer from Toronto would get the samples much better than the officer in Montreal, and vice versa an officer going from Montreal to Toronto, who was not known to the merchants there, would get the samples better than one who was known in Toronto.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I understand that the Minister is willing to strike out the provision in this Bill to which reference has been made. He was proposing to do one thing, but now he wishes to take power to use an officer in Ottawa or anywhere else for this extra work. It seems to me that the Minister cannot carry this out without additional expense by instructing the officers in the different

Mr. COSTIGAN.

Inland Revenue divisions to do the work, and, if he has officers whom he cannot trust in the public interest to assist in carrying out the Adulteration Act, they should be changed. It should not be necessary to send an officer from Ottawa to other parts of the Dominion. We ought to be able to trust our officers, and they ought to be able to do this work, and should be willing to do it, and, if the officer does the work in his own division, there is no reason for him to require extra remuneration. If it should be desired to send an officer from Ottawa to Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, it might be a nice trip for the officer, but how will the ends of justice or the efficiency of the carrying out of the statute be promoted by that? It is clear that this is supposing that the officers in the different divisions are not fit to be trusted in carrying out the provisions of the Act.

Mr. COSTIGAN. If the hon. gentleman wants to criticise and find fault, I cannot help it. Have I said a single word to justify the statement that I have not confidence in my officers?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes; when the hon. gentleman says that he might have to send an officer from Ottawa to Hamilton, it must be because he has no confidence in his officer there.

Mr. COSTIGAN. No. The hon. gentleman jumps to a conclusion which is not warranted. I said it might be better to send an officer from Ottawa to Toronto, or from any one division to another, to obtain the samples, because a stranger can get the samples much better than those who are known in the place itself to be officers of the department. Then the hon. gentleman states that I was quite willing to strike out that clause which gives me power to appoint anyone outside of my own staff to do this work. I say at once that I do not want to take that power, that is to strike out. The Government is limited now to imposing these duties on the officers named here, officers in regular standing, and belonging to the department in one branch or another. I still hold that in imposing on these officers additional duties, we have a right to ask the power to pay them a small remuneration in consideration of these additional duties.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What words does the hon. gentleman propose to add for that purpose? That is the point.

Mr. COSTIGAN. As I said before to the hon. gentleman, when my attention was called to it by him, I consulted the Minister of Justice on this point and on all the points in the Bill. The words to be added are:

The prohibition contained in the first paragraph of section 51 of the Act concerning the Civil Service of Canada shall not extend to officers rendering service under this section.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The effect of that is that you may pay your officers an extra amount for doing this work.

Mr. COSTIGAN. An additional amount for their services.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That is what I object to.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Parliament laid down this principle before. The Civil Service Act does provide that, if you come to Parliament in any one case, notwithstanding that 51st section, or even in that 51st section, and state that A, B or C, civil servants, have two or three thousand a year salary, and if you place a sum in the Estimates to pay them a thousand additional for some additional duty, Parliament votes the sum to those officers. The same reason we give now. I take these men with small salaries, and I want to pay them out of the fund voted by Parliament for the administration of that branch for which the services of these men will be utilised, I ask power to pay a small proportion of that vote to supplement their salaries, instead of being obliged to ask for their whole salary for that particular purpose.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The practice hitherto pursued of adding to the salaries of civil servants in that way, has just been taken exception to by the hon. member for Brant, and I think myself it is a very undesirable practice, and the sooner we put a stop to it the better. But it appears in this case that the hon. gentleman is asking the sanction of this House to appropriate money voted for that purpose to increase the salaries of the officers of his own department. Now, I do think, with all due deference to the Minister, that the officers of his department should do the work allotted to them within their hours of duty—and I do not suppose that they are very frequently worked beyond that time—without any additional remuneration from any other branch. This practice that is growing up of asking the House for an increased vote for such and such a person in the civil service, for services done, or supposed to be done, and very often only supposed to be done, so far as we consider the question, is a practice that should be condemned most emphatically by every member of this House.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not think the hon. gentleman has clearly understood me. The salaries of our excise officers are voted by Parliament. The Estimates provide for a certain amount for the administration of that particular branch of my department, coming under the Act for the Prevention of the Adulteration of Foods and Drugs. Now, I am not asking Parliament for any more money. Parliament has voted the money for the administration of that Act. I have power to appoint collectors of these samples all over the country, and give such a salary as by Order in Council may be approved of, and that will be paid. I do not want to incur such an enormous expense as that would be, simply because the clause in the Civil Service Act provides that these accumulated salaries shall not be paid. I want to take the House into my confidence and say that, instead of taking money—not new money—I do not want any more money, because Parliament has voted the money already to enable me to administer that Act. I want Parliament to understand that instead of appointing a new man, as I may do, and which the Civil Service Act does not prevent me from doing—instead of appointing a man at $1,000 to go and collect these samples, the vote you have given me already enables me to administer the law. Therefore, I want Parliament to understand that I am going to impose this duty upon our present officers, already in our department, and I am going to take a small amount of the money that you voted for that purpose, and pay a portion of their salary out of the vote. I do not ask you to give me a new sum of money to increase the salary of these men; I only want authority to use the money you have placed in my hands for the administration of the law in that way.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has explained the point very clearly, and possibly in some cases the principle may be defensible. I think I understand him, but it amounts to this, and it is a belief which has permeated very deeply the official mind, that no man who holds an office to which a salary can be attached, can be asked to cross a T or dot an I, or do anything that is not in the bond, without being paid extra. Now, the objection which my hon. friend to my left submitted was this, that the hon. gentlemen will ask an official having certain defined duties, with a fixed salary, to do a little work which is not strictly within his department, and then ask us to pay him for it. For every additional act they ask us to pay an extra sum of money. It may be right that should be done, but my impression is, and it is the impression of many members of the House, that many of the officials in the hon. gentleman's department, serving in the outlying parts of the Dominion, so far from being over-worked, are very much underworked. I may be wrong in that, but my impression is that they have not got half enough to do, in some cases. It may be unfortunate that it is so, the hon. gentleman may have to pay a large salary, a man may be necessary in a certain place, and the duties of the office may not be sufficient to occupy all his time, but you have to pay him a salary. The hon. gentleman is carrying out the principle that if you ask any one of these men, who have very few duties attached to their office, to do one single thing that is not in the scope of the appointment he must pay them extra for it. I do not think that is a desirable thing to do. I do not think their duties are very onerous, and they might be fairly asked to do that without additional pay.

It being six o'clock the Committee rose. The Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 47) to amend the Adulteration Act, chap. 107 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. (Mr. Costigan).

(In the Committee.)

Mr. EDGAR. The Minister of Inland Revenue has explained that the amendment he proposes would enable him to pay officers in his department, who are already in receipt of salaries, an additional sum for work in which he might employ them in connection with the Inspection Act, and he proposed to do this without placing a sum in the Estimates. The opinion is entertained very largely on this side of the House that members of the Civil Service should be paid enough to secure their time, and not be continually asked to do other work for which extra pay must be granted. The hon. gentleman says the country will not lose anything by adopting his proposition, because payment will be made out of special sums appropriated by Parliament for carrying out the Adulteration Act. Surely if he pays them in that way, he is appropriating their time which should be given to another service, and they should not be paid for both services. There will be no saving, directly or indirectly, effected by paying the men out of one fund more than another. The principle is objectionable as well as the practice.

On section 3.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The same reason applies to this change in the law that I gave in connection with the first clause. It has been decided by the courts that if an article to be submitted to analysis be sent out of the district where it was taken, it is questionable whether that will stand. The chief analyst takes the ground that it would be better that people should be free to submit samples to any of the analysts. One analyst might be a better authority on a particular article than another, and for that reason as well as for the reason that it is important that any analysis should be legal, this section has been framed.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CHIGNECTO MARINE TRANSPORT RAILWAY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the second reading of Bill (No. 101) to make further provision respecting the granting of a subsidy to the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company (Limited.)

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Any appropriation of public money looking to the development of the natural channels of trade, is, of course, a defensible measure; but it appears to me, looking at this undertaking on its merits, that it is an utter waste of public money. I have never yet seen or heard any man in the Maritime Provinces, familiar with the trade of that part of the country, who entertains the opinion that any good will result from the expenditure of money to build the railway contemplated under this Bill. The hon. Minister of Finance last night mentioned that an eminent engineering authority in England, a Mr. Fowler, had expressed an opinion as to the feasibility of this work. I have no doubt whatever that that was the case, because there can be no doubt that the work can be completed if you are disposed to spend sufficient money. We know very well that in a great enterprise of this kind where there is a large subsidy concerned, that when people go to England where money is cheap they will go to an engineer of the eminent character that I have no doubt this gentleman is and submit a project to him and he will say it is quite feasible. He did not go so far as to pronounce the same hopeful opinion as to the working of that railway, nor did he give us any information regarding the opinion of any eminent or prominent authority with respect to its usefulness in the future. It is in that aspect of the case that I think it is unfortunate the Government are committed to this expense. I suppose they are bound to go on and I do not intend to delay the House by offering further opposition to it than merely to say I regard it as an unnecessary expense and I cannot allow it to pass without recording my opinion against it.

Mr. WELSH. I quite agree with the words that have fallen from the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). I think it is a work that is unnecessary, and that is my private opinion. I know the place well. I know Baie Verte and I know there is a rocky strand where you have to go for five miles from shore before you get twenty feet of water. I would like to know how you will build this railway. If you build it on the principle of a marine slip you will find great difficulty. Any person in this House conversant with the shipping interests knows that there are very few marine slips so perfect that they can take a ship out of water and take her on the rocks on to the slip without doing her an injury. I say that in taking a ship out of water, say a ship of 1,000 tons, loaded or unloaded, and conveying her overland, the chances are that the ship will be badly injured. If this Bill passes I hope there will be a clause inserted that the company will be liable for any damage or injury done to a ship during transport. I notice that this company applied for a charter seven years ago and that they got what they asked for. I find that a few years after they applied for an amendment to that Act. They obtained the amendment seven years after the passing of that Act granting them all they asked for, and without their putting a spade in the ground or having a shilling paid out they asked this House for further amendments. I think that is pressing the matter rather close. The hon. the Minister of Finance stated the other evening that everything comes to those who wait, and I think those gentlemen who applied for an amendment to the charter are acting upon that principle. I think it is a bad principle, where a company after seven years comes a third time applying to this House for further concessions or for further grants in some way or other, that we should grant it until they do something. In looking over the list of promoters of this scheme I do not find many shipowners among them. Every hon. gentleman in this House knows that some ten or twelve or thirteen years ago there was an agitation for a Baie Verte Canal, and this was agitated for a number of years. Finally the Government of the country appointed a commission to take evidence as to the feasibility and chance of success for that canal. I think that the result of that commission was that the canal was not warranted, that it was not feasible and that it would be of no service. I myself remember being in court when the evidence was taken. I remember the evidence of an old man, Captain Salmon, I think his name was, who had been engaged in the Bay of Fundy trade for several years and who had served in the Imperial Navy. He was asked his reasons for objecting to the canal, and he said he would sooner go the long route than he would attempt it if there was a navigable river across this isthmus. It was a large tidal basin, that there was a great rise and fall of tide, and it was full of rocks and shoals—more dangerous for navigation than any part of the world, I suppose. He was asked what was his reason. He said: A fog; and when they asked him what was the fog, he said: I have been there and I mean it. Sir (somebody) Young, I think it was, asked him how thick the fog was? and he said: I have seen the fog so thick that I could make a looking glass of my hand. I think that is true. If this Bill passes I would like to have a clause in it to the effect that the company should be liable to any damage or injury sustained by any ship transferred by that railway. I know well and any person acquainted with shipping knows, that if you build a ship the foreman must look after her to keep her in proper position when she is building, so liable is she to strain from undue weight on any one section. If a ship is so difficult to keep in position when she is not moving, how difficult is it to get her out of water on to a marine slip and how much more difficult it is to take a ship out of water and take her 20 miles over land and drop her into the Bay of Fundy. I really believe that it will be more than the third time the House will be troubled with this kind of thing, for I do not imagine that any capitalists will invest money in it. I should like another clause in the Act, and that is, that the company shall not commence operations until they have a subscribed capital of a million of money. I remember, some years ago, that a company got a concession to build a railway from the same part of Nova Scotia. They commenced operations, employed a large number of men, levelled a lot of the road, and all of a sudden the gentleman who got the charter was not to be seen; he was non est. The poor people he employed were done out of their money for their supplies and labor, and the man had gone away. What was the consequence? The consequence was that the Government had to undertake this work and pay the people. Suppose this gentleman who comes here three times asking for concessions commences work, employs men and incurs liability, and the people get nothing, will the Government have to pay it? I suggest to the Minister of Finance that the company be not allowed to commence operations until a million of capital is paid up, so as to secure liabilities, and to prove this a bond fide enterprise. I believe if it was a bond fide enterprise they would not, after being granted the concessions they asked in this House, after seven years come this time for the third concession, and without having invested, as I believe, one dollar. All this work is costing the country money, and I think there is a disposition on the part of the Minister of Finance to keep our expenses within bounds, and to check it. It is my will that this policy should be carried out, and that the expenditure of public money should be lessened, and the expenditure of public money for useless purposes should be put an end to.

Mr. JONES (Halifax).

Mr. ELLIS. This is undoubtedly a purely experimental work; I think there is no railroad or marine slip of this character in the world; and it is certainly quite an undertaking for this country to make such an experiment. The navigation there is open only five or six months in the year, and that is all the time this marine railway can be used. However, the Government appear to be committed to it, and all I desire to say in the matter is that I think it should be distinctly understood on both sides of the House that this undertaking cannot be regarded by Maritime Province men as in the interest of the Maritime Provinces. It may turn out so; but I think there are many things that we are agreed on are necessary for the Maritime Provinces, and should be proceeded with before this work. Therefore, I desire as one representative of the Maritime Provinces to disclaim the idea that this can be absolutely and purely for Maritime Provinces purposes, and it ought not to be charged to us as undertaken solely for the benefit of the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. EDGAR. So far as Ontario is concerned, I think that Province can stand a little further delay and investigation of the matter, and therefore it should not be shouldered on us.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can hardly allow the measure to be carried, after what has been said, without making a statement to the House. I would remind the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Welsh) that they are six years too late in the speeches they have addressed to the House to-night. This Parliament deliberately six years ago adopted the policy of giving a certain amount of aid for securing the construction of this work, after the matter was put fairly and distinctly before the House; and from that hour down to the present, although certain modifications and extensions of time have been asked, not one dollar additional has been asked by the promoters of this enterprise over and above what Parliament deliberately sanctioned six years ago. So much for that part of the question. Now, Sir, why did the House sanction this work? I can understand the position of the hon. member for Halifax perfectly well. The hon. gentleman wants to prevent the construction of this work in the interests of his own constituents. He wants every vessel sailing from the Gulf of St. Lawrence to be compelled to pass by the port of Halifax, to make a friendly call at that port, and leave a little money there on its way to New York, Boston, or Portland. But I consider it the height of ingratitude on the part of the hon. member for Queen's to stand up here and oppose a measure which, if it is going to benefit one part of this Dominion more than another, will benefit the island on which he lives. Why, Sir, it will give to the great article of export of that island, potatoes, a value almost equal to the amount of the duty that now meets them in the United States. It will enable the large fleets with which Captain Welsh is identified—if he will allow me to use his name—to make two or three voyages between Charlottetown and Boston and New York, for every one that it can make as matters stand to-day.

Mr. WELSH. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Why, Sir, I am not attempting to offer to the House, on a question of this kind, my opinion in opposition to that of a gentleman who is perfectly familiar with navigation on the water; but that hon. gentleman has had no experience in navigating his ship on land.

Mr. WELSH. No, and I do not want to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He is no authority on the question of taking his ship over land for twenty miles. The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) objects to this work. The fact is, I have cannon in front of me, cannon to the right of me, cannon to the left of me, and cannon in all directions—Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Ontario, all bound to crush this enterprise. Now, Sir, what is the fact? This policy of having the means of sending ships from the Gulf of St. Lawrence into the Bay of Fundy is not a policy of mine. I did not propound it to this House. It was propounded to this House by gentlemen who had more interests in ships and more interest in the traffic of the country, than any of the gentlemen who have addressed the House, great as their interests are.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will you name them?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will. I will name Sir Hugh Allan, the chairman of the commission which recommended this work, and I will give the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) a name that will command respect in the Province of New Brunswick for many years to come, as it has for many years in the past. I will give you the names of the foremost men of every section of this country—of Ontario, of Quebec, New Brunswick—all charged with the important duty of reporting for the consideration of the Government, and for the information of Parliament the value of having the means of transferring vessels from the Gulf of St. Lawrence into the Bay of Fundy. That commission, Sir, was composed of Sir Hugh Allan, its chairman; of Col. Gzowski, a distinguished engineer, and a man whose knowledge of trade and business is widely known and respected in this country; Mr. Calvin, a gentleman who had a great interest in all questions connected with inter-provincial trade, and who understood this question about as thoroughly as any gentlemen here; Mr. George Laidlaw, a man of high attainments and great ability; Mr. Garneau, from Quebec, a merchant of high standing, whose opinion would command respect everywhere; Mr. Stairs, of Halifax, a gentleman whose name only requires to be mentioned where he is known to command great and unqualified respect; and Mr. Jardine, of the Province of New Brunswick. Now, Sir, what did these gentlemen say? That there was no object in shortening the distance from Quebec to the Bay of Fundy? Let me read to the House what they did say:

"Inseparably connected with the growth of intercolonial trade is the construction of the Baie Verte Canal."

Mr. MITCHELL. Canal, not railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If my hon. friend will keep quiet, I will come to the reason for the substitution of the ship railway for the canal. The first point is the question of traffic—is there business sufficient to warrant the work? Ontario, Quebec, and all the Provinces are interested in shortening this communication. I establish that by an authority that I consider as great and undoubted as any authority that could be offered on a commercial and engineering question to this House. They said:

"The advantages that must accrue, not merely to the Dominion as a whole, but to the commerce of the Maritime Provinces, are so clearly pointed out by the boards of trade of all the leading cities of Canada, and by men interested in the development of our commercial cities—not simply the merchants of St. John and other places in the locality of the proposed canal, but merchants at Hamilton, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, and Quebec—that it is superfluous for the commissioners more than briefly to refer to a few salient features of the scheme."

"A steamer laden with flour for St. John, N.B., now goes down the Gulf as far as Shediac, where the cargo is transported by rail to its destination. The total distance by water from Shediac through the Gut of Canso and round the coast of Nova Scotia to the Bay of Fundy, as far as the commercial capital of New Brunswick, is about 600 miles, and the consequence is that there is little or no direct communication between the Bay of Fundy ports and those of the River St. Lawrence. That is to say, that the construction of the canal at that point or of any other means that will accomplish the same object as the canal, will shorten the distance between Shediac and the port of St. John by no less than 600 miles.

"By a canal through the isthmus, from Shediac, the distance to St. John will not be more than 100 miles. This fact will show the insuperable obstacle that now exists to anything like extensive commerce between Montreal and the Bay of Fundy ports of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and the great impulse that must necessarily be given to the trade by the opening out of a route which will shorten distance so considerably, furnish an inland navigation from the lakes to Boston, and consequently lessen freights between those points at least twenty-five per cent."

Now it is quite true that my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I., will lose that 25 per cent. on the voyage; but he must not forget that although he will get 25 per cent. less for the cargo he carries over this ship railway, he will make it up in another way. He will send four vessels through in this way for every one he can send to Boston or New York, with that very valuable commodity of which

Prince Edward Island is so prolific. It has been shown that there is a tonnage on the Bay of Fundy from the gulf ports of something like 2,687,550 tons entering and leaving these ports per annum, which would receive the advantage of this work. Then there is the fishing fleet of not less, I believe, than 600 vessels per annum, which would avail themselves of this ship railway and would be a source of incalculable wealth and profit to the great commercial city of St. John. I am astounded, Sir, at the remarks of the hon. member for St. John; but I was glad from one point of view, to hear that hon. gentleman make the speech he made to night, because I believe he could not have made any speech that would be of greater strength to the Government or more likely to relieve this House of his presence than the speech he made with reference to this enterprise. Knowing, as the hon. member for St. Johns does, that the press and people of St. John have been for years urging the Government to adopt this scheme, I was astounded to hear the hon. gentleman endeavor to kill this enterprise from which the city of St. John will receive greater benefit than any other portion of the Dominion. If I looked upon the hon. gentleman as an exponent, which I do not, of the views and sentiments of his constituents on this question, I would just as soon see the Bill thrown out as not, because I should feel that if a city which must inevitably derive the advantage that the city of St. John will from this measure is disposed to endeavor to thwart and obstruct the efforts the Government are making to give that city these great advantages and benefits, it would be hardly worth our while to endeavor to force these blessings, not only on an ungrateful, but on an unwilling community. The hon. gentleman talks about this country not being able to make the experiment. The country is not making it. Let the hon. gentleman read the Bill, and he will find that the Government of this country are not imperilling a single sixpence of the country's money. No money has been expended on the enterprise by the Government. A large sum of money has been expended in connection with the enterprise, but it has been expended by one of the hon. gentleman's own friends in New Brunswick. It has been expended by a gentleman of high character and standing as an engineer who has satisfied himself of the entire practicability of this work. It has been expended by a gentleman who was so confident of the practicability of the work that without the aid of one dollar from the Government or the Parliament of Canada, he spent six years of his own time—six years of the time of a man whose services command a very large remuneration—and spent his own money in endeavoring to bring this work to a completion. It is not an experiment the Government is making, nor is the Government imperilling a single sixpence, because under this scheme the work must be accomplished and must be continued to be performed if the country is to pay any money. What are the terms? They are, that the Government is not to be bound, directly or indirectly, to furnish one sixpence until that work is completed, and until the ships are transported from the Gulf of St. Lawrence to the Bay of Fundy and vice versa for a year. Vessels five times as large as those which will cross this railway are lifted by hydraulic pressure at the East India docks at London out of the water every day a distance of fifty feet, with the same ease, facility, and celerity almost as I lift up my hand. So that, so far as regards the difficulty, that question has been disposed of. Is there found to be any difficulty, any question of damages in taking these large vessels out of the water and lifting them to this great height? Not the least. That can be seen every day in the week by any one who will visit the East India dock in London. Then, as far as moving the ships on a marine slip is concerned, we have seen marine slips in which, by steam power, ships are drawn, not along a level as they would be in this case, but up a steep incline, and that is done without any harm or injury to the vessel whatever. But I say that this question involves no risk on the part of the Government, because the company not only have to complete the work, but they have to successfully operate it for a year before they get the first year's subsidy; and if the second year, the third year, or the tenth year, the works fail and the company are unable to carry on this work successfully, that moment the subsidy stops; so that we only pay so long as the work is completely and successfully done. I have shown not only did these gentlemen, the high authority I have referred to, show that we would be warranted in spending $5,000,000 in the construction of a canal there, and that it would be a profitable investment for the people of this country, but that Parliament only abandoned the construction of this canal when Mr. Page, by his estimates, declared that the work, instead of being accomplished for $5,000,000, would cost from $9,000,000 to $10,000,000. That, it was thought, would be more than under the circumstances the Government would be justified in spending. What does this scheme involve? It involves less, all told, than $3,000,000. The hon. gentleman may be interested in knowing that our neighbors in the United States take so deep an interest in providing the means of transport of vessels from the Bay of Fundy into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, that at this moment there is a Bill before Congress, placed there by a distinguished Senator, by which it is proposed that the Government of the United States should contribute half the money and ask the Canadian Government to contribute the other half to build this canal at joint expense. So that instead of its being supposed by these gentlemen, who know the currents of trade and are acquainted with what is likely to be profitable, that there is no business to be done, the evidence of this Commission shows that great facilities would be given and a great advancement would be made in the trade and commerce of the country. If, instead of circumnavigating Nova Scotia in order to oblige the hon. member for Halifax, by making vessels come in there like a lame duck, they can take the short cut, you will have Montreal, that great centre of commerce, and the great lakes with their shipping, and all those places in connection with them, by saving 600 miles of circuitous navigation, brought into direct connection with the Bay of Fundy, and thus with Portland, Boston and New York. We are not asked to pay any money on this. It is to be a success or we are not to pay any money at all, and an engineer of the highest standing has so satisfied himself as to the practicability of the scheme that he has given six years of the best period of his life to it, and has at this moment behind him the highest engineering talent in the world. There is no higher engineering authority in the world than Sir John Fowler, and he told me himself that, having examined this question from beginning to end, from top to bottom, he had satisfied himself not only of its entire practicability, but of the ease and success with which this navigation overland could be accomplished. Therefore, I have a right to say to the House, having taken the best information which I could get, that the plan is feasible. There is an eminent engineer in this House, and, though I have not discussed the matter with him, I should be greatly surprised to hear him say that there is any difficulty in raising ships from the water, carrying them over a road 17 miles in length on a dead level, and placing them on the other side without any damage to ship or cargo. Sir John Fowler told me that a ship carried in that way from Baie Verte to the Bay of Fundy is not exposed to one tithe of the strain to which a ship is exposed in a severe storm; that vessels that go through a storm with ease and facility, through storms which they encounter every day, is exposed to ten times the danger and difficulty that it would be in being transported by the means proposed. Parliament has over and over again voted money for this purpose, and I say that it is certain that the ship railway is infinitely superior to the canal. The hon. gentleman says that it can only be used for six months in the year. That must apply to the canal, because the ship railway can be used much longer, and so has an advantage over the canal. The cost of carriage will be extremely light, and much less than would be involved in the tolls which would be required to pay the interest on the $5,000,000 necessary for the construction of the canal. I do not think I need detain the House longer than to say that my hon. friend's fear of damages should be removed by the fact that the most eminent engineers in the world are prepared to show him that there is no risk of damage whatever. But, even if there should be damage, does not the hon. gentleman know that, when a vessel is brought through Government canals, and is wrecked through the fault of the Government of Canada, or through any neglect on the part of the Minister of Railways and Canals, we have to pay the money, and we have done so over and over again? So, in regard to this enterprise, as the owners of a canal are bound to pay any damage caused by a failure on their part, the same thing must necessarily result. My hon. friend is very anxious that this company should not be allowed to undertake the work until they can find $1,000,000. The work would have been undertaken long ago but that these gentlemen would not engage in it until they had raised, not $1,000,000 simply, but every dollar required to complete the work, or until that was secured by the sale of the bonds and securities. I am asking the House for nothing which it did not grant six years ago, nothing that has not been submitted to the highest authority in this country and admitted to be of the greatest advantage to the business of this Dominion, or at all events to the business of the eastern portion of this Dominion, and I think we might extend it further. The Government is not asked to pay any money, but simply to enable English capitalists to furnish all the money required and to give us this work at half the cost we could obtain it in any other way. I think the House must see the great advantages to the trade and commerce of Canada that will follow the construction of this work.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. MITCHELL. This House knows very well the great admiration I have for the abilities of the Minister of Finance, and I must say that, in all my experience of him, I have never admired him more than I have in the argument which he has made in favor of this Bay of Fundy ship canal. I have heard of a great many queer schemes in my life, but, of all the queer schemes that I ever heard of, to take money out of the pockets of the people of this country, and in addition to fleece the British public, I have never heard of anything to equal this Chignecto ship railway. The hon. gentleman has made two or three propositions. He has referred to the appointment of a commission by the Government some years ago in reference to canals. It is fashionable with the Government of which the First Minister is the head to appoint commissions when that hon. gentleman gets into a tight place, and I remember very well when that commission was appointed, but it was not in regard to this particular canal, but as to whether canals in general should be constructed or subsidised by the Government, as against railways, and it was upon that commission that Sir Hugh Allan and Colonel Gzowski and other distinguished gentlemen to whom the Minister has referred were appointed. They went over a great number of the canals of this country. If I recollect aright, they commenced in the far west with the Sault Canal. Then they had the Trent Valley Canal, the Ottawa Valley Canal, the whole system of the St. Lawrence canals, and last of all they tacked on their report the ship canal between the waters of the St. Lawrence and the Bay of Fundy.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman mean that that commission recommended either the Trent Valley Canal or the Ottawa Valley Canal?

Mr. MITCHELL. I am simply stating the facts. I do not think I interrupted the hon. gentleman when he was speaking except to smile in a credulous manner. They made a general report, and if my memory serves me right, I think they were rather down on canals generally. The hon. gentleman has striven to show the mechanical possibility of building a railway that will take ships out of the waters of the Bay of Fundy and will land them in the waters of the St. Lawrence. No one doubts the possibility of that. No one doubts that money will do anything. The hon. gentleman referred to a distinguished engineer in this House, who, I presume, is my hon. friend whom I have in my eye, and he called upon him to verify the fact that such a thing is possible. No one doubts that it is possible; no one doubts that money will do anything, and that it is possible to build a railway which will do what the hon. gentleman proposes. That is one proposition which my hon. friend started. That proposition I concede to him at once. My hon. friend says that seven years ago this House sanctioned the idea of building a ship railway. If my memory serves me aright, the proposition seven years ago was to build a canal.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Six years ago. I said it was in 1882 this Bill was passed.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, six years ago, and seven years ago application was made, if I recollect aright. He states that a young gentleman who has devoted six years of his life to the prosecution of this enterprise, invested a large amount of money in it. Now, Sir, that gentleman to whom he refers may have invested a great deal of money in it, but so far as I can learn there is no work done. Where the money has been invested I do not know. That is the second proposition the hon. gentleman has made. The third proposition is the great advantage it would be to the trade and commerce of Montreal and Quebec and the Gulf ports, connected with the trade of St. John. Now, Sir, I ask: What would be the trade suppose you had a canal built tomorrow over that route—much less a ship canal? Does my hon. friend pretend to tell me that he has submitted to this House any statistics upon which he could base the continuation of the insane act? because I say it is nothing more than a piece of folly, first, to have subsidised such a thing as that Chignecto Ship Railway, and next to continue it from year to year upon the Statute-book, encouraging the belief—not that such a thing is not possible, because it is possible—but that such a railway, if built, would inure to the benefit of the country, or in any way benefit the trade and navigation of Canada. Sir, my hon. friend speaks of the shortening of the distance of 600 miles between Montreal and the port of St. John. What trade is there between the two? By the railway which we have subsidised from Montreal down to the harbor of St. John, you can carry, in less than twenty hours, freight and passengers. Does any man believe that in face of the low railway carriage at this day, people will ship goods down the St. Lawrence, ship them an eight or ten days' voyage down to the point where a vessel will take them on, and then take them over a railway down into the waters of the Bay of Fundy, and thence down the St. Lawrence? Why, Sir, there is no business between the two ports to start with, and my hon. friend has not submitted any statistics to show that there is any business to warrant such an expenditure as this. In the next place it is apparent to every one conversant with the current of trade in this country, that railways are taking away trade from the ships, that shipments by railway are taking the place of shipments by water in large quantities by vessels. My hon. friend speaks of 600 vessels visiting the Gulf of the St. Lawrence. Whose were they? Were they vessels of Canada? No, Sir. If 600 vessels last year, or the year before, visited the Gulf of St. Lawrence, they were the vessels of the United States, they were the fishing vessels for which we have sacrificed so much by the Bill we have already passed in this House, they were the vessels of a foreign nation from whom we are seeking justice, but have not got it as yet, they are the vessels of a country from which we are excluded from reciprocity in the natural productions of Canada. Are we going to expend $170,000 a year for that purpose? And if we did so, would any of these 600 vessels go over that railway? Why, Sir, there is not a particle of evidence submitted by the hon. gentleman to show that if the railway were built to-morrow, these fishing vessels—and they are the only ones that go there, comparatively speaking—there is not a tittle of evidence to show that they would go over that railway, even if it were built. Now, Sir, is there any traffic in common between the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the harbor of St. John, the only port to which my hon. friend has referred, from which traffic would result by passing over that railway? Sir, I know of none, I think I know as much of the business of that country as my hon. friend; I have been engaged in the trade of that country in shipping, and in business, for many years, and my hon. friend has not; and I may tell him now that if that railway were built to-morrow, it would not pay the grease to oil the wheels that run over it, and it is an expenditure of public money which this country is not warranted in making. Sir, my hon. friend has brought forward another argument to induce this House to adopt this scheme, he says it is to be built with British money. Is it possible that my hon. friend, occupying the prominent position he does as the representative of this country in England, speaking with the authority which that gives him, is going to give currency to an idea that if English money is going to be invested in this enterprise it can be invested profitably and with satisfaction to the men who furnish the money? Sir, does my hon. friend himself believe that this railway will ever pay a dollar? He has not told this House that he does. I tell this House that I would regret to see any investments secured under false pretences, brought into Canada to discredit Canada by putting them into a scheme which must be an utter failure, and an utter ruin to the men who furnish the money. The hon. gentleman says this country was pledged to this scheme six years ago. What are the facts? Seven years ago a scheme was propounded for building a canal. Subsequently this scheme comes up for building a ship canal, and a charter is granted. He says the House is pledged to it. Who pledged the House to it? The influence of my hon. friend pledged the House to that scheme.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was carried unanimously.

Mr. MITCHELL. The influence of my hon. friend pledged the House to that scheme, as he has managed, through his abilities, his eloquence and his persuasive powers, and his control over the Administration of which he is a member, to pledge this House to many a scheme which has not been very profitable to this country. That is the way this House is pledged to a scheme to which it never should have given its sanction, and which, now that it has an opportunity of terminating it ought to do by refusing to extend the time. This House, if it has any regard for the credit of Canada, should put its foot down and stamp out a scheme which is nothing but a fraud upon the British public, where we desire to maintain our credit and our reputation. That is the way I view the scheme of my hon. friend. Now, I am not going to follow my hon. friend through every point that he has raised. I want to lay down a few propositions. First, that if the railway was built, comparatively speaking, no ships will go over it. I talked of that ship railway to-day with the largest ship owner in the port of St. John. He said, "It is a fraud, there is nothing in it. I know more of ships than any man out the port of St. John, and I would not send one of my ships over it. In the first place, I believe it will be detrimental to shipping, because it will strain them to be carried over the long track over which they will have to travel." The hon. gentleman says a distinguished engineer tells him that one storm at sea would strain a ship more than carrying it over that road. Sir, a practical man who has his money invested in ships, tells me that he would not trust one of his ships over that railway, even if she was carried free. In the next place, what trade is there between the two sections which this railway connects? Why, Sir, there is no trade, comparatively speaking, between the Gulf of St. Lawrence and St. John. Any trade that exists between Montreal and Boston and Portland and New York, has railway facilities for carrying it cheaper and quicker than it could be possibly carried by water, certainly in one-fourth of the time, and certainly at less expense. Then we come to another point, the claims which the persons who have promoted this railway, have upon this country. What claims have they upon the country? Is it because a scheme is propounded of this character that nobody but the hon. gentleman ever believed in? Why, Sir, I looked at him, listening to his dulcet tones, listening to the persuasive arguments which he used, looking at his countenance as he spoke, and I almost believe the hon. gentleman was sincere, and I believe it now. He is always sincere when Nova Scotia is concerned. Just suggest that one million dollars be spent in Nova Scotia and he is the man for it, no matter what the results and consequences may be. You may take the railways, whether the Cape Breton road or the Short railway, in regard to which the country had to step in and pay the workmen, or any other railway, and if the scheme is one that will advance the interests of Nova Scotia and will cause the expenditure of money, especially British money, the hon. gentleman will support it and let the consequences take care of themselves. I am surprised at the hon. gentleman with his knowledge that this scheme has been before the British public for years, has been quoted in the financial papers of England to the disadvantages of Canada, has been cordially denounced by men whose opinions are worth something,—with these facts before him I am surprised the hon. gentleman should come to this House and ask this House again to renew the offer, which is nothing more than deceiving the British public who are to be fleeced if they put one dollar of money into it.

Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I entirely concur in the views expressed by my hon. friend who has preceded me. I fail to see what benefit would result from this project if carried out. In regard to the practicability of constructing the work from an engineering point of view, that is only a question of expense; but so far as Mr. Fowler knowing the resources of this country I would prefer not to take his opinion but the opinion of practical men. I have never heard anyone, with the exception of the originator and the Minister of Finance—and I have spoken to a good many persons on the subject—speak favorably of it; but the opinion of practical men is that the work would be practically useless. Although the company was incorporated in 1882, I do not find in the list of incorporators a single man who is interested in shipping; some are engineers or merchants who have interest in vessels, but there is not a single name interested in the shipping business. This scheme has been before the country during the last seven years. The Minister of Finance says a large amount of money has been expended. I believe the gentleman who originated the scheme spent some money in soundings, and if my memory serves me he discovered that Baie Verte, which he supposed was sand, was, after a short distance had been passed, wholly rock. I admit that I am utterly incompetent to give an opinion as to the practicability of the scheme from an engineering point of view, but with respect to its value in a commercial sense, that is a matter on which I think it is incumbent for the Government to show clearly by statistics the benefit that will be derived. As regards large ships, they would not venture to go over it. Not only the gentleman to whom my hon. friend alluded, who is the largest shipowner in St. John, but others have told me that they would not trust their vessels over that route. As regards timber vessels going from the Gulf to New York, they would continue to go through the Gut of Canso. The small vessels which might possibly use the route would be prevented on the ground of cost, for a man would rather beat about a week in the Gut than pay the expense. Of course statistics can be brought forward to show that all the potatoes and produce of Prince Edward Island would go over that route. They would, however, continue to be shipped by railway to a large extent, while the balance would be sent by schooner as at present. The Finance Minister has explained that a large sum has been expended. What work has been done? It is true that the gentleman at the head of the scheme, who is a perfect enthusiast, has made several trips to England. Has a company ever been incorporated? It is true that a contract has been entered into with the Government, but I do not know there is in existence such a company; the promoters are simply endeavoring to obtain a subsidy in order to get British capital invested in what I can truly call a wild-cat scheme. We have had some experience, and I am afraid we are going to have some more sad experience in the direction of getting British capital invested in this country, and while it is put forward that the credit of Canada is pledged to this scheme I hold that the credit of Canada would be better maintained in the mother country if Parliament would not lend itself to a scheme for the purpose of inducing capitalists to put money in a scheme, when, if the promoters went through the different towns of Canada they could not get one single man to invest a dollar in it. We are always being told as to the amounts of public money expended in the Lower Provinces; we are reminded of the expenditures on the Intercolonial Railway, and I am bound to say that we do not want $5,000,000 of public money invested in this scheme. If the money has to be expended, I would rather have it invested in a subway between the Island and the mainland, which, if not so practicable, would be more useful and beneficial than ever this railway will be to New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know nothing about the engineering merits or demerits of this scheme, but no sort of evidence has been submitted to us to-night or at any other time to show that this will be a commercially profitable transaction. As I understand, the Finance Minister was not correct in stating that this would cost us nothing. This is to cost us $170,000, if my memory is correct, for a period of either fifteen or twenty years.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Twenty years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is but equivalent to a present payment of $2,000,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. A little over.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I must say that, looking at the enormous proportions our debt has attained, looking at the enormous proportions of the taxation of this country, looking, as I have had occasion to point out again and again, at the enormous disadvantages which every million of added debt and every additional tax means to us in our commercial contest with the nation beside us, this is the last time in the world when we should be called upon to add, if we can possibly avoid it, to the expenditure or liability of the country. This contract will expire on the 1st July, 1889, and we will be free of the whole concern. The Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company was bound to complete the work, I see by this Bill, on 1st July next year, and it is quite clear that cannot be done, and therefore we are honorably free from all liability. They have not been able to live up to their agreements, and they have had the chance during five or six years, and I can see no reason whatever why, under these circumstances, we should practically throw away, or at all events risk, to take the mildest possible view of it, a couple of millions on an enterprise, the profits of which are of a most dubious description. I hope, Sir, that this scheme will not be proceeded with and that we will not add to our existing debt or liabilities as this would do on the evidence of hon. gentlemen who know more about the matter than I do, and who are very much interested if this were a practical scheme in putting it forward. It appears by their evidence that it is extremely doubtful as a commercial undertaking.

House divided on motion for second reading.

YEAS :

Messieurs

| | | |
|----------------------|------------------------|-----------------------|
| Amoyot, | Dawson, | Marshall, |
| Bain (Soulanges), | Denison, | Moncreiff, |
| Baird, | Desaulniers, | Montague, |
| Bell, | Desjardins, | O'Brien, |
| Bergeron, | Dickinson, | Perley (Assiniboia), |
| Bergin, | Dupont, | Porter, |
| Borden, | Ferguson (Welland), | Riopel, |
| Bowell, | Freeman, | Roome, |
| Boyle, | Guilbault, | Rykert, |
| Brown, | Godbout, | Shanly, |
| Bryson, | Gordon, | Skinner, |
| Cameron, | Grandbois, | Small, |
| Cargill, | Guillet, | Smith (Ontario), |
| Carling, | Hale, | Stevenson, |
| Carpenter, | Hall, | Taylor, |
| Caron (Sir Adolphe), | Henderson, | Temple, |
| Chisholm, | Hickey, | Thompson, |
| Chouinard, | Jamieson, | Tisdale, |
| Cimon, | Joncas, | Tupper (Sir Charles), |
| Cochrane, | Kenny, | Tyrwhitt, |
| Colby, | Labelle, | Vanasse, |
| Costigan, | Langevin (Sir Hector), | Wallace, |
| Coughlin, | Laurie, | Weldon (Albert), |
| Coulombe, | Macdowall, | Wilmot, |
| Couture, | McKeen, | Wilson (Argenteuil), |
| Curran, | McLellan, | Wilson (Lennox), |
| Davin, | McMillan (Vaudreuil), | Wood (Brockville), |
| Davis, | McNeill, | Wright.—84. |

NAYS :

Messieurs

| | | |
|-------------------------|--------------------|--------------------|
| Armstrong, | Flynn, | Paterson (Brant), |
| Bain (Wentworth), | Gauthier, | Perry, |
| Barron, | Gillmor, | Platt, |
| Béchar, | Guay, | Parcell, |
| Bernier, | Holton, | Rinfret, |
| Bowman, | Innes, | Robertson, |
| Cartwright (Sir Rich.), | Jones (Halifax), | Rowand, |
| Casey, | Kirk, | Ste. Marie, |
| Casgrain, | Lang, | Scriven, |
| Charlton, | Laurier, | Somerville, |
| Cook, | Lovitt, | Trow, |
| De St. Georges, | Macdonald (Huron), | Turcot, |
| Dessaint, | McIntyre, | Watson, |
| Doyon, | McMillan (Huron), | Weldon (St. John), |
| Edgar, | McMullen, | Welsh, |
| Eisenhauer, | Meigs, | Wilson (Elgin), |
| Ellis, | Mitchell, | Yeo.—52. |
| Fiset, | | |

Motion for second reading carried.

Mr. TROW. I beg to call attention to the fact that the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Labelle) was not in the Chamber when the motion was read and voted on.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Richelieu will please state if he was in the House when the question was put?

Mr. LABELLE. I was in the entrance of the House when you read the motion and I came in as they were taking the vote.

Mr. MITCHELL. You were not in your seat?

Mr. LABELLE. I was very near it then.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question to which the hon. member must answer is if he was in the precincts of the House when the question was put either in English or French—that is in the Chamber.

Mr. LABELLE. I was within the precincts of the House. Plusieurs honorable DEPUTÉS: En français, en français.

M. L'ORATEUR: Est-ce que l'honorable député de Richelieu (M. Labelle) dit qu'il était dans la Chambre lorsque la question a été posée?

M. LABELLE: J'étais assez près pour entendre lire la motion, seulement j'étais à parler. Mais si mon vote embarrasse trop ces messieurs, je suis prêt à le retirer.

M. Fiset: M. l'Orateur, l'honorable député de Verchères (M. Geoffrion) est à peu près dans la même position; il était dans le portique, lui.

M. l'ORATEUR: Est-ce que l'honorable député de Richelieu (M. Labelle) dit qu'il était dans le portique de manière à pouvoir entendre lire la question, ou bien s'il était dans le corridor?

M. LABELLE: Puisque l'opposition ne tient pas à mon vote, je n'ai pas d'objection à ce qu'il soit retranché.

M. l'ORATEUR: Il vaut mieux que le point soit décidé suivant les règles de la Chambre. Est-ce que l'honorable député était dans le portique ou s'il était dans le corridor?

M. LABELLE: J'étais dans le portique lorsque la motion a été lue.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member's vote will be allowed to stand.

Mr. TROW. The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) has not voted.

M. CHOQUETTE: M. l'Orateur j'ai pairé avec l'honorable député de Restigouche (M. Moffat).

M. AMYOT: L'honorable député de Bruce-Sud (M. Landerkin) n'a pas voté, M. l'Orateur.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I was very near the House, Mr. Speaker.

House in Committee on Bill.

Bill considered in Committee, read a third time and passed.

SECOND READINGS.

Mr. THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 41) respecting the application of certain laws therein mentioned to the Province of Manitoba.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the second reading of Bill (No. 24) to consolidate and amend the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 89) to amend the Dominion Elections Act, Chapter 8, Revised Statutes of Canada.

Mr. Trow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the object?

Mr. THOMPSON. I explained this when I introduced it the other day. It contains most of the provisions which were in the Bill before the House last Session, for increasing the safeguards as to secrecy of voting and it contains some further provisions also with regard to corrupt practices.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has that Bill been distributed? I do not find it amongst my papers.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, it has been distributed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When was it distributed?

Mr. THOMPSON. Some time ago.

Mr. EDGAR. I understood that the hon. Minister of Justice promised the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), who has a Bill on the subject of the Dominion Controverted Elections before the House, that it might be considered at the same time as this Government Bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. I only proposed that it should be read a second time to-night, and when we go into committee on the Bill to-morrow, he will have an opportunity.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read a second time.

PUNISHMENTS AND PARDONS.

Mr. THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 90) to amend the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 181, respecting Punishments, Pardons and the Commutation of Sentences.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. LAURIER. What is the object of that?

Mr. THOMPSON. I explained in introducing the Bill that the defect was a technical one. There is no clear provision to enable a sentence with hard labor to be imposed in the North-West Territories, and this Bill is to remove that defect.

Committee rose and reported, and Bill read the third and passed.

FRAUDULENT MARKS ON MERCHANDISE.

Mr. THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill to amend the law relating to fraudulent marks on merchandise.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If the hon. gentleman explained this Bill when he introduced it, I was unfortunate enough not to be present, and I would call the attention of the House to the fact that it is a Bill of considerable length which is to be substituted for the Act upon the Statute-book, and it would be convenient if the hon. gentleman would state the changes made.

Mr. THOMPSON. I explained when I asked leave to introduce the Bill that its object was to carry out the Convention of Paris which was entered into a few years ago by the principal powers of Europe and assented to by the United States as well. The convention was followed by a subsequent one in Rome, in which other details were agreed upon. Our law on the Statute-book is practically the same as the English law, and the principle embodied in the amendment. I can best state in a few words which contain the synopsis of the English enactment. The most noteworthy features of the new Act are as follows:

"First, the protection by criminal process which it affords to trade marks is confined to registered trade marks, a provision which will be recognised as just, now that the register has been opened to the public for upwards of twelve years. Second, it throws the burden of proving the absence of fraud largely upon the defendant. Third, all offences under it may be subject to summary conviction. Fourth, it enlarges the law as to false trade descriptions. Fifth, it provides as to search warrants. Sixth, it provides for the seizure by the Customs authorities of goods bearing false indications of general or other marks, rendering them liable to forfeiture under this Act."

I may say that the Bill which was framed to carry out the convention was adopted in Great Britain last year, and Her Majesty's colonies have all been urged by circular to adopt it. The present Bill is an adaptation of the English Act to our condition.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SPEEDY TRIALS ACT.

Mr. THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 93) further to amend the Speedy Trials Act, chapter 175 of the Revised Statutes. He said; The object is to amend the Speedy Trials Act in such a way as to make it applicable to the new districts in the Province of Ontario. I shall ask the committee to allow me to add one or two clauses to remedy one or two technical defects.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH CABLES.

Mr. THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 98) respecting the international convention for the preservation of submarine telegraph cables (from the Senate). He said: The object of the Bill is to carry into effect the provisions of the convention by imposing penalties on those who break cables, either in disentangling anchors or in any other way.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time

PROCEDURE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill No. 48, further to amend the law respecting procedure in criminal cases.

Mr. EDGAR. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain the bearing of this Bill?

Mr. THOMPSON. The Act which this is to amend is an Act of last Session. Hon. members will remember that I proposed last Session to take away the appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The words used were the words which have been read by the hon. gentleman, that no appeal should lie to any court created by the Parliament of Great Britain. One would suppose that this would cover the case of the Privy Council, but, at the time of drafting the Bill, a decision of the House of Lords was overlooked, in which these words were defined in regard to an Act of Australia, and were considered to mean not the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, although that is organised under an Act of the Imperial Parliament; but it was considered that the Legislature must have contemplated the establishment of a Court of Appeal under the authority of the Parliament of Great Britain and was not applicable to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

House went into Committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. THOMPSON. I want to add another clause to the Bill. I ask the attention of the Committee to section 267 of chapter 174 of the Revised Statutes, the chapter which this Bill is to amend. There is a verbal error in the second line. The word "or" has been used instead of the word "on." I propose to amend the section by striking out in lines 2 and 3 the words "or any indictment, information, presentment or inquisition," and I think that will meet the case.

Mr. EDGAR. I observe that there is another change in the Bill as introduced by which the word "authority" is inserted. What does that mean?

Mr. THOMPSON. I am glad the hon. gentleman has called my attention to that. It is a misprint. The word should be inserted in another place. It should be that no appeal can take place from any judgment, &c., to any Court of Appeal or authority.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Printed by Maclean, Roger & Co., Parliamentary Printers, Wellington Street, Ottawa.

House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Friday, April 20, 1888.

No. 39.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 20th April, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CHIGNECTO MARINE TRANSPORT RAILWAY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved third reading of Bill (No. 101) to make further provision respecting the granting of a subsidy to the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was in hope that my hon. friend—if he will allow me to call him so, after the sharp discussion we had last night—would not have made this motion. I hope I am not trespassing too much in calling him my hon. friend, because, with all the assurance with which he submitted this to the House again, my confidence in him has been a little weakened. I think he has worked himself up to a belief that the Bill is everything he has portrayed it to be, but still I was in hopes that, after some reflection, the hon. gentleman, knowing that this will be of no benefit to the country at all, would have seen the propriety of dropping the Bill. In my opinion, it is a Bill which ought not to be pressed, and I hope the hon. gentleman will see the propriety of dropping it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time, and passed.

THE AUDITOR GENERAL.

House again went into Committee on Bill (No. 87) to amend the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, chapter 29 of the Revised Statutes of Canada.

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that there was a clause of this Bill which was left over when the House was in committee yesterday for further consideration, in consequence of an enquiry made, I think, by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar). I have had an opportunity of conferring with the Auditor General as to the exact meaning of this clause, which was prepared in connection with my department during the time I was not able to attend to business, and I find that the alteration in this clause is simply for the purpose of avoiding surplusage; that it is held that the instructions to the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, to cause an account to be prepared and transmitted to the Auditor General on or before the 30th September in each year, cover everything, and therefore it was unnecessary to provide more in this Act.

Mr. EDGAR. I have taken some trouble to look over the Act since the Bill was last in committee, and I quite agree with the Minister of Finance that that is the effect of it, though the whole thing is rather complicated and it was not very clear at the time.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

FRAUDULENT TRADE MARKS.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 91) to amend the law concerning Fraudulent Marks on Merchandise.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. THOMPSON. I stated last night, in answer to the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), what the particular changes are that the Bill proposes. I may state to him, however, as a supplement to my answer of last evening, what the principal causes were for the failure of the existing legislation. They are stated to have been principally threefold. In the first place, offences against the Trade Marks Act had to be prosecuted by indictment, and inasmuch as that is a very difficult and cumbrous mode of procedure, the mercantile community practically abandoned any prosecution under the Act. In the second place, there was a difficulty about the burden of proof. The original legislation contained words like these, that it was an offence against the Act to use a forged trade mark with intent thereby to deceive, and in all cases in which prosecutions were attempted, it was found practically impossible to prove intent in relation to goods which so easily and so quickly change hands, as trade-marked goods generally do. Furthermore, it was found absolutely necessary that a provision should be inserted for search warrants in cases which are provided for in this Bill. The question was asked me by a member of the House, as to the representation of this country in the convention at Paris and the convention at Rome. There was no representation, even of Great Britain, in either of those conventions; but subsequently Great Britain became a party to them, and it is intended that countries which adopted the convention this year or last, shall send representatives to a convention next year. One of the features connected with that convention is to be a representation of the colonies of countries which have been parties to the convention. Great Britain, however, as I said, has become a party to the convention, and has urged upon her colonies to take part, and the advantage of that will be the protection of registered trade marks in all countries which form part of the convention.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I want to call the attention of the Minister to a communication I have had in respect to this, which seems to me to deserve some attention. It is from an eminent merchant in Toronto, and he advises me that in consequence of the fact, as the Minister knows, that importers usually place their orders for foreign goods a long time ahead, he hopes the Government will see their way to delay bringing this Act into operation for a reasonable period—he suggests six months, after the Act passes. I am not sufficiently conversant with all the details to know whether that is an unreasonable time, but it seems to me there might be some hardship in applying this at once. I wish the Minister would be good enough to take that into his consideration, and after he has considered it, to see whether he can accede to the proposition.

Mr. THOMPSON. I shall be very glad to consider it, and examine the ground upon which it is based. But as regards the prohibitions which are contained in this Bill, there are none that are not contained in the present law. It is merely a prohibition against the importation and the use of fraudulent trade marks. They are as much prohibited at present as they will be under the new Bill. The only difference is that there will be provisions for prosecuting offences in a different way. But if the hon. gentleman ascertains that there is any practical difficulty, I will see what can be done to meet it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will just send him the letter confidentially. I do not care to give the gentleman's name in public, but I will just hand the letter to the Minister and let him take note of it.

Mr. THOMPSON. When the Bill was before the House on a previous occasion it was urged that something should be inserted in it which would more effectually protect manufacturers. This Bill does give a large amount of protection to manufacturers, inasmuch as it is made an offence against this Act to use a bottle which bears a trademark of one manufacturer and contains the product of another manufacturer. But the persons who were asking for that legislation request that the following section be inserted as clause 7 of the Bill, to which I have no objection:

"Every person other than the lawful owner of the bottle and proprietor of the trade mark who sells, disposes or offers for sale bottles marked with the trade mark of the owner and without the assent of such owner, is guilty of an offence against this Act."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The name must be registered?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes. With regard to the special case the hon. gentleman asked me about, I might inform him of the origin of it: "This section presupposes marks indicative of origin on the case and no marks of origin on the movements; if by common repute the marks on the case are considered indicative of the origin of the movement, and if they are false as regards the movement, an offence will be committed. The marks usual on cases made to contain foreign movements are either an English hall mark or some such words as 'sterling silver' or 'fine silver.' The evidence given to the Select Committee was very strong as to the public being misled by the English hall mark; whether they are misled by the above or any English words without a hall mark, will be a question for the jury."

On section 17,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). This seventeenth section levies the whole penalty on the vendor.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will leave that stand, if you please. I am not quite sure about our right to do that.

On section 21,

The CHAIRMAN. What shall the blank in the clause be filled by as to the amount of penalty?

Mr. THOMPSON. $500.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am not quite sure whether this twenty-first section does not conflict with the seventeenth. Does not this twenty-first section make the purchaser equally liable?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. THOMPSON. Oh, yes; but the seventeenth section relates only to the civil contract.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not understand legal phrases very well. Will the hon. gentleman tell me if this $500 is the minimum?

Mr. THOMPSON. It would be a fixed sum.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Do you think it should be so large as that?

Mr. THOMPSON. Make it not less than $200 and not exceeding $500.

Committee rose and reported progress.

SUBMARINE CABLES.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 98) respecting the International Convention for the preservation of Submarine Telegraph Cables (from the Senate).—(Mr. Thompson.)

Committee rose and reported, and Bill read the third time and passed.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 89) to amend the Dominion Elections Act, chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes of Canada.—(Mr. Thompson.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. EDGAR. Perhaps the hon. Minister of Justice will tell us how he proposes to shorten the time for electoral proceedings in British Columbia and other outside constituencies, as is proposed by this section.

Mr. THOMPSON. The facilities for communication have been so much increased during the last few years, since the Election Act was adopted making those exceptions, that I think we can now make the dates for holding the elections uniform all over the country, except perhaps in one section of British Columbia, as to which representations have been made to me very lately, and I shall not, therefore, ask the adoption of this clause at present. That is, however, the effect of this measure.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he proposes to amend this clause so as to provide, in the case of bye-elections, that the writ shall issue within a certain period of time? Certain great abuses grow out of the practice of delaying the issue of the writ, after the Speaker's warrant has been issued, and it ought to be provided that it shall be the duty of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to issue the writ to some specified officer, unless the Government names some person, within a certain number of days after the Speaker's warrant is issued.

Mr. THOMPSON. There is no provision of that kind in the Bill, and it is not the intention to alter the law in that respect.

Mr. BARRON. I had drafted an amendment following the idea of the hon. member for Bothwell, and I think it is very important that something of the kind should be introduced. We have had some experience already of the danger of allowing a prolonged period to elapse between the receipt of the Speaker's warrant by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and the fixing of the date of the election. I propose that there should be an amendment of this kind:

And in the case of a vacancy happening in any electoral district by death or otherwise, the day so fixed by the Governor General for the nomination of candidates shall, so far as relates to the electoral districts of the Province of British Columbia, to the electoral district of Algoma, in the Province of Ontario, and to those of Gaspé, Chicoutimi and Saguenay, in the Province of Quebec, be within thirty days after the Speaker's warrant shall have been received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and so far as relates to the other electoral districts of Canada, within twenty days after the Speaker's warrant shall have been received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery aforesaid.

That will apply to all cases, I think, arising in the bye-elections. Of course, it would not apply to the cases where a judge who tried the election case reported that there were corrupt practices existing in the election, because in that case the fixing of the nomination day and the ordering of a new election would have to be disposed of by order of the House. In all other cases, however, the Speaker would have to render his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and then the Governor in Council, as provided by the statute, fixes the nomination day, and the returning officer will hold the election in a certain fixed time after that. I propose to add at the end of the fifth clause of the Dominion Election Act the following words:—

The day so fixed by the Governor General shall be named in the writs of elections for the several bye-elections to which this Act applies.

I think that amendment will meet all the cases and do justice between all the parties. It is to the effect that in all the cases of bye-elections—of course it does not apply to general elections—the nomination day shall be fixed within a certain time positively, and it shall not remain with the Governor in Council to prolong the fixing of the nomination day as long as he chooses.

Mr. THOMPSON. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to move this as an amendment to the first section?

Mr. BARRON. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. I stated the object of the first section. I propose to let that section stand for the present, because there may have to be one or two exceptions added to it. As to the section the hon. gentleman has just read, I would ask him to give me a copy of the clause, as it is one that must be carefully considered.

On section 2,

Mr. DAWSON. I would call attention to this fact that if this becomes law it will strike out Algoma from representation. It would be absolutely impossible in the time allowed in ordinary districts to send proclamations over the district of Algoma; and after the proclamation had issued and the nomination had taken place, it would be impossible to convey information to the remoter parts of the district within three weeks. Twenty days is the shortest time in which it has been found possible to convey information over the district. With every exertion, even in summer when the travelling is good, it takes a fortnight, and in winter when hundreds of miles have to be travelled on snowshoes, it is impossible to distribute a proclamation within the time occupied in ordinary districts.

Mr. THOMPSON. Sections 2 and 3 will stand for the same reasons.

On section 7,

Mr. EDGAR. This makes a great change in the law by striking out the use of all the oaths for the voter at the election, except one. We have no oath now at all for farmers' sons, and, therefore, they have not to swear that they have been resident with their parents and have not been absent from such residence more than six months since they were placed on the list of voters. As I understand it, the effect of this change will be to make the list, as revised, absolute in regard to farmers' sons and owners' sons.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is only fair that I should allow this section to stand, because the substance of that legislation will have to be an amendment to the Franchise Act.

Therefore we will let this stand until that is passed upon by the House.

Mr. EDGAR. Does the Minister of Justice think that this requires an amendment to the Franchise Act?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, I think so. There is an oath required that, subsequently to the making of the list, he has lived with his parents.

Mr. EDGAR. These oaths are not in the Franchise Act but in the Elections Act. The Franchise Act only refers to what is required in order to put the name on the list, and it does not say anything about the subsequent oath; so I think the Minister will see that this does not require an amendment to the Franchise Act.

Mr. THOMPSON. Perhaps so, but we will let the section stand for the present.

On section 8,

Mr. EDGAR. I give my cordial assent to this, because it is my Bill of last Session.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think the hon. gentleman will remember that I stated last Session that, if he would allow his Bill to stand, it would receive fair consideration, and he will understand now that that statement was not made captiously.

On section 9,

Mr. EDGAR. Will the hon. gentleman explain the effect of this addition to section 63?

Mr. THOMPSON. The section provides for the loss of the ballot box, but it contains no provision in case of the loss of the lists. It says that if ballot box is lost the list should be used, but there is no provision where not only the ballot box but the list also is lost.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This is a very important provision. I nearly lost my election, two years ago, in consequence of that.

Mr. THOMPSON. That would have been an irreparable misfortune.

Mr. MILLS. The Act provides for giving copies of the certificates to the representatives of the parties at the polling places, and this provides that the returning officer shall retain a copy as well as put one in the ballot box. I suppose it will be the duty of the returning officer to make up his return from such certificates of the result of the polling, where the original is not found in the ballot box. It would not be the duty of any returning officer to open the envelopes and undertake to count the ballots?

Mr. THOMPSON. Only in the case of no returns being available.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is that quite clear? Might not the returning officer prefer to count the ballots instead of taking the result from the certificates or the copies of the certificates? I think he ought to take the result from the certificates or the copies of certificates, and should only take the recounting as a last resort.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think it is quite clear that if the list is not found in the box, and cannot be had in the shape of a copy, then only can he recount the ballots.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It reads that:

"The returning officer may proceed, in the manner hereinbefore directed, to ascertain, by the ballots or by such evidence as he is able to obtain, the total number of votes given to each candidate," and so on. I do not think that is clear as to the order in which he is to take these means.

Mr. THOMPSON. We will let that stand.

On section 10,

Mr. PLATT. I would draw the attention of the Minister to the fact that section 62 of the Act should be amended by making provision that the returning officer may adjourn the proceedings if any of the contents of the ballot box are missing. At present, the Act only allows him to adjourn if the ballot box is missing, but there is no provision for adjournment where the lists are missing.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is quite likely. I will look into that point.

On section 11,

Mr. EDGAR. The Minister of Justice was going to allow another clause to stand with reference to the qualifications of farmers' sons. This relates to the same matter and should stand also. The Minister suggested that it might involve a change in the Franchise Act, and this refers to the same point.

Mr. THOMPSON. That clause will stand.

Mr. LAURIER. I think you are giving great power to justices of the peace:

"Every person who acts in contravention of the provisions of this section shall be liable, on summary conviction, before two judges of the peace."

I would suggest the ordinary courts.

Mr. THOMPSON. That involves an indictment.

Mr. LAURIER. You can employ a stipendiary magistrate, or some such like officer. It is giving justices of the peace large powers, and there are some of them which would be utterly unable to try such cases.

Mr. MILLS. Would it not be well that the offender should be tried by any judge having jurisdiction in such cases where punishment for misdemeanor to this extent may be awarded?

Mr. THOMPSON. Such jurisdiction is now possessed by two justices, or one stipendiary or police magistrate.

Mr. LAURIER. There is a great difference between the ordinary magistrates and a police magistrate.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have no objection to let that sub-section stand.

On section 14,

Mr. EDGAR. The two sub-sections of this clause seem to be very desirable, and create offences of corrupt practices. But the third clause provides that the "Candidate shall not be liable, nor shall his election be avoided for any corrupt practice under this section committed by his agents, other than his agent appointed under the provisions of the Act." Now, I think that would be quite reasonable as regards the second sub-section, which provides that any person who, during an election, "knowingly publishes a false statement of the withdrawal of a candidate, shall be guilty of a corrupt practice." I think it would be rather hard to disqualify a candidate for a report of that kind being started by any agent except his special agent. But as to the provision in the first part of section 14, that "every person who votes, or induces, or procures, any person to vote at any election, knowing that he or such person is not entitled to vote thereat, is guilty of corrupt practice," I certainly think that the candidate should be responsible for his ordinary agents who choose to commit a corrupt practice of that kind. I do not see why the candidate should be exempt from responsibility for such a serious corrupt practice as that one is. I would suggest that it would be much more reasonable to make a provision in sub-section 3, only limiting it to the second sub-section.

Mr. THOMPSON. The whole section is taken from the late English Act regulating corrupt practices. I think that Mr. THOMPSON.

law is exceedingly stringent, and that if we go as far as they have gone in that direction, we should be going far enough. The adoptions of agency are going so far that it is almost impossible for a candidate to avoid constituting agents, if he runs an election in the way they must be run, to solicit votes and solicit aid.

On section 15,

Mr. BARRON. Before the Bill is passed in its present stage, I think there should be an amendment. Section 66 of the Elections Act provides:

"The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall, on receiving the return of a member elected to the House of Commons, give notice in the next ordinary issue of the Canada Gazette of the name of the candidate so elected."

That should be amended by adding the following:—

"And the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall give notice in the ordinary issue of the Gazette, the next after such return shall have been received by him, or, in the case of several returns being received by him at the same time, he shall then give notice in the next ordinary issue of the Canada Gazette, of the names of the candidates so elected in the order in which the said returns are opened and read by him."

That proposal, I think, would meet the case that came up last Session, regarding which there was a good deal of discussion.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will leave that when the committee sits again, I suppose.

Committee rose and reported progress.

CUSTOMS.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 92) to amend chapter 32 of the Revised Statutes, respecting the Customs,—(Mr. Bowell.)

On section 3,

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Are the Board of Customs to have additional powers?

Mr. BOWELL. No additional powers. Now they have a status only by Order in Council, and it is proposed to give them a status by law.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the meaning of the word "Commissioner of Customs?" The old Act says: "Commissioner of Customs, who shall be deputy of the Minister of Customs." In the proposed legislation there will be a board to consist of the Commissioner of Customs, Assistant Commissioner, and so forth. Is the Commissioner of Customs the Commissioner under the statute we passed last year, or under the Customs Act?

Mr. BOWELL. It is Commissioner of Customs under the customs law. The Act to which the hon. gentleman now refers is not in force and has no reference to this. As soon as this Act comes into force the Commissioner of Customs will cease, and I am advised that law will have no effect. That point was fully discussed.

On section 4,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Are you taking extra powers under this clause?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is there any necessity for doing so?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes. It is proposed to give a lien on the goods with the additional duty; this section is to make the law more plain than it is at present.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The department could come upon innocent purchasers and take goods at any time.

Mr. BOWELL. Just in the same way as if a man steals a horse and sells it to another, it belongs to the original owner; and the Crown, I take it, always has a lien on goods for customs duty.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You have found some necessity for obtaining the power ?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this not a totally new power ?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The goods might pass through half a dozen hands and be finally seized in the hands of a man who was utterly and completely innocent of any intention to defraud the revenue. That would be a hard case, I think.

Mr. BOWELL. It does appear to be a hard case. The Customs Act is different from almost any other Act on the Statute-book, and experience has taught all countries that this is necessary in order to protect the revenue, and that we require power to enable us to follow the goods. There may be hard cases, if I may use the expression, such as those referred to by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), but we have found cases of this kind: Horses have been smuggled; they have been seized in the hands of an innocent party, but unless there was some power to follow, it would be questionable whether the department would be able to collect the duty. You may sue the person who smuggled, but the probabilities are he is not to be found, or if he is to be found, he may not be worth the duty. I may say that the practice of the department has been that in cases of that kind, upon the payment of the duty, the innocent party has been allowed to retain the goods. We simply ask the power to continue that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that this is a very exceptional power. The hon. gentleman gives us an illustration from the criminal law, but the law that he has given us is not good. The sale of any property sold by a thief becomes the property of the innocent purchaser; and why should the hon. gentleman undertake to lay down a different rule? Here the Government, from want of vigilance or some other cause, fails to collect the duty on the goods. Those goods pass into the hands of the innocent purchaser, and the hon. gentleman proposes that the innocent purchaser shall pay the duty when he would not have purchased the goods if he had not obtained them at a particular price. Why should the Government seek to exercise this exceptional power and practically rob the purchaser of moneys that he is not morally bound to pay? Certainly the Government may take power to punish a man criminally who undertakes to defraud it in this way. It may undertake to take from him property which he may possess in lieu of the money which he ought to have paid; but why punish the innocent purchaser? If a man steals a horse and that horse is brought into the market and sold to an innocent purchaser, you do not allow the purchaser to be punished in that way. You do not compel him to pay the value of the horse to the man who has lost it, but you provide for the punishment of the thief if you can catch him, and you allow the party who lost the horse to take the value of the property from him if he possesses it. I think the Government should rest upon that general principle for the protection of its right, but the idea of following up an innocent party in this way is perfectly monstrous.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think that what my friend the Minister of Customs has said is quite applicable to the arguments of the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). All the remedies given by the Customs Act are just as severe as that which he now proposes, and necessarily so for the protection of the revenue. The owner of a valuable ship loses his ship if one of his seamen smuggle goods in her, entirely without his knowledge, and in the existing law with regard to the duty on goods, the unpaid duty attaches as a lien upon the goods if the goods have been smuggled into Canada. They may be seized even in the hands of an innocent purchaser for the amount of the duty, and now it is proposed simply to extend the right of lien in respect to the increased amount of duty to which the goods are liable.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister of Justice gives the case of the responsibility of a shipowner for wrongdoing by the party who was using the ship. There is an attempt to force the owner to diligence as a matter of public policy. If it were established absolutely that he was innocent, and had taken every possible precaution, and the Government should undertake to forfeit the ship, the law would very soon disappear from the Statute-book. You merely undertake, in that case, to secure the diligence of the owner, and his act of co-operation along with the Government, in order to prevent the ship being so used. You do that as a matter of public policy, but it does not apply in this case.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, precisely.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How is the purchaser of goods going to see whether duty is paid on those goods or not. Take a man living in Chatham or London or some other town, and he goes to Montreal for the purpose of purchasing goods. He buys them, and takes them home as retail dealer; and after he has them for twelve months, under the provisions of the hon. gentleman's law as he proposes to make it, the hon. gentleman may send his customs officer and seize those goods because the original importer has not paid the duty upon them. Such a rule is perfectly monstrous, and there is no analogy between the rule he proposes to adopt, and any other principle in law.

Mr. THOMPSON. The rule which the hon. gentleman says is monstrous is precisely the rule with regard to a vessel. A seaman smuggles goods in a vessel even without the knowledge of the master or owner; the vessel changes hands and may go through a dozen hands in foreign ports, and when she comes back to Canada she is seized, as has been done time and again.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). An outrageous thing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Perfectly outrageous.

Mr. THOMPSON. Perhaps so. It is the law, and the hon. gentleman says that if it is used with severity the law would disappear from the Statute-book. I say that in this case precisely the same means of relief exists here as exists in relation to a vessel. That is to say that while a lien is declared by law to attach to the goods in all cases, even in the case of duty, and that the man originally guilty could not be punished, still the same discretion to relieve rests in the Minister and the Crown in cases where goods have passed into the hands of innocent parties. We can do nothing more than lay down a general rule as regards custom laws. They are severe rules, but they are always considered with the modification which takes place where the rights of innocent parties intervene.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). There is another principle which perhaps does not occur to the Minister. He is aware that a large amount of business is done by taxes on property. By this law he would strike at the credit and create a great deal of uncertainty in the business transactions of the banks and other financial concerns of the country. A man has certain articles which are dutiable, and he goes to a banking institution or private individual and asks for an advance on them or he may sell them. In many cases he asks for the advance and they give him the advance in good faith. He is in possession of the property. He is not required by the law to prove that property has been duty paid, because if it is in his possession the assumption is that the duty has been satisfied. Therefore when he goes to a monied institution and gives a warehouse receipt for that property the bank of financial concern would readily advance him the money upon it, but if this law passes the bank may advance the money and months afterwards the Government may come down and say: "Oh, it is quite true the duty was not paid on that, and we will take it out of your possession or you must pay the duty." I think that is a most arbitrary Act. I think it is very unnecessary and I think it is more power than the Government should ask. I do not think, from the explanations given by the Minister of Customs, that he has sufficient grounds for asking this House to confer such a power upon the Government. If the hon. gentleman could satisfy this House that it was necessary and give us some sound reason for it, I have no doubt the House would go a long way to meet his views, but up to the present moment I fail to see any just reason for asking for such extraordinary exercise of power to be placed in the hands of the Government, and which may be destructive of commercial confidence. I think the hon. Minister will see it when he looks at it in that light.

Mr. BOWELL. I think that a few clear moments' reflection will teach the hon. gentleman who has just spoken that if his ideas were carried out there would be no protection against smuggling in many cases. The advance which may be made upon a ship cannot by any possibility protect it from seizure, if the captain or one of the proprietors or any one of those on board it had been smuggling. Take the case, for instance, where a man advances a mortgage upon a ship, and certainly he is not responsible for the smuggling which the owner may carry on.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The fines are really a small matter in comparison with the value of the ship.

Mr. BOWELL. I admit that, but the principle is precisely the same. The principle of punishing shipowners who allow or use their vessel for smuggling takes place whether the penalty is $50 or $400 or confiscation of the vessel as the case may be. Any vessel which is caught smuggling is subject under law to confiscation, though an innocent party may have advanced money on mortgage upon that vessel, just the same as a bank advances money to a merchant who purchases his goods; but surely no one would argue that that would protect a merchant against the confiscation of goods he had purchased in a foreign country and smuggled into this country. Take a case which is now under consideration. In one of the western towns a party carrying on a woollen factory or something of that kind, obtained a large quantity of machinery which had been purchased in the United States and brought to Canada. Before it was discovered that a fraud had been perpetrated in the entry of this machinery, the importer had sold it to another party. Now, if the theory laid down by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) be correct, that the party who now owns the property is to be exempt from the duty, then all a rogue would have to do would be to buy machinery from a business man, and, if not caught in the act, transfer it to an innocent party. All you could do would be to punish the individual who had committed the fraud in the importation, and you would have to prove that the party who purchased was a party to the fraud, or you could not touch him.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That seems fair.

Mr. BOWELL. Although the hon. gentleman was in the Cabinet, he had not to do with all the intricate cases that come before the Minister of Customs; if he had, he would have come to this conclusion, that many an honest man might perhaps suffer, but that still the moment that door was opened, many persons would become parties to fraud for the purpose of escaping the duty. Under the present law you can follow smuggled goods wherever you can find them. The only object of this provision is to set the matter at rest, so that people will know that there is a lien on the goods. I am not particular whether this becomes law or not; but, for the protection of the revenue and the honest importer, you cannot make the law too rigid in cases of this kind.

Mr. JONES (Halifax).

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I do not think there is an analogy between the case of vessels and this case. The case of vessels is a peculiar one. The law is no doubt harsh, but as a rule the parties are treated very lightly unless they are actually guilty. In this case the Government have a lien on the goods for the duty, even after they pass out of the possession of the importer. I do not see why the Government should stand in any other position than any other person who has a lien, and allows the goods to pass out of his possession. The person purchasing the goods has a right to assume that the duty was paid. In the cases of fraud the hon. Minister has mentioned, he is going beyond the common law of the land. If a party obtains goods by fraud and sells them to an innocent party, the purchaser has a title to the goods; but no matter how innocent a person might be, he could not get a title against the Crown. If a person has had goods passed through the custom house improperly, either through carelessness or negligence of the officers or by fraud, let him be punished by the proper tribunals; but it would be hard to put the penalty on the innocent purchaser.

Mr. BOWELL. If hon. gentlemen have no objection, after what has been said, I will allow this clause to stand for further consideration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand the hon. Minister to say that in such a case as the one he has cited, the party would be obliged to pay only the difference between the duty which had been originally collected and that which ought to have been collected, or is there any fine besides?

Mr. BOWELL. There is no fine at all. The practice has been this, that if an article has been smuggled in, and is in the hands of an innocent party, all we ask him to pay is the extra duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it limited as to time?

Mr. BOWELL. Three years, under the present law.

Mr. WATSON. I do not think the law is always carried out in the way in which the hon. the Minister has stated. I know of a case which occurred last fall, in which two grain cleaners were imported from the United States into Manitoba. The price paid for them was $450, and that was the amount on which the duty of 30 per cent was paid. They were released by the customs officers and placed in an elevator; and after they had been in actual operation for two months, the contractor was notified that the machines were entered at an undervaluation, the customs authorities claiming that they should have been entered at $600. There appeared to be no resource but to pay the duty on $600. The extra duty was paid, and in addition, a fine was imposed of 50 per cent on the original duty under section 8 of the Customs Act; but the fine was afterwards returned. Now, I think the innocent purchaser should not suffer. Thirty per cent was paid on the full price which had been paid for the goods in the United States, and as it was the actual duty paid, instead of being 30 per cent. was exactly 40 per cent. I think the Act should provide that if no fraud was committed, no fine should be imposed, and the duty should be paid on the actual price of the goods.

Mr. BOWELL. The case mentioned has no reference to the question now under discussion. The hon. gentleman is discussing the clause that provides for an additional duty being imposed on an article which was undervalued. I suppose he states from his knowledge that the machines were only worth $450. I am not going to dispute that, because I know nothing of the case. The hon. gentleman knows that if it were purchased in the United States at $400, and that was $100 less than it was sold at for home consumption in the United States, it would be just $100 under valuation if so entered. That is, the law provides—which I propose to modify when I reach it—that in all cases where the undervaluation amounts to or exceeds 20 per cent. of the value of the article as sold for home consumption in the country where it is purchased, 50 per cent of the duty follows as a matter of course; and that is just as much a part of the law as the imposition of 20 or 25 per cent. is.

Mr. WATSON. What I said was in answer to the illustration given by the Minister of Customs with regard to the woollen machinery. Here is an innocent party, the owner of an elevator, who paid the contract price for building the elevator, and is then liable to a fine as well as the extra duty.

Mr. BOWELL. His recourse would be against the person from whom he purchased, just as if I sell you goods which I have no right to sell. The custom laws make every article imported absolutely forfeited the moment the crime is committed. From the moment smuggling takes place, the goods are really not the property of anyone but the Crown, and if you purchase, and are an innocent person, you ought to treat the seller the same way as if you purchased from him any other article that was not his.

Mr. WATSON. The contractor in this case was an innocent person.

Mr. BOWELL. Very likely.

Mr. WATSON. What I say, is that the custom collectors at those outports should be instructed as to what goods they are in a position to release. That collector ought to have been in the position to know that these machines were valued at $600, and that a duty of 30 per cent. should have been paid on $600, no matter what price was paid for the goods. Had the collector been informed at what prices these articles should have been entered, the proprietors of the elevator would not have been in a position to be imposed on by the customs authorities.

Mr. BOWELL. The giving of instructions such as that indicated by the hon. gentleman could not by any possibility be done. An article to-day might be worth $100 and to-morrow $200 or $50. The value of the duty is the value the article had at the time they were purchased and exported.

On section 5,

Mr. BOWELL. On looking at the old Act, you will find that where the undervaluation exceeds 20 per cent. a sum equal to one-half the duty shall be levied in addition to the regular duty. It also provides that 50 per cent. of the duty shall apply to goods which bear a specific as well as an ad valorem duty. I propose to change that so as to relieve from the penalty the goods upon which a specific duty is imposed, and have it apply only to those which bears an ad valorem duty. And I propose to reduce the undervaluation from 20 to 10 per cent., so that in case the goods are entered at 10 per cent. under value, then the penalty will not be 50 per cent., as at present, but 10 per cent. of the duty, and so on in proportion to the amount of undervaluation. Under this clause an article would have to be entered at an undervaluation of 50 per cent. before the penalty now imposed by the Act could be collected. For instance, if you import a horse for which you paid $100 and entered it at $20, that would be 20 per cent. under the price you paid. Under the present law, that would carry a penalty of 50 per cent. besides the whole duty, which would be $10; under the present law, it would be simply 10 per cent. of the duty itself; that is $2 instead of $10.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). How would that apply to cargoes of sugar?

Mr. BOWELL. Just the same, if there was an ad valorem duty. It would not apply to cargoes of sugar for refining purposes, because they pay the duty on their strength, as tested by the polariscope. If it were entered at an undervaluation,—that for general grocery purposes and not for refining—then the penalty would be imposed upon the ad valorem value of the sugar. Sugar now bears a duty of 1 cent per lb. specific and 30 per cent. ad valorem. If it were undervalued, the undervaluation would apply only to the duty ad valorem and not to the specific value as it does at present.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I asked that question because it applies to other articles as well as to sugar. Take cargoes of molasses.

Mr. BOWELL. Just the same.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman is perhaps aware that difficulties have at all times arisen in the customs in valuing cargoes of molasses, where part has been purchased at a lower rate than other portions of the cargo, and I have known frequently cargoes coming from the West Indies which have been entered at the bond fide prices at which they were paid. Yet the prices have been increased by the appraisers, very improperly, I think. It would be hard enough under those circumstances if they were called upon to pay an increased duty at all, but, if they are to pay upon an increased valuation as well, it would make it so much the worse, and would be very unfair. There is no intention, as a rule, on the part of importers to evade the customs law in that way, but this arises sometimes from the fact that a part of a cargo may be purchased at a lower rate than the balance. I think the hon. gentleman is aware that sometimes his officers have raised the value of the whole cargo to the highest amount specified in the invoice. It seems to me that that would work unfairly to the original importer.

Mr. BOWELL. If that were so, it would be much worse under the old law than under this, because, if the officer raised the price of the whole invoice before, if it exceeded 20 per cent., the 50 per cent. penalty would follow, but now it would not. Under the present law, if the cargo was undervalued 20 per cent., as the hon. gentleman says—

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I do not say it is undervalued, but that the customs suppose it to be undervalued.

Mr. BOWELL. Of course the customs must suppose it, or the officer would not take that course.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Of course the customs are right.

Mr. BOWELL. Sometimes they are not right, or I would not have so much trouble. The basis of this measure, however, is to relieve, as much as possible, parties who have not intentionally undervalued their goods.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). My hon. friend does not quite catch the point which I desired to lay before him. Under the present practice the customs would increase the value of the portion they suppose to be undervalued, and the 15 per cent. duty would be placed on the increased value; but, under this Bill, they would not only make that increase, but would add 10 per cent. to the duties.

Mr. BOWELL. No, not at all.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is so unusual for the Minister of Customs to relax the rigor of the law that one must feel persuaded that he has found that the old clause worked very harshly, and that being the case, I would like to ask him now, when he sees that it is fair and right to relax the rules, whether any relief will be given to innocent parties, parties acting in good faith, who have been fined when there has been a dispute between them and the customs officers in cases such as that instanced by my hon. friend where a bond fide purchase was made and the importer had to submit, as we all have to submit, to the ruling of the department, and had to pay the amount, but did so under protest. I desire to know whether the Minister will look back at all. If not, the passing of this law is an admission that parties have been fined in the past who should not have been fined, and have been harshly dealt with. We practically admit by this that the penalty for innocent undervaluation heretofore inflicted was unjust. Very many people throughout the country feel that, but they have had to pay the penalty and did it under protest. I suppose that where it has not been paid under protest, the Minister would not take any notice of it, but I suggest whether justice does not require that he should take power to deal with cases of that kind where the amount has been paid under protest.

Mr. BOWELL. There is full power now under the law. If there are any cases where injustice has been done to an importer, if he will show where the money has been improperly collected, the money will be refunded. The hon. gentleman from Marquette (Mr. Watson) mentioned a case of that kind, where the officer made a mistake, and the $90 was refunded. If the hon. gentleman can show any case where an injustice has been done, the matter will be considered, and if the Minister of Customs cannot deal with it, he will take it to the Treasury Board, and the money will be refunded. The hon. gentleman knows that, when once money goes into the hands of the Receiver General it is only by action on the part of the Treasury Board and the Council that the money can be refunded. The present Bill does not affect that at all. The only result is to impose a smaller penalty than under the old Act.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). My hon. friend from Marquette has stated a case in which he paid $150 for an article. The Government made the amount $680, and $90 was the double penalty, or the fine imposed. What would we have to pay under the new arrangement?

Mr. BOWELL. Under the old law, assuming that the imposition of the extra duty was correct, he should have paid $180 duty. Then, $90 would be 50 per cent. on that, but under this provision he would have to pay $60 instead of $90.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I asked a question as to the case of a person who paid a larger amount under protest than we are now deciding by this Bill he should have paid. Would not the Minister have power to deal with this by way of refund?

Mr. BOWELL. Certainly not any more than if the duty on an article was 20 per cent. to-day and was reduced to 10 per cent. to-morrow, the Minister of Customs could be asked to refund the difference. The question of paying under protest has never been considered by me. If a man has paid the duty, and afterwards shows that he has paid it improperly, that the value of the goods has been improperly raised, and that the market value in the United States was that at which they were entered by him, and the officers exacted more from him than they should, I have always recommended the refund, but the matter of paying under protest or not has never made any difference.

On section 6,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There the Minister is enacting the first part of the section in the old law, and is removing the alternative provision which was in the old Act which permitted the production of the original invoice of the goods or a certificate.

Mr. BOWELL. If the hon. gentleman will read it closely, he will see the latter portion of the clause contradicts the first. It says:

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

"Whenever duties are charged according to the weight, toll, gauge, or other rate, such allowances shall be made for tares and draft to the packages as are prescribed by regulations made by the Governor in Council."

There it gives the Governor in Council power to declare what tare, gauge, etc., shall be allowed. That has been acted upon. Now, if you read the other portion:

"But when the original invoice of any goods is produced, and a declaration of the correctness shall be made as hereinafter provided—"

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What are you reading from?

Mr. BOWELL. I am reading the old Act, because the proposition is to leave out a portion of that Act.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not see the contradiction.

Mr. BOWELL. Well, you have not let me finish. I say the first portion of the clause gives power to the Governor in Council to make such regulations as they may deem necessary, allowing tare, etc. Then the other clause goes on to say:

"When the original invoice of any goods is produced, and a declaration of the correctness thereof is made as hereinafter provided, the tare according to such invoice shall be deducted from the gross weight of the goods, instead of the allowance aforesaid, subject to such further regulations as may be made from time to time by the Governor in Council."

So that although it gives power to the importer to declare by affidavit the correctness of certain weights, it then goes on to say that they must be subject to any further regulations which may be made from time to time by the Governor in Council. Now, we very often find cases of this kind, that an importer, many of them, or an exporter, as the case may be, will add to the tare of their goods a great deal more than ought to be added, or they will as they have done in the past, add to the value of the packages more than should be added. One merchant will deduct as high as 20 or 30 shillings upon certain goods that constitute a portion of the tare, while another from the same port will deduct nine or ten. So, you see at once the difficulty that presents itself in the administration of this law. It simply provides that the Governor in Council shall have power to declare by Order in Council what the tare, etc., shall be, and then it removes any ambiguity.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I see that; but still I do not see why the production of the original invoice, giving the tare, and supported by affidavit, should not be good proof as to the correctness of the tare. Now, I can understand that the Minister should make a regulation as to the tare of a certain article; but it is quite possible that the goods, or the packages in which they are contained, may vary, the tare may vary, and to make a new rule might work a hardship or injustice upon some importer. It seems to me that when an original invoice is produced, and an affidavit made to the correctness of it, that should be made prima facie evidence of its correctness. The Minister has mentioned one or two cases. I should suppose that any fraud that would be perpetrated would be in the original shipper altering his tare in order to avoid the customs duty; but he would have to make a fraudulent invoice all through in order to do it, and the Minister would have the original invoice, and could detect the fraud. Suppose there was a collusion between the parties, and that the importer should say to the exporter in a foreign country: Now, you make the tare 10 or 15 per cent. more than it is—especially if the duties were levied on the ad valorem basis; he would have to increase the price at which it was entered, and would reveal the difference in that way.

Mr. BOWELL. I ask the hon. gentleman what good reason, or any reason, is there why you should have a clause upon the Statute-book that is ambiguous in its wording and that would lead to complications between the administrator of the law and the importer? As I understand it now, the Order in Council which has been issued making the declaration of the tare upon certain articles, sufficient proof, has been accepted by all the merchants; it was done after a great deal of consideration and consultation with the largest importers of the country; and when they accepted that as fair, and it is working harmoniously, there is no reason why we should allow a clause to remain upon the Statute-book which gives any importer who likes to be cantankerous or troublesome, the opportunity of saying: Well, this is a correct invoice, these tares are correct, and I am prepared to swear to them,—and even if he does, then the last two lines of the clause give power to the Governor in Council to change that.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Well, I do not so understand the meaning of these last words, I do not think that is a fair interpretation of them. I interpret them this way; that you make your rule and it does not apply in the case of a certain importer, and he says: Your rule is not doing me justice, and in proof of that I produce my original invoice, giving the original tare, which I support with affidavit. The section in the old law, as I understand it, permits the Minister to accept that as proof, but it has added: "subject to such further regulations as are made from time to time by the Governor in Council," but I interpret that part in this way, that the Governor in Council might require more proof than the original invoice, more proof than the declaration of the owner, for instance, if the Order in Council should require that he should have a declaration from the exporter from whom he bought the goods—that is how I understand the meaning of the words, and I think they were put in the Act for that purpose.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It appears to me that it is absolutely necessary that the Governor in Council should have power to deal with it in that way, though I presume the Government would not very frequently interfere with the established tares in the various countries from which the goods were received. But, at the same time, I think it is absolutely necessary that the Government should have power to deal with that, in the event of an invoice leading them to suppose there was something irregular in the tares which the importer declared to have on his invoice. I cannot see any objection to it, although I think the Government would not interfere very often, or at all events, change the established tares of the country from which the goods were imported.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understand from the Minister of Customs that that subject has been for a long time under consideration, that they have modified their rules from time to time, as experience shows to be necessary, and at the present time the rules on that subject are uniform and complete. Now, of course, the only object in giving the Governor in Council power to deal by Order in Council with a subject of this sort, is that Parliament has not the necessary data upon which to base specific and minute legislation; but if the Minister of Customs thinks that they have now, by Orders in Council, or by their experience, arrived at a condition of things when these Orders in Council no longer require to be modified or changed, then that ought to be embraced in this section as part of the legislation; the experience which the hon. gentleman has acquired, and which is set forth in these Orders in Council, should be embraced in the statute itself. At all events, if that is not the case, there ought to be made an appendix to the statute where they would be accessible and known to the mercantile community.

Mr. BOWELL. As to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Bothwell, it could be carried out the moment that trade ceases to fluctuate, and administrators become perfect. I do not anticipate that day will arrive until perhaps the hon. gentleman reaches this side of the House. The trade is continually changing, and there is no member on that side of the House who knows it better than the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). It may be necessary to change these regulations affecting tare and draft and deductions allowed upon packages containing goods which are exempt from duty. That may occur to-morrow or a month hence. We know that a package containing molasses may be worth 9 shillings one day and 12 shillings a month hence. If the hon. gentleman's suggestion were adopted we would have no power to make a change. These regulations, however, have to be varied as changes take place in the trade of the country. It would be utterly impossible to carry out the suggestion, which would either impose a wrong on the importers or on the revenue.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That would only apply to cases where there were specific duties on particular packages. If the duty was on the value of the packages, then there would be no difficulty. Besides, if the value fluctuates in the way the hon. gentleman has described the Order in Council always comes too late. The trouble is that the hon. gentleman's rule is always made after the fact, whereas ordinary legislation is made before the fact.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I desire to enquire the reason why the latter portion of the clause in the old Act has been omitted in framing the new clause?

Mr. BOWELL. Under the old Act the importer appears to be given the absolute right to insist on his statement being accepted. That might be correct in dealing with an honest man, but such was not the case in dealing with a dishonest trader. I did not see the necessity of retaining that portion of the clause.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That portion of the clause must have been inserted when the old Act was passed to give the alternative to the honest importer. At the same time the Governor in Council was given power to require something more from the importer than the mere production of the invoice, or that the Governor in Council might make regulations requiring something more.

Mr. BOWELL. Then it simply means this, that the Minister of Customs, or whoever administers the law, must throw doubt upon the statement of the importer who has sworn to the invoice. Taking the interpretation of the law, as given by the hon. gentleman, and perhaps it is correct, then the old clause gave power to the Minister of Customs or party administering the law, to say: You are not telling the truth, I will not accept your invoice, but I require further evidence. No doubt the words referred to were inserted for a good purpose; but, like many other clauses in the Act, they might be applicable at the time, but the changes of trade have been such and the way of doing business has changed to such an extent that we find it impracticable to carry out some of the clauses without coming into collision with the trade, which we desire to avoid.

On section 9,

Mr. BOWELL. The change made is one already existing by Order in Council, and many importers plead ignorance and say, because it is not in the law they do not know it. I propose to add that which is the law by Order in Council to the statute.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). A consignee of course can only make a declaration to the best of his knowledge or belief.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, that is all.

On section 10,

Mr. BOWELL. I explained this fully the other night. It simply refers to the payment of damage on sugar which goes into a refinery. It would not refer to sugar which was imported for household purposes, for that would be entitled to the same claim as under the fourth section. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Jones) knows that sugar used for refining purposes is tested by the polariscope, and we allow for the salt in the testing.

On section 11,

Mr. BOWELL. This section simply changes the words: "Whenever any vessel is entered," to "whenever any vessel is reported." The only change is substituting the word "reported" for "entered." In former times the word "entered" was used whether referring to the reporting of a vessel or the entering of goods. Under the present Act the terms are distinct, and our desire is that there should be no conflict hereafter as to what is the meaning of entering or reporting.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). "Reporting" is the proper word.

Mr. BOWELL. I think so.

On section 12,

Mr. BOWELL. The House will see that in making those changes where only a word or two had to be changed I have reconstructed the whole clause, as I thought it better it should be done. The only change made in this clause is by inserting "assistant appraiser" and making it in conformity with the Civil Service Act, which recognises assistant appraisers.

On section 13,

Mr. BOWELL. Under the old Act in reading it, there is a doubt existing as to whether it applies to parts of machines that are imported or to the whole machinery which is imported. The words added are, "when parts of any manufactured articles are imported into Canada, each such part shall be dutiable." The object of the clause is to make the matter so plain that we cannot misunderstand it.

On section 14,

Mr. BOWELL. The object of this clause is to make clear the power to impose a duty upon an article which has been sent from one country to the other upon which a bounty has been paid or a drawback given. For instance you purchase sugar in New York upon which two cents per pound has been paid to the purchaser as a drawback, and that article is sent to Liverpool and there purchased in the market and brought to Canada. The question then arises: does the law empower the Customs to impose a duty upon that two cents in addition to the price paid for the article. If the article was purchased in New York and exported directly to Canada, then there is no question but that the two cents would be added to the value of the sugar for duty, but an attempt has been made to evade that law by sending it to some other country and ostensibly selling it in the market and returning it back to Canada. The law is not clear upon that point, and this position is to make it beyond a doubt.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Even with the law obscure as it is, I should think "they could not come it over you" in that way.

Mr. BOWELL. No, sir; I want to put it beyond the power of anyone importing goods in that way to taking an action against us.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman only refers to one article.

Mr. BOWELL. I merely give that as an illustration.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Practically it refers to only one branch, such as refined sugar. Under the operation of this clause I presume, duty will be demanded on sugar coming from Germany, including the bounty as well. There is a bounty or drawback on sugar coming from Germany which interferes very much with our trade relations with the West Indies, in which hon. gentlemen lately have shown much interest, and under the operation of this Act, that sugar heretofore has come in a different way. Of course, I know that the polariscope test makes the principle of levying a duty somewhat difficult, and that perhaps may be my answer. I think the hon. gentleman, while he is dealing with the subject, should take power to place an ad valorem duty on German beet root sugar to cover the drawback so as to place it on the same footing as the refined sugar which comes from the United States. The principle I think should be applied in both cases, and if so it would very materially assist our trade with the West Indies by keeping out the German sugar. It now averages 60 or 70 per cent. of the refined sugar of the Dominion, and there is only about 25 per cent. of West Indian sugar. The German sugar is allowed to come in and compete with it under the operation of this Act, and I suppose the hon. gentleman will deal with the matter.

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. BOWELL. If the hon. gentleman will read the clause carefully he will see that the object he has in view is provided for. It applies to every article on which it can be established a drawback has been allowed.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman's explanation is perfectly satisfactory, if he only carries that provision into effect. That has been the practice. The subject having been brought to the notice of the Government some years ago, an order was passed that the duty should be collected on the increased amount; but that order was subsequently rescinded, and beet root sugar has recently been permitted to enter the Dominion on its actual value, less the amount of the drawback. I wish to know whether the hon. gentleman proposes to place an ad valorem duty on German sugar, because, under the present arrangement of a polariscopic test, German sugar is hardly included.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to suggest that, as this is a subject in which a great many gentlemen are interested, and as a number wish to go away to-night, perhaps it would be as well not to resume this discussion this evening.

Mr. BOWELL. I think the hon. gentleman had better let me go through with the Bill.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will be here.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know what other business can be gone on with just now. If it is desired that any clause should stand over, I shall have great pleasure in letting it stand, but I would like to get through with the Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is a very important Bill. It has excited a great deal of attention in the mercantile centres of this country; several gentlemen have written to me about it; and I know that a number of members are going away to-night after half past eight o'clock, and I think it would be only fair to allow this Bill to stand over until the next Government day, because there are some sections of this Bill which I take particular exception to. I trust, therefore, that the hon. gentleman will not press the Bill to-night. If he does, he will force a number of us to stay, and I do not think it will help public business.

Sir HECTOR LANGENIN. We would like to meet the wish of the hon. gentleman, but he must see that the Session is so far advanced that if we postpone measure after measure because some members go away or take exception to a clause, we shall never get away; we shall be here until June, and later than June, and I have no doubt that the wish of the hon. member and of the House is to get through the work as fast as we can. This is a measure that we thought we would take up this afternoon, and resume it after 8 o'clock.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not aware that any other Bill has been asked to be postponed, certainly not at my request. I do think this is not an unreasonable request. This Bill is one that affects the interests of the commercial community of this Dominion, and we have a right to a fair and reasonable opportunity of discussing it. There has been no Opposition shown to the Bill, but we desire to criticise it clause by clause, as they come up, and we request that it may be left over until the next Government day, in order that those who wish to go home to-night may do so. If it is necessary for me to stay, I will stay, but I do not think it would promote public business. I tell hon. gentlemen that frankly.

It being six o'clock, the committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MANITOBA AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY OF CANADA.

Mr. TISDALE moved that the order for the third reading of Bill (No. 46) to amend the Acts relating to the Manitoba and North-Western Railway Company of Canada (Mr. Scarth) be discharged, and that the Bill be referred back to Committee of the Whole for the purpose of adding the following clause:—

The directors of the company may make and issue as paid up stock, shares in the company, whether subscribed for or not, and may allot and hand over such stock in payment for right of way, plant, rolling stock, or materials of any kind, and also for the services of directors and engineers. Such issue and allotment of stock shall be binding on the company, and such stock shall not be assessable for call, and the paid up stock heretofore issued and allotted in accordance with the provisions of this section is hereby legalised and affirmed.

He said: I may say that, excepting the last words with regard to the legalising of any allotment, this is precisely the clause that is in the model Bill. I am moving this in the absence of Mr. Scarth. The promoters of this Bill had supposed, until it went through the Railway Committee, that they had the ordinary powers this clause contained. The addition I ask is, therefore, simply to have the model Bill clause put in and to legalise whatever the directors have done in accordance with that clause. I presume no hon. gentleman will object to this legislation. This railway is one that has built over two hundred miles of road, and has expended over $1,000,000, so that I am asking for no new thing, but simply that the charter shall contain the ordinary clause, and that what has been done in the belief that the charter did contain that clause shall be legalised.

Mr. EDGAR. The amendment conforms, I see, except in the last sentence, exactly with the model Bill, and that only makes the model Bill retroactive. I do not think there can be any objection to it.

Motion agreed to.

The House resolved itself into committee. The committee reported. Bill read the third time, and passed.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 31) to incorporate the Detroit River Winter Railway Bridge Company.—(Mr. Ferguson, Welland.)

SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

On the order:—

Further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Hall for the third reading of Bill (No. 54) to incorporate the South-Western Railway Company, and the motion of Mr. Bergin in amendment thereto: "That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be read a third time, this day six months."

House divided on the amendment.

YEAS:

Messieurs

| | | |
|----------------------|---------------------|-----------------------|
| Armstrong, | Desjardins, | McMillan (Vaudreuil), |
| Bain (Soulanges), | Dessaint, | McMullen, |
| Barron, | Doyon, | Meigs, |
| Bergin, | Edgar, | Mills (Bothwell), |
| Bernier, | Eisenhauer, | Patterson (Essex), |
| Bourassa, | Ferguson (Welland), | Perry, |
| Bowell, | Geoffrion, | Platt, |
| Brien, | Girouard, | Préfontaine, |
| Caron (Sir Adolphe), | Godbout, | Rinfret, |
| Casgrain, | Guay, | Rykert, |
| Chapleau, | Hickey, | Ste. Marie, |
| Choquette, | Labelle, | Shanly, |
| Chouinard, | Labrosse, | Thompson, |
| Cockburn, | Landerkin, | Tisdale, |
| Cook, | Landry, | Turoot, |
| Costigan, | Laurier, | Vanasse, |
| Couture, | Lister, | Wallace, |
| Curran, | Lovitt, | Watson, |
| De St. Georges, | McLellan, | Wilson (Lennox).—57. |

NAYS:

Messieurs

| | | |
|---------------------------|--------------------------|-----------------------|
| Bain (Wentworth), | Guilbault, | Porter, |
| Baker, | Guillet, | Prior, |
| Bergeron, | Haggart, | Reid, |
| Bowman, | Hale, | Robillard, |
| Boyle, | Hall, | Roome, |
| Brown, | Henderson, | Ross, |
| Burns, | Hesson, | Rowand, |
| Cameron, | Holtou, | Royal, |
| Cargill, | Hudspeth, | Scriver, |
| Carling, | Innes, | Skinner, |
| Chisholm, | Jamieson, | Small, |
| Cimon, | Joncas, | Smith (Ontario), |
| Oochrane, | Kirk, | Somerville, |
| Coughlin, | Lang, | Sproule, |
| Daoust, | Langevin (Sir Hector), | Sutherland, |
| Davin, | Laurie, | Temple, |
| Davis, | Macdonald (Sir John), | Thérien, |
| Dawson, | Macdowall, | Trow, |
| Desautniers, | McCulla, | Tupper (Sir Charles), |
| Dupont, | McDougald (Pictou), | Tyrwhitt, |
| Ellis, | McDougald (Cape Bret'n), | Ward, |
| Ferguson (Leeds & Gren.), | Madill, | Weldon (St. John), |
| Ferguson (Renfrew), | Mara, | White (Renfrew), |
| Fiset, | Marshall, | Wilmot, |
| Flynn, | Mills (Annapolis), | Wilson (Argenteuil), |
| Gauthier, | Mitchell, | Wood (Westmoreland), |
| Gigault, | Moffat, | Wright, |
| Gordon, | Montplaisir, | Yeo.—86. |
| Grandbois, | Perley (Assinibofa), | |

Mr. TROW. The hon. member for North Perth has not voted.

Mr. HESSON. I paired with the hon. member for Kent, (Mr. Landry).

Mr. LANDRY. I did not vote either. The hon. gentleman is quite correct. I paired with him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Vote.

Mr. HESSON. I vote against the six months' hoist.

Mr. LANDRY. Then I vote the other way.

Mr. TROW. I notice that the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKeen) has not voted, and I see that he is in the House—at least he is in the gallery.

Mr. ROYAL. I call attention to the fact that the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) has not voted.

Mr. SPEAKER. This is too late. I have declared the amendment lost.

Mr. CURRAN moved that the Bill be not now read the third time, but be referred back to a Committee of the Whole House, to have the following clause inserted therein:—

This Act shall not go into force until the first day of May, 1890.

He said: I shall make very few observations in connection with this motion, as the time for private Bills is nearly up; but this Parliament having last year refused to pass the Bill which is now about to be granted, it is of the highest importance, owing to the fact that some $300,000 have been spent, not only on the branch line, but in perfecting the connection with the American system, that the present company which are now constructing the road should be permitted to complete their works which are now commenced and are nearing a termination, and that they should have an opportunity of floating their bonds, and in fact of carrying out the large construction they have now on hand and of bringing commerce to this work, which will be destroyed altogether, and will prove almost ruinous to the company if this Bill should go into force immediately. This is not the first occasion upon which similar legislation has been enacted. In 1882, the Great Eastern Railway Company was incorporated by this House, and it was provided in the Act of incorporation:

"That so much of this section as authorises the construction of any part or parts of said railway, from and lying east of any point on the frontier, at or near the village of Dundee, and which passes through the counties of Huntingdon, Chateaugay, Beauharnois, Napierville and Laprairie, shall not come into force until the first day of May, 1884."

Thus giving two years' limit before the Act should come into force. As this House, through its Committee on Railways last year, threw out a Bill similar to this one, and thereby it was considered by the promoters of the other road that Parliament was pledged that this Bill should not be granted, and went to work and expended this large amount of money, I think the House will consider it only fair that the company should have that brief time allotted to them, and then, if there is a prospect of business, if the gentlemen who are promoting this Bill see that there is enough business for them to operate their present charter, they can do so, and the people of the country will be glad to see them do so; but, in the meantime, there is no justice in crushing out an enterprise which has begun in good faith, and upon which a large amount of money has been expended.

Mr. BAKER. I ask if that amendment is in order. Clause 67 of the Rules of this House says that no important amendment can be moved, either in committee or on the third reading, without one day's notice having been given. Has that notice been given?

Mr. SPEAKER. I have to declare that this motion is not in order.

Mr. BERGIN. I object to the Bill being read the third time to-night. It must go over until Monday.

Mr. SPEAKER. On what ground does the hon. gentleman object?

Mr. BERGIN. You cannot take that stage to-night.

Mr. SPEAKER. The order for to-night is for the third reading.

Mr. BERGIN. The order to-night is for the consideration of the amendment I proposed.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot entertain the objection. The third reading must take place if the House so wills it.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 83) to amend the Act to incorporate the Moncton Harbor Improvement Company.—Mr. Wood (Westmoreland).

Bill (No. 15) to incorporate the Nisbet Academy of Prince Albert.—(Mr. Macdowall.)

Bill (No. 62) to incorporate the Grenville International Bridge Company.—(Mr. Shanly.)

Bill (No. 59) to confer certain powers on the Nova Scotia Telephone Company (Limited).—(Mr. Tupper.)

Mr. CURRAN.

Bill (No. 50) to incorporate the Ottawa, Morrisburg and New York Railway and Bridge Company.—(Mr. Hickey.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 96) to incorporate the Belleville and Lake Nipissing Railway Company (from the Senate).—(Mr. Masson.)

Bill (No. 102) respecting the Central Ontario Railway Company.—(Mr. O'Brien.)

THE CUSTOMS ACT.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 92) to amend chapter 32 of the Revised Statutes, respecting the Customs.—(Mr. Bowell.)

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I enquired of the Minister of Customs before Recess in reference to his interpretation of a previous clause which I did not understand to be passed. That was with reference to the value of goods on which there was a drawback. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he proposed to deal with the beet root sugar in the same way as the sugar from New York?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes. The proposition is to deal with all articles whether it be sugar or anything else. I might state, however, what I did not state before in reply to my hon. friend in reference to beet root sugar. There was a doubt existing in the minds of some eminent lawyers whose opinions we had, that we had no right to impose that duty upon sugar which was manufactured in England from sugar imported from Germany upon which the drawback had been paid. However, I might state frankly that we differed in the department from that opinion which was given to us by some Montreal gentleman who belongs to the legal profession on behalf of the sugar refiners. But, under the peculiar circumstances which the hon. gentleman remembers I explained at the time, we did not think it advisable to put our construction of the law into force. It is changed now so as to place it beyond a doubt and it makes it more defined in the future under this clause to impose duty upon sugar of that kind if purchased in England or any other country when a drawback is paid.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That is, beet root sugar coming Germany?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). How will you apply that to the others on which duty is levied by the polariscopic test? Do you propose changing the law so as to have an ad valorem?

Mr. BOWELL. Quite right; we cannot do that under the polariscopic test for refining purposes. That is the point that arose in dispute in relation to the sugar manufactured in England from the German sugar. It was the refined sugar purchased in England for grocery purposes, or the "low yellows," as they were called. Those do not go to the refinery and, consequently, they will bear an ad valorem duty, and this clause can be applied.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Perhaps I did not make myself understood. I understand that a complaint made by the refiners led to a change in the duty a few years ago, and that beet root sugars were admitted, less the bounty, for a time, because it was said that the English refiners having the advantage of using the beet root sugars, if the raw material was not admitted into the Dominion on the same terms as other sugars, that our refiners could not compete with them. Since the change has been made under which the duty on refined sugar from Great Britain has been increased to meet the views of the refiners, what I desire to know is whether the Government propose taking any action to levy the duty on the raw beet root sugar from Germany on the same principle that they apply it on the refined sugars from New York. That is to say, on the value of the sugar without deducting the large bounty or drawback which is allowed the purchaser off the raw material in that country.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no proposition of that kind. The proposition before the House is simply to apply to sugar or any other articles upon which an ad valorem duty is imposed. Under the system that prevails now—the charging of duty in accordance with the strength of the sugar—that question cannot arise, nor has it arisen in the past, and unless an ad valorem duty was imposed in addition to the duty which was imposed upon the different degrees of strength now.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. BOWELL. We do not propose to change that. The hon. gentleman will remember that one of the principal reasons why we changed the mode of collecting the sugar duty was to encourage the West Indian trade with Canada. It was contended by those who were engaged in the trade that, when sugars were purchased in China, or the Sandwich Islands, and such places, it could be purchased at a very much lower rate than in the West Indies, or Cuba, and the result of that was that the freights being so much lower in the long route it would, in a measure, have acted against the West Indian trade. Then it was changed to the polariscopic system, by which it mattered not from what part of the world it came, and it mattered not under what circumstances it was published, the duty would be collected on the actual strength of the sugar, so that if it were purchased in China and brought to Canada, and contained the same strength as sugar purchased in the nearest islands to Halifax or Canada, it would pay precisely the same duty as that brought the short distance. It is not proposed to change this mode of collecting duty on sugar.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The point I was trying to get the hon. gentleman to notice was this, he stated the object was to encourage the West Indian trade.

Mr. BOWELL. That was the object of the change.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Yes, I understand that was all right so far as it went, but the hon. gentleman will see he is not carrying out his own policy; that is to say, he was only carrying it out with a particular object, and in so far as it is beneficial to the refiners. He is placing duty on the refined sugar coming from the States at its market value without allowing for that drawback. An ad valorem duty is assessed at the same rate as the article sells for in the wholesale market in New York. I wish to know whether the hon. gentleman does not see that under that principle the beet root sugar should be assessed in the same way. I admit you do not reach it by the polariscopic test system. The question is whether you should not apply an ad valorem duty in that way to meet that difficulty. The hon. gentleman knows, and no one knows better, that under the present arrangement the beet root sugar is driving the West Indian sugar almost entirely out of the market. I have not the figures in my hand at the moment, but I think, if the hon. gentleman refers to the Trade and Navigation Returns he will find that less than 40 per cent. of the sugar manufactured in this country is what is called Barbadoes and that the large proportion is the beet root sugars coming from Germany. If the import of that article goes on under the present system in the same ratio it has for the past few years, instead of encouraging the West India trade which seems to be the object the hon. gentleman and the Government have in view, it will completely kill that trade. Therefore it is useless for them to talk about building up a trade with the West Indies, while at the same time the effect of their tariff regulations is to encourage the importation of beet root sugar, and is driving the West India sugar out of the market. If the Government desire to help the West India trade, they should take some means by which the duty will be imposed on the raw sugar at its value in Germany, without allowing any deduction for the bounty or drawback, just as they do on sugar from New York, to benefit the refiner.

Mr. BOWELL. I fully recognise the logic of the hon. gentleman on this question, but to adopt the system he proposes now would disarrange the whole system of the collection of sugar duties. The probabilities are from present appearances that the discrimination which he has pointed out may not exist for any length of time, for I understand that the effect of the international congress which has been discussing this question, is that Germany, Belgium, France, and nearly every country which has been paying heavy bounties on the production of beet root sugar, have agreed to their abandonment. I am not sure of any that have not joined in the conference except the United States, and it was only about a week ago that it was announced in England that the colonies had given in their adhesion to that decision.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). In the meantime the West India trade shall suffer.

On section 16,

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I do not see any difference between this and the old law, with this exception, that under the amended clause the collector appoints one appraiser, the individual who feels aggrieved nominates another, and an officer of the Customs Department is the third; virtually leaving the Government or their officers to appoint two, whose decision is final.

Mr. BOWELL. Under the old law, in case of a dispute between the importer and the customs authorities as to values, the collector is empowered to appoint two merchant appraisers who are supposed to know the value of the goods. They take the evidence, and report to Ottawa, and the decision of the Commissioner of Customs is final. The importers have contended that that arrangement is too one-sided, and that they ought to have something to say. Therefore we have changed the law so as to give the importer a voice on the board. The Government, instead of having the power to appoint the whole of them, have only power to appoint another, who is outside of the customs, and the appraiser, who is supposed to have a better knowledge of the value of the goods than any one, is the third; and their decision is final. This relieves the Government of any responsibility in the matter, and this is a concession which has never been given before either in this country or in the United States. In the United States they have had two or three systems of appraisement, but they have abolished them all, and at the present the law there is that the Government appoint a board of appraisers from their own officers, whose decision is final. It was thought under the circumstances that it would be better to make our law a little more moderate by giving the importers a say in the matter.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I understand that, but really I cannot see that it is such a concession on the part of the Government as the hon. Minister would lead us to believe. Virtually the Government control the whole valuation. Before, the party feeling aggrieved had no voice in the matter. Now, he may have a voice, but the voice does not amount to anything, because the two Government appraisers decide as to the value of the article and the duty to be paid, and their decision is final.

Mr. BOWELL. That argument is very good, based on the assumption that the only object the Government have is to take all the duty they can get out of everybody. I take it for granted that the Government do not want any more than they are entitled to, and this provision is only to protect the honest importer who enters his goods at a fair valuation. The Government have no power to take one cent of duty out of the importer if it is shown, after these appraisers meet, that the original appraisal by the department was too high. All they have to enquire is whether the article imported has been entered at a value less than that article is sold at in the market for home consumption. Under the circumstances, my hon. friend will see that this is a very equitable provision, unless I am to infer that he desires when a difficulty arises that the merchant who imports shall have the selection of the board to decide the question. Then, I suppose the argument is fair on the other side, that the Government would have nothing to do with the valuation, and might as well surrender at once, because the importer would select such friends as would do away with the valuation at which the goods were entered.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think my hon. friend will see the Government should have such a power as this, if they deal with it at all. They must take the responsibility, and we are bound to assume that the Government have no object in getting more than the fair duty which the importer is entitled to pay.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I do not object to that in the least, but I do not think the Minister of Customs has really shown that the individual aggrieved can feel he has every protection desirable. Of course I can understand it is necessary to protect the Government, but we should also not look upon every importer as a dishonest individual, and frame the law so as to punish almost every individual who may fall at times into the hands of the Government. I think the protection offered here to the importer is very little indeed.

On section 17,

Mr. BOWELL. Clauses 78, 79, 82, 83, 103, 124 and 125 are all changed so as to provide for the doing away with the giving of bonds, to which I called the attention of the House the other night. As the law now stands, bonds are required to be given in each case when goods are removed from one warehouse to another, thus entailing a large amount of labor on the part of the merchants as well as the custom house officers. About 30,000 to 35,000 bonds are passed during a year. The moment a party ex-warehousing goods from one warehouse to another or from one bonded warehouse in one Province to another, makes an entry, he becomes just as responsible for the delivery of the goods to the other warehouse as if he had given the bond, so that it relieves the merchant from giving the bond, and it relieves the custom officials in different parts of the Dominion from filling out some 30,000 to 40,000 bonds every year. The revenue will be just as safe as it is now, because the parties who give bonds do not give their sureties, but their own individual bonds, and if they can be held as responsible by a clause in the Act as by signing bonds, we do away with all the difficulty and at the same time protect the revenue.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Do I understand that when the party warehousing a cargo and giving his bond, transfers it to a second party, whether the latter gives bonds or not, the original importer who has given his bond, and who loses all control of the goods after he has parted with them, is held responsible?

Mr. BOWELL. Do you mean that the goods remain in the bonded warehouse?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). No; after they are delivered. For instance: If I import a cargo and give a bond, and then sell it to a refinery; they may either pass a bond, or not, as the case may be, but I, as the original importer, cease to be held responsible for the duty?

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes; the moment the transfer takes place, and the party who has purchased from you in bond transfers it from that warehouse to his own, he is responsible.

On section 18,

Mr. BOWELL. Clause 82 makes the acceptance of the transfer of goods in the warehouse equivalent to the bond heretofore exacted, and places the new owner under the same obligations as was the party who originally entered the goods for warehouse.

On section 19,

Mr. BOWELL. Section 86 is to give the officers of the Customs Department power to enter and examine a warehouse in which goods are stored in bond. At present such officer has no legal authority to enter and examine without the consent of the proprietor. It is manifestly necessary and proper that the right to enter and make an examination should be beyond dispute. At present, it is contended the officer has no power to demand entrance to your warehouse and pass through a free portion of it to enter the bonded portion. This will enable him, if he thinks anything is wrong, to demand entrance, and you are obliged to give it to him.

On section 20,

Mr. BOWELL. The object of this provision is to keep the statistics right, so as to show the country to which the vessel belongs and from which it comes. This has always been the law.

On section 21,

Mr. BOWELL. That is the same clause, defining the time at which the articles seized may be sold, if the law is not complied with.

On section 22,

Mr. BOWELL. The object of this is to assist exporters and relieve them of a good deal of trouble to which they are now put. Take the case of an exporter of lumber from Buckingham by way of Rouse's Point. He is now compelled to come to Ottawa to make his entry, instead of making it at Rouse's Point, which would be more convenient. Take the case of lumber exported by rail from Alexandria, on the line of the Canada Atlantic Railway. The nearest custom house to that place is at Cornwall, which is some 40 miles out of the way, and he must make his entry there. I propose to allow him to make his export entry at the nearest place to that by which it is going out of the country. The other provision is a question of bonds again.

On section 23,

Mr. BOWELL. This is to provide for vessels which do not enter a regular port of entry. The penalty before was only fixed in regard to vessels which had dutiable goods on board, leaving a vessel which had no such goods to do practically what she pleased, and, therefore, to a certain extent enabling her to evade the necessity of reporting. It is also intended to reduce the penalty from the forfeiture of the vessel to a fine of $400, in case the vessel is worth less than $800, and then to authorise the sale of the vessel if the penalty is not paid within thirty days. It often occurs now that a vessel may run in for shelter or for smuggling purposes, but, as the law reads, you cannot do anything with her unless she enters a regular port of entry, and we want to make her report whether she has dutiable goods on her or not. The House will see that it would be very easy for her to run in and get rid of the dutiable goods, and afterwards to state: "We have no dutiable goods on board."

Mr. JONES (Halifax). How will that affect the fishermen under the treaty?

Mr. BOWELL. It will not affect them, because they will be specially exempt under the law.

On section 25,

Mr. BOWELL. This is to cover a dispute which has arisen as to the right of a customs officer to make a seizure. It has been contended that no seizure can be made except under cover of a writ of assistance, or under a section of the old law. If that were the correct interpretation, it is not that under which customs officers have acted in the past, and the operation of the law would be impracticable unless we obtained from the courts a writ of assistance, and placed it in the hands of every customs officer. In the past when any customs official has had reason to suppose that there were smuggled goods, he considered that he had the right to make the seizure. I believe he had the right under but that the law, has been disputed, and it is better to make it clear.

On section 26,

Mr. BOWELL. This is to correct an absurd wording of the law. The old law refers to places where no justice can be found within five miles, and that has been struck out.

On section 27,

Mr. BOWELL. These words have been added to the original clause:

"And unless payment is made within thirty days, such vessel may, after the expiration of such delay, be sold to pay such penalty and any expenses incurred in detaining, keeping and selling the same."

It is only carrying out the provisions of the earlier clauses.

On section 28,

Mr. BOWELL. That is striking out the words "North-West Territories," as courts have been established in the Territories since.

On section 29,

Mr. BOWELL. These words are added:

"Which he has reasonable grounds to believe are liable to forfeiture."

On section 30,

Mr. BOWELL. This is somewhat of an important change, and I will give the House the reasons for it. The object of the amendment is to render more plain and unmistakable the intention of the law. While it would appear, by section 148 of the old law, that no action, suit or proceeding of any nature could be commenced against an officer making a seizure on account thereof, it has been contended that this does not include actions in replevin or revendication to recover possession of the thing seized. While it is impossible to deny that the owner or claimant of the thing seized has a right to an adjudication on the legality of the seizure, such opportunity should be afforded him to obtain a decision in regard to the ownership of the thing seized; but the intent and purpose of the law is not so clear at present as to debar the owner from taking action in replevin or revendication, and that necessarily tends to embarrass the officers of the Government, and in some cases to defeat the ends of justice. The amendment would prevent unnecessary and unprofitable litigation. The law in the United States provides that property seized under such circumstances shall be irrepleviable. We desire to prevent as much as possible the delay in settling these cases by lawyers replevining goods, and then keeping them standing in that position for a year. These cases have occurred, particularly in Montreal.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). In the right of replevin, the officer gets the condemnation. There is great doubt whether a replevin applies at all. The 148th section seems to be entirely new. It says that action shall be brought against the Crown or any officer of customs until a decision has been first given either by the Minister of Customs or by a court of competent jurisdiction, in relation to the condemnation of the things seized. It seems to me that is rather cutting down the rights of the parties.

Mr. BOWELL. This amendment was made for the express purpose of facilitating the settlement of all these cases. When a seizure is so made a certain length of time is given for the Minister or the deputy to make his decision, but before that can be done, the goods have been, in many cases, replevined, and there they stand for a year, and you cannot touch them until that case is decided. This has been framed after a good deal of thought and consideration, as leading to the best and quickest possible mode of arriving at a decision.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). But by section 147, any action must be brought within three months: it is possible no condemnation will take place before that three months; therefore the parties in the action may be completely barred. I think that section ought to be left out. By the sub-section of section 148, you declare that no action shall be brought until adjudication by the Minister of Customs, or by a court of competent jurisdiction, as to the condemnation of the thing seized. The previous section 147 limits the time for bringing the action within three months, and possibly a condemnation might not be arrived at and the party would be deprived of his remedy.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The decision of the Minister will save it, "until a decision has been first given by the Minister of Customs, or by a court of competent jurisdiction."

Mr. WELDON (St. John). But no action shall be brought within that time.

Mr. BOWELL. I think you will find, when we reach a later section, that there is a time fixed for giving his decision, or a reasonable time. But if the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will let that stand for consideration.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I would suggest three months after the decision, or after it has been passed upon.

On section 32,

Mr. BOWELL. You strike out the words "for entry" and "to hold the vessel in case of penalties being put," the contention being by some parties that you can only collect from the officer who committed the offence, and while it makes that provision, it also says you may detain the vessel. But the contention is that though you may detain the vessel, you cannot compel the owners to pay the penalties. This is provide against that. Whenever a captain has committed to an offence which makes him liable to a penalty, you not only detain the vessel, but you compel the owners to pay. That was evidently the original intention of the law, or they would not have given power to the officers to retain the vessel.

On section 33,

Mr. BOWELL. The present Civil Service Act confines the administering of the oath of allegiance to certain officers and officials in Ottawa. The object of this is to give inspectors of customs and certain other officials the power to do that which they formerly had power to do, that is, to administer the oath of allegiance and the oath of office to any new officer that may be appointed, without having to come to Ottawa to do it.

On section 34,

Mr. BOWELL. This gives power to the Minister in case of any dispute, as with the party who has been fined, that instead of waiting for them to commence the investigation, you may transfer it at once to the courts.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). What is the difference between this and the old clause, as regards production of books and papers in case of seizure of goods?

Mr. BOWELL. Only that the three years' limitation is abolished. You can now seize for duties for any time. Many were confounding the collection of duties with penalties which have been imposed, which were limited to three years. By the provision of this section of the old Act, power is given to customs officers to examine the books of an importer respecting importations made within the three years next preceding the date of the seizure made by him. It is proposed to strike out this limitation.

Mr. WELDON. Then you will be able to go back any number of years?

Mr. BOWELL. Not unless there is reason to believe that there has been improper dealing.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Then the officers would be able to expose a man's business for any number of years?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, as can be done at the present time for three years. Suppose it is known that a man has been smuggling for ten years, why should he be exempted for seven years' fraud? That is really the point for the committee to decide—whether a man not having been caught for the three years is to be held to be innocent because the crime was committed three years before the time the fraud was discovered. The discovery may not take place for three years. It may be discovered, as has been done, that frauds have been continually perpetrated by importers for years and years. Under the present law, although his books may give evidence showing that he has committed those frauds, the Department can only secure penalties for three years.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Has there not been a great deal of trouble in the United States respecting a provision of this character, and has it not been repealed there?

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman may be right; we have no knowledge of it.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). In the United States that power was exercised very harshly, and was attended by very serious consequences. It is a very harsh clause. There should be a limitation of some kind. This clause is giving very dictatorial power on very slender evidence.

Mr. BOWELL. The whole Customs Act is of a very dictatorial character, and it is only on information that custom house officers can act. Action is very often taken in this way: An importer has a manager or foreman who quarrels with his employer. Thereupon the employé enters a complaint with the customs against his employer, whom he accuses of being engaged in smuggling, and he gives such evidence of the fact as to justify the officers in entering his establishment and making a seizure.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). No doubt this Act is in the interest of the honest importer, but, at the same time, it gives great power to inflict annoyance and take action of an inquisitorial character that can be made very offensive. We know that it sometimes happens that an importer is subject to a pique on the part of some one who sends notice to the Customs Department that he has reason to believe that the importer is smuggling. On the faith of that statement the officer walks into the man's business premises and demands to have his whole business exposed for years. That is a most improper authority to give to any one, except under the most extraordinary circumstances. I am quite willing that the law should be of a nature to protect the honest importer, but this provision opens the door to a great deal of annoyance, and an honest importer may be annoyed by a man walking in and saying: I believe you are smuggling, and I demand to see your books and papers. Under this clause the importer, under a penalty of $5,000 will be obliged to expose his business. Advantage may be taken of this by another man who wants to obtain knowledge of his business. Customs officers are not always above suspicion, and if a man wanted to obtain knowledge of his neighbor's business he could send to the customs officers a complaint that his neighbor was smuggling. His friend could thereupon examine the books and report as to where purchases were made and the rates paid. That is an authority which the hon. gentleman should not ask the committee to grant. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman, or any hon. gentleman responsible to this House, going himself to any importer and making an examination of the books; but to send every Tom, Dick and Harry that belongs to the department is, I think, asking too much. This clause can be, no doubt, operated so as to be very offensive indeed.

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Are there any departmental regulations which would prevent a party who undertook to make an inspection of another man's business for the purpose of reporting to anyone else? Are the officers under an obligation to maintain secrecy?

Mr. BOWELL. Under the rules of the department any officer giving information subjects himself to dismissal. One of the complaints against the officers, is in the large cities and other places because they will not tell and have not told, and they have been accused of entering into collusion with merchants and others to take a certain sum and hush the matter up. But those people wanted the whole thing published in the papers. I have never known a case in the last ten years similar to that suggested by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). His whole argument applies just as strongly to the three years' limit as to the ten years' limit. He will also understand that unless this power be given to customs officials—this work is not done by every Tom, Dick and Harry, but is done by responsible officers—you cannot reach cases of men who have been committing smuggling frauds that have only recently been discovered unless you can go back for some years. Take the cases which occurred in Montreal, in which it was declared that the importers had been systematically entering goods under false invoices; that they had been numbering their cases improperly, and that they would conceal one case containing very valuable goods while the other case which they had contained goods of very little value and, consequently, a lower rate of duty. We only found out the extent of the frauds by going to their establishment and demanding to see their books. It transpired there was an invoice upon which the entry had been made, and the entry in their books showed that they had paid a much larger sum for their goods, and it also proved that while they had entered and paid duty on one class of goods, they had actually purchased from an exporter in the other country goods of a much more valuable class and higher duty. If you eliminate that from the Act, there is no safety at all for the honest importers. In one case where parties in Montreal paid over $32,000, the frauds were only reached by the means which I have pointed out. Experience told them, and their lawyers probably advised them, so, instead of giving up their books, we have reason to know they burned them, and the only penalty we could inflict on that person was a penalty of a thousand dollars. It was impossible to reach the frauds or the extent of them, because we could not have got their books. It is true I might have sent an officer to England or the great markets of the world where they bought their goods in order to find out the quantity and quality of the goods, they were purchasing. Suppose I had sent to Manchester, and an officer went into an establishment, even accredited from the Government, the exporter might very properly have said: "It is none of your business, sir, walk out;" as they do sometimes. In other cases they gave us their books as they have done in New York, when it was shown they had sent goods to people in this country who were enabled by defrauding the customs to sell goods at half their value. This clause is only giving the Government power to send customs officers to demand their books, and if they try to prevent investigation to deal more severely with them.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I admit it is in the interests of the honest importer if properly carried out, but at the same time it opens the door to a good deal of annoyance.

Mr. BOWELL. So it does.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I know of cases within my own knowledge where an intimation was given of a certain vessel having goods on board which were not reported, and merely to annoy the owner of that ship the customs officer examined her and nothing was found on board. The same principle would apply to any person having a large amount of goods in his store, and he would have to allow this officer to have knowledge of all his transactions for a number of years. I have it on authority that in many cases those officers do not exercise their power very judiciously or very impartially. I may be wrong, but I have heard that officers from the Minister of Customs' Department have been through our own Province and they have shown a remarkable avoidance of certain business premises in the country that were known to be more in sympathy with the views of the Government of the day, and they always scented out with an extraordinary amount of readiness and activity prominent business places conducted by gentlemen who did not sympathise with them. Now, this is one of the difficulties. I admit if the law was honestly carried out it would be all right, but it opens the door for such an inquisitorial interference with the honest trader and the business generally that it would be very objectionable and looked upon with very great disfavor by the commercial community generally.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). The argument of the Minister of Customs seems irresistible, but suppose we confine the power to customs officers of the port alone. Here you say: "to any officer of customs." This would give the power to an understrapper, which he might exercise arbitrarily, and I suppose the intention of the Government is to confine it to a responsible officer.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes. It says: "or any other proper officer of customs."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). Suppose you confine it to the customs collector himself.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). In the first line of that clause, section 85, would it not be better to make it read "Whenever information has been given under oath."

Mr. BOWELL. I have no objection to that; let it be so. In order to meet the objection made by my hon. friend from St. John's (Mr. Weldon) I will confine the time to five years, and make it read, "And of all goods imported into Canada by him at any time within five years preceding such request or seizure." There are two or three other verbal corrections which I would make in that clause, such as changing the word "and" on the sixth line to "or," and make it read "either the exporter or the owner." There is an objection to making the officer the collector of customs alone, because the officer who discovers the fraud might be 20 or 30 miles away from the port in charge and the goods might be removed before the collector could act. We have found in our experience of sending a man from Ottawa, the moment that he is known to be an officer in any port they are on the qui vive at once, and sometimes even the officers of the port will frustrate his action, because they conceive that if he succeeds that it is a reflection on them. It is absolutely necessary in order to catch smugglers, for a stranger to go to a port and wait there sometimes two or three weeks before the parties are discovered.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). As it stands now a tide-waiter who is not responsible might demand the books.

Mr. BOWELL. We never do that.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). He has the power to demand the books.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, but the man sent is a man who occupies some position in the customs, and who knows what his duties are.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The objection is not to the seizure, it is to the demanding of the books by an inferior officer.

Mr. BOWELL. I understand that. The amended section 186 fixes the penalty for refusing to give up the books at from $1,000 to $5,000. The law of the United States is that if the party refuses to give up the books, that is prima facie evidence of his guilt, and in case of a suit the decision is given accordingly. If it is alleged that a person has smuggled goods and there is no means of ascertaining the facts except by his books and he refuses to give up his books on an order of the court, we also provide that that shall be taken as prima facie evidence of his guilt.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The order of the court should not be taken unless the party has an opportunity of being heard. The books might be destroyed so that he might not be able to produce them.

Mr. BOWELL. This is a case we want to meet. I have in my mind a case that occurred in Montreal, in which, just as soon as the importer consulted his lawyer—I do not know that his lawyer advised him to do so—the books were burned, and we could not reach them. Therefore we thought it better, after a great deal of consideration, to adopt the American system in this respect. If a man is innocent, he will give up his books, and I think it will be in the discretion of the court to say whether his excuse is sufficient or not.

On section 35,

Mr. BOWELL. This amends section 192 so as to make a party guilty of smuggling or of an attempt to defraud subject to a penalty equal to the value of the goods. The Act as it exists provides for the forfeiture of the goods, which would be sufficient if the goods were found; but when they are not found, the party escapes after conviction with a penalty of from $50 to $200, as the magistrate may decide; but practically it is only $50, for the sympathy, I am sorry to say, is with the smuggler and not with the Government, whereas the goods might be ten times that value.

On section 38,

Mr. BOWELL. This section provides that in cases where smuggled goods have been disposed of or are beyond the reach of seizure, the penalty for concealing them, &c., is the same as for smuggling, as provided in section 192. At present, the penalty for being an accessory is four times that of being a principal.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Why omit the word "knowingly?" You should make it "knowingly harbor, conceal, &c."

Mr. BOWELL. I will add that word.

On section 39,

Mr. BOWELL. The intention of this amendment is to make part of the offence any misdescription of goods in the invoice. At present the law only refers to misstatement of values, and frauds are frequently perpetrated by giving goods a name by which they can be entered free or at a lower rate than if they were properly named.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I brought before the hon. gentleman last year a case on which the goods were entered under a different name. Did the law not cover that case?

Mr. BOWELL. Not clearly. Of course we could call it a fraud, but a great deal of technical objections were raised by legal gentlemen. Parties have imported dye stuffs, per-citrate, as free, but the extract per-citrate or ground per-citrate is dutiable at 20 per cent. We have discovered, after seeing the correspondence, that these parties instructed the merchants in the foreign markets to invoice the goods simply as per-citrate; and to ascertain whether it was ground or the other, every barrel would have to be opened.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). In the case I brought up, there was clear misrepresentation. Would this be a convenient time to ask what was done in that case?

Mr. BOWELL. If you will give me the case and the name, I will let you know what was done.

On section 41,

Mr. BOWELL. This strikes out the name of the province, which I was advised was unnecessary and only encumbered the Act.

On section 44,

Mr. BOWELL. The clause in the old Act is obsolete and has never been acted on, and we have substituted this in its place to define what is meant by the commencement of an action, suit or proceeding. Under the Act differences of opinion have arisen. Strange to say, there are four or five different opinions as to when the time commences before the beginning of an action. Some eminent lawyers contend that the time begins to run the moment the offence is committed; others contend that is not until the discovery of the fraud has been made, while we have always acted upon the view that the time begins to run from the time the decision has been made by the Department, and this is to declare exactly when it does commence to run.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). That is in regard to any suit of the Crown under the Act?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

On section 45,

Mr. BOWELL. That defines the time within which proceedings must be commenced.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does not that conflict with the six years' provision which has been already made?

Mr. BOWELL. No, that is only in regard to books.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But supposing there was a seizure under that? It seems to me that this provision with conflict with the other.

Mr. BOWELL. The Minister of Justice tells me that it does not interfere at all.

On section 47,

Mr. BOWELL. This clause is simply to make the law as it now stands upon the Statute-book applicable to railways as well as to steamboats and vessels. There was no provision in the law applicable to railways, strange as it may appear.

Mr. BOWELL.

On section 48,

Mr. BOWELL. There is no provision in the law as it stands for disposing of the surplus.

On section 49,

Mr. BOWELL. I move to strike out of that repealing clause section 117, which is not repealed.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I should like to ask under what authority the Government claim the right by Order in Council to vary the duties or classify the duties on different articles from time to time. We frequently see an Order in Council issued changing the duties or fixing the duties on certain classes of goods. On more than one occasion, I heard that, when articles have been imported and admitted at a certain rate, when it was found that they rather interfered with some manufacturing interests—

Mr. BOWELL. Do not put it in that way.

Mr. JONES. I am well aware of that by the representations which have been made.

Mr. BOWELL. They are not always true.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). In those cases, I have found that they have been changed. Have the Government any authority to do this by Order in Council under the Customs Act or under any special Act?

Mr. BOWELL. It often occurs that an article is imported, and sometimes the appraiser and sometimes the collector will rule the article under a certain clause of the tariff. When the entries are sent to the Department the check clerks often discover that the goods have been improperly entered, and these are, I think, the cases to which my hon. friend refers. The ninth section of the Customs Act provides that:

"Whenever any dispute arises as to whether any or what duty is payable on particular goods, and there is no previous decision in the matter by any competent tribunal, or there are decisions inconsistent with each other, the Governor in Council may declare the duty payable on the kind of goods in question or that such goods are exempt from duty; and any Order in Council containing such declaration and fixing such duty, if any, and published in the Canada Gazette, shall have the effect of law."

That provision is only taken advantage of when disputes arise as to the proper classification of goods, and the proper rate of duty to be levied upon them. There is another clause, however, which gives power to the Governor in Council to put articles on the free list which are used in the manufacture of other articles.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I do not object to that so much, because it is a relief from taxation. Perhaps it is not exactly in accordance with constitutional government to vest that authority in the Executive; still, we never complain when they relieve us from the burden of taxation, but, when, as is often the case, the duties are indirectly increased by an Order in Council, putting articles under different headings from those under which they have been previously admitted, it seems to me that the Government practically assume the functions of this Parliament to declare what duties shall be levied on those articles.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Government must construe the law if a question arises as to what the duty is.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). We have not, I think, that implicit confidence in the Government which would lead us to believe that they will always rightly construe the law.

Mr. BOWELL. I suppose that will occur, no matter what Government is in power.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That Act has been in operation now for several years, and still we constantly find Orders in Council passed placing goods under different heads, and I think the Government should have had sufficient time to decide as to what heads these articles ought to be placed under before this period.

Mr. BOWELL. My hon. friend forgets that the tariff has been changed every year since 1873, except this year, and consequently the difficulties which he refers to are constantly occurring under every new tariff. We have those difficulties now under certain classes of iron. After we thought we had taken every possible precaution to define what scrap iron was, we have now different importers and manufacturers giving different interpretations as to what scrap iron is. There is another clause of the Customs Act which provides:

"If an article is enumerated in the tariff under two or more names or descriptions, and there is a difference of duty, the highest duty provided shall be charged and collected thereon."

Some collectors may impose the lower duty, and then our attention is brought to that by a manufacturer or an importer. Because when an importer has been charged the higher duty, and we learn that at another port his goods have been admitted at a lower duty, our attention is called to it, and then upon investigation, if we find the higher duty the correct one, we have so to rule. Those are the only cases in which duties, as the hon. gentleman says, may have been apparently increased, but they are not really increased.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I pointed out last year that certain dealers in agricultural implements found that they could get them from Montreal by rail to Halifax cheaper than they could import them from the United States direct. I am not sure whether that is still going on, but up to that time it had been going on for a number of years. Will the hon. gentleman look into it?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, we are constantly looking into cases of that kind; there is scarcely a month that these complaints do not come to our department. They arise, I dare say, much from the fact of the great number of ports in the country, and the diversity of ideas that collectors have as to the proper ruling upon articles which are imported. Then again it arises in this way: that a man may be importing into one small port an article at a very large undervaluation, and that would enable him, until it was found out, to do precisely what the hon. gentleman says.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). This applies to a large port like Montreal. There were two cases that I mentioned to the hon. gentleman last year. The difference was so glaring that these goods could be imported in Montreal and sold in Halifax, paying all the expense over the Intercolonial Railway, at a lower rate than they could be imported to Halifax direct from the United States. This shows there was something wrong in Montreal.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There is difficulty here. In the 185th section we extend the limits, and on explanation of the hon. Minister, we gave power to a person to examine the books, originally to go back any length of time—the hon. Minister has limited to six years the time within which he can examine the books of any importers who have entered. Well, what is the object in looking through a man's books for six years unless it is to discover the frauds committed during those six years?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, that is the meaning.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Well, he is not going to look through those books for fun, simply to ascertain whether the man did what was wrong or not. If you look back for six years, if it is thought that at any time during those six years a fraud has been committed, and that it will institute a suit to recover—is that the idea? Well, if I understand that section 240 that you passed a minute ago, it says:

"All seizures, prosecutions, or suits for the recovery or enforcement of any of the penalties or forfeitures imposed by this Act, or any other law relating to the Customs, may be made or commenced at any time within three years after the offence was committed, or the cause of prosecution or suit arose, but not afterwards."

The difficulty I see is this: What is the use of looking through a man's books six years back to find frauds if you pass another Act declaring that the time is limited to three years within which an action will be brought?

Mr. BOWELL. I think that you will find that the 185th clause relates almost exclusively to payment of duties, while the three years' clause refers only to penalties which have been imposed.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think you are wrong, but it is your own Bill.

Mr. BOWELL. That is what I am informed. If we find, as the hon. gentleman says, that there is a conflict, we will look at it, and I will ask to go back into committee so as to rectify it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the Minister to look at section 5 again. I am certain, as it now stands, that it would not bear the construction that he puts upon it. I am referring to his substituted section. From the explanation the Minister gave, he proposed to impose a duty of 10 per cent. on the ad valorem duty of goods; but that is not what the clause says as it stands. It is 10 per cent. on the duty according to the ad valorem value.

Mr. BOWELL. No, it is not the intention to impose 10 per cent. on the value of the goods, the intention is to impose 10 per cent. upon the duty.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, but the hon. gentleman, when he was giving the information, mentioned a case where there was $450 charged, and where they valued the goods, as fixed by the customs, at $600. He said there 10 per cent. would be $60. Now, as this reads, 10 per cent. would be $18, that is, it would be 10 per cent. on the ad valorem duty. The ad valorem duty is $180, and 10 per cent. on that is $18. But 10 per cent. on the value of the goods would be $60, and that is not what the clause says. Now, the hon. gentleman, under this clause, could not collect $60, but only $18.

Mr. THOMPSON. But the ad valorem duty of the goods would be the whole $180, because the value is $600. In addition to that, a sum equal to the same percentage of the whole ad valorem duty is usually payable as the percentage of the under-valuation in the original bill of entry. The original bill was $140, and it was deficient by $150. Now, as $450 is to $150, so is the sum which he paid to the additional sum he would have to pay by this, and that would amount, I think, to $60.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It would amount to $45.

Mr. BOWELL. The principle upon which this clause is based is this: That if the goods be entered at 10 per cent. under the correct value, then the penalty is 10 per cent. duty in addition; if, as in the case referred to by my hon. friend, it was $150, that would be 33⅓ per cent. under value, and that would be the proportion, not 10 per cent. of the whole. The penalty is not 10 per cent. upon every undervaluation. If it is 50 per cent., then it would carry with it 50 per cent. of the duty.

Mr. THOMPSON. In that particular case the goods were undervalued by 33 per cent., then there will be 33 per cent added to the actual duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We will take the illustration the hon. member gave. Goods are introduced at $450, which are worth $600. These goods bear 30 per cent. duty. In that case, would the result be this, that the party would have to pay 30 per cent. on the $150, which is $45, and 33⅓ per cent. on the $45, making $60.

Mr. THOMPSON. He would have to pay the whole $180 and the $45 besides. It is 30 per cent. on the $600.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A large portion of the $180 has been paid in the first instance.

Mr. THOMPSON. He has only to make up the difference and the fine of $45.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The fine will be levied, $45, on the whole $180 he had to pay, not on the difference between the duty.

Mr. BOWELL. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not understand the clause in that way. I thought the fine of 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. was on the surplus duty, not on the whole amount of duty. As I now understand it, it is on the whole amount of duty.

Mr. BOWELL. In order to avoid detaining the committee I propose to strike out section 4.

Committee reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the Minister of Finance propose to proceed on Tuesday next with the Budget speech?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I may remind the hon. gentleman that when I mentioned it would be very desirable to have the Supplementary Estimates down, he expressed his intention, as I understood him, of bringing them down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope to have laid them on the Table when the House meets on Monday.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11:20 p.m.

Printed by MCLISA, ROGER & Co., Parliamentary Printers, Wellington Street, Ottawa.

House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Monday, April 23, 1888.

No. 40.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 23rd April, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, which was as follows:

LANDSDOWNE.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Supplementary Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion, for the year ending 30th June, 1888; and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," he recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

OTTAWA, April, 1888.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that said Supplementary Estimates be referred to Committee on Supply.

Motion agreed to.

THE LATE HON. THOMAS WHITE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I expected that my hon. friend and leader, the First Minister, would have been able to announce, as he wished to have done, the death of our worthy colleague, the Hon. Thomas White, Minister of the Interior. His death was entirely unexpected, and is a terrible blow to his colleagues, and especially to the First Minister, whose intimate friend he was. I have no doubt that hon. members on both sides of the House sympathise with the bereaved family, and deplore with us the great loss which this House has met with in the death of Mr. White, and that the country has sustained by being deprived of his services. Mr. White, for many years, had been an active member of the press, and in that capacity had rendered great services to his country, and especially to his party. He was a good writer, but he was also a good friend, and although he fought his opponents vigorously, he was nevertheless always ready afterwards to shake hands with them; and he was always careful so to conduct his controversies with them that he could afterwards be their friend again. I must say that during the last ten or eleven years that he has occupied a seat in this House, my friend, Mr. White, showed that he was worthy of his position, worthy to occupy a seat in this House; and when, at the suggestion of, and on the selection of, the First Minister, he was called to take a place in the Government, I know that on our side of the House, everybody applauded the choice, and his opponents likewise recognised that he was worthy of a seat alongside the other members of the Cabinet. Mr. White has lost his life in the service of his country. He was entirely devoted to his duties, and in order the better to be able to fulfil them faithfully and well, he visited the North-West twice, if I remember aright, and undertook a long voyage through that country in order to make himself perfectly acquainted with the needs and circumstances of that vast region the affairs of which he had to administer. He made himself perfectly au fait with the wants of that country, and during the last year or so, he was in a position to render those services that were expected of him, when, in the midst of his great labors, he has been taken away, and thus leaves a great void in the Government of the country. I have no doubt that the country at large will mourn his loss, and will say with us that a good and able man has disappeared from our midst. Of course, it is not for me to dwell upon the consequences of this loss, or upon the lesson which this sad event teaches us; but let me say, at all events, that he has passed away, leaving, I hope, not one single enemy in this House, or even outside the House. I have no doubt that although his opponents, and our opponents, found that he was sometimes a very formidable adversary, on the other hand they will recognise that he always tried to avoid such expressions as might wound their feelings. For myself, at all events, the lesson I drew from his example is, that we must always remember that though we are called here to perform a duty, nevertheless we must be lenient towards others if we would have others lenient towards us in the performance of our duties. Mr. Speaker, my friend, the First Minister, will move that this House, when it adjourns to-day, will stand adjourned until Wednesday at three o'clock in the afternoon. The reason for this adjournment is that the funeral will leave the house of the deceased to-morrow morning at nine o'clock, and a special train will leave the Canada Atlantic Station at 9:30 for Montreal, for the convenience of the family, of members of both Houses, the heads of departments, the officers of his own department, the press, and some other officials. The train will return to Ottawa the same afternoon, leaving Montreal at an hour which will be announced to the passengers on the train during the course of the voyage. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. In seconding the motion, I can scarcely find words to give expression to the very sad emotions which this occasion arouses. Engaged as we are in daily strife, divided as we are in aims and purposes, struggling as we are every day, and sometimes bitterly struggling for our own convictions, we are too apt to forget, what we readily realise to-day, that after all there is an universality about us; and when a man of Mr. White's eminence is removed from amongst us we all individually feel that we have suffered a loss, and perhaps for the first time we can see the full measure of the man's worth. It is, however, a misfortune of our nature that we never appreciate fully what we have until we have lost it, and this feeling comes forcibly to me to-day. In Mr. White's death the whole nation has suffered a great loss, but I realise and understand that to his friends the blow must seem almost unbearable. His untiring energy and industry, his vast and wide knowledge of all political questions, his aptitude for business, his great administrative ability, his skill in debate, his eloquence, all were the happy combination of varied qualities which made him a tower of strength to those with whom he was associated, and we on this side of the House can never forget, as has been said by the Minister of Public Works, that upon all occasions, whether on the floor of Parliament or whether in his department as an executive officer of the Crown, he was always civil, courteous and obliging. But I am sure that great as the blow must be to the country at large, to his party and to his family, there is no one who feels it more deeply than the veteran Premier. We all can sympathise with him, and we do sympathise with him now, and much as we may differ from him in politics on various questions we all understand that at his time of life the death of a long trusted friend must deal a severe blow. Death with us has been of late unusually cruel, Mr. White is the ninth of our colleagues we have lost since last elections. Death has been unsparing, striking alike on all ages and stations, and this last blow coming as it does so suddenly and so unexpectedly after so many others, recalls very forcibly the words of Burke, "What shadows we are and what shadows we pursue."

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, we meet to-day under circumstances different perhaps from any which have ever marked the assembling of the representatives of the people—the death of a Minister of the Crown during a Session of Parliament—the occasion, Sir, hushes all party strife and a feeling of profound sorrow fills every heart in this Chamber. As a companion of the boyhood days of the deceased Minister and a close and warm friend of maturer years, it is becoming that I should say a few words on this sad occasion. Not only as the head of an important department had our deceased friend rendered most valuable service to his country, but he for thirty years and more before he entered Parliament had been a leader in everything which tended to Canada's prosperity. Full of energy and high sense of right, he had administered the important Department of the Interior in such a way as to secure the confidence of the people of our great North-West and British Columbia. He faced every obstacle which beset him with sagacity and ability. He appreciated the needs of those great sections of our country and he met them, inspiring the people with hope in their great future. Had his valuable life been spared it is impossible to predict how great would have been the results of his administration of the department. When he assumed the duties of the office he had mountains of difficulties to encounter, but he overcame them all and secured the grateful appreciation of those who were the most interested. I know, Sir, that hon. gentlemen who represent Manitoba and the North-West Territories and British Columbia will sustain me in this statement. We often fail in the bustle of life fully to recognise the merits of men until we lose them. It is so in this case. We shall all miss our deceased friend—miss his pleasant recognition and the hailing him by his familiar name. He was a man of talent and of truth, dealing with all questions in a spirit of equity and good judgment, inspiring the settlers with fresh courage, and as a Minister of the Crown ever most painstaking with the representatives whom the people sent here to look after their interest. In the adjudication of all matters brought before him, he did not "hew to the line," but met them in a spirit of concession. No man, Sir, I venture to say, has contributed so much to the prosperity of the North-West and our territory on the Pacific, present and prospective, as the Minister who has been called to his rest. Mr. Speaker, he was my friend. I knew him as perhaps few in this House did; he was always a true friend. The elevation to office made no change in him—a great man and one to whom the country looked for many years of still greater public usefulness has passed away at an age when it may be said he was in his prime. Truly, Sir, "his sun has set while it was yet day." Those of us who were permitted to enjoy his society in his happy home, surrounded by those among whom there was such mutual love, and of whom he was so proud, will not soon forget it. Full of manliness he was tender as a woman. We shall not again see his face or listen to his persuasive eloquence, but it will be long before the brilliant ability of Thomas White as a Minister of the Crown and the beauty of his whole character will be forgotten either by this House or the country.

"Death has moulded into calm completion
The statue of his life."

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 3:30 p.m., until Wednesday, 25th inst., at three o'clock, p.m.

Printed by McLEAN, ROGER & Co., Parliamentary Printers, Wellington Street, Ottawa.

House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Wednesday, April 25, 1888.

No. 41.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 25th April, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BANK OF LONDON.

Mr. MILLS moved;

That the report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce relating to the Bill for winding up the affairs of the Bank of London be not now concurred in, but be referred back to the Committee with instructions to consider the Bill as soon as the shareholders of the bank have signified by resolution, at a special meeting called for the purpose, that they desire the proposed legislation.

Mr. HALL. The report that has been submitted shows that the committee declined to consider the Bill on the ground solely that the shareholders of the institution have not been consulted. As the motion which has been submitted recognises the necessity of such a consultation and is based upon it, there can be no objection to the second reference even by those who have opposed the consideration of the Bill already.

Motion agreed to.

ADVERTISING COUNTERFEIT MONEY.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 108) respecting the advertising of counterfeit money. He said: As the name of this Bill signifies, it is desired to attach penalties to the advertising of counterfeit money.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CARE AND REFORMATION OF NEGLECTED CHILDREN.

Mr. O'BRIEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 109) to provide for the care and reformation of children neglected or ill-treated by parents or guardians. He said: This Bill is brought in at the instance of the Humane Society of Toronto, and its object is to provide means whereby children neglected or ill-treated by parents or guardians may be brought before certain magistrates and by them admitted to institutions suitable for the reformation and care of such children. The Bill, so far as the first two clauses are concerned, is similar to the Bill already passed by the Ontario Legislature. The other clauses go a good deal further than that measure does. I have to admit at the outset that this Bill travels on that very narrow debatable ground lying between the civil jurisdiction of the Provinces and the criminal law as administered by the Dominion. Hon. gentlemen are aware that in regard to a Factory Act there is great difficulty in the way of that legislation, and it is very possible that one or two of the clauses in this Bill may necessarily be struck out on the ground of there being no jurisdiction. However, it is not proposed to go further with this measure, as there is no time to give it full consideration; but I bring it before the House that those hon. gentlemen who feel interested in it may have an opportunity of considering it, and at a later period the subject will be brought forward. It is a subject which may be considered upon its merits, as one entitled to the fullest consideration of all those who desire that the class of persons referred to shall have every protection the law can give them and every means by which they can be rescued from temptation, and enabled to be brought up in a condition of life which may be beneficial to themselves and to their fellow subjects.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 110) further to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act, chapter 135 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. He said: This is a Bill on which I shall ask special action on the part of the House. A few weeks ago Mr. Justice Taschereau of the Supreme Court asked leave of absence for reasons which appeared to be quite sufficient at the time, and very shortly afterwards another of the judges became incapacitated by illness. The result is that only four judges remain to perform the duties which begin on Tuesday next in connection with the May term of the court. I understand the docket of the term is a long one, and it is very undesirable that the term should be passed over and the cases thus go into arrear. The present provision of the statute is that five judges shall form a quorum, and inasmuch as only four are available the term of the court must govern unless it is the pleasure of the House to pass this Bill, and to pass it without reference to the procedure which governs Bills in ordinary cases. This has been done occasionally in cases of emergency, and in asking leave to introduce the Bill, I will ask to have it expedited through its several stages to-day in order that it may be finally passed and sent to the Senate. The reason why I ask permission to proceed with it so urgently is that a number of practitioners in different parts of the Dominion desire to know this before they leave their homes for the term, and they desire to know whether the courts will be postponed or proceeded with. The Bill will contain one section only:

"Any five, or in the case of the illness, absence on leave, or any incapacity or the death of any judge, any four of the judges of the Supreme Court shall constitute a quorum, and may lawfully hold the court: Provided, however, that in such latter case, in the event of the judges being equally divided as to their decision upon any cause or matter heard before the court, there shall be a rehearing of such cause or matter before a court comprised of at least five judges; and provided also, that it shall not be necessary for all the judges who have heard the argument in any case to be present in order to constitute the court for delivery of judgment in such case, but in the absence of any judge, from illness or any other cause, judgment may be delivered by a majority of the judges who were present at the hearing; and any judge who has heard the case and is absent at the delivery of judgment may hand his opinion in writing to any judge present at the delivery of judgment, to be read or announced in open court, and then to be left with the registrar or reporter of the court; and in such case it shall not be necessary for a quorum to be present at the delivery of such judgment."

And so on, as in the present section. The only new provision being that in the case of urgency which I have mentioned four judges shall constitute a quorum, and that in the event of their being equally divided it shall be argued again before the full court.

Mr. LAUBIER. The first reading, of course, may very well take place to-day, but I do not think the hon. gentleman should ask us to take any further stages. This is a very important Bill, and I am sure that the principle of it may be found very objectionable in many ways. I do not mean to say that it would negative the Bill altogether, but before we take this very important step it is nothing but fair that we should have an opportunity to read the Bill, and then if we can favorably consider the Bill we will do what we can to expedite business. I think that we should have an opportunity to consider the Bill and that it must take its usual course. I trust that the Bill will be printed and distributed at once.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN. In Quebec matters are managed differently. When a judge is unable to preside another judge is appointed to his place temporarily. It may be well for the Government to consider this.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 111) to provide for the crossing of railways by streets, drains and water mains.—(Mr. Lister.)

IMMIGRANTS TO CANADA.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, 1. Whether the attention of the Government has been called to the fact that a considerable number of the immigrants who have landed in Canada, of late years, have been necessitous persons, unfit for settlers, and that these parties have frequently become permanent charges on the charity of the people of Canada?

Mr. CARLING. 1. The attention of the Government has been directed to the character of the immigration to Canada, and it has been found that the numbers of the unsuitable are very small, being only a fractional percentage of the whole, and have not been of a nature to call for any exceptional measures.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If so, what precautions? Will the hon. gentleman state that?

Mr. CARLING. The precautions taken by our agents in Liverpool, who are in attendance on the sailing of vessels and at the purchase of tickets, to prevent unsuitable immigrants being sent by those vessels.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked further, 2. Whether the Government have taken any precautions to prevent such necessitous and unfit persons being landed in Canada? And if so, what precautions? 3. Have any such persons been sent back to the countries from which they came? And if so, how many? 4. Is it in the power of the Government to inflict any penalties, and if so, what penalties on any steamship company, or other persons, bringing such people into Canada? 5. If in their own opinion Government do not possess adequate powers to prevent and punish the importation of such persons into Canada, is it their intention to ask Parliament for further powers during the present Session?

Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. CARLING. 2. The Government has taken precautions to prevent the sailing of persons who would be unsuitable for settlement in Canada. 3. The answer to this question is substantially the same as that made to question 1. 4. The Government can exact a duty in the nature of a penalty if a vessel arrives without having observed the necessary sanitary measures, and also in addition to the duty, a bond of $200, with sureties, for each lunatic passenger. 5. The Government has power, by proclamation, to take any steps necessary to prevent the landing of unsuitable persons, and sending them back at the ship's expense.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not understand the answer to question number four to be an answer to the question. As I understood the hon. Minister, he alluded to the case of steamships bringing diseased persons into Canada. He talked of sanitary precautions, and my question had reference to the case of the importation of persons unfit as immigrants to Canada.

THE VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. WELDON, St. John) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill to suspend the revision of the Voters' Lists, under the Franchise Act, during the present year?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is the intention of the Government to present such a measure.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND WHARVES AND PIERS.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, What official, if any, in Prince Edward Island, has charge of the Dominion Government wharves and piers in that Province? Is there any such official, what are his powers? Has he any authority to cause necessary repairs to be made from time to time?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. My department sent an engineer there when wanted to look after those piers and to report. Besides that, there are the wharfingers under the department of my friend the Minister of Marine, who also report if repairs are required. That is communicated to my department, so that any of those repairs may be made, and in this way we are fully cognizant of what is going on.

MR. A. P. SHERWOOD.

Mr. COOK asked, Is Mr. A. P. Sherwood still occupying the position of Chief of the Dominion Police? If so, are the Government aware that he is engaged as agent or attorney for certain contractors on the Cape Breton Railway? Has he obtained permission from the Government to engage in such business? Has a member of the inside Civil Service the right to engage in business connected with the building of Government railways, or otherwise?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. At the time the contract was taken out of the hands of Slater & Co., Mr. Sherwood was advised by the department that he could get leave of absence, which he did get for a few days, to go down to Cape Breton and ascertain just how matters stood in the interest of Mrs. Slater, the lady in whose hands the contract had remained, she having been surety for the contractors who had to put up the money. So it was in the interest of his family that he obtained leave of absence, to go and see how things were and report; Mrs. Slater is his mother-in-law.

Mr. COOK. The last part of the question is whether a member of the inside service has the right to engage in business of this kind?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He does not belong to the inside service.

QUAI PRÈS DE L'ISLE-AUX-NOIX.

M. BOURASSA: Le gouvernement se propose-t-il d'insérer une somme d'argent dans le budget supplémentaire, cette année, pour la construction d'un quai, au bout du chemin qui conduit à l'Île-aux-Noix, appelé "Chemin aux approches de l'Île-aux-Noix," en la paroisse de Saint-Valentin, comté de St-Jean, sur la rivière Richelieu, pour faciliter l'approche de l'Île-aux-Noix et le commerce des paroisses environnantes?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN: Je suis fâché de ne pouvoir donner une réponse soit affirmative ou négative à l'honorable député, sur cette question: Quand les estimés supplémentaires seront devant la Chambre, ils contiendront toutes les informations voulues.

ANALYSIS OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. CURRAN asked, Is it the intention of the Government to require inspectors under the Food Adulteration Act to subject to analysis intoxicating liquors publicly offered for sale, in conformity with the suggestions of the Temperance Association?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is the intention of the Government to require samples of intoxicating liquors to be subject to analysis.

MEDALS TO THE VETERANS OF 1866-70.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked, Has the Government had any communication with the Imperial Government with regard to the granting of medals to the veterans of 1866-70, in accordance with the promise made to a deputation from Montreal in 1887?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Communication has been had through His Excellency the Governor-General with the Imperial Government in reference to the granting of medals to the veterans of 1866-70, but no reply has yet been received.

MR. WILLIAM SHANNON'S DEFALCATIONS.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, Whether Government has paid or promised to pay any sums of money to any parties on account of Mr. Wm. Shannon's defalcations; and if so, what amount has been paid?

Mr. McLELAN. The Government has not paid, nor has it promised to pay.

INSPECTOR OF RANCHES.

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta) asked, What are the duties and salary of the Inspector of Ranches? What is allowed for expenses in addition to salary? How long has he held the office? What work has he done in connection with his office, and what (if any) reports has he made?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The inspector of ranches inspects such ranches as he is instructed to do from time to time by the Department of the Interior. He was appointed on the 1st of May, 1886. He receives a salary of $600 a year, and is allowed actual travelling expenses in addition. He has reported from time to time, but I am not in a position to give the exact number of the reports.

HEADQUARTERS OF MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to build police barracks at Edmonton and remove the headquarters of police in that district to same; if so, when?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Fort Saskatchewan, about 20 miles north-east of Edmonton, has been the headquarters of the police in that district since the organisation of the force in 1874. It is now under the consideration of the Government whether the headquarters of that division had not better be transferred to Edmonton.

ERRORS IN THE CIVIL SERVICE LIST.

Mr. DAVIN asked, 1. Whether there is not a typographical error in the Civil Service List of Canada, 1887, on page 129, second column, as to description of official position of Thomas Albert Scott, "2nd" being printed instead of "3rd;" and 2. Whether Robert Montgomery (line 10) has not been transferred from the Manitoba division to the Ottawa division, or some other outside Manitoba and the Territories?

Mr. McLELAN. There is a typographical error. Thomas Albert Scott is a third-class clerk, not a second-class clerk. Robert Montgomery has been removed from the Manitoba division to some other division. The railway mail clerks are not supposed to be confined to any one division, but are removable.

LOSS OF THE BARGE ORIENTAL.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Whether in view of the report of Inspector Risley, upon the loss of the barge Oriental, the Government have caused proceedings to be taken against the owners of such barge, or whether they intend to do so?

Mr. FOSTER. The papers in this question have been handed to the Minister of Justice, with the request that he take such action upon them as he deems proper to take in the premises.

PROTECTION OF SAILORS.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any legislation this Session to further protect sailors against wrecks or accidents, the result of vessels being unseaworthy?

Mr. FOSTER. The first page of the Order paper will be a sufficient answer to that question.

P. WATELET, EMIGRATION AGENT.

Mr. HOLTON asked, Whether P. Wateret is employed by Government, in Belgium, or elsewhere, as emigration agent, or in any other capacity? If so, what are his position and duties, and how are his services remunerated? How many immigrants have come to and settled in Canada through his agency during the past year? Is the Government aware that acting as a Canadian emigration agent, or pretending to be such, the said P. Wateret has very recently induced the removal from Belgium to Montreal of a number of artisans, under the promise and guarantee of immediate and profitable employment there; that since their arrival in Montreal a number of these men have not succeeded in obtaining employment, and that no effort has been made by him or by Government officials in that city to procure employment for them?

Mr. CARLING. This refers to Paul Watelet, not Wateret. He is not an agent of the Government, nor employed by it in any capacity. He is a steamship agent in Belgium, and is allowed the same commission as all other agents on the continent of Europe, for immigrants actually arriving in Manitoba, but not for any sent to any of the Provinces. The Government is not responsible for any immigrants he brings out, nor for any representations made by him. As a consequence, however, of some statements furnished to the department, an enquiry is now being instituted respecting some immigrants brought by him to Montreal.

SEIZURES IN BEHRING'S SEA.

Mr. GORDON moved for :

A return of all correspondence having reference to the seizure of Canadian vessels while engaged in the seal fisheries in Behring's Sea. He said : Mr. Speaker, this motion and the correspondence to which it refers are of too great importance to the people I represent to justify me in allowing the question to stand over any longer. My hon. friend who seconds the motion will deal particularly with the question involved, and other hon. gentlemen, I presume, will also discuss it. I am sure every hon. member here must be aware that the grossest injustice is inflicted on our fishermen who are in pursuit of what they consider to be their rights and interests in Behring's Sea. They want to know whether the rights of British subjects are to be as sacred in Behring's Sea as they are in the other great seas of the globe, or whether they are to be pursued by American cruisers and have their ships seized, towed into the ports of Alaska and confiscated, with their whole cargoes, and the captains and mates of their vessels sent to prison, and their crews, some of them sent to San Francisco to find their way back to British Columbia as best they can, and others allowed to coast 1,500 miles, reaching British Columbia in the greatest destitution. Circumstances of such a serious character as these are not to be allowed on my part to remain unnoticed. I am sure that the correspondence, if brought down, will show that this Government has taken every step in its power towards having those grievances redressed, and I have hope that the Imperial Government, through its jealous regard for the rights of its subjects in every part of the inhabited globe, will see that its distant subjects, pursuing their business in Behring's Sea, will have every care and protection.

Mr. PRIOR. I have great pleasure in rising to second the address of the hon. member for Vancouver, but I am sorry that, owing to indisposition, he has not been able to place the matter more fully before this House, because I am sure he could have done so more forcibly and more plainly than I can hope to do. This is a matter that deeply affects every man on Canadian soil, involving as it does the honor and credit of the whole country; but more especially does it affect the constituency that I have the honor to represent, as upon it has fallen, not only the indignities which have been offered, but also the heavy losses incident to the seizure of these vessels. As the territory of Alaska is one that is very little known, and as I, in common with other British Columbia members, claim that the representatives from other sections of this country in this House have equally with us a deep interest in this matter, and should assist us in endeavoring to obtain redress, I will give you, Sir, a short sketch of the country and of the events that have led up to the late outbreak. Alaska became a part of the Russian Empire in the year 1741, when the Russian traveller Behring first planted his country's flag on that portion of the North American continent, and gave his name to the sea, the jurisdiction over which is the question at present in dispute between the United States and the Dominion. During the next twenty years, the Russian ensign was planted over the whole of the Aleutian chain, from the Aleutian Islands to the mainland, many forts were established, and numerous trading enterprises founded, until the year 1772, when we find that no less than twenty-five different trading companies were engaged in catching seals that are so numerous in those waters. In 1779, a consolidation of these different trading companies took place, and a company was formed under the name of the Russian-American Trading Company; and in 1821, the Russian Government issued an ordinance regulating traffic in its Asiatic and American possessions, and reserving exclusively to its subjects :

Mr. CARLING.

"The transactions of commerce, the pursuit of whaling and fishing or any other industry in the islands, in the harbors and inlets and in general along the north-western coast of America from Behring Straits to the 51st parallel of north latitude, and in the Aleutian Islands and along the coast of Siberia and on the Kurile Islands from Behring Straits to the south-eastern promontory of the Island of Urup, viz., as far south as latitude 45° and 50° north."

This really meant that Russia claimed sovereign jurisdiction over these seas 100 miles from shore. Previous to the issuing of this edict, British and American sealers had been in the habit of pursuing their trade in those waters, and of course as soon as this ordinance was promulgated, both British and American companies protested most emphatically against the claim of the Russian Government. The United States Minister at St. Petersburg made use of these words in his protest :

"The existence of territorial rights to the distance of 100 miles from the coasts upon two opposite continents, and the prohibition of approaching to the same distance from these coasts, or from those of all the intervening islands, are innovations in the law of nations and measures unexampled."

Well, the evidence goes to show that after protracted discussion, the Treaty of 1825 was drawn up and signed, by which Russia gave up her claim to the sole jurisdiction in Behring Sea. The treaty between Russia and the United States contained the following agreement :

"That in any part of the great ocean commonly called the Pacific Ocean, the respective citizens, subjects of the high contracting powers, should be neither disturbed or restrained in navigation or fishing."

A similar treaty was made between Russia and Great Britain. In 1867, the year when Confederation took place, the United States bought the territory of Alaska from the Russians for the sum of $7,200,000; and just to show what a good bargain they made, I may say that at present, one gold mine in Alaska is yielding over $1,000,000 per annum to its fortunate owners. After the United States bought Alaska territory, a good deal of trouble was caused by the different nationalities trying to get hold of the valuable sea fisheries. Vessels came from Japan, Honolulu, Australia, San Francisco, and almost from every port of the world, and there was no end of trouble and dispute until at last the Americans found it was necessary to do something to keep order. They, therefore, in 1870, called for tenders for the exclusive rights of catching seals on the Islands of St. George and St. Paul; and after the tenders were opened, it was found that a company trading under the name of "the Alaska Commercial Company" was the successful tenderer. That company got a charter, dated the 1st May, 1870, for a period of twenty years, giving it exclusive rights to trading on these islands. A few years ago, its annual payment to the United States Government for its rights and privileges over these fisheries was $315,000, a sum sufficient to pay interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum on the whole purchase money which the United States gave for the territory, besides paying for the full cost of government of the territory. Under the Treaty of 1867, the Americans claimed jurisdiction over that part of Behring Sea, lying to the east of the westerly boundary of Alaska, which sea, in its widest part, is some 600 or 700 miles wide. Just to show how absurd this claim is, I will read to the House a portion of a despatch from Lord Lansdowne to Mr. Stanhope on the 29th November, 1886.

"The statements contained in the Report (i.e., the Report of the Privy Council) are sufficient to establish that the claim now put forward on the part of the United States to the sole right of taking fur-bearing animals within the limits laid down in the first article of the Treaty of 1867, is inconsistent with the rights secured to Great Britain under the convention of 1825, and is in substance the same as that which, when advanced by the Russian Government on occasions prior to the cession of Alaska by Russia to the United States, was either strenuously resisted or treated with ridicule and contempt by the Government of the latter power."

And again :

"Under the Treaty of 1867, Russia ceded to the United States all the rights, franchises and privileges then belonging to her in the territory or dominion included within the limits described, but could not cede a right which, in the express terms of the Treaty of 1825, was recognised as belonging to the subjects of the British Crown as well as to those of Russia."

You will therefore see that our neighbors across the line do not believe in the old adage that "what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander," because, when Russia claimed the right to those seas and the Americans wanted their vessels to go in, the United States protested most emphatically against the attempt to exclude them; but when the United States took over the rights which Russia had there, and Canadian sealers want to go into those seas, the boot is on the other leg. Relying on this preposterous claim, the United States vessels have seized our vessels, have imprisoned our crews and have confiscated our sealskins. They have been guilty of the greatest outrage which has ever been perpetrated by one civilised nation upon another. On the 1st August, 1886, three of our schooners were seized when they were plying their peaceful avocations on the high seas, not within the three-mile limit, but at distances varying from 139 miles to 68 miles from Ounalaska. The Carolina was seized at a distance of 139 miles, and the Onward and the Thornton at a distance of 68 miles from the coast. Not only did they seize these vessels, but the revenue cutter Corwin towed them to Sitka, the capital of the Territory of Alaska, and there the captains and mates were fined $300 and $200 respectively, and were also imprisoned, when they did not pay, for a long term. When they were let out of prison, they were turned out destitute. Some of them were taken to San Francisco, and turned adrift there, and had to make their way back to British Columbia as best they could. A few were taken to Nanaimo, but some were turned adrift destitute in Alaska. I cannot understand any more inhuman act than leaving these people destitute in that country. I was in those waters myself in 1874, and I know what a rugged and inhospitable country it is. There is no civilisation at all. There are no people there but savages. There is no language which I can make use of which is too strong to express the injustice which has been done to our people in this matter, which has crippled one of the most important industries on the Pacific coast, and has entailed great pecuniary loss on our citizens, because the three vessels and the skins they had on board when they were seized were worth $33,000, besides the indirect loss in consequence of their not being able to finish their season's catch. Last Session, certain documents were brought down to the House—all the documents that could be got up to that time in relation to the matter—and I am glad to say that they proved that the present Government have been fully alive to the gravity of the affair, and have done all in their power to get the Imperial Government to bring about a settlement with the United States, but no such settlement has been arrived at. In 1887, that is, last year, although negotiations were pending between the different Governments, the United States cutters again seized, in the same place, six more of our sealers, under the same circumstances, and they also seized eight of their own sealers—in fact they seized every vessel which was not under the control of the company which has the right to fish on those islands. It seems to me that this means that the United States Government would rather seize British vessels there and tramp on the British flag, and afterwards pay compensation and make apologies, than they would allow the Alaska Commercial Company to lose its hold on the seal fisheries in the Behring Sea. This company has only the right to these two islands.

I will only read the clause of the lease which refers to this point, which is as follows:—

"That the said Secretary hereby leases to the said Alaska Commercial Company, without power to transfer, for the term of twenty years, from the 1st day of May, 1870, the right to engage in the business of taking fur seals on the islands of St. George and St. Paul, within the Territory of Alaska, and to send a vessel or vessels to said islands for the skins of such seals."

That is all the right they had given them. Further, Lord Lansdowne in a letter to Lord Idlesleigh says:—

"Outside of these Islands it holds no exclusive rights or franchise from the Government, nor does it pay any rent or royalty to the Government for the territory it occupies, or the furs it procures from the natives. It has no rights over any other citizen or company of citizens who may desire to trade in competition with it, and yet it has been aided by the revenue marine in suppressing competition from rival traders, for it appears that under instructions from the Treasury Department the revenue cruisers board and examine every trading vessel sighted in the Behring Sea, or on the north-west coast of Alaska, except the vessels of the company."

I am glad to say that a large portion of the American press, the most respectable portion of the American press, concur in condemning the action of their Government in seizing these vessels, especially as that action was contrary to the advice of the ablest of their own jurists. To show what is thought of that Alaska Commercial Company, I will read what Governor Swinford says in his report of last year:

"The fur trade of Alaska is practically monopolised by the company, a non-resident corporation, which does not confine its operations to the Seal Islands leased to it by the Government, but holds and possesses most of the Aleutian chain and the greater part of the mainland as a principality of its own, on which it exercises undisputed sway and control. Clothed by the Government with a monopoly of the seal fur trade, by which it has profited to the extent of many millions, it has, octopus like, thrown out its great tentacles, and gathered to itself about all there is of value in the fur trade of the whole Territory—it has by the power of its great wealth driven away all competition—its paid agents and lobbyists are kept at the National Capital to oppose any and every effort that may be made to loosen the grip of the company."

And yet this is the company which they are backing up against the wishes of their own people and against the wishes of every other nation. I hear that this year three revenue cutters have been ordered to cruise in the Behring Sea and in the Straits and to seize all sealing vessels, and that instructions have been issued from Washington to warn all vessels off except those belonging to the Company. I do not know whether this is true or not, but I have seen it stated in the newspapers. I have received a telegram from the owners of one of the sealers, and I believe my hon. colleague has received several others. The one I have received is as follows:—

"Official orders issued from Washington to seize all sealers this season in Behring Sea. We demand protection, otherwise must protect ourselves. Please urge Government."

Well, Sir, the Government sent out a warning to our vessels not to resist any armed force of the United States, as it might lead to grave difficulty, and I hope that advice will be taken. I see by the papers a statement that some gentlemen who owned those sealers have been to Sitka to try to obtain possession of the vessels and seals seized in 1886, but they could not get them. Now, I hope the Government will accede to the wishes of my hon. friend, and bring these papers down, if it is not considered prejudicial to the negotiations now going on; and I believe when they are brought down they will fully reveal the insults that were offered to our people, and I hope we shall also learn that some compensation has been granted to those men who have suffered by these seizures.

Mr. FOSTER. A few days ago when a question was asked across the floor of the House in reference to the Behring Sea papers, I replied that owing to the state in which the negotiations were at that time, it was not thought wise to lay the papers before the House. Negotiations are still in progress upon this question, and I may say that since the other day I have received permission to bring down an assorted collection of the most important papers, covering the negotiations which have taken place from the date of the printed papers which are before the House, up to the present time, with some few exceptions of papers which it is not thought best, in the present state of the negotiations, to have made public. I think Mr. Speaker, the House owes the hon. junior member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) a debt of gratitude for the clear and lucid explanation of this matter which he has made the House, and from the interest with which members on both sides listened to it, I am certain that they appreciate it as much as I do myself. The question is widened a little from its first position, since the United States Government have seized vessels of their own nationality as well as Canadian vessels which were sealing there, thus affirming the right of their law to prevent all from sealing in the Behring Sea except the trading company to which the monopoly was given. My hon. friend stated that the papers that were brought down last year showed that the Government had acted with vigor, and in the best interest of the sealing vessels that were more nearly in question, and in the interest of the country at large. That, I think, was true, and I think it will be found, when the papers are brought down, that the Government has not been remiss in its exertions up to the present time. Of course, it is a large Imperial matter, and the British Government are now engaged in close negotiations with the Government of the United States, and the course of these will be largely shown by the papers which will be brought down, and the result, I hope, will be favorable alike to those whose interests have been injuriously affected, and to the larger rights of the country that are in question.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This, Sir, is a very important question, and I am sure that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House very much regret that it was not made a subject of negotiation in the recent conference at Washington. This is a matter of very great importance to this country. It relates to a question which was supposed to have been settled more than half a century ago. The Russian Government, at a very early period, claimed, in consequence of holding the territories on both sides of Behring Sea, jurisdiction over that as a portion of the Russian territory, and they held that Behring Sea was wholly within the dominion of the Russian Empire. That pretension was contested, both by the Government of the United States, represented by John Quincy Adams, and by the Government of Great Britain. Russia, in the treaties to which the hon. gentleman has referred, conceded the pretension put forward both by the United States and by Great Britain. It is clear that it is quite impossible that the United States could claim to have received from Russia, along with the cession of Alaska, any portion of the high seas over which Russia had herself abandoned her pretensions, especially so when she abandoned those pretensions at the instance of the United States. Now, Sir, it does seem to me very extraordinary that when the United States Government were contesting our rights to any portion of the inlets upon our coasts that were more than six miles wide, she should claim to exercise sovereignty over a sea that is nearly three thousand miles in width, and that has long been recognised as part of the Pacific Ocean. It does seem to me, so far as we could judge from the information placed before us, that this measure has not been pressed with the energy that we had a right to expect—I do not say with a want of energy on the part of the Government of Canada, but I refer especially to the want of energy on the part of the Government of the United Kingdom. Why, Sir, look at the facts. The United States has herself put forward a claim to fish in those seas, as a part of the open ocean, more than half a century ago. Her pretensions in that respect were conceded when Russia owned both coasts; now, after she has acquired possession of the coast of Alaska, it would give her no more claim over the Pacific Ocean, at least in those latitudes, than it would over the Pacific Ocean further south. She revives the original claim, owning one coast of Behring Sea, and puts forward, aggressively, a pretension that denies to us a right which we had for many years exercised. I think this House would be remiss in its duty if it failed to express its opinion as to its right, as to the aggressive policy that has been pursued by our neighbors with reference to our rights to fish in those waters. Sir, it does seem to me that the Government of the United Kingdom would have been justified in placing there a portion of the navy for the purpose of protecting us in the exercise of those rights which we had before claimed, which we had before exercised, and with reference to which, if they were improperly claimed and improperly exercised, it was the duty of the United States to exercise forbearance until their rights against us were established. But, instead of that being done, there has been usurpation; we have been denied rights that we exercised for half a century without molestation from the Government that owned both coasts. I think it is the duty of the Government here, sustained by Parliament, to press the claim of Canada in those waters with energy, and to insist upon the British Government giving to this country adequate protection. Sir, we have heard hon. gentleman on that side, not long since, tell what protection the English Government were prepared to give us, stating how ready they were to sacrifice the last man and the last shilling in our defence. Now, here is a matter where our pretensions are undoubted, and where those that were set up adversely to us, are of recent growth, and if there ever was a case when a Government would be justified in taking strong measures for the protection of its citizens, of a sovereign for the protection of his subjects, it is the case of Canada in the right to fish in the Behring Sea.

Mr. FOSTER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I join with my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in thanking the junior member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) for having brought this subject up and placed it in such a clear and distinct light before the House. I rise for the purpose of making a single remark in reference to the statement of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that there was a failure on the part of Her Majesty's Government in pressing this question before the recent conference that took place at Washington. I may say that the British side were prepared to take this question up there, but they were met on the part of the Administration of the United States by the statement that it had not reached that stage, that the claims had not been distinctly formulated on the part of the British Government, and that it would be time enough when the Government of the United States refused to admit a claim formulated and pressed upon them by Her Majesty's Government to have it made the subject of reference to a conference. The question was undergoing diplomatic investigation between the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain, and although my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had, with his usual industry and assiduity, collected all the facts, a very considerable time was necessarily involved in preparing such a clear and succinct statement on the part of the British subjects of Canada of the injuries that have been inflicted on them, and it was only very recently that full and complete information was placed in the hands of Her Majesty's Government so as to enable them to state what amount of claim they made against the Government of the United States. My hon. friend must have noticed the remark made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that the Government of the United States, in carrying out what they hold to be the law in reference to this matter, have applied it both to American subjects, to subjects of their own Government, and to British subjects, so that the case was not exactly one of a nation taking a ground against the claims of another nation distinct and apart as between the claims of American subjects on the one side and British subjects on the other. That the position taken by the Government of the United States is one entirely unfounded in justice, that it is one entirely unsupported by the original treaty between Russia and Great Britain, upon which this claim must rest on the part of the United States and from which they seem to be entirely estopped from proceeding, because, as the junior member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) has already informed the House, the United States were as strong in their denunciation of the claim in reference to Behring Sea set up by Russia, under the treaty between Russia and Great Britain, as was Great Britain herself. No doubt they were entirely estopped from setting up any such claim, and that the result of this must be that the Government of the United States will be obliged to make full and ample reparation for all injuries done to British subjects in Canada, in connection with these matters, I entertain no possible doubt; but I merely rose to explain that we were precluded from pressing it by the statement of the Administration of the United States that, until the claim had been distinctly formulated by Her Majesty's Government and had been refused by them, it could not properly be taken out of diplomatic negotiation, and its consideration entered upon by a conference arranged for the settlement of the difficulties between the two countries.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Has the Canadian Government any right to a voice in the negotiations?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not exactly understand the purport of the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman said negotiations were now proceeding. Who are carrying on the negotiations?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I now understand the question asked by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), and I am happy to be able to tell him that Her Majesty's Government alone are the parties who can negotiate with respect to this question and settle the question between the United States and Great Britain. But Her Majesty's Government, on this, as on all occasions in which the interests of Canada are affected, are obtaining the fullest and most complete information from the Government of Canada, which, I think, has been as anxious as it was possible for any Government to be to collect the most full and complete data to place before Her Majesty's Government so as to enable them to obtain complete redress for the injuries inflicted; and I can only assure the hon. gentleman that the greatest anxiety has been exhibited by Her Majesty's Government to obtain the most full and complete information; and I have no hesitation in saying that I am satisfied it will be found that they will urge the question of redress quite as promptly as it would be possible for any Government to urge the settlement of a question upon another Government.

Mr. MILLS. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. The hon. gentleman says that the matter was not sufficiently matured, nor had they the necessary specific information to deal with the subject at Washington. The hon. gentleman will, however, see that there are two distinct questions: the right to compensation to be made to parties who have been injured, and the question of jurisdiction. The question of jurisdiction over the waters could not at all be dependent upon the specific wrongs that have been done. Were the United States willing to consider the question of jurisdiction?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No. I may say to my hon. friend that the United States Government declined to have that subject referred to the conference, on the ground that that question, which is the one on which finally the question of damages must rest, was at present a subject of diplomatic negotiation and communication between the Governments of Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL. It appears to me that the explanation of the Finance Minister is anything but a satisfactory explanation to the country, and is equally unsatisfactory to this House. The point taken by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is a good one. The answer which the Minister gave as coming from the United States Government to the British portion of the commission was, that the claims for injuries, which the hon. gentleman states were undoubtedly committed, which were undoubtedly outrages committed by the Americans upon the Government and people of this country—that those claims formulated on the part of the British commissioners could not be submitted to or dealt with by the commission because they had not been formulated in a sufficiently distinct way in such a specific form that the conference would be justified in taking them up and dealing with them. But that is an entirely different point from the question of jurisdiction, to which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has referred. These outrages are going on to-day; the Americans are still exercising jurisdiction over that sea; and I would like to ask the Finance Minister whether that feature of the question was brought before the conference by Her Majesty's commissioners at Washington or not? It is quite clear, if what the hon. gentleman says is true, that this outrage by a neighboring nation to attempt to exercise control and jurisdiction over a sea 300 or 600 or 1,000 miles from the shore, this attempt to exercise that jurisdiction at the very moment they are claiming the right to come within three miles of our shores on the Atlantic, is preposterous and turns the whole affair into a burlesque, and the people of British Columbia have a right to expect not only that Her Majesty's Government will take the matter in hand and carry out the negotiations without delay, and see that no injury is done to our people on the Pacific coast, but also that this Government will press, and press continually, on the British Government the necessity of prompt, speedy and immediate action to prevent outrages being continued. The question of compensation for outrages already committed is entirely outside of the question we are discussing to-day. That these people will get compensation for their damages either from Her Majesty's Government or from the United States, on the proper settlement of the matter, no one can doubt, if our rights to the common user of Behring's Sea is recognised. But are we going to allow that nation quietly to go on and continue to commit outrages, to place additional cruisers in that sea, to seize and destroy our traffic and trade during another season? It is the duty of the Government to protest against that state of things being continued, and if difficulty exists let them exercise the right for which Canada is contending, that her people should be allowed to exercise the right of catching fur-bearing animals or fish in those seas on the Pacific Coast. Let both parties, and let this country press upon the British Government the necessity of placing those pretensions of the Americans in abeyance until the whole question can be dealt with by a commission as this other Fishery Commission has dealt with the fisheries on the Atlantic Coast. This Government have not done their duty if they have not protested strongly against the injuries that have been committed in the past and an attempt to exercise those rights which are in dispute in the present or in the future. That is the point to be taken and considered in the question before the House. I am not condemning this Government. They may have done everything that lies in their power, and I am not going to say they have not, for I will reserve my judgment on the case until the papers come before the House. Perhaps when those papers do come down they may not be complete, and we may not be able to judge even then, for the Government may think it unwise in the interests of Canada to bring down all the papers even to justify themselves. It is the duty of this House, and let the gentlemen who control the interests of Canada know it, to press these matters on the British Government, as they have been pressed on a former occasion in relation to the Atlantic fisheries. The hon. gentleman says that he has no doubt the British Government have used every means in this matter. I cannot think so. We have some experience in this country of how the British Government treated Canada in neglecting matters connected with her fisheries, and I have no hesitation in saying that there has been an amount of tardy action again on this question. Those unjust assumptions to the right of those seas on the part of the United States have been allowed to go on for two years, and so far as we know no definite action has been taken to arrest or stay the exercise of that authority. Take the document before this House which I read the other day, where a protest was made against the rights of Canada being in abeyance for a single moment in 1870, or take the despatch which led to the Washington Treaty, and which was read here. Take them and you will find a forecast of what was going to happen when our fisheries were frittered away—those rights which came into operation in 1866 when a subsequent treaty expired. It was then predicted that if we allowed the Americans to use our fisheries, as they afterwards were permitted to use them under the strong remonstrance of the British Government, the result would be that our interests would be frittered away, and our whole case given away as the matter stands to-day. It will be the same thing in this case. I warned those British Columbians who support this Administration, that it is their duty—and I believe their constituents will hold them responsible for it—to press upon the Administration the necessity of urging the British Government not to repeat on the Pacific coast what they carried out on the Atlantic.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It seems to me that the conduct of the British Government—and I do not now refer to the conduct of the Canadian Government in this matter—has been exceedingly unfair and unjustly prejudicial to the just rights of Canada. Every man of common sense who considers the situation of our claims in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the coasts adjacent, and of the American claims in the Behring Sea and the coasts adjacent, must see that it was in the highest degree in the interest of Canada that these two questions should be considered together, for they had reference to subjects of precisely the same character—with this difference, that every argument that the Americans could advance to substantiate their claims as regards the St. Lawrence fisheries, could be brought to bear with tenfold and hundredfold greater force against their claims to exclude our people from the Alaskan fur fisheries. I cannot but feel that, in dealing with any other country whatever, the British Government would never have consented to allow one section of the same question to be treated of, and that section, it must be remembered, the section in which the claim was against us, while they ignored entirely our just claims as regards a similar dispute at the other end of our Dominion. Considering the lapse of time, and considering the extraordinary character of the outrages as stated to us by the hon. members for British Columbia, I think that the British Government have been guilty of great laches towards us. I think, Sir, it is just another proof, and a substantial proof of the statements made again and again from this side of the House, that the British Government from various causes are not by any manner of means so well qualified to deal with those questions as the Government of Canada, and that we would be better off—the hon. the Finance Minister of the country notwithstanding, because we could not be worse off, in my opinion, than we are now—if we had to deal directly with this Administration at Washington. Here, Sir, we find, as it has been stated on the floor of this House again and again, that British subjects, pursuing their calling on the high seas a hundred miles from shore, are violently arrested by American cruisers, their ships confiscated, or, at all events, laid up, and they themselves cast into prison and severely fined. We find that after two years have elapsed all the consolation we get is that the claim is not formulated in any sufficiently decisive character. This is a repetition of what occurred in the case of the first Treaty of Washington, when the Americans pressing their claims for damages done by the Alabama, which claims could not have been recognised, they delayed at the same time the just claims of Canada for compensation for grosser outrages committed on Canadian territory by American citizens. We know what happened then. We know, to satisfy the interests of certain American politicians and to consolidate certain votes that they were desirous of securing, that Canada's just claims were ignored. Just the same thing has been done in this case. Canada's just claims have been ignored. We find that concessions have been made on our part and no recognition has been had or obtained, and not likely will be had or obtained for years to come of far juster claims, by their own showing, of Canadian seamen and fishermen carrying on their industry in waters where they have enjoyed undisturbed privileges for nearly half a century. I cannot say how far the Government have gone, but I do say the Imperial Government have acted very unjustly by us in this matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not see that at all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not see how the British Government, from anything that has appeared in this House or from anything which appears to the public, is in any way to be blamed. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the two questions are identical. The conference that took place at Washington was by virtue of mutual correspondence and agreement in order to settle the construction of a treaty between the two nations and affecting especially Canada. That has been settled. It would have been very well, I think, if the United States had agreed to have this question about their jurisdiction in the Behring Seas submitted to the same conference, but they did not agree to that and it was no portion of either the unofficial or semi-official correspondence between Mr. Bayard and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, or no portion of the subsequent correspondence.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Why was it not?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Because this Atlantic question pressed specially upon us here, and because the question respecting the Behring Seas is not exclusively a Canadian question as that was. The one affected the trade along Canadian coasts, in the construction of the convention of 1818 and the subsequent commissions which were alleged to have affected and varied that convention of 1818. It was altogether a Canadian question. The other question about the Behring Seas is as much a matter of interest for all the marine powers as it is for the United States, for Canada or for England. English whalers are in every sea, in the Arctic ocean and in the Antarctic ocean, and England is as much bound to see that the freedom of those seas is preserved, as if a Canadian vessel never sailed there. So is France, so is Holland, so are all those nations which send whalers into any sea in the world. These are alleged captures in the open sea. It was alleged that certain Canadian vessels were seized while pursuing their lawful avocation in the open sea. That allegation was either true or false. Those vessels were brought by American cruisers and put under the jurisdiction of local courts, and it appears they were condemned by the local courts. The owners of those vessels complained to the Canadian Government, and I have no doubt they also complained directly to Her Majesty's Government in England. The Canadian Government lost no time in calling the attention of Her Majesty's Government in the strongest terms to the necessity of an enquiry into this matter. England, I presume—because we have not the papers before us, and we cannot well discuss them with any particularity—said, Well, give us authenticated statements of any such breaches of maritime law and the law of nations, and we shall press them upon the attention of the United States; and ever since that time that process has been going on. But there seems to be a disposition to suppose that England is neglecting her duties towards us. I am quite sure that when the correspondence is brought down, it will show, first, that the Canadian Government, as soon as possible and as earnestly as possible, pressed the claims presented to us, and next, that Her Majesty's Government is fully conscious of its duty to her Canadian subjects and has been as energetic and earnest as the Canadian Government. That there have been delays is true, but we have delays on the Atlantic coast. We find vessels hung up there for two years, I suppose; there is the law's delay. The appeal from the course taken by the local tribunals has been made in the strongest terms; but the nations must proceed by diplomatic action, and not declare war against each other. We certainly will not declare war because there has been some delay, not in having enquired, but in having adjusted these various claims. That the claims will be settled, I have no doubt; that ample compensation, with interest, will be made to those people who have suffered, I have no doubt; but it is futile in us to attempt to interpose any argument, I may almost say discussion, like this, into a subject which is now solemnly being discussed by two great nations, the United States and England, and I would not be at all surprised that, when the papers are brought down, it will be found that other maritime powers have taken up the question as well, and that it is a matter for diplomacy among all maritime powers, and not exclusively between England and the United States. However that may be, I think I may venture to state to this House that it will answer no good purpose to throw out merely imaginary charges or complaints against Her Majesty's Government for negligence and delay that has not taken place.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think the hon. gentleman is quite justified in characterising the charges formulated to-day with such great clearness by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) as imaginary charges.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say they were imaginary charges.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Nor is he justified in making that charge against the complaints which have been alleged on this side of the House. The hon. gentleman has hardly, I think, stated the case as fairly as he ought to have done. There is no disposition to prejudice the action of Great Britain in this matter; but hon. members on either side of the House cannot shut their eyes to the facts plainly before them. These grievances about outrages committed on our vessels in Behring's Sea, were grievances existing concurrently with the grievances the Americans claimed they had suffered in the Bay of Chaleurs, the Bay of Fundy and the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Diplomatic correspondence was going on between the Governments with reference to those several grievances. There is a very marked and important distinction between the private claims which the parties who owned those ships may have against the Government for wrong done to them, and which may be recognised, and the general right of the Dominion of Canada that its citizens shall have preserved to them the right which they always supposed they had of fishing in the high seas. If the United States maintained their contention on the general subject, it is perfectly clear that private citizens cannot get compensation at all. If the United States have a right to seize vessels 100 miles from land in the open sea, it is clear that the owners of those vessels cannot receive compensation. The two subjects are entirely distinct; and while the private claims may not have been formulated, either through the inadvertence or negligence of the parties themselves, or through the inadvertence or negligence of some department of this Government or the English Government, or while those claims might be left in abeyance, the great question of the right of the citizens of the Dominion of Canada to fish in the high seas of either ocean was one that we say should have been pressed upon and settled in the conference at Washington, which met to settle the fishery questions between the two countries. It is well enough for the hon. gentleman to say that they confined their settlement to the difficulties arising in connection with the fisheries in the Gulf of St. Lawrence; but our contention is that diplomatic action should have been taken by Great Britain on the question as it existed in Behring's Sea as well, not only in 1885 and 1886, when those difficulties arose, but as the hon. gentleman has shown, in 1887 as well. The whole fishing interest is being paralysed because the United States are insisting on the right to drive our vessels off the sea altogether. If they get that right, private citizens will obtain no compensation at all. But what we insist on is that there does not appear to be that determined and persistent action on the part of the British Government which the outrages committed on our citizens require, and which, if insisted on as persistently and determinedly as the United States insisted on her case, would have brought about a settlement before the Fishery Commission at Washington. There appears to have been gross delay on the part of the British Government. The hon. gentleman who brought forward this motion pointed out that those rights, which to the ordinary mind appear to be so perfectly clear, were maintained by the United States themselves before they bought Alaska; and if Great Britain had sent one or two of her cruisers there to preserve the rights of her subjects, I do not think those outrages would have been continued. If Great Britain had shown one-half the desire to protect the rights of her fishermen there that the United States did to protect her fishermen in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, there would have been none of these difficulties. But the matter appears to have been managed in such a way that our fishing interests are in danger of being destroyed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask whether the Government have requested the Imperial authorities to put a cruiser there for the purpose of protecting the Canadian seal fishermen?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think it is in the public interest to make any statement of the course that has been taken by the Government in carrying on these diplomatic arrangements.

Mr. McNEILL. I venture to think that it would meet the approbation of this House and also the approbation of this country, if hon. gentlemen would refrain from accusing the Imperial Government of misdeeds or negligence of the interests of the people of this country, until they had some evidence, however slight, that such misdeeds and such negligence really exist and are chargeable to the Imperial Government. There is not an hon. gentleman on the other side who has risen to speak on this question, who has not hurled accusations of that kind against the Government of the mother country. If the home Government have been neglectful of our interests, it is only right we should state so fearlessly, frankly and fairly in this House; but when we are assured by hon. members of this Government of this country, who are responsible to the Canadian people, that such statements are absolutely unfounded—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) No.

Mr. McNEILL. The right hon. the First Minister has said so, the hon. the Minister of Finance has said so; and yet, despite the assertions of these hon. gentlemen, we have these charges repeated, without variation, by every hon. gentleman who rises in his place on the other side. These hon. gentlemen do not accuse the United States Government of negligence; on the contrary, they have always for the Americans word of praise, but for the people or the Government of the mother country they cannot find one good word to say. I do not believe that hon. gentlemen opposite really have in their hearts this feeling which their language in this House would indicate they had; I do not believe that in private conversation they would give expression to such feeling. I believe, on the contrary, they are better disposed in their hearts to the mother country and its Government; but it is unfortunate that they should allow their politics so far to run away with their sense of right as to lead them make these statements in the House. We have heard a great deal of the manner in which the Government of the mother country have sacrificed the interests of the Canadian people with reference to our fisheries on the Atlantic coast, and the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has not been at all careful to measure his words when speaking on that question. But distinct statements have been made by members of the Dominion Government to the effect that these attacks on the home Government were unfounded.

Mr. MITCHELL. We have given the evidence.

Mr. McNEILL. And that the Government of the mother country have been most careful of our interests.

Mr. MITCHELL. I gave evidence that they were not.

Mr. McNEILL. I am speaking of recent negotiations with regard to the fisheries. The hon. gentlemen perhaps understood me to refer to what has passed in by-gone times.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. McNEILL. There is a certain amount of truth in the statement that politicians of the mother country in by-gone times have paid almost as little respect to Canadian interests which were unrepresented there, as Canadian politicians have paid to distant and unrepresented interests in Canada itself. I am speaking now, however, of the question before the House, that is, with reference to this Behring Sea fisheries and the observations that fell from some hon. gentlemen opposite, a moment or two ago, with regard to the betrayal of our interests lately by the mother country in the fishery negotiations at Washington. I have said that members of our Government have declared that the home Government were especially anxious to guard our interests, and I was met with cries of "No" from the other side. Now, I wish to say that if those statements were not sufficiently explicit, I am authorized by the hon. the Minister of Justice—with whom I had a conversation some three or four weeks ago on the subject, and whose permission I asked and was kindly given to use the information he then gave me—to make this explicit statement. The hon. gentleman is present and can correct me if I, in any degree, misrepresent what he then said. He told me that, so far as Mr. Chamberlain was concerned, had he been a patriotic native-born Canadian, he could not have shown more earnest desire to safeguard the interests of Canada than he did, and the hon. gentleman authorized me to say further that the main object of Mr. Chamberlain seemed to be to discover what the wishes of his Canadian associates were and to carry out those wishes to the utmost.

Mr. McNEILL.

Mr. MITCHELL. What about his speech before he left England?

Mr. McNEILL. If those statements are not sufficiently explicit—

Mr. MITCHELL. What about his speech before he left England?

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman does not like to be always interrupted himself. I think it is very unfortunate that the hon. gentleman, knowing that to be the fact, should continue, notwithstanding the statements I have made on the authority of one of the members of the Government, to reiterate charges which are absolutely and utterly void of truth.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not so.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Chamberlain, as every one knows, who knows anything of the history of the matter, is one of those men who are pervaded with the spirit of Imperial unity. He is one of that body of men who is rapidly increasing, I am glad to say, who believe and hold that the interests of Canada and the colonies are identical with the interests of the mother country; and when hon. gentlemen tell us that Mr. Chamberlain came over to Canada to give away the interests of Canada, they tell us virtually that he came over to do what he believed would be to give away the interests of the mother country.

Mr. MITCHELL. He did it anyway.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I congratulate the First Minister on obtaining a mouthpiece to convey information to this House.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has constituted himself the champion of the British Empire in this House for some time past. It would seem as if, in his opinion, the British lion was utterly decrepit and utterly unable to take care of itself, because, in season and out of season, he rises in this House to take the part of the British Empire against Canadian interests. I wonder how long native Canadians on both sides of the House are going to be lectured by that hon. gentleman without giving him an answer. There are Canadians on both sides, who, I am sure, are perfectly satisfied that they understand what loyalty in Canada is perfectly well, without the hon. member for Bruce—a very recent importation in Canada—telling them what it is. I hold it would be well, if the hon. gentleman must lecture somebody on loyalty, that he should leave native Canadians alone for a while, and go back to his native Ireland, where they can afford to be lectured on loyalty a little more than we can. The hon. gentleman does not seem to understand what most of us do in this House, that native Canadians have a strong feeling in their hearts for the land of their birth, and although we give hearty welcome to all strangers who come to us from England, Ireland or Scotland or anywhere else, we native Canadians on both sides of the House have a fellow feeling, and do not want to be lectured, in season and out of season, on our loyalty to England.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not rise to make any lengthy remarks upon the subject which has been brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Victoria, (Mr. Prior). I only wish to say that I think it does not become the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) to make any imputation against the loyalty of that part of the British Empire which happens to be located in the Emerald Isle. The people of Ireland have been agitating for Home Rule, and, if I mistake not, the hon. member for West Ontario voted for a resolution in favor of Home Rule. It is therefore rather out of place for him to call the agitation for Home Rule a disloyal agitation, he himself having voted in favor of it.

Mr. BAKER. I regret exceedingly the turn this discussion has taken, and feel in a measure personally responsible for it, because had I risen at an earlier period of the debate to speak, I think I would, as I have on my desk materials for a six-hour speech, have choked off all discussions of this nature. I was afraid to speak at an earlier date, one reason being that I did not really feel equal to the task which I had for myself undertaken, and secondly, because I thought it was more essentially necessary, and more calculated to be productive of good to my constituents, and to the whole of those interested in the seal fisheries of British Columbia, that a discussion should arise of a legitimate nature in this House, which would be beneficial to them, and would serve as a guide for the future as to what would be likely to be done in regard to this industry. I do not think there is anyone who occupies a position on the floor of this House who can speak more feelingly on this subject than I can, for the reason that I am financially interested in the matter. I was very anxious to hear what other members might say on this subject, and to listen to the opinions of hon. members on both sides of the House. It is of vital importance, not only to the Province of British Columbia from which I come, but to Canada as a whole, and I do not think that the discussion should partake of the nature of party politics at all. I am sorry to say that very frequently matters which come before this House, which should have the freest possible discussion, in regard to which the opinions of everyone in this House who cares to speak upon them should be listened to, are discussed from the point of party politics rather than from a point which is relevant to the matters under discussion. I do not accuse hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of this more than I do those belonging to the party of which I am one of its humblest members; but, in regard to the matter which the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Gordon) has brought before the House, he has moved for certain papers to be brought down, but I think that is according to the practice in other cases, for the purpose of engendering a discussion upon a question which is considered to be of interest to hon. members and to the public generally. In introducing this motion, the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Gordon) spoke generally on the subject now before this House. My hon. colleague (Mr. Prior) has traversed the ground and placed before you many matters of interest, more particularly as regards the early history of Alaska, the treaty which was entered into, and the rights, real or imaginary, which the Alaska Commercial Fur Company has under its charter from the United States; and he has also generally mentioned what has taken place in the Behring Sea in regard to the seizure of Canadian vessels. I think, however, that I have a few matters which will be of interest to this House which have not been mentioned by previous speakers. In the first place, there are 16 or 17 vessels that go up every year to the Behring Sea. In 1886, the vessels which went up there, with the names of their captains, and their registered tonnage were as follows:—

| Name. | Captain. | Tonnage. |
|----------------------------|-----------------------|----------|
| Carolina | James Ogilvie..... | 32 |
| Onward | Daniel Munroe..... | 35 |
| Thornton | Hans Guttorensen..... | 33 |
| Alfred Adams | W. H. Dyer..... | 69.75 |
| Anna Beck | Louis Olsen..... | 41 |
| W. P. Sayward | Geo. R. Ferey..... | 135½ |
| Dolphin | J. D. Warren..... | 174 |
| Grace | Wm. Petit..... | 182 |
| Ada | Jas. Gaudin..... | 65 |

The mates of the Carolina, the Onward, and the Thornton, were respectively James Blake, John Margotich and Harry Norman. Out of these vessels whose names I have given, three were seized in 1886, in the latitude, longitude and distance from shore which is shown in this statement:—

VESSELS SEIZED IN 1886.

| Name. | Lat. | Long. | Distance from Ounalaska. |
|-----------------------|----------|-----------|--------------------------|
| Carolina | 55 50 N. | 163 53 W. | 139 miles. |
| Onward | 54 52 N. | 167 55 W. | 68 " |
| Thornton | 54 52 N. | 167 55 W. | 68 " |

The vessels seized in 1887, and their distance from shore, is shown in the following statement:—

VESSELS SEIZED IN 1887.

| Name. | Lat. | Long. | Distance from Ounalaska. |
|----------------------------|----------|-----------|--------------------------|
| Alfred Adams | 54 48 N. | 167 49 W. | 62 miles. |
| Anna Beck | 54 58 N. | 167 26 W. | 66 " |
| W. P. Sayward | 54 43 N. | 167 51 W. | 58 " |
| Dolphin | 54 38 N. | 167 03 W. | 42 " |
| Grace | 55 03 N. | 168 40 W. | 92 " |
| Ada | 54 09 N. | 166 40 W. | 15 " |

So hon. members will notice that the nearest point to any United States territory at which any of these vessels was seized was 15 miles, and some of them were seized at a distance of about 140 miles. No doubt, it will be of some interest to the House to know what crews manned these vessels, to learn something in regard to their outfit, the amount which they are paid, and also something in regard to the season's catch. The crew usually consists of a master, mate, cook, steward, and 4 men to navigate the vessel. Each vessel carries from 6 to 8 boats, each boat has one hunter and two pullers; each hunter gets \$1.50 per skin, each boat puller 50 cents per skin; so that the number on board an vessel would vary from 22 to 30 men. Where Indians are employed the number will exceed these figures by about 50 per cent. Each skin therefore costs \$2.50 for the hunter and his crew. To this must be added the cost of outfit, wages of master and crew, and interest on capital invested. The master is usually upon what is known as a "lay out" which combines wages, which range from \$50 to \$65 a month, with practically a commission on the catch, amounting to about 25 cents or 30 cents a skin. One case will fairly illustrate the many:—Hans Guttorensen, master of the Thornton, left Victoria Harbor on the 15th February, upon what is known as a sealing and fishing voyage and cleared at the custom house for the Behring Sea, put into Clayoquot Sound on 25th May, thence west of Vancouver Island to Behring Sea, entering said sea about the 6th June. The vessel which he commanded was seized on the 1st August, and in addition to the forfeiture of his skins, he was fined the sum of \$500 and imprisoned 30 days. He was, in addition to that, robbed of his sextant—for I can use no milder term—valued at \$50, and a chronometer, worth \$125. His instruments were his personal property, and in addition to the loss of his vessel and skins, he individually loses the remainder of the season's catch in which he is interested, and the remainder of the wages, which cease directly his vessel is seized, and he also loses the prospective employment of the vessel and what his wages would be under that prospective employment. I mention these facts, Mr. Speaker, to show that not only has he lost the cost of the vessel's equipment, her outfit, her apparel and provisions, ammunition and small arms, and the kit, and every thing belonging to the men on board the vessel, but the ship master and the mate lose, in addition to what they had on board and their wages and their interest in the season's catch, the prospective employment of the vessel during the winter months. Now, the value of the outfits of the three vessels that were seized in 1886, amounts to \$22,000; the wages and layout payable to the crew amounted to \$17,100; the value of the skins on board was \$10,423; value of the probable catch was estimated at \$21,000 for each of the vessels, which would be \$63,000; legal and other expenses, \$3,000; loss to the schooner Favorite through having received orders to quit the sealing, and to get out of Behring Sea, \$3,000; the indemnity claimed for the masters of the three vessels, namely: Munroe, Guttorensen, and Ogilvie, and the mates, Magolitch, Norman and Black, were respectively \$8,000 for the masters, and \$5,000 for the mates; therefore the total amount at risk, when these vessels were seized, foots up the nice little sum of \$154,523. Now, this will show to the House the amount of money that it is necessary to have to embark, even in a small scale, in the Behring Sea fishery, and if it had not been for the interference of these American revenue cruisers, a very large number of vessels would have fitted out, and would have considerably enhanced the value of the sealing industry of British Columbia. The ground covered by the sealing fleet previous to going into Behring Sea is, roughly, 1,560 miles. The distance from Victoria to Cape Flattery is 63 miles; from Cape Flattery to Queen Charlotte Island, 400 miles; from Queen Charlotte Island to the entrance of Behring Sea, 1,100; making a total of 1,563 miles from, we will say, Victoria harbor to the entrance of Behring Sea. Some of these vessels were warned outside the group of islands known as the Aleutian Islands, not to go into the Behring Sea, and if I am not greatly in error, one vessel had her skins taken from on board outside the Aleutian Islands, and not within the Behring Sea at all. Now, it will be interesting to this House to know that previous to these vessels going into the Behring Sea, they made what is called their preliminary trip, down south in the direction of San Francisco, 670 miles, to the south of Vancouver Island. They go down as far as Cape Mendocino, then they work up on the north-west coast towards Vancouver Island, then strike across to Queen Charlotte Island, and then on the north-west coast to the entrance of Behring Sea. Several vessels have made large catches without going into Behring Sea at all. When these vessels got into Behring Sea, it was impossible for the revenue cruisers to discriminate between what skins we reactually taken south of the Aleutian Islands, and what skins were the result of the kill in Behring Sea, and all the skins on board the vessels at the time were seized. Now, there is another little matter which will be interesting to members of this House, while on the subject, and that is the distance from point to point and place to place in and about Behring Sea. Now, from Unalaska Island to the south-east point of St. George's Island, is 182 miles; from the north-west point of St. George's Island to the south point of St. Paul's Island, 36 miles; north point of St. Paul's Island to south-east point of St. Matthew's Island, 197 miles; north-east point of St. Matthew's Island to south-west point of St. Lawrence Island, 178 miles; from St. Lawrence Island and Cape Prince of Wales Island, in Alaska territory, 140 miles; total distance a vessel would probably make it, from the island known as Unalaska to the Behring Straits (entrance of the Arctic Ocean) that is, entrance of Behring Sea to entrance of Behring Straits is 733 miles. I want hon. gentlemen to understand that there is a difference between Behring Sea and Behring Straits, therefore I give these distances. The total distance from the centre of Unalak Pass, passing 10 miles west of Nunivak Island, to Cape Prince of Wales, at the east entrance of Behring Strait, is 700 miles. The width of Unalak Pass, that is, from south-west point of Unalak Island to east point of Akun Island, the usual pass used is from $22\frac{1}{2}$ to 25 miles. There is another pass called the Amukleta Pass, between Amukleta and Siguan Islands, which is 37 miles wide. The Akutam Pass, between Akutam and Unalak Island, is only eight miles wide, that is the narrowest entrance between that point and Behring Sea. The width of the entrance of Behring Straits from Cape Prince of Wales to Cape Kregugin, is 70 miles; width of entrance of Behring Straits from Cape Prince of Wales, in Alaska, to East Cape, on the eastern shore of Siberia, is 51 miles. A line dividing the straits of Behring Sea, passes within 23 miles of Cape Prince of Wales, and 47 miles from Cape Kregugin, and 27 miles from Cape Chakotski. The Aleutian Islands cover a width, as hon. gentlemen will see, of 900 miles, that is, from the North East Bay, with a sweep up to the north-west, is a distance of 900 miles, all inside of which is the Behring Sea, which will give hon. members some idea, if they have not already looked at the map themselves, of the immense volume of water there is in that sea, and the immense amount of sea territory, so to speak, which is claimed by the United States as an inland sea. The sealing grounds in the Behring Sea are principally between 55 and 60 parallels of latitude, and 165 and 175 meridians of longitude. The foregoing information is taken from United States Coast and Geodetic Survey of Alaska and adjoining territory, 1884, by J. E. Hilgard, Superintendent; C. O. Boutelle, assistant in charge of office, as reissued with additions up to April, 1884—Compiled from all accessible data by W. H. Dale, assistant, U.S.C.S., and including results of recent explorations by Capt. Beardslee and Lieut. Perry, U.S. Navy; Lieuts. Kay and Schwaka, U.S. Army; Capt. Hooper, U.S. Rev. Mar.; the officers of the Vega expedition and of the Coast Survey and other well-known surveyors and hydrographers, giving data to October, 1883. It is a little peculiar, Mr. Speaker, when we take into consideration the contention of the United States on the Atlantic shores, that they should make, or attempt to make, Behrings Sea a closed sea, especially in view of the liberty enjoyed by United States whalers from New Bedford in Hudson Bay, which is wholly surrounded by our Canadian territory and is entered by passing through an archipelago by channels less than 30 miles in width. I have shown that the channels entering into Behring Sea are respectively 37 miles in width, 51 miles, the principal channel, and the one least used eight miles. Hon. gentlemen will remember the contention of the United States in regard to our bays on the Atlantic coast. Some of those bays are as follows:—Bay Chaleurs, New Brunswick, 15 miles wide; Miramichi Bay, 14 miles; Egmont Bay, 17 miles; St. Mary's Bay, Nova Scotia, between Long Island and Bryn Island, nine miles; Banington Bay, eastern entrance $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles, western entrance $6\frac{1}{2}$; Chedabucto Bay, Gut of Canso, two entrances; nine and ten miles respectively; St. Ann's Bay, 17 miles; Mince Bay, five or seven miles; Placentia Bay, Newfoundland, 22 miles; Hamilton Sound, 12 or 16 miles; Fortune Bay, three miles. Now, if the United States contend that they have the right or that the concessions should be granted to enter bays of such narrow width, equally, I think, and indeed with greater force, can we contend that we have the right to pass through the narrow entrances to Behring Sea, because in passing through any one of those entrances a vessel does not approach within 15 miles of the shore. It has been said by some hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this subject that great indifference has been shown either by the Federal Government or by the Imperial Government. I certainly do think, with all deference to hon. gentlemen who have spoken, that there has been apparent apathy or indifference amounting, to use the mildest term, to apparent neglect on the part of the Imperial Government—and I speak as an Englishman proud of the British flag, and proud of holding a seat in this House as a Canadian—because I must say that from 1st August, 1886, to 25th April, 1888, there has been ample time for some one upon whom the responsibility rested to have promised that there should not be a recurrence of the seizures. I am quite convinced that so far as the Canadian Government are concerned every legislative endeavor has been made, all the persuasive eloquence that could be brought to bear has been used by telegram and letter to induce the Imperial Government to take that step which we would like to see taken yet, namely, to send there an armed vessel, and, if necessary, take out our vessels, as was done in old times, with shot and shell. That is about the only way to take them. As far back as 12th May, 1886, I received a letter from a gentleman named T. Lubbe who was interested at that time in the sealing fleet sailing from Victoria. I consider that telegram was really the firing of the first shot in defense of our rights as Canadians to fish anywhere we please on the high seas, including Behring Sea. I was requested at that time to get the matter before the Government, which I most promptly did. That telegram, which was dated 12th May, 1886, simply said:

Mr. BAKER.

"Has the Minister of Justice not yet decided?"

"T. LUBBE."

To that telegram I sent the following reply:

"The Minister of Justice gives opinion in your favor and against American contentions. He has recommended attention of Imperial Government being called to the subject in order that views of Canadian Government be then sustained and enforced."

Now, Mr. Speaker, no less than 23 months have passed since the Federal Government sent either a telegram or a very emphatic and unmistakable letter to the Imperial Government, urging the enforcement of the position taken by the Government of Canada, namely, that our rights should be protected on the high seas, and up to the present nothing practical has been done. The reason why we in British Columbia are anxious at the present time that something should be done, not only in the matter of restitution for seizures that took place in 1886-87, but in reference to our rights in Behring Sea, is because a certain amount of uncertainty and scepticism prevails as to whether the United States will continue to make seizures of vessels or not. Had it not been for that feeling I am quite confident that to-day, instead of there being 17 or 18 vessels sailing from Victoria to Behring Sea, there would have been at least three times that number, and even to-day we are not assured that protection will be given to our vessels. If we were assured of protection being given to the vessels, I think by this time there would have been a vessel flying the British flag somewhere in that vicinity, but until the Union Jack of old England is seen flying there so long will the American Eagle, represented by the Stars and Stripes, pounce down on our vessels and take them to Alaska. Only the other day an item appeared in one of the San Francisco newspapers, having an appearance of authenticity, to the effect that all vessels operating within certain limits set forth would be liable to the penalties prescribed by law against the killing of fur-bearing animals. It is equally possible that all vessels sailing from Victoria Harbor or any other port in British Columbia, if they did not see this notice at the custom house in San Francisco, had it communicated to them by agents there; so that at the present moment vessels fitted out in Victoria and going into Behring Sea have no guarantee that they will not be seized as were other Canadian vessels in 1886-87. In fact everything shows that such will be the case. I do not know that anything more can be done so far as the Canadian Government are concerned. They have urged the matter up to a point which is satisfactory to the Canadian Government and this position is supported by facts of which we are in possession, and no doubt there may be some very good reasons for the Government not laying certain diplomatic correspondence before the House, or until a certain period has passed. But what we really want practically in British Columbia and in the vicinity of the Behring Sea are two things: We want compensation for the vessels seized and the damage done, and we want a prevention of the recurrence of such a thing in future. I will not weary the House by reading the Alaska Commercial Company's charter from the United States Government or the Act for the prevention of the extermination of seals in the Behring Sea, but I will simply give a reference to them so that hon. members can refer to them themselves. The Act for the prevention of the extermination of seals in the Behring Sea will be found on No. 120 of that little blue book issued last year when the correspondence was called for. While I am referring to the matter of extermination of seals in the Behring Sea I will take this occasion to repudiate a statement which has got wind, to the effect that one of the reasons for preventing persons from killing seals in the Behring Sea is that they kill indiscriminately; that they kill the female seal with pups, and seals under two years old. I have taken the trouble of critically going into this matter, and I have enquired from masters, officers, mates and the crews of these vessels as to what percentage of the seals killed would come under that category. I have the very best of assurance that out of possibly 21,000 or 22,000 sealkins brought down by each vessel from Behring Sea to Victoria Harbor, that there will not be 2 per cent. of them belonging to seals such as should not be killed, which is a very small percentage indeed. Then, as regards the Commercial Company's lease, that will be found a little further on in those papers of last year, to which I have already alluded. Although I have lots of material here that I would like to refer to and place on record, the ground has been so well covered by those who have spoken that the patience of the House must have been fully tested upon this subject. The only excuse I can offer for taking up so much time of the House is that British Columbians do not usually occupy the time of the House, unless it is some important matter having particular reference to their own Province, such as a question of this kind, in which possibly some of us have an individual interest, as I have already stated I have. There are many matters which come up before this House, such as the Fishery Treaty, and some hon. gentleman may say: Why do not British Columbians speak on that subject? One very good reason may be given for this and that is that on some subjects "silence is golden." There are some questions which come up which immediately it would be in the interest of British Columbia to adopt but which in the near future I rather apprehend it would be in the interest of the Province not to adopt, and considering the future and the present and the conflict between them it is just as well to say nothing on them. Upon this subject I think I can voice the sentiment of every man in British Columbia when I say that the rights of Canadian vessels on the Pacific can fairly claim as much protection, and that their case should equally be urged on the Imperial Government, as the rights of our vessels upon the Atlantic Ocean have been urged. It is, I think, a matter of regret that this question was not referred to the United States plenipotentiaries so that the necessity of calling for the papers in this House would have been avoided.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF ARCHIBALD CULBERTSON.

Mr. BURDETT moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, charges, papers and orders touching or relating to the dismissal of Archibald Culbertson from the office of Indian Councillor of the Mohawk Band.

He said: I should like to say a few words in respect to this motion affecting the status of the Mohawk band. I believe, according to a statute of the Dominion, chap. 43, sec. 75, the Government have the power and have exercised that power of permitting the bands to elect councillors to manage their local affairs. They have, under the same statute, the right to remove those councillors for four specified reasons, viz.,

dishonesty, intemperance, immorality and incompetence. I should say here that if the Government possessed this power in all cases as well as those referring to Indians, and if they exercised it as they endeavored to exercise it in this case, we would possibly have a pretty large political house-cleaning. This man, Archibald Culbertson, has been, I am told, elected for a number of years, and has served with efficiency and zeal the band to which he belongs. Last winter before the election, he writes me, that he was told if he interfered punishment would be meted out to him. After the elections similar threats were made, and they were carried out, and he was summarily dismissed from his position. He made enquiries of Mr. Dingman, an officer of the Department, and asked if any charges were made against him, and if there were he asked that they should be mentioned to him. Mr. Dingman said no charges were made, but as the Government had directed him to do so he would make enquiries. Archibald Culbertson informs me that on the 11th of August he received a letter summarily dismissing him from his position as a member of the council. I understand that this man occupied an analogous position to an alderman or a member of a municipality or township, and that he ought not to be dismissed without specific charges and for good cause. The courts are open to persons guilty of any error, and they may be removed for proper cause and on proper grounds. We were told here in the Queen's County election case that the courts were open and that those who objected to Mr. Baird's election could move in that direction. I think it would have been highly proper if the courts had moved in this direction instead of the Executive at Ottawa. This gentleman writes me that he was dismissed without accusation, without a charge and without an opportunity of defending himself before his accusers, or to show his innocence or justify his conduct. If this be true it rests with the Government in justice to this man to show why he was dismissed and for what cause. In support of the position that he directs me to take I have two letters written him from the department. The first is as follows:—

"OTTAWA, 19th October, 1887.

"SIR,—In reply to your letter of the 10th instant asking to be furnished with copies of certain papers, &c., connected with the Order of His Excellency the Governor General in Council deposing you from the chieftainship of the Tyendinaga band of Indians, I have to inform you that the department declines to furnish you with the document asked for.

"R. SINCLAIR,

"Acting Deputy of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs."

The second letter is as follows:

OTTAWA, 2nd January, 1888.

"SIR,—With reference to your verbal request on the 4th instant to be furnished with copies of the papers containing charges against you under which you were deposed from the chieftainship of the Tyendinaga band of Indians I beg to refer you to the letter from this department of the 19th October last, informing you that the department was unwilling to furnish you with the document asked for.

L. VANKOUGHNET,

Deputy Superintendent of Indian Affairs."

I cannot understand why a man who occupies a position like this, to which he has been elected by the people, should be deposed without having an opportunity to answer his accusers. Even the French translators had that opportunity. I am told that the Irishmen on the Lachine Canal had not the same privilege. Possibly it is only Irishmen and Indians who are denied the right which is granted to Frenchmen and Canadians. This is the first occasion on which I have known a man to be removed from a position that he has acceptably filled without some cause or reason being given. There may have been good cause for his dismissal; I do not know whether there was or not; but I do say that in justice to him and to his people, he ought to have had an opportunity to answer those charges. Further, he informs me that although he was dismissed on the 11th of August, in a summary manner, nothing was done to fill his office until the 22nd of January. We find that when it became necessary, through death, to fill vacancies in this House, in the cases of West Hastings and Missisquoi, there was no delay, but in the cases of Prince Edward, Kent, Russell, Shelburne and Yarmouth, considerable and unnecessary delay occurred. Delay also happened in the appointment of the successor of this man: He also informs me that although his dismissal did not imply disqualification, men in the employ of the Government informed him that the Government would not accept him if he ran and was elected. He tells me that the person who nominated his opponent would have supported him if he had known that he was not objectionable to the Government. It was bad enough to be dismissed without cause and without charges, but it was still worse to have it circulated that he could not be re-elected and would not be acceptable to the powers that be. I do not believe the Government authorised anybody to say that he would not be acceptable to them if he was re-elected. In conclusion he writes to me:

Mr. BURDETT.

"It seems to me very unjust to allow any man to prefer a charge against another, and the answer not to be delivered, and the accused not to be allowed to defend himself."

It is only right to say that he informed me that some of them said he was dismissed for intemperance—because he had, in common language, got "tight." That may be true or it may not be true; but if the Government have decided to dismiss officials in their employ for intemperance, I am glad to hear it. I hope that the application of that principle will not be limited to Indians alone. If the Government state that they will dismiss all in their employ who can be proved not only to get "tight," but to go on a common, everyday "drunk," we will give them more employment. If this rule is to be applied, it will be more effective than any Scott Act can be to clear the country of intemperance, and if they do decide to undertake that work, I will give them a few subjects to act on. What I say is that this man, who was a ward of the Government, complains to me that he was dismissed without any accusation being made against him, and without a chance to answer, and that others, in order to deprive him of an opportunity to be re-elected, stated that the Government would not accept him if he were re-elected. I say that the Government should place themselves right on this matter, and should let those men know that now that they have the franchise they have a right to exercise it freely and without fear of molestation from the Government or any of their officials.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I know little or nothing of this case myself, but I am quite sure that the head of the department, in acting as he is alleged to have done, in the first place, acted according to what he believed was within the scope of his duty, and in the second place, believed that he was acting in the interest of the band of whom Mr. Culbertson is stated to have been a councillor. The hon. gentleman is right in stating that the charge brought against him was intemperance and violence, extreme violence, during the time he was so intemperate, and that not in a few but in many instances, and in the interest of the band and the cause of good order he was removed. However, I cannot speak of the particulars because they are not before me. The papers will be brought down.

Mr. BURDETT. The law provides for the punishment of an Indian for intemperance; but it is the duty of the Government not only to punish the Indian, but the person who gave him the liquor. If this man is to be removed for intemperance and violence, he writes to me about his successor, whom the Government seems to accept as satisfactory, in these words:

"Jacob B. Brant was the man that went home drunk, broke his stove, cut up some of the furniture and some of the house, and run his wife away from her home, and she was obliged to have him committed to jail, and who will get drunk whenever he gets an opportunity."

The rule that the Government have applied to Mr. Culbertson ought to apply to his successor, and if the hon. gentleman thinks he has not served in jail, he will find his name on the jailer's book in Belleville.

Motion agreed to.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 32) to incorporate the Dominion Plate Glass Insurance Company.—(Mr. Holton.)

Bill (No. 78) to incorporate the Keystone Fire Insurance Company.—(Mr. Weldon, St. John.)

Bill (No. 82) to incorporate the Annapolis Atlantic Railway Company.—(Mr. Mills, Annapolis.)

Bill (No. 67) to incorporate the Buffalo, Chippawa and Niagara Falls Steamboat and Tramway Company.—(Mr. Ferguson, Welland.)

Bill (No. 86) to authorise the construction of Bridges over the Assiniboine River at Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie for Railway and Passenger purposes.—(Mr. Watson.)

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENTS.

Mr. McCARTHY moved the second reading of Bill (No. 6) to amend the Canada Temperance Act. He said: This Bill, I may say, is a formal one, and perhaps, to a great extent, its usefulness is already gone—it has gone, at all events, so far as the county from which I come is concerned, as quite recently the Scott Act has been repealed in that county by a large majority. But there are still a number of counties where the Scott Act is in force, and the object of this measure is to simplify and make plain the voting, either for the repeal or the introduction of the Scott Act. At present the voter is very much puzzled to know when he is voting for the petition to bring the Act into force, or voting for the repeal—he is puzzled to know whether he is voting for or against the measure. The object of this Bill is to enable the elector to understand what he is voting for. He knows, of course, if he votes for the Act it is for the purpose of bringing the Act into force, and he ought also to know that if he is voting against the Act, it is for the repeal of the Act so far as it affects his constituency. Now, the Bill is simply framed with that object. I do not anticipate any opposition to the measure from any part of the House. I think all must agree that it is important that the electors should have the matter made as plain and simple as possible, and they should understand whether they are voting for the Act or against it. But it may be important perhaps that I should bring this matter up that it may be embodied in this Bill and a provision be inserted that in counties where the Act has been repealed it should be brought into force at the earliest possible date. In no less than nine counties, including the unions, and I believe represented in this House, by no less than fifteen members, the Scott Act has been repealed and repealed by very large majorities, but under the provisions of that repeal it cannot come into force for one year yet. The result is that for a year to come this law against which the people have pronounced is practically paralysed. It has ceased to be of the slightest effect though it is still technically in force, but there is no public opinion behind it, and I do not think any person will take the slightest trouble to enforce its provisions. Practically free trade in liquor will prevail in those counties. I think we had better at the earliest possible moment in those counties where the people have pronounced upon this question bring this Act into force and allow the Crooks Act or the license law for the regulation of the liquor traffic to be carried into effect. However, in this Bill I am simply dealing at present with the matter I have mentioned.

Mr. JAMIESON. The mover of the Bill has made a very candid confession in regard to it, and that is that its usefulness is gone. My own impression about this Bill, and I do not place myself as a very good authority, is that the last clause of the Bill is the only one that is going to be of any service. I think that what my hon. friend has said in reference to a change in the ballot is quite true, and that a change in that respect would be an advantage not only to those who are in favor of the law but to those who are opposed to the law. My hon. friend may be quite right in regard to the effect of the vote which took place on Thursday last and with regard to which I shall have some further remarks to make in the course of the evening, but my impression of the law is quite different to that which my hon. friend holds. I have not looked into the matter carefully, but my impression is that the Act will become repealed and the license law of the Province will go into effect at the expiration of ninety days; that is that the Order in Council revoking the Act can be passed at the expiration of sixty days after the vote in favor of the repeal of the Act, and after the expiration of thirty days from that time the Act will be repealed. I do not know whether my hon. friend proposes to move the House into committee to-night, but so far as I am concerned I think the last clause is the only one that is of any importance, and in regard to that I would suggest, and no doubt my hon. friend will make no objection, that the form of the ballot prescribed should be made applicable not only to the adoption of the Act but to the repeal of the Act, and I think the affirmative should be placed first, that is for the Act. So far as the other provisions of the Bill are concerned I think my hon. friend will concede that no difficulties have arisen on that score so far as the repeal votes that have already taken place are concerned, and no difficulty is likely to arise in the future. They seem to have adopted the provisions of the law according to the statute, mutatis mutandis for the repeal, and I think the only provision in this Bill which should be considered by the House, and I think my hon. friend will not dispute this, is the one in regard to the change in the ballot.

Mr. LAURIER. As I understood the hon. gentleman he confined his remarks to the last section of the Bill, that is to say to the section in regard to the ballot. I notice that the first section is to amend clause 96 of the Act. Will the hon. gentleman kindly give the House any explanation he has to offer in regard to the proposed amendment?

Mr. McCARTHY. There is no change contemplated in the law.

Mr. LAURIER. Then what is the object of the amendment?

Mr. McCARTHY. The object is to make it plain and clear in connection with the repeal of the Act. The hon. gentleman will understand that the procedure for bringing the Act into force is the procedure in the original statute. The procedure for the repeal of the Act is stated in a general way, that mutatis mutandis the forms are to be adopted for the repeal of the Act. That has created a good deal of confusion, especially in regard to the ballot. The form of the ballot is for the petition. The change is proposed with a view to make it clear to a voter whether he is voting for or against the Act. Clause 96 reads in the original Act, in substance, the same as in the proposed amending Act. Clause 96 is as follows:

"No Order in Council issued under this Act shall be revoked until after the expiration of three years from the date of the coming into force under it of the second part of this Act."

I have put these provisions into separate sections. Section 96 is repealed and the following substituted for the first part of the section:

"Sections five, six, seven and eight following and the forms in the schedule to this Act shall be read as if embodied in the first part of the said Act, but shall relate to proceedings for revoking the Order in Council which has brought the second part of the said Act into force."

Section 5, which has reference to part of Section 96, precedes as follows:—

"A petition to the Governor in Council praying for the revocation of any Order in Council, passed for bringing the second part of this Act into force, may be in the form O of the schedule hereto or to the like effect.

Section 6 is as follows:—

"Such petition may be embodied, as in form O in the schedule to this Act, in the notice in writing addressed to the Secretary of State of Canada and signed by electors qualified to vote at the election of a member of the House of Commons in a county or city, to the effect that the signers desire that the votes of such electors as under the provisions of the said Act are entitled to vote for the bringing into force of the second part of the said Act, be taken for and against the revocation of the Order in Council bringing the second part of the said Act into force."

Mr. MILLS. I desire some information in regard to an observation made by the hon. gentleman. I understood the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to say that in those counties where the Act has been repealed the Act will still operate for one year, notwithstanding the vote taken. As I understood the original law—I have not examined it in the Revised Statutes—there was no possibility of taking a vote in regard to the Act until at the expiration of three years.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is not correct.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That was the original provision.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Act must remain in force three years; but there was no provision on the Statute-book such as the hon. gentleman has mentioned. An Order in Council was passed providing that the Act when adopted should remain in force for three years; so the vote did not take place until March or April. But the hon. gentleman will find, now that the Act has been repealed, sixty days must elapse before the proclamation can issue, then either 30 or 60 days after that again before the law comes into force, and then again not to become operative until, as I understand it the next license year, although there may be some doubt with regard to that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that the spirit of the law was to bring it into operation and then take a vote to ascertain public sentiment, but not until the three years had about expired.

Mr. McCARTHY. We cannot help dealing with things as they are.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Public opinion might change before the time expires and people might take a different view. Clearly the intention of the law is that a vote should be taken at the close of the period.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. McCARTHY moved the House into committee on the Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no. Yes, yes.

Mr. LAURIER. I would suggest that the Bill should be taken later on.

Mr. McCARTHY. Let us go into the committee now.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has suggested amendments and provisions that are not in the Bill. I think it is only fair that the House should have an opportunity of considering them. It might be desirable that further amendments would be proposed. The hon. gentleman will see that when we go into committee that our opportunity for consideration would have expired when the committee rises.

Mr. McCARTHY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You have the third reading and concurrence.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The right hon. gentleman knows from an experience of 20 years that the opportunities in concurrence are not very great. The proper time to consider them is in committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Let us do so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says: Let us do so, but has the hon. gentleman considered the subject? If he had he would hardly have taken a vote of the people on the repeal of the Bill twelve months before it should be repealed.

Mr. McCARTHY. No, no.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says: "No." The hon. gentleman himself has admitted that repeal of the Scott Act has been carried in several counties although the Act has still a year to operate. Unless Parliament interferes that Act will continue to operate under the statute although the people have decided it ought to be repealed. The intention of the law was that an Order in Council authorising a vote to be taken ought not to have been issued until the three years had about expired. Clearly it never was the intention of Parliament that there should be a vote taken on a measure that is actually in operation, before the time has expired or about to expire within which that measure is to operate. The hon. gentleman says we can consider it in committee. He has not considered what he has done himself and the least that can be done is to give us an opportunity of considering the Bill. I do not say it is to be opposed. I say it is highly mischievous to have a law in operation after the people have condemned it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No doubt of that, but it is a remarkable condition of things that the people should be called upon to say whether they approve or disapprove of a measure, which the statute says should operate for another year. The Government administering the law have not carried out the intentions of Parliament.

Mr. TISDALE. The hon. gentleman either does not know what he is talking about or he is misrepresenting what the law is, because if the Government had waited five years before they submitted it to a vote people would have to wait another year before it could come into force. The facts are that they did wait three years less fifteen days, in every one of those seven counties, so that at the time of the vote there was only fifteen days to wait. If you waited five years you would still have to wait another year according to the explanation of the law given by the member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). If the hon. gentleman will take up this Bill he will see it has been distributed for over a month and if the hon. gentleman had not time to consider it he ought to have found time. The members in charge of it have considered it. I think the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has shown no cause for delay and that we should go into committee at once.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Let me remind the hon. gentleman the mover of this Bill proposes certain conditions which are not in the present Bill at all.

Mr. TISDALE. That is not the question. It is whether we are to go into committee or not.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what provisions he proposes to make to prevent a vote being taken until the three years has expired. The hon. gentleman sees there is no such provision in the statute.

Mr. MCCARTHY. You had better move it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, it is the hon. gentleman's Bill. His hon. friend beside him has fully considered the subject and has no doubt an amendment ready.

Mr. TISDALE. If I have I will move it at the proper time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The time has come now. The clause in the Bill reads thus:

"No Order in Council issued under this Act shall be revoked until after the expiration of three years from the date of the coming into force under it of the second part of this Act.

The hon. gentleman certainly must see that it is highly desirable that the Bill should not remain in force and continue to operate after the people have voted in favor of repeal, and therefore such vote ought not to be taken until after the time expires.

Mr. MCCARTHY. There is no doubt a great deal of force in what the hon. gentleman says, but that does not interfere with this section. The hon. gentleman will see I am copying from his own Bill, for he was a member of the Government that brought in this Scott Act.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes.

Mr. MCCARTHY. The hon. gentleman ought not to go back on his own measure. As I explained before I am distributing this section 96 into three or four sections without altering the Scott Act in any way. I am quite willing the hon. gentleman should make such a motion and speaking for myself am quite willing to adopt it as far as I can; that the vote for the repeal should not take place until a certain limited time within the three years; but that need not at all conflict with this section, which means that the Act need not be repealed by Order in Council until after three years.

On section 8,

Mr. TISDALE. Owing to the vote that took place the other day in no less than nine counties in the Province of Ontario, a very anomalous state of law exists. Although by a very large majority the qualified electors decided that the Scott Act is not law, it will still remain law for a year. I think as a matter of principle that is wrong, and it will put all those counties in this extraordinary position, that there will be no possibility of a license being issued, while the Scott Act, after the people have said they do not want it, will be comparatively impossible of enforcement. Therefore, in my opinion, it is the duty of this House to pass some legislation that will prevent this state of things. In moving the amendment that I have in my hand, I wish to state that last year when the motion was brought into the House for the repeal of the Scott Act, I was one of those who, though opposed to that Act, felt that we should not repeal it, on the ground that we should not take from the electors the right to say whether an Act should be law or not after Parliament had delegated that power to them. Now, the electors having said in those different large counties, by thousands in the aggregate majority, that they wish no more of that Act, I think it is wrong to leave those counties in this position, that they cannot get rid of it for a year. Therefore I move:

That in all counties in which a petition for the repeal of the Canada Temperance Act has been adopted by a vote of the qualified electors, and in the manner and according to the provisions of the said Act, the Governor in Council may forthwith, after the adoption thereof, pass an Order in Council declaring that the said Act is repealed in the said county, and the said Act shall, from the publication of the said Order in Council in the Canada Gazette, be repealed accordingly.

I wish to add one word in moving the resolution—one word which, I think, after all, so far as an individual is concerned, is the strongest sort of evidence—my own observation as to the effect that will follow in my own county, if some such provision is not adopted. While the Scott Act was in force, so far as the temperance cause is concerned, I regret exceedingly to say that in my opinion it did more harm than good. At the time the petition for the adoption of the Act was before the people, I was so staggered myself by the earnestness and the statements of the advocates of it, that I did not vote. But during the years that it has been in existence, particularly during the late elections for the Local Legislature and for this House, I was surprised and grieved, as I went through the county, to find the state of affairs that existed, as contrasted with the condition of the county a few years before, when we were under the License Act; and I believe things will be worse now unless we take some steps in this House to provide that, as soon as the people vote to repeal the Act, they can return to the license system.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him under what section of the Act he pretends that the Act will remain in force one year after its repeal is voted by the people?

Mr. TISDALE. Under several sections of the Act. I confess that, although in my own opinion a reasonably fair lawyer, I do not understand the Act; and I have conversed with several legal gentlemen who I thought knew better than myself, and they all arrived at the conclusion that it is uncertain; some say a year and some say ninety days. At all events the consensus of opinion that I have been able to gather in consulting eminent legal gentlemen, without respect to their political opinions, is that it will be a year before a license can properly be issued under the laws of Ontario. It can do no harm if I am wrong; but when there is such a consensus of opinion, will the hon. gentleman tell me there is no doubt under that Act, under the license laws of Ontario, that we can get a license within a year?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not answering the question.

Mr. LAURIER. That is not the fault of the Act; it is the fault of the law of Ontario.

Mr. TISDALE. It is an effect of the law. I propose to deal with principles, and I say it is a question of principle, and a most important principle, so far as one county, at all events, is concerned. I do not want to see a state of affairs continue to exist, which, for the past two years especially, have existed in some parts of the riding I have the honor to represent; and to prevent that I want to see that no doubt shall remain under this law, and that after the sense of the people has been proclaimed by a large majority in favor of repeal, we shall be able to go back to the old state of things, or to a better state of things.

Mr. LAURIER. I did not put the question with the view of carping at the amendment, but only to obtain information. I do not pretend to be familiar with the Act. The hon. gentleman has affirmed that the amendment together with the effect of the legislation, such as it exists, will be that when the Act will be repealed by the vote of the people, it will still remain in force for one year. I ask him to give me the section on which he bases that assertion, and he tells me it is the result of several sections. Those are the very sections concerning which I would like to be informed. The hon. gentleman must be familiar with them since he has undertaken to remove them from the statutes and replace them by something else. The hon. gentleman says that he cannot say whether the Act will remain in force for a year, but that at all events it will for ninety days.

Mr. TISDALE. No doubt of that.

Mr. LAURIER. I ask him to point to the sections which would have that effect?

Mr. TISDALE. It is sometime since I examined the Act, perhaps two or three weeks ago, before the vote took place, and I cannot now remember the sections or the particulars.

Mr. LAURIER. A moment ago my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) asked that the Bill be postponed until another sitting, in order to consider it, but the hon. gentleman said he was quite ready now, and rather taunted my hon. friend for not being ready. He said he had had the Act for a month in his hands, and was quite ready now to discuss it, and I inferred from that that he was quite ready to give the information I asked for.

Mr. MITCHELL. It appears to me there are entirely too many doctors about this patient. We have heard a good many opinions expressed on this Act, and a little time has been asked by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). What I think ought to be done is this: It is a public Bill which affects public interests, and the hon. the Minister of Justice should look into this point, and let the House really know what the effect of the law really is, as it stands, and what would be the effect of the proposed change. We ought not to go blindly into a question that may lead to endless litigation. Before dealing with an Act about which there are so many conflicting opinions, we ought to have the opinion of the Minister of Justice as to the position we will be in should this legislation be adopted.

Mr. McCARTHY. Perhaps I may be able to point out the meaning of the law, as I understand it, and the effect of the proposed amendment. The hon. the leader of the Opposition will find that the latter part of section 96 provides that the vote upon the repeal shall take effect, mutatis mutandis, according to the preceding sections 94 and 95 of the statute. It is as follows:—

“And each and all of the provisions of the preceding sections of this Act shall apply, mutatis mutandis, to every case of a petition and notice for the revocation of an Order in Council under this section and to the proceedings to be had and taken thereon, and in respect of the powers to be exercised and the offences that may be committed, and the penalties that may be incurred in the course of and in connection with such proceedings.”

Therefore, we have to look at sections 94 and 95 to see when this petition, having been adopted by the people will become effective. Section 95 says:

“When any petition embodied, as aforesaid, in any notice and in any proclamation under this part of this Act, has been adopted by the electors of the county or city named therein and to which the same relates, the Governor in Council may—”

That has taken place with regard to the appeal. The petition has been adopted.

—“at any time after the expiration of sixty days from the date on which the same was adopted—”

That is the first delay of sixty days. There is a delay of two months before the proclamation can issue.

—“by Order in Council published in the Canada Gazette, declare that the second part of this Act shall be in force and take effect in such county or city upon, from and after the day on which the annual or semi annual licenses for the sale of spirituous liquors then in force in such county or city will expire.”

Of course there are no licenses in force in such county or city; but if there were, they would be in force for the year ending next April. The consequence is although the proclamation may be made two months hence, that proclamation has to declare the law shall not become effective until the expiration of the license year. The difficulty created in the construction of the statute is by sub-section 2, between which and the section I have just read there appears to be a contradiction. Sub-section 2 says:

Mr. LAURIER.

“If, in any county or city, there are no licenses in force when the petition mentioned in the first part of this Act is adopted, the second part of this Act shall become and be in force and take effect in such county or city after the expiration of thirty days from the date of such Order in Council.”

That makes the ninety days that are spoken of. So that it is either ninety days from the time the Act is adopted or it is the year of the license. In either case, the mischief we are seeking to avoid will exist. In the one case it would exist twelve months and in the other case three months. My hon. friend proposes in amendment that the law should come at once into force, that the Governor in Council should have power to proclaim that a petition has been adopted and that the repeal should become at once effective. It would then be the duty of the provincial authorities to issue licenses; or, if they find that they cannot issue licenses, the provincial liquor license law, which is quite as stringent as this law, should be enforced, and we will not have the case of the people having determined that the law should not govern them and yet have that law in force. I would, however, suggest to my hon. friend that perhaps the amendment should better follow the words of the Act, so as to prevent any confusion or any of that litigation which the hon. member for Northumberland seems to desire so properly to avoid. Therefore, I propose that the amendment should read as follows:—

“And when any petition embodied, as aforesaid, for the repeal of the Act, has been adopted by the electors of the county or city named and to which the same relates, the Governor in Council may, at any time after the adoption, by Order in Council published in the Canada Gazette, declare that the second part of this Act shall be no longer in force.”

Mr. TISDALE. I do not care how the amendment is worded; it is only the principle I care about.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me that the amendment is quite appropriate, but I think the word “forthwith” is perhaps not the best that could be used under the circumstances. The object of the delay, as I understand it, was to allow any party that had petitions to present to the Government against putting the proclamation in force, to present them.

Mr. McCARTHY. We will say “thirty days” instead of “forthwith.”

Mr. FISHER. I think it is requisite that another addition should be made to this amendment, if this amendment be carried. I am not prepared to say that such an amendment ought not to be passed. I quite appreciate the difficulty which the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) has explained might occur, and, if the people of a county desire that there should be licenses in their midst instead of the Scott Act, I am quite prepared to grant them that right. But there has been in days past a great deal of difficulty in regard to the period at which repeal votes might be taken. An interpretation has been given to the Act which would allow a repeal vote to take place within a very short time after the original vote adopting the Act had been passed; and, although section 95 says that:

“No Order in Council issued under this Act shall be revoked until after the expiration of three years from the day of the coming into force under it of the second part of this Act.”

Still, under certain conditions and circumstances, a vote upon a repeal petition has been allowed very much before the three years have expired. If the amendment is passed, unless some change is made, there might be a vote taken upon a repeal petition within a year after the adoption of the Act, and the repeal would come into force immediately after the vote was taken. It was an essential principle of the Act originally that no repeal should or could take place until the Act had been tried for three years. I am aware that quite recently the Government have issued an Order in Council by which a repeal vote cannot be taken until fifteen days after the expiration of the three years, and I quite agree with and appreciate the motive of that Order in Council; but, if this amendment were to be made part of the Act, and a change were made in the Order in Council, which the Government are quite competent to make at any time without reference to Parliament and according to their own will, they might make a repeal vote competent to be taken within a very much shorter time, and the Act might be repealed just after it was adopted, which would be entirely contrary to the principle of the Act. Therefore, if this amendment is to be adopted, there ought to be incorporated in it a declaration that no repeal vote shall take place until fifteen days after three years have elapsed from the time of the adoption of the Act. If that decision is come to, and is embodied in the Act, I shall be very glad to support the amendment, but otherwise, if the Order in Council were to be revoked or changed in any way, I point out the danger which there would be in the adoption of this amendment, and I warn the temperance people in this House of the great danger there would be of the Act being repealed very soon after its adoption, and thus one of the first principles of the Act as originally adopted would be completely obliterated.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I must congratulate the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) on the extraordinary legal knowledge he showed in regard to the statute which is under discussion. He had the frankness to inform the House that I knew nothing of the subject under discussion, but let him have an opportunity of showing what he knew and he would convince the House that he was thoroughly familiar with the subject, that he knew as much about it as he did about his alphabet. He got up, and, with great confidence and great legal learning and familiarity with the statute, he said he was familiar with it a fortnight ago, but that now when it was under discussion he had forgotten all he knew before. I think he would have exhibited greater taste if he had shown a little more modesty. When he assured the House that he was so thoroughly familiar with the subject, he ought to have informed us how it was that no change could be made in the law for a year, although the people had voted for its repeal. I ask the attention of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), whose Bill is now under consideration, to the provision of the law which he has quoted, which it seems to me is not applicable to a repeal of the Act, but has simply to do with the bringing into operation of the Canada Temperance Act. Section 95 says:

"When in any county or city one-half or more of all the votes polled have been against the adoption of any petition embodied as aforesaid in any notice and in any proclamation, under this the first part of this Act, no similar petition shall be put to the vote of the electors of such county or city for a period of three years from the day on which such vote was taken."

That clearly refers to bringing the Act into operation for the first time. It has no reference to the repeal. The next section says:

"When any petition embodied as aforesaid in any notice and in any proclamation under this the first part of this Act has been adopted by the electors of the county or city named therein and to which the same relates, the Governor General in Council may, at any time after the expiration of sixty days from the day of which the same was adopted, by Order in Council published in the Canada Gazette declare that the second part of this Act shall be in force and take effect in such county or city upon, from and after the day on which the annual or semi-annual license for the sale of spirituous liquors then in force in such county or city will expire."

Now it is clear what the provisions of the law are and what the intention was. Here is a licensing system in operation at the time the vote is taken, and the law simply provides that the licenses must expire before the Act goes into operation. While that puts restrictions upon the effect of the law as far as bringing it into operation is concerned, it in no way imposes any restrictions on the repeal. It is true that it may be in operation in some Provinces where licenses might not be in operation, but this section refers only to the bringing of the Act into operation. It is said that these licenses may not expire for some weeks, and it is provided that, until the time has expired during which they are to operate, the Act shall not be in force. That is the provision, and it is clear that that is the intention of the law; and, when the hon. gentleman said that a year must expire before a licensing system could be brought into operation, he stated what is not the fact, and there is no such provisions in the statute, and there is no such regulation.

Mr. TISDALE. The hon. gentleman has tried to show that he is capable of sitting upon a young member of this House, but I do not feel at all sat upon, to use a common phrase. The Act I referred to was the Act of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and I say that it is so simple that any gentleman can understand it. The Act which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) accuses me of not understanding is an Act which he drew himself, and I do not think that any other legal gentleman understands it except himself—that is, the Canada Temperance Act. I had to acknowledge to the leader of the Opposition that I did not understand it, that I could not make head or tail of it. I believe in endeavoring to legislate upon principles, and not to attempt to split hairs. I think it may have been unintentionally confused, and I do not think I am as well able as the hon. gentleman to deal with matters of that kind in which hair splitting is required, but I propose to deal with material principles, and not to take up so much time in order to see whether one hon. gentleman or another expresses himself clearly or not. It was the principle I was after, and that, I think, should be the foundation of all legislation. I am very glad the hon. leader of the Opposition made the suggestion with regard to the 30 days. I think I was wrong, and I think the Government should be limited to a certain reasonable time to allow other parties to be heard. I am perfectly willing to accept that correction, and the amended phraseology as suggested by the hon. member in charge of the Bill.

Mr. McCARTHY. With regard to the observations of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher), I think his suggestion is very well worthy the consideration of the committee. It appears to me it would be well to provide by statute, instead of leaving it to Order in Council, that the vote should not take place for a repeal until within a short period before the Act may be brought to an end. It is not, however, at all germane to the proposition now before the Chair. I think it would be better, if my hon. friend would frame, as I suggested to him privately a moment ago, another clause with that object. I propose the following, if my hon. friend from South Norfolk will agree to allow this to be substituted for the amendment he has put into your hand:

When a petition for the revocation of an Order in Council for the bringing into operation of the second part has been adopted by the electors of the county or the city named therein, and to which the same relates, the Governor in Council may, at any time after the expiration of 30 days from the date on which the same was so adopted, by Order in Council published in the Canada Gazette, declare the second part of this Act shall no longer be in force.

I do not propose to answer my hon. friend from Bothwell about the construction of the law. It appears to me that it bears that construction, but to so high an authority I will not attempt, on any material matter of that kind, to waste the time of the committee. All I think the hon. member for South Norfolk meant to say was, that he had forgotten more about this Bill than ever the hon. gentleman for Bothwell knew.

Amendment of Mr. Tisdale, as modified, agreed to.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I have an amendment which more properly applies to the second part of the Canada Temperance Act. It is within the knowledge of some hon. members that all suits under this Act are brought under the Summary Convictions Act; and there is a clause in that Summary Convictions Act to this effect:

"Every one who aids, abets, counsels or procures the commission of any offence punishable on summary conviction, may be proceeded against and convicted either in the territorial division or place where the principal offender may be convicted, or in that in which the offence of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring was committed."

I desire to introduce an amendment that will prevent a witness, on being asked if he had, at a certain time, bought any liquor of any person, from refusing to reply, taking advantage of that clause and saying that he does not wish to criminate himself. There is just such a clause that applies to the first part of the Canada Temperance Act, which, however, does not apply to the second. I can see no reason, and other legal gentlemen can see no reason why a witness should be allowed to take advantage, on being placed on the witness stand, of that part of the Summary Convictions Act, and refuse to answer questions and say that he does not wish to criminate himself. Therefore I copy the wording of the clause in the first part of the Canada Temperance Act, and would move this amendment:

No person shall be excused from answering any question put to him in any action, suit or other proceeding, in any court or before any judge, justice, or justices of the peace, stipendiary magistrate or other tribunal touching or concerning any infraction of the provisions of this Act, on the ground of any privilege or on the ground that the answer to such questions will tend to criminate such person; but no answer given by any person claiming to be excused on the ground of privilege or on the ground that such answer will tend to criminate himself, shall be used in any criminal proceeding against such person other than an indictment for perjury, if the judge, or justice or justices of the peace, stipendiary magistrate, or president of the tribunal, gives to the witness a certificate that he claimed the right to be excused, on either of the grounds aforesaid, and made full and true answers to the satisfaction of the judge, justice, or justices of the peace, stipendiary magistrate or tribunal.

I desire to have this amendment made, because in the constituency I represent, this Canada Temperance Act is in good working order, and it has been countenanced by the municipality, which has given an unlimited license, so far as funds are concerned, to carry out the provisions of the Act; and a firm of solicitors have been employed to see that the prosecutions are carried on in a proper manner. I may say that they have been very successful in that county in carrying out this Act, and the selling of liquor is reduced to a minimum. You can hardly find a shop in the county where liquor is to be sold, and if any infraction of the law is discovered, it is promptly put before the inspector, who just as promptly brings it before the proper tribunal. The inspector in that county has called my attention to this discrepancy in the Act, and I was asked to bring it before the House and to secure the proper amendment.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think that amendment properly belongs to the next Bill, which is one for the amendment of the same Act, in the hands of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson). I am afraid this provision would conflict with the amendment which my hon. friend has submitted to the committee. We had better deal with one thing at a time. I could not vote for the amendment. My feeling would be to expunge the clause from the Act compelling people to commit perjury or criminate themselves. But we had better not interfere with that matter in the present measure. I purposely dropped out from the Bill of last year everything of a controversial character, and this Bill is to simplify matters and is introduced practically with the consent of both sides and of all parties in the House.

Mr. McCARTHY.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to offer a suggestion in regard to this subject, and it is this: that there should be no procedure under this Act with respect to the mode of trial, the giving of testimony and the summoning of witnesses which does not apply to every other kind of conviction. I would rather suggest to the hon. gentleman, who has just taken his seat, not in the line taken by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), that this amendment belongs to the next Bill, but rather that it belongs to the Summary Convictions Amendment Act, and I have a Bill to amend that Act which I will introduce to-morrow, and it could come into that Bill more appropriately. If the principle is admitted and adopted, it should apply to all summary convictions, and if it is not a wise provision in regard to Summary Convictions Act it should not be adopted in regard to this Act.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. FISHER. I move an amendment as follows:—

No provision for the revocation of the Order in Council which declares the Canada Temperance Act in force shall be submitted to a vote of the electors more than fifteen days before the expiration of three years from the date of the Order in Council, which declared that the Act was in force in such county or city.

I have followed as closely as possible the wording of the Order in Council passed by the Government last summer, which fixes the date I have given, namely, not more than fifteen days before the expiration of the three years. I also propose that the amendment should come in before section No. 4. I move it after consulting with the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who accepts the amendment and agrees that it should be inserted at the place I have indicated.

Mr. MILLS. It would be very convenient in those Provinces where there is a fixed date for issuing the licenses that there should be a provision in the Bill that the vote either for bringing the Act into operation or for its repeal should be taken very near the time at which licenses issue. The hon. gentleman will see that it would be highly convenient wherever there is a fixed date to issue the licenses to provide that voting on the Act shall take place immediately preceding that time. In Ontario, the date for issuing licenses is 1st May. Suppose the Act was repealed in July, what would be the condition of things from that month until May following?

Mr. McCARTHY. The law will come into force on 1st May, whatever time it may have been carried. The amendment provides that the vote for the repeal must take place during the last fifteen days of April, so that the mischief which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) thinks may happen, cannot possibly occur. There might be an advantage if the voting took place on 1st January at the time of the municipal election, but on the other hand there would be a hiatus between January and 1st May when the law would not be in practical operation in the event of repeal.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. IVES. I move:

That in cases where a county is divided for municipal purposes after having adopted the Canada Temperance Act of 1864 or the Canada Temperance Act of 1878, the vote for the repeal of the same or either thereof may be taken precisely as it might have been taken if said county had not been divided."

The difficulty is this: That under the Canada Temperance Act of 1864, sub-section 13 of section 4, provides for the case of repeal. It says that a by-law so approved or adopted, as the case may be, may be repealed by a by-law of the council of the municipality affected thereby and such by-law shall be submitted for approval to the electors in the manner and with the formalities provided by the foregoing sub-section. In the case of the division of a county into two parts after the adoption of the Canada Temperance Act of 1864, there is no provision in the law for the passing of a repeal by-law or for a vote being taken to repeal that by-law. I am quite sure that if the committee or the House appreciates the difficulty they would be willing to adopt an amendment which would remove the difficulty in a case of this kind. Take the case of the county of Richmond, one of the counties which I represent. A by-law was passed by the county of Richmond several years ago under the old Dunkin Act or Canada Temperance Act of 1864 and since that by-law was adopted the county of Richmond has been divided for municipal purposes, and the town of Richmond has been incorporated as a municipality and has been separated entirely for municipal purposes from the county of Richmond. Legal gentlemen have advised the warden of the county that, under the Act, there is no machinery by which a repeal of the by-law can be passed upon at all. The council of the town of Richmond cannot adopt a by-law and have it submitted either to the town or county of Richmond, and the county of Richmond cannot adopt a by-law and have it submitted either to that part of the county which remains after deducting the town of Richmond from the county, nor can they submit it to the whole county as the law now stands. What I desire is that the part of the county which originally adopted this by-law should be permitted to repeal it, and that the machinery shall be adopted by the whole county as it originally stood at the time this by-law was adopted, and again vote upon the question of the continuance or repeal of this by-law. I once before introduced a resolution to this House on this subject and in that case I think my resolution was that the town of Richmond should be permitted to repeal the Act for the town of Richmond. That was refused by the House some years ago. At the present time I can see no good reason why the House should not be willing to afford a remedy in this case. I think there would be no disposition on the part of the House to condemn the county of Richmond to remain forever under the Act if the people did not wish to do so. I presume there is no disposition on the part of anyone to take advantage of a defect in the law, or the machinery, as it now exists. I am quite sure that the committee would be disposed to permit the whole county of Richmond to vote for its repeal, and that it would be willing to have an amendment to this Bill passed which would enable the whole county to adopt the by-law and to vote upon it as in the case of the Canada Temperance Act. I therefore place this motion in your hands, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JAMIESON. I would point out in the first place that there is no Canada Temperance Act of 1878 in existence, and in addition to that I think a very great difficulty may arise if that amendment is passed. It may not arise in connection with the territory to which the hon. gentleman from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) refers, but I know of some counties in the Province of Ontario where if that amendment were adopted it would be utterly impossible to repeal the law. Take for instance the counties of Lennox and Addington. If the county of Lennox under that amendment could repeal the Scott Act which they probably could do because there is a sheriff and registrar's office in that county, but in the county of Addington there is neither a sheriff's nor a registrar's office, and there would be no place to deposit the petition, so that the Act would remain in force in perpetuity in one or other of those counties. That is the difficulty I see in connection with the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives).

Mr. LAURIER. I would like to ask my hon. friend for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) if there has been any judicial decision upon the difficulty which he has just referred to? Has there been a decision from the court at Sherbrooke?

Mr. IVES. There has been a decision to this effect, that the Local Legislature in incorporating the town of Richmond, permitted, by the Act of incorporation, the town of Richmond to repeal the Dunkin Act and to issue licenses. The courts declared that to be ultra vires of the Local Legislature, and the state of affairs there now is that the council are granting certificates to the hotel keepers, which the hotel keepers are paying for, and the Local Government are refusing to issue licenses, and the sale of liquor is going on under municipal certificates, without licenses. A legal opinion has been obtained from several legal gentlemen, to the effect that under the Canada Temperance Act there is no machinery by which a vote can be taken. The law says a council may pass a repealing by-law, but there are two councils in this case, the council of the county and the council of the town, having no more connection than the county of Drummond with the county of Richmond. The first difficulty is that there is no council that has power to pass a repealing by-law. Then the law says the municipal officer shall be the returning officer, but there is no officer of that kind in common with the town and the county. Therefore there is no machinery for holding a poll, even if it were possible to get the repealing by-law passed. So the county is in a deadlock.

Mr. LAURIER. It strikes me that the objection is not so serious as the hon. gentleman would lead us to believe. If it were, it would follow that it would be in the power of the Provincial Legislature altogether to defeat the legislation of this Parliament. Now, I do not conceive that anything can be done by a Local Legislature which would have that effect. It is true, legal gentlemen may have given their opinion in that way, but legal gentlemen have also given the opposite opinion, and it seems to me it would be better to leave the question to be settled by the courts than to attempt to do it by new legislation, which I think would only make confusion worse confounded.

Mr. IVES. I would ask leave to withdraw the amendment I proposed, and to substitute this one, which has been kindly suggested to me by the hon. Minister of Justice:

The provisions of section 97 of the Canada Temperance Act shall be applicable to counties which have been divided for municipal purposes after the adoption of the Temperance Act of 1864.

Mr. LAURIER. Is the hon. Minister of opinion that this meets the objection?

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand from the discussion that the difficulty has arisen under section 97 of the Canada Temperance Act, owing to an opinion having been given from the bench that the provisions of that section can only be made applicable to the municipality that adopted the by-law, and that, therefore, they are not applicable where a county has been divided. I cannot conceive of any other objection than that arising, and it may be that that is the true construction of section 97, although I would hardly say that it is.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not say that the amendment may not be necessary, but in consequence of the Provincial Legislature—

Mr. IVES. In consequence of the division of the county. Mr. LAURIER. Divided under the legislation of the Provincial Legislature, and it would therefore be in the power of the Local Legislature to defeat any Act of this Parliament.

Mr. THOMPSON. That might have been the effect, as the body that had power to pass the repealing by-law no longer exists.

Mr. LAURIER. It opens up a very large question.

Mr. McCARTHY. That seems to be the effect of clause 97. An amendment of this kind is necessary so far as the Dunkin Act is concerned, but not so far as the Canada Temperance Act is concerned. We ought to recognise the divisions made by the Local Legislature, and allow the council of a county formed out of any portion of an old county to petition. Since the adoption of the Act, the Muskoka portion has been taken from the county of Simcoe, and also from Victoria, and it has been formed into a new municipal district; and it appears to me that the principle we ought to follow is this: that where a new county has been created by the provincial body, that county ought to have the power to repeal the Act. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) shakes his head. I do not see why one county should be obliged to retain the Act by a vote of the majority in another county with which it was formerly connected. If it is separated from the old county for one purpose, it seems to me it ought to be separated for all purposes.

Mr. FISHER. I shook my head on this account: that the Canada Temperance Act comes within the electoral divisions established by the Acts of this Parliament, and has no reference whatever to either provincial or municipal divisions. In the Province of Ontario, it was not the electoral division established by the Local Legislature which voted on the Scott Act, but the Gerrymander divisions established by this Parliament. I do not see that it is necessary to have any reference whatever to the municipal or provincial divisions which may arise.

Mr. McCARTHY. My hon. friend is in error. The petition comes, not from the electoral divisions, but from the county. For instance, the County of Simcoe embraces a part of Muskoka for other purposes, and there are four or five electoral divisions in that county. I presume that my hon. friend's objection will be withdrawn, as it was made under misapprehension.

Committee rose and reported.

THE CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Mr. JAMIESON moved second reading of Bill (No. 10) to amend the Canada Temperance Act. He said: I trust that this Bill will receive the same kindly treatment which has been given to the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). In my opinion the measure is a far more important one, and one that should have received the attention of the House long ago. In fact many of its provisions were adopted by this House three years ago, but unfortunately the Upper Chamber would not consent to pass the Bill, at all events, in the shape in which it left this House. I propose, in the first instance, to give a very short explanation of the provisions of this Bill, and then to make some remarks on the present position of the Canada Temperance Act. The first provision is for the purpose of remedying a defect which was discovered in the application of the law. Those conversant with the law will recollect that a petition has to be deposited either in the registry office of the county or in the office of the sheriff of the county; and in the county of Perth, where a petition was deposited in one of the registry offices, there being two in the county, the result was that the people lost their petition. Now, I think that the purposes of this Act will be served if the petition is simply deposited in one registry office, and it is proposed to amend the law in that respect. The second and third clause of the Bill are for the purpose of making the Canada Temperance Act applicable to the Province of British Columbia, where, I understand, there are no municipal counties; and in order to make the Act applicable to that Province, we have provided that the petition shall be deposited in the office of the registrar of voters in the electoral divisions, as constituted for representation in the Dominion Parliament. It is not necessary for me to make any further reference to that point, because I think it was the original intention of Parliament that the Act should apply to the whole Dominion. We also propose to make it applicable to the temporary judicial districts in the Province of Ontario, and, when such exists, in the other Provinces also, as there is no reason why, if the people of these temporary judicial districts should adopt the law, they should be deprived of it. The fifth clause of the Bill is no longer necessary because the hon. member for Brome has embodied the same amendment in the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe which has just passed through the committee, so that I shall have to ask the committee to allow me to expunge that clause. Now we propose making a change in section 94, but we think it will answer the purpose better to repeal the section and remodel it altogether rather than make changes by interlineation. We propose, in the first place, in repealing the old and enacting a new section, that medical men may prescribe in any quantities they think proper. At present they can only prescribe in quantities a pint and over, and I never could understand why the law was framed in that way. Frequently it is necessary for a medical man to prescribe small quantities of liquor, but under the present law it is impossible for them to do so. In addition to that we propose that a penalty shall be imposed on medical men giving colorless certificates. I do not think any respectable, honorable medical man can take offence at any provisions of this kind. But there are unfortunately in the medical as in other professions black sheep who will prostitute their position for the purpose of pecuniary gain, and who delight in evading the law. We propose also to repeal section 103, and to re-enact it in a simpler form. In the original Act, it will be observed, there is a special rule made for each Province. I am referring now to the judicial or magisterial authority before whom prosecutions may be brought, and it is proposed to simplify the procedure so that there will be one joint rule for the whole Dominion. Two or three of the following sections are simply for the purpose of making the law conform to the amendment to which I have just directed attention. One of the most important provisions of this Bill is in reference to the search clause. Difficulties have arisen in my own Province in reference to the administration of the law under section 108. Our courts have held that a search warrant, notwithstanding the provisions of that clause, cannot issue until after there has been a conviction. If the search clause is to be effective at all, it must be obvious that provision should be made by which a search should be made at any time and prior to a conviction. We propose to change the law in two respects. We propose that, on the oath of a credible witness that he has good cause to suspect and believe that liquor is kept for sale in violation of the second part of the statute, a magistrate may issue a search warrant; and we propose to extend the right of search to any hour. Perhaps some objection may be taken to this by hon. members of this House, but a much stronger provision than this exists in the license law of my own Province. I am not familiar with the license laws of the other Provinces, and I cannot speak in reference to them on this point, but I know that in my own Province there is a provision in the law by which search may be made at any time; and moreover, the right which is given under that law is so strong that a police officer or constable or inspector may at any time enter into any place where liquor is reputed to be sold, without any search warrant at all. Then, there is a provision in reference to the destruction of the liquor, and we propose also to provide a set of forms for the guidance of justices of the peace. There are some amendments which I shall be compelled to ask for when we go into committee. Lastly, I will refer to the last clause of the Bill, which provides for the application of the penalty. I think it is only reasonable and proper that whatever authority—be it provincial or otherwise—undertakes the burden of enforcing the law should also have the benefits to be derived from it. That is all I have to say by way of explanation of the Bill, but I have some further remarks to make, and I shall proceed now to make them. It may be said, perhaps, that, after the result of the voting which took place on Thursday last on the Canada Temperance Act, its usefulness has gone.

Mr. McCARTHY.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. JAMIESON. It is hard to understand what is the meaning of those "hear, hears," but, if the Canada Temperance Act has become unpopular, it is largely in consequence of its not being enforced properly, and I am afraid that the responsibility for that rests not so much upon this House as upon the Upper Chamber, where reasonable amendments to this law have been repeatedly refused. I believe there are other reasons which exist for the unpopularity of the law and one is that the law has not been efficiently enforced. I am now speaking in reference to my own Province. I may take for instance my own county. We had two inspectors appointed by the Ontario Government. We also had a police magistrate appointed. Shortly after the Act came into force a police magistrate was appointed by the Province of Ontario, but the courts held that the appointment, as far as the Canada Temperance Act was concerned, was invalid, and consequently he could act no longer, he could adjudicate on prosecutions no longer. What should have been done, in my judgment, was that he should have been re-appointed in a proper way. In the first instance, he was only appointed for each riding separately, and he should have been re-appointed for the whole county; but, instead of that being done the matter was allowed to stand in that loose way for some months, until practically the law was a dead letter on the Statute-book. All through the Province of Ontario we have had difficulties arising in connection with the enforcement of the law of this nature, and my contention is that, until a very recent period, if at all, the law has not had fair play as far as my own Province is concerned; but, if the law has not been effective, that is the greater reason why proper amendments should be made to it, so that, if it can be made effective, those who are promoting the law may have some reasonable means of operating it and standing behind it. It is quite true, and I recognise the fact, that on Thursday last a very serious blow was dealt to the Canada Temperance Act, and it may be possible that a series of disasters may follow; but the fact remains that, for another year at least, in from 50 to 60 counties in this Dominion, this law will be upon the Statute-book, and I believe it is the duty, not only of this Parliament, but of every subject in this Dominion, to do all in his power to aid in enforcing the law. Further, this law, as far as the temperance people of this Dominion were concerned, was of a tentative character in the first instance. I have stated before, and I repeat, that in the first place the temperance people of the Dominion never asked for a local option law, or at least not for the Canada Temperance Act. I am not sure but that, in the first instance, they asked for the old Dunkin Act. In 1875, the temperance people of this Dominion asked for a plebiscite, for a popular vote on this subject throughout the whole Dominion. The Government of that day refused to grant that request, but, in lieu of it, they offered this improved local option law. Well, the temperance people, of course, did not think proper to refuse it. They did not get all they wanted, but they accepted what they were offered. Now, when, in 1883, this Parliament was very largely petitioned in favor of the principle of general prohibition, we were told on every hand that we had a law on the Statute-book and it was our duty to operate that, that we could sound public opinion in regard to prohibition in that way, and that, in any case, we could have prohibition in any section where the people were favorable to it. Possibly that was a reasonable ground for Parliament to take. The temperance people immediately afterwards laid hold of the Canada Temperance Act. They adopted it over a large area of this Dominion, and, if the Canada Temperance Act has not proved as satisfactory as the friends of temperance could have desired, it is not the fault of the temperance people, and they are now in a position to come back to Parliament and say: "We have done what you told us to do, and now we make a further demand, and that is the demand of general prohibition." In my judgment, Sir, the vote which took place on Thursday last is no indication that the temperance or prohibition sentiment in this country is waning in any degree. It is quite true that an unfavorable gale has struck the prohibition ship, and she has lurched for a time, but we live in hope that a favorable gale from heaven will soon fill her sails and waft her on to the destined haven.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is only blessed spirits which come from heaven.

Mr. JAMIESON. I am not prepared to admit that the Canada Temperance Act has been a failure. I am prepared to admit that so far it has not realised the expectations of those who framed it; but that it has been a failure in every sense of the word I most emphatically deny. I have some figures here that I intend to give to the House, which satisfy me, at all events, that the Act has proved effective in curtailing the traffic in intoxicating liquor. I refer to the license report published by the Provincial Secretary for the Province of Ontario. From that report I take 20 counties in which the Canada Temperance Act is in force. I take the number of convictions or commitments to prison for drunkenness in 1884, when the Canada Temperance Act was only in force in one county in the Province of Ontario, that is, the county of Halton; and I take the number of commitments for the year 1887, when the Canada Temperance Act was in force in 20 and more counties in that Province. In those counties the number of commitments in the year 1882 was 756; in 1887, in the same counties, under the Canada Temperance Act, the number of commitments was only 214, or a deduction of 542 cases. Now, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this indicates in the strongest possible way that the Canada Temperance Act has, to a certain degree, been effective in preventing drunkenness. It has been said that there has been an increase in certain counties, and Brant, Carleton, Frontenac, and Middlesex have been instanced as counties in which the Scott Act was in force, and the number of commitments for drunkenness has increased. Now, Sir, those who used that argument have not been honest in doing so. The fact must not be overlooked that these counties have attached to them cities of considerable size in which the Canada Temperance Act has not been in force. For instance, the county of Brant has the city of Brantford attached to it; the county of Carleton has the city of Ottawa attached to it; the county of Frontenac has the city of Kingston, and the county of Middlesex the city of London. Now, I would refer to the commitments for drunkenness in some 13 counties in which the Canada Temperance Act has not been in force, and compare the year 1884 with the year 1887. In 1884 the number of commitments was 3,280; in 1887 the number was 2,851. It will be seen there was a decrease of a little over 400, or a decrease of about one-seventh in the counties in which the Canada Temperance Act was not in force, whereas there has been a decrease of about one-third in those counties in which the Act has been in force. Then, again, I shall refer the House to a few figures in reference to the consumption of spirits since 1880 up to the present time, for the purpose of showing that the Canada Temperance Act, or some other good influence, is decreasing the consumption of liquor. It will be observed that from 1880 up to a certain period the consumption of spirits in this Dominion increased, whereas since 1886, there has been a decrease. In 1880, the quantity of spirits manufactured for home consumption was 2,296,987 gallons; the quantity imported for the same purpose was 1,445,009 gallons. In 1881, there was a slight decrease. In 1882, the quantity ran up to 4,029,067 gallons manufactured for home consumption, and the imports were 1,666,173. In 1885, the quantity manufactured for home consumption was 4,274,722 gallons, and there were imported for home consumption 964,181 gallons. In 1886, when the Canada Temperance Act, came into force in a large section of this Dominion, the quantity of liquor manufactured for home consumption fell to 2,478,098 gallons, and the imports fell to 906,019 gallons. Last year again there was a considerable decrease. Now, Sir, in my judgment the good influence that has been at work is the operation of the Canada Temperance Act, which has reduced the consumption of liquor in this Dominion. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have a few more remarks to make before I sit down. I was placed in a very embarrassing position on Wednesday last in reference to this question in this House, and this is the first opportunity I have had of entering into an explanation of my connection with it, and I am quite sure the House will indulge me for a short time while I make reference to it. I was charged by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) with having obstructed, rather than advanced, amendments to the Canada Temperance Act; and he referred to the occasion, last year, when an effort was about to be made to advance the Bill out of its proper order in the same way that was done three years ago; and the hon. member for Bothwell charged me with having opposed that movement. Well, Sir, I made an explanation a week ago, on Monday last, in this House, as to the manner in which we have co-operated on both sides of this House in temperance legislation. I stated, in answer to the hon. member for Bothwell, that the action I took on the occasion to which he refers, was the result of a conference had between the temperance men of the two political parties in this House. I now make that statement just as emphatically as I made it on that occasion. Unfortunately the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) had forgotten a meeting to which I made reference. The Bill was not introduced last year as soon as it might have been under other circumstances. The circumstances which preceded the introduction of the Bill were these: The Dominion Alliance, which has advised us all through, was here when the House was in session, and I was not requested until the meeting of the Alliance was held to introduce this Bill last session. It was down on the Order Paper in the ordinary way. When it was found impossible to reach the measure in the ordinary way, I had a conference with the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher), and we concluded to call a meeting of the friends of temperance in this House—we had called them together on former occasions—not a large meeting but a few of those who took some interest in the cause of temperance. I was to notify hon. members on my side of the House and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) was to notify hon. members on his side of the House. That meeting was held. There are, I think, in the House, I do not know whether they are in the House to-night or not, but I can give the names of the gentlemen present at that meeting, and it may refresh the memory of the hon. member for Brome. I would not enter into this explanation if it were not for the fact that in the public press I have been grossly misrepresented in this matter, and I am resolved with the indulgence of the House to put myself right. The hon. member for Lennox (Mr. Wilson) was present at that meeting, and I think he will corroborate what I say in regard to it. The hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Landry), was also present. The hon. member for Queen's, N.S. (Mr. Freeman), was also present.

Mr. JAMIESON.

Senator Vidal presided at the meeting. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) was present, and the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), who sits on the other side of the House, informed me the other day that he was present at the meeting. I do not charge the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) with wrong-doing in the matter, but I think it is unfortunate, so far as I am personally concerned, that his memory is at fault, because the meeting was certainly held and my action in regard to this Bill was governed entirely by the action of that meeting. I have no desire to allow the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to misrepresent me before this House. I can tell that hon. gentleman that I have a record upon this question to which he cannot point. When the Dunkin Act was submitted in my county I took the platform in favor of it and it was adopted. Afterwards when the Scott Act was being promoted in my county I pursued a similar course, and in so doing gave offence to a large number of my political supporters; I risked my seat in the House on that question, and I am not prepared to submit to any taunt from the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in regard to my course upon the temperance question in this House. I should like to ask if the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has in his capacity as an elector of the Dominion ever cast a vote for the Temperance Act? I should like to know if that hon. gentleman ever stood on a public platform to advocate the cause of temperance, more especially in the interests of the Canada Temperance Act? I should like to know what course that hon. gentleman pursued in this House last session when the question of prohibition was before the House? When that question was introduced into the House by myself, at the request of the Dominion Alliance, there were several amendments proposed to it. There was a wine and beer amendment, there was a repeal of the Scott Act amendment. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) stood his ground and voted upon those two amendments; but when the crucial question came, the question of compensation and the main motion in reference to prohibition, where was the hon. gentleman to be found? Not in this Chamber—he slunk out of the Chamber.

Mr. MILLS. No.

Mr. JAMIESON. I say he slunk out of the Chamber. He beat the record of Maud S. in getting out of the Chamber when the prohibition vote was before the House.

Mr. MILLS. I voted.

Mr. JAMIESON. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) stood up valiantly four times, but I have no doubt that the old poetic adage that—

“He who fights and runs away,
Will live to fight another day,” occurred to him, and he retreated and was not to be found when the main motion and the money compensation amendment were disposed of by this House.

Mr. MILLS. I voted on it. I voted against prohibition.

Mr. JAMIESON. No; I beg your pardon. It is not in Hansard.

Mr. MILLS. I was here and voted, and my vote was recorded.

Mr. JAMIESON. I have little more to say on this question, but I am resolved that at all events I will place my position before the House and I trust to some extent before the country, because my record is clear upon this question, and I am not open to the charge of inconsistency which was hurled across the floor on a former occasion this Session when the question of prohibition was before the House. I will refer to one other matter. Because I voted against the resolution or rather an amendment introduced by the hon.

member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in reference to the reformation or reconstitution of the Senate, foresooth I must be charged with voting against temperance. I referred the other day to the fact that in 1874 the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) introduced a resolution into this House and submitted a motion in regard to the reconstitution of the Senate, that resolution received the assent of this House or of the House then assembled. But the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) afterwards entered the Cabinet of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), and he did not take one single step in the direction in which the resolution pointed. If he were sincere upon that question he ought, while a member of the Cabinet, while his friends were in power and in a large majority, to have placed in some practical form upon the Statute book of the country his scheme in reference to the reformation of the Senate. I am at one with him in reference to the constitution of the Senate, but the hon. gentleman excused himself the other day on the ground that he believed the course he pursued last year was the proper course in bringing up a matter of that kind. But the hon. gentleman forgets that last year he placed upon the notice paper a similar resolution to the one which he introduced in 1874 in reference to the constitution of the Senate. So that, on two occasions he introduced the question as a substantive motion and only on one occasion as a motion of a want of confidence in the Government. But I said then—I believe I was misrepresented in regard to the last motion which the hon. gentleman made in this House—on the amendment moved on going into Committee of Supply that I did not vote against the amendment on the ground that it was a motion of want of confidence in the Government. I voted it on the ground that it would be a breach of the understanding which has existed for years between the temperance men in the two political parties in this country. It is an understood principle, a formulated principle on which the Dominion Alliance is based that all action in reference to the temperance question shall emanate from that Alliance and that they shall receive the support as far as possible of the temperance men of both sides of this House. The other day when I voted against the amendment of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) I voted consistently. I voted on the lines laid down by the Dominion Alliance and if I had voted otherwise I would have been voting want of confidence in the Dominion Alliance of which I am a member. I have no hesitation in saying here to-night that the course that the member for Bothwell has pursued has been a most disastrous one for the cause of temperance in this country. A paid agent of the opponents of prohibition in this House could not have pursued a course more detrimental to the interests of temperance than the course pursued by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I have placed my views on this question before the House and I am sorry I was obliged to go into this personal matter, but there was considerable provocation and perhaps this is the only occasion on which I will have an opportunity of doing so. I believe that I have succeeded in showing, in the judgment at all events of every reasonable man, that my course upon the prohibition and temperance question has been a consistent one not only in my own county, but also in this the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, I rather regret that this personal question has entered into the discussion at so early a stage, upon the second reading of what I believe to be a very important measure in the interests of the people of Canada. After the words which have fallen from the lips of my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) and since my name has been mentioned so often by him I think it necessary that I should say a few words upon this point. In the first place I wish to allude to the discussion which occurred here a little while ago upon the motion for total prohibition, moved by that hon. gentleman. On that occasion my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was speaking to that motion and in the course of his remarks he alluded to the action of my hon. friend from Lanark. My hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), interrupting him, made some remarks which, I confess, I did not thoroughly understand nor catch. In those remarks he made reference to my name. I did not then make any reply, but later on, in the course of that debate, I did make use of a few words which I will now read. I said:

"What meeting are you referring to?"

"Mr. JAMIESON. The one that was called last year to bring up this question. You recollect it."

I replied:

"I am not aware of any meeting at which it was decided that we should not push the temperance question as fast as we can."

I think those words explain themselves. In case they do not completely I may say this; I understood the member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) to imply that the temperance members of this House connected with the Alliance had held a meeting at which they decided not to push the Scott Act amendments then before the House. I denied that, because I knew they had no meeting at which the members of this House representing the Alliance came to any such conclusion as that they would not push their own Bill as far as possible. I find on reference to the Hansard that the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) when he made reference to that meeting stated that that meeting had decided that we should not ask the Government to take up the Bill we had before the House. I misunderstood him. Had I understood him I would have agreed with him that there was a meeting of members of the Alliance which had decided not to ask the Government to press that motion. I may say in reference to that question that I myself was desirous of asking the Government to take up the Scott Act amendments of last Session and make them law. When I found, as I did find, that the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) and other hon. gentlemen on that side of the House were prepared to vote against such a motion asking the Government to take up the measure, I did not wish to make any split between myself and those hon. temperance gentlemen who are working with me, and, therefore, I did not propose the resolution or the question at the meeting under reference. I, myself, believe it would be in the interest of the people of this country that the Government should take up those amendments to the Scott Act, and I would be glad to see them do it. When I did arrange, as I had arranged in the earlier part of the Session, to work in conjunction with several gentlemen on the lines of this Temperance amendment Bill, I was anxious that there should not be any split between us on the motion before this House. As far as I was concerned I, therefore, refrained from making any motion or urging any motion which would make a split between the temperance members of this House who belonged to the Dominion Alliance. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) has just now alluded to the motion of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) which was made this Session, and I must take most serious exception to some of the references he made in regard to the Dominion Alliance. It is true, Sir, that those hon. members of this House, who are members of the Dominion Alliance, met together for the discussion of their business and their work before this House. In so far as these gentlemen are members of the Alliance, I believe it to be their duty to work in harmony and to support such motions as may be authorised and as may be introduced into this House by them, as members of the Dominion Alliance. But, Sir, when the hon. gentleman goes further and intimates that temperance people in this House are only to work on the lines which the Dominion Alliance lays down I most seriously differ from him and emphatically say that I cannot allow such an inference to go abroad, or such a statement of the opinions of the Dominion Alliance to go on record here in Parliament, for such is not the case. The Dominion Alliance has certain views and the Dominion Alliance by means of the members of that body who are members of this House introduced certain resolutions or motions. As far as those motions are concerned, I, as a member of the council of the Dominion Alliance, felt it to be my duty to support them, and to act in accordance with the spirit of them, but as far as my action on temperance matters as a member of this House is concerned, and as representing a constituency in this House, that I shall allow myself or my motions or my speeches to be trammelled by the Dominion Alliance, or by the council of the Dominion Alliance, I emphatically deny. I do not believe for an instant that is the temper or the spirit of the council of the Dominion Alliance. Last session of the Alliance when the Council held their meeting in Ottawa the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) made some such statement. I denied it there, and I informed the council of the Alliance that if that was their opinion, and their views on my duty as a member, I must withdraw from the council. But, Sir, did the council endorse my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson)? Not a bit of it. They sat silent and did not endorse his action, but they practically accepted the explanation of their views and their objects which I laid down, and did not for an instant suggest that his interpretation of their views was right. This motion, which is now before us, is a motion which has been framed in the lines of the Dominion Alliance, and as such I had, in former years, the pleasure of seconding the motion moved by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) in the introduction of a similar Bill to this. It happened this year that I was out of the House when the member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) moved for leave to introduce this Bill, and my hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) acted as seconder to the motion. I am glad to see it so. Although I am not to-day the seconder of the motion, as I have been in times past, I thoroughly endorse it, I thoroughly concur in the views expressed in this Bill, and I trust it will pass the House and become law. I may say that last winter, before this House met, having had in view the experience of the members of the Alliance who had introduced this Bill previously and that when we introduced it it was late in the Session and could not become law; I took upon myself as one interested in this question to write to a member of the Executive Council of the Dominion Alliance and I urged that gentleman that the council should ask Mr. Jamieson to introduce this measure before the council met in Ottawa pointing out the fact that if the council of the Dominion Alliance wished afterwards to make any amendment or introduce any changes in the Bill, that might be done when the Bill went into committee. I am glad that the Executive Council of the Dominion Alliance followed out that plan of action, and wrote to Mr. Jamieson requesting him to introduce this Bill as early in the Session as possible; and I am glad to know that the hon. member for Lanark did introduce the Bill very much earlier than it has generally been introduced into the House, and I trust that in consequence of this fact, the Bill may become law this Session. I will not now go into the details of the Bill. My hon. friend from Lanark, I think, has carefully and successfully explained them, and, perhaps, in the unsatisfactory state of my voice, I would not have made these remarks had I not deemed it necessary that some correction should be made of the statements made by the hon. member for Lanark.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think, before this House is asked for exceptional legislation in the promotion of a movement which certainly does not stand before the country as well as it did some time ago, its advocates should at least settle their own quarrels, and not take up the time of the House with them. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) endeavored to explain the reason why the Scott Act has been rejected in nine counties in the Province of Ontario; but I do not think he at all touched the real reason, which is, in my opinion, not only that the Act has not been effective, but because the people of this country have determined that they will not submit to the sort of tyrannical dictation that has been sought to be forced upon them by those who have been advocating what has been erroneously called the temperance movement. I deny the right of these gentlemen to that name, because temperance and total abstinence are two different things. I claim for myself, as well as for the majority of this House, and perhaps every man in it, the right to be called temperance men, but the claim of total abstainers to that title is an assumption that cannot be too often condemned. Temperance does not consist in total abstinence; it does not consist in denying oneself absolutely; but it does consist in using things in a manner consistent with the exercise of the various faculties given to us and in obedience to the laws of this country. I say the real cause of the rejection of the Scott Act is that the people have revolted from the spiritual dictation which women of the Christian Temperance Union and the various total abstinence bodies have put upon them during the last few years. Will any one tell us that the failure on the Dominion Government to do what they were called on to do, or the failure of Ontario magistrates and inspectors to enforce the Act, could have brought about a change of 1,400 majority in favor of the Act in one year to a majority of 3,000 against it three years afterwards? I do not think the cause can be found in any of these sources. The cause of the failure, I believe, is that the people have come to the conclusion that the whole attempt to force total abstinence upon them by law is a mistake, contrary to common sense, contrary to experience, contrary to the reasoning of every man who exercises his reason, and also due to the fact that those who have had control of this Act and have had ample power to carry it out, have failed to do so, and the Act has been inoperative. In the county of Simcoe, from the very first month that Act was nominally in force, it was not carried out. During the whole of those three years, with the exception of a few months, liquor has been sold openly in every bar in the county. In the town of Barrie, where I live, there has not been one month during those three years during which liquor has not been openly and avowedly sold without any attempt at prevention. Of course, a few prosecutions have taken place, and the hotel-keepers have been fined, but not having to pay for licenses, they could afford to pay the fines inflicted, and even very much heavier ones. But the fact is that those who voted for the Act were apparently indifferent whether it was carried out or not, and they made no serious attempt to carry it out. They did get a magistrate appointed to carry it out, and he was not in office more than a few months when, strong partisan as he was, the Ontario Government dismissed him for malfeasance. I think, under these circumstances, it will be folly in us to give the advocates of this measure any greater powers than those they now possess. Last year, when this question was up, I thought it was only fair, considering that the Act had been passed in a great many counties, that those who advocated it should have every opportunity to carry it out, and I for one voted against its repeal, not because I had any faith in it or thought it could be effective, but because I thought its advocates should have every opportunity to carry it out. Now, Sir, they have had their three years, and they have failed ignominiously. I venture to say that in every county in which it has been adopted there has been more liquor sold, more drunkenness, and from my own observation I can say there has been more perjury and ill-feeling created by the Scott Act than by any other law that we have ever had on the Statute-book of this country. If the Act merely failed to stop the sale of liquor, that would be comparatively a small thing; but when we consider the perjury and prevarication which it has caused, and the nefarious means resorted to by its advocates to get prosecutions, it has brought the law into contempt. What is the effect of having a law that the people will not respect? It has the effect of making them disregard all law. Therefore, I think this House is justified, after the experience the country has had of this legislation, in saying that it will not be any further extended. The evils that it has caused are far greater than any good it has effected. It has had this effect, that there has practically been free trade in liquor. Where liquor was sold in ten or a dozen houses before the Scott Act came into force, since it has been in operation it has been sold in fifty or sixty places without any restriction whatever. We know that the inspectors, men appointed by Mr. Mowat himself, and supposed to be competent to carry out this law, occasionally, for the sake of making a little show, bring up the proprietor of a respectable public house and fine him, but they never attempt to enforce the law in the fifty or sixty places where liquor was known to be sold in much larger quantities than it would be in respectable houses. To show you how unfairly the Act works, in my own constituency there were two or three public houses within two or three miles of each other. In one of them, when the Scott Act came in force, the publican said he would sell no more liquor, he closed his bar, disposed of his stock and did not sell another glass. Another man, three miles off, set the law at defiance, and sold more liquor than he ever did before. The consequence was that the first man, a friend of mine, who stopped selling liquor and kept a temperance house in obedience to the law, lost his business was starved out, and had to shut up his house altogether, while the man who continued to sell liquor has been going on selling it ever since. Two or three prosecutions were brought against him, but they failed; and even if he had been fined two or three times, he could well afford to pay the fines because he made more money under the Scott Act than ever he did before. Knowing from experience that this law has not only been inoperative but has done an immense deal of mischief and been the cause of any amount of ill-feeling and false swearing, and brought all law into contempt, and has failed in every respect to secure its object, this is not the time of day for the advocates of that measure to ask for increased legislation. Holding these views, not being afraid to act up to my convictions, I move that this Bill be read this day six months.

Mr. FISHER,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I intend to say but very little with reference to the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman, and desire only to make a few observations with regard to the speech which was addressed to the House by this hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill. The hon. gentleman said that I am not so zealous a supporter of the cause of prohibition as he. He declared that he has taken the platform in favor of prohibition outside of the House, that he has supported prohibition here, that whenever he opposed it he had good reason, and he assures the House that when the Bill was before the House last year I shirked the vote. I knew that statement was not correct; I knew that the hon. gentleman, with his usual accuracy, whether in speaking of himself or somebody else, addressed to this House observations that were not warranted in fact. I hold the Journals of the House of last year, and I find in them that the House was called on last year, on the 13th June, to vote on this question. Four divisions were taken on the subject. On the first division 38 voted yea and 145 nay. My name is recorded as one of the 145. On the second division 47 voted yea and 136 nay, and I find my name recorded as one of the 136. On the third division 91 voted yea and 88 nay, and I was one of the 91. On the fourth division 70 voted yea and 112 nay, and my name is one of the 112. These are all the divisions that took place, and in every one of them I voted. Yet the hon. gentleman not only informed us that I shirked the vote, but informed us with what celerity I left my place when I shirked the vote on that occasion. The House will full appreciate from this that although the hon. gentleman may be a zealous advocate of temperance, he has not a very great regard for accuracy in any statement he may make. The hon. gentleman's observations, in criticising my actions last year, are, as the House will see, as worthy of credence as the hon. gentleman's declaration that he is a zealous supporter of temperance. I have said that the hon. gentleman supported the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), who is notoriously opposed to this Bill, and I believe the hon. member for South Lanark supported the hon. gentleman who professes to be a zealous advocate of prohibition. I said that they hunted in couples, that the hon. member for South Lanark brought the support of those opposed to prohibition to the hon. gentleman, and the hon. gentleman secured the support of the prohibitionists to the hon. member for South Lanark.

Mr. JAMIESON. If the hon. gentleman will excuse me—

Mr. MILLS. I do not intend that the hon. gentleman shall interrupt me. If he wishes to make any more incorrect statements, he can take some other occasion to make them. There was a local election in the hon. gentleman's constituency, and the president of the prohibition committee and a member of the Temperance Alliance was a candidate. Whom did the hon. gentleman support in opposition to that candidate? He supported a party who was notoriously opposed to prohibition; and yet the hon. gentleman comes here and poses not only as an apostle of prohibition, but as the very Messiah of a measure of that sort. The hon. gentleman tells us he is a zealous, warm and sincere advocate of the cause of temperance. I remember not long ago being at a railway station in the city of St. Thomas, where there was a party who seemed rather the worse of something stronger than cold water, and he was assuring a clergyman standing by that he was a very great advocate of prohibition. "Well," said the clergyman, "let me tell you a story. A friend of mine on the Mohawk had a tame woodchuck which could occasionally stand up beside to him and seem to say: 'I am your woodchuck.' Well, said he, there was a little animal with white stripes down its back, which would stand up and say: 'I am your woodchuck;' and when I kicked him out of the way, I found he did not smell like it." So the hon. gentleman may be a zealous advocate of prohibition, but his conduct in and out of the House does not look like that of a prohibitionist. The hon. gentleman said that my statement the other night in reply to him was incorrect. Why, when the First Minister proposed to take Wednesdays as Government days, I proposed that the hon. gentleman should put his motion on the Government Notices in order that it might be reached, and I asked my hon. friend (Mr. Fisher) to make a motion to that effect. He told me he had gone to the hon. gentleman and asked him to propose to put this Bill on the Government Orders, and what reply did he make? He told him he would serve his party first.

Mr. JAMIESON. There is not a word of truth in that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) He said more. He said: If the Government would not agree to such a proposition, he would vote for the Government and against the proposition to put the motion on Government Orders. That is the authority for my statement. The hon. gentleman came here and told me that at the time. The hon. gentleman would not come into the House and ask the First Minister to put his Bill upon the Government Orders, because the Government were taking a day from private members. While he wished to appear before the country and to pose as the apostle of temperance, he was not prepared to take the first step to carry it out. The hon. gentleman asks what the member for Bothwell has done for prohibition—has he ever appeared on a public platform in regard to it, has he ever spoken at a public meeting in favor of it? Well, Sir, I have told my constituents my views on this subject, and, as a member of the Government, I assisted in putting upon the Statute-book the only measure which has been put there by a Government. The Dominion Alliance stated that it was the duty of the Government to deal with the subject. The Dominion Alliance employed Mr. Watson, who was afterwards, I believe, taken in as a Government official, to lecture the people in regard to it, and in every speech he made Mr. Watson declared that it was the duty of the Government to take up that subject and to deal with it. We agreed with that, we did take it up, and we dealt with it, but when we suggested that the men whom the hon. gentleman supports should deal with it, and should deal with it as public opinion had shown it was necessary to deal with it, what course did the hon. gentleman take? He voted against the proposition we made, in which our sincerity was shown by our having done what we suggested that they should do. In what position does the hon. gentleman appear before the country? He appears before the country as the impediment of the temperance movement. If there is any sincerity in what he says, why did he not vote for the amendment, why did he not say that the Government whom he supports and to whom he has given his confidence should act in this way? The people have acted in favor of this measure in many cases, they have actively put it into force, and he was entitled to ask the Government of which he is a supporter either to repeal the measure or to adopt such amendments as experience had shown to be necessary. He did neither. He went before the Alliance and said: Our measure has been rejected by the Senate chamber, and I am henceforth in favor of an elective Senate. But, when I proposed that we should make the Senate elective, what did he say? Notwithstanding the pledge which he had given to the Alliance, notwithstanding his statement that he would seek to change the constitution of that House which stands in the way of progressive legislation, he said, I will stand by my party and vote against my convictions and against my principles, and I will not vote for any change in the constitution of the Senate. What excuse did he offer for his course in that matter? That it was a party movement. If we agreed with the hon. gentleman in every view he has ever expressed, he is ready to support those with whom he does not agree; because it is a party question, and he would vote against his principles in order to support his party. Yet, the hon. gentlemen says, I am here as the apostle of temperance and as the exponent of the views of the Alliance. The hon. gentleman talks as if this House had no right to deal with the temperance question unless the Alliance is allowed to dictate to it the measure it should support, and the kind of legislation which should be carried through. I do not admit any such doctrine. If any special class of the community is aggrieved, I am ready to listen to their grievance, and, if the grievance is well founded, I am ready to be the exponent of justice in the matter, and to redress the wrong; but when any portion of the community proposes a measure to affect the community at large, then I say that their voice is merged in that of the whole community, and I decline to be the exponent of a particular class. We dealt with this matter as a Government. We investigated the matter for ourselves, we framed our own measure and carried it through on our own responsibility, taking the risk of defeat; and, if the hon. gentleman's colleagues, or his masters rather, were to deal with the matter, I am sure that they would judge for themselves and would not consent to be merely the mouthpiece of an Alliance. Those gentlemen are entitled to respect, but, when the hon. gentleman comes here and professes to speak for the Alliance, and for the Alliance alone, he does not sit as a member of Parliament, he does not vote as a member of the Parliament of Canada, but he professes to vote and act as something altogether different from a member of this Parliament. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) says that he is opposed to this legislation altogether. He says it has not been efficient or operative. Why not?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. O'BRIEN. Because public opinion was against it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If public opinion was against it, it would not have been adopted. It is only where public opinion favors it that it comes into operation, and the hon. gentleman knows well that the chief difficulty in the operation of this law is the refusal of the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches to assume the responsibility of legislating on the subject in the way which experience has shown to be necessary. The hon. First Minister knows that the House at the other end of this building is his creature; he created it; they are the sheep of his pasture; they will do what he bids them, and, if he proposed any legislation on this subject, there would be no difficulty in carrying it through that House. It is true that a majority might not agree with the legislation he proposed, but we know that nine times out of ten the majority on the other side of this House do not agree with the legislation he proposes, but they vote for it nevertheless.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They say "no," but there have been cases in the past month in regard to which hon. gentlemen on that side have changed two or three times, and the hon. gentleman who sits beside the First Minister has proposed that they shall change again. I do not intend to discuss that matter, but I simply refer to it in order to show the extraordinary power which the hon. gentleman and his colleague possess over the members on that side of the House. The hon. the First Minister possesses even still more power over the Chamber at the other end of this building. Therefore it was necessary that the hon. gentleman should have proposed this measure and carried it through this House, and, my word for it, there would not have been the slightest hesitation in carrying it through the House at the other end of this building. For that reason especially, if not for that reason more than any other, I thought it important to press upon the House the propriety of the Government taking this question up. If the Government think the law is wrong they ought to propose its repeal, and if they do not, the hon. gentleman from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) ought to propose an expression of regret that the Government have not proposed its repeal; but if the Government agree with the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), they ought to propose the amendments which are necessary to the measure, and ought to assume the responsibility of carrying them through that House through which alone it will be carried by the aid and support of the Government.

Mr. FREEMAN. I beg to say to the hon. gentleman who has just sat down that he has been talking as though he had made a motion in this House tending to prohibition or to the amendment of the Scott Act. I never heard of such a motion from him. If he had done so, I certainly should have voted for it; I could not have voted against it; but, if I understood properly what he proposed, he wanted some one else to take it up, he wanted the Government to take it up. Now that is a very nice way for people to get rid of doing a thing they do not like to do themselves, to call upon somebody else to do it. Had the hon. member for Bothwell taken up these resolutions, had he made that motion before the House, he would have found every temperance man on this side of the House with him. Now, he says that the First Minister can have this House to follow him wherever he chooses. I wonder if anybody follows the hon. member for Bothwell. What did he do the other night when he wanted to press the Government to do that which they did not wish to take upon themselves? Hon. gentlemen opposite voted solid for him, if I recollect correctly. Certainly some of them are not temperance men; they do not generally vote with us upon this temperance question, but they followed him because he was their leader for the time being, they followed him just as closely as any body of men could follow their leader. Why, then, does he find fault when we follow our leader? But what he says with regard to the following on this side is not the case. I mean to say distinctly and emphatically that the statements made in that regard are wholly incorrect. Now, I wish to say a word with regard to my vote on that occasion. The hon. gentleman tries to mystify the matter very much. I was at the Dominion Alliance the day on which the hon. member for Bothwell brought in his resolution. I formed one of the committee on legislation, and as we sat at the table the question arose whether we should press this matter upon the Government, and the committee decided that the Government should not be asked to take that question in hand, but that the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) should take it in hand. That was the position of that committee of the Dominion Alliance. And we could do nothing else. If we wanted to act like men at all in the matter, after having decided that was the course we should pursue in this House, it was our duty to pursue that course, and we did it. At the same time, if the hon. gentleman for Bothwell had stepped in and taken the matter out of the hands of the hon. member for Lanark, I dare say the hon. member for Lanark would not have found any great fault; I am sure he would not, and that he would have voted for him. But the hon. member for Bothwell did not do that, and now he is trying to get into the position of a leader of the temperance party in this House, as if he had done all that was to be done, and that we were faithless because we did not follow him. I do not know the hon. gentleman's record upon this temperance question, but I cannot learn anything of it that would lead me to follow him very closely. I have made enquiries and I have asked: "What position has the hon. member for Bothwell occupied in this temperance reform for the last 50 years?" I said: "Did you ever know him to be a foremost man; what has he done; has he stood out upon the platform and vindicated the cause of temperance when we had scores and hundreds of just such men as the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) opposed to us? When we had all the ability of the land opposed to us, when we were weak, few and despised? Did the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) then stand up with us? But, to day Sir, when it has become somewhat fashionable, he wants to make favor with us. And, Sir, no man in the country would hail him quicker than myself as one of our leaders if he would come out with us heart and soul and not stand in the position so many hon. gentlemen stand in to-day, saying: "I am a very temperate man, only, mark you, I am not a fanatic." Those kind of men had better stand away from us. I think the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) takes a much more creditable course than some others. He says: "I am opposed to you, I am opposed to your pulpits, I am opposed to your ministers, I am opposed to your women societies," and I do not know but that he is opposed to the women also. When we deal with that hon. gentleman we know where we are. Now, Sir, I will come to the point in hand. I beg to say to hon. gentlemen that I am not here to make sport for anybody. I am arguing in the cause of justice and right, I am arguing for what I believe is of more importance to this country than any thing that has ever been before this Parliament. I believe this prohibition cause is one upon which the prosperity of this country in a large measure depends. The lives of hundreds of people are hanging upon this very question. There are thousands of orphans to-day that are crying for bread because of this rum traffic which we are denouncing, and it is not to me a cause for mirth, at all events. It is a cause that is to-day making the hearts of many men and women to grieve, and making them to bow their heads in anguish. Now, in relation to this Temperance Act, there are some hon. gentlemen who wish to hurl their shafts against prohibition. We will not quarrel with the hon. gentlemen about the word "temperance." We know what the meaning of the word "temperance" is, but the total abstinence have adopted that word by which their principles of total abstinence are understood. I hope hon. gentlemen will not find too much fault with us about that. We say distinctly that by temperance we mean total abstinence; if they do not, we will not quarrel with them. But they do not mean the same kind of temperance that we mean. I say that when they hurl their shafts of ignominy and ridicule at the Canada Temperance Act, I beg them to remember that we do not think them at all damaging to the cause of prohibition. Now, because of the repeal of the Canada Temperance Act in several counties of Ontario, they tell us that we must collapse, that this whole temperance reform of ours must go back, that we are defeated. Sir, I do not think so at all. For my part I am very little discouraged from the fact that these seven counties have repealed the Act. You have to remember that a few years ago they adopted the Act by a large majority, and they are only to-day going back to where they were before. Now, what has the Canada Temperance Act done since it was first brought into operation? The House will bear in mind that it was not forced on any county, it cannot be forced on any county, or on any section of the people, or on any riding, as you call counties in Ontario. Any county that chooses to adopt the Scott Act, will do so; and any county that prefers not to adopt it, will not do so; so it is altogether a local option Act. But what has it done during the last eight years? Nova Scotia has 18 counties and one city, of which 13 counties have adopted the Act. New Brunswick has 14 counties and two cities, of which ten counties and two cities have adopted the Act. Manitoba has five counties and one city, of which two counties have adopted the Act. Prince Edward Island has three counties and one city, all of which have adopted the Act. Ontario has thirty-eight counties and union of counties and 11 cities, of which 25 counties and two cities have adopted the Act; one of these has repealed it. Quebec has 56 counties and four cities, five counties of which have adopted the Act. British Columbia has five parliamentary constituencies, none of which have adopted the Act. In all, up the present time, 81 cities and counties have voted upon the Scott Act, and 63 have adopted it. Nine counties and cities voted twice and five three times, making an aggregate of 95 contests, out of which we have been victorious in 73. I do not think we need be ashamed of this showing or that it should cause us to be much discouraged. The leaders and friends of the liquor traffic in getting seven counties to repeal the Act have not so very much of which to boast. Let them crow and rejoice, but I think rejoicing will not be for any great period. I have examined the leading papers of the Upper Province, the exponents of public opinion, the Globe, the Mail, the Empire, and also the Montreal Gazette, and I fail to find any of those papers attribute the repeal of the Act to a falling off in temperance sentiment throughout the Dominion or in those individual counties. They gave various reasons, and all through there are political reasons mixed up with others. The Globe points out that it is due to the abominable Franchise Act; then the roads were bad and the farmers could not get in to vote, and such reasons. Papers on the other side gave other reasons. The Ontario Government was said to be false, and they had the appointment of the officials, who were said to have done all they could to prevent the Act from being carried out—and thus political prejudices seem to prevail. It is difficult to get at the real cause, but in no case have I seen it stated that the Act was repealed because of decline in the temperance sentiment. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) said that the Act had never been enforced. Let us see how it has been enforced in one county at all events. In East Simcoe, according to a statement of the convictions and fines imposed in the license district of East Simcoe, between the 1st day of May, 1886, and 7th April, 1888, the amount of fines imposed was $4,950, number of convictions 96. Probable gain to the county $2,263. If there were 96 convictions in that county it was surely a good attempt to enforce the Act. Dundas county was prepared to carry out the Act, and it has done so with beneficial effect. I read:

"The Scott Act is being vigorously carried out in this county at present, and is having a very beneficial effect. The efficient enforcement of the Act during the past few months will greatly help the temperance people in the coming contest for repeal. Mrs. Rocksy-ault, of Irene, a noted character, has been fined for two convictions of the Act and it is expected she will be brought up for a third offence in a short time. She has become thoroughly frightened and has promised faithfully to break the law no more. This lady has been selling whisky in defiance of law for a number of years. Before the Scott Act came in force she sold without a license in defiance of the Crooks' Act, but managed to escape detection, although an honest attempt was made by the license inspector to convict her."

Here is a fair test as between officers of the Scott Act and officers of the license law. It would appear that an old offender under license law, who could not be got hold of, had been got hold of by the Scott Act officers. I have a number of other cases with which I will not, however, weary the House. A casual examination will show that there has been a good deal of enforcement of the Scott Act. There have been difficulties in the way. I am not prepared to give an opinion in regard to some counties, but the temperance body of the Dominion will not regard the repeal vote in the different counties during the week as a matter to discourage them. On the other hand, I believe the defeat will nerve them to renewed effort. Of what material do hon. gentlemen think temperance men are made when they express the opinion with pleasure that since these reverses the temperance movement is finished? They mistake the character of the men altogether. When we had but a handful of men fighting for this reform, when we had fashion against us, when we had, to some extent, the pulpit against us and the leading men of the country against us, when strong appetites and habits were against us much more than they are now, we fought the battle of temperance. We contended for those principles, and to-day we can hardly find a man who does not want to be acknowledged as a temperance man, and to-day the great majority of the people are in favor of prohibition, and, instead of being frightened out of our senses by the repeal of the Scott Act in those counties, the next effort that will be made will be an effort to obtain total prohibition. I for one feel that such is necessary. As a prohibitionist of some years standing, and I believe an honest friend of the cause, I believe that in order to be successful we must have the body of the electors behind us, we must have a large measure of public sympathy with us, the people must be with us in this work if we are going to succeed in prohibition, and it will be a question for the temperance reformers seriously to consider whether the people are so fully at their backs as to enable them to press for a prohibitory measure. If not, then I advise them to go on in the same way as they have been going and to use such efforts and appliances as they have been using, and which have brought them up to their present grand position. Let us rely more on moral effort and less upon law. But I believe this country wants a prohibitory law; I believe such is necessary to put down this terrible evil of drunkenness. I am not going into the consideration of this evil. I might show that this evil is now sapping the very life of this country, how the use of liquor in the old country is destroying 28 per cent. of the valuable lives there; and that the lives in this Dominion are being destroyed in proportion by it. I could show how it is destroying the families of the people, how it is bringing discord into the homes of the people which should represent heaven. I could show these facts but they do not enter into this question. All we ask to-night is to obtain amendments to the Scott Act which are necessary to make it effective in the different counties throughout the Dominion in which it is now in operation. The complaint against the Scott Act is that it is not really enforced. There have been many difficulties in the way of its enforcement. I need not enumerate them but some provisions are found for the removal of them in the Bill the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) has introduced. We ask this House to give us those amendments and if the Scott Act with those amendments cannot be worked then perhaps other counties will repeal it. Let us do what we can for those amendments. I appeal to every man who desires to see the drinking habits of the country lessened, I appeal to every man who desires to see good order in the country, I appeal to every man who wants to assist us in this good work. It is a measure which will not conflict with the drinking habits of any one. They can go and take their glass of brandy if they wish it and they can go on and indulge to any extent they please. I appeal to you to give the temperance people the amendments to this Act which we ask for here to-night and let us have the Act in a workable condition. If I would turn to the Hansard I could show you what the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie the then leader of the Government declared when he introduced the measure that he believed the sentiment of the country demanded it. He believed it was in answer to the demand of the temperance sentiment in this country, that he gave them the Scott Act and he also indicated it was but a step towards a larger and fuller measure, a measure of prohibition. I believe that hon. gentleman desired the Act should be perfect, I believe it was in his heart to make the measure as perfect as it ought to be. From time to time the friends of temperance have been before Parliament asking for amendments, and some times they have succeeded and more times not succeeded. While this House has been willing that those amendments should be passed they have been blocked in another chamber. This has aroused a feeling in the minds of the temperance people of this country which at the proper time will find such an expression, as will wake up in the country the slumbering embers of dissatisfaction that lie in the breasts of the people, at the action of the Legislative Chamber in this matter. I trust that the reasonable demands of the temperance people may not be thrown out. I hope their reasonable requests will be listened to and that those amendments will pass the House and become the law of the land. I do not think it necessary for me to say anything more on this subject, but before I sit down I would say that I regret exceedingly that there should have been so much political animus in this discussion. I have regarded it with a great deal of regret for I think it is possible for the two political parties in Canada to fight their political battles without dragging the temperance question into those battles. I believe that the Opposition will get into power just as quickly and that the Government will retain power just as long without dragging this temperance question into politics. I believe it will be wise of both political parties to let that question lie outside of politics altogether. Let hon. members on both sides of the House take hold of it as a great moral question, and deal with it as a question in which we have all a mutual interest, and in which our families and our children after us are interested. Let us cast politics aside, and let us vote as men of principle, let us vote as manly men, men who desire to see our country prosper, men who desire to see the evils of intemperance reduced to a minimum, men who desire to see all the floodgates of vice opened by the liquor traffic closed up forever and our country prosperous whether under a Conservative or a Liberal Government. Let us throw aside political feelings and vote on this question as accountable beings, accountable to our children and accountable to our God.

Mr. FREEMAN.

Mr. JAMIESON. I wish to say a few words in reply to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). The first statement that I made that he had shirked a vote was made on the authority of Hansard, which is the official record of the House. If the hon. gentleman examines Hansard he will find that it is not there.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will find my name in the Journals of the House. I told him I voted and he made a statement that was not true.

Mr. JAMIESON. Both are official records recognised by the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I stated that I had voted.

Mr. JAMIESON. I made my statement on the authority of the official Hansard.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Hansard is not the official record of the votes.

Mr. JAMIESON. There are a few remarks I would like to make in reply to statements made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), statements which are as untrue as it is possible for them to be. In the first place he states that I have supported and taken part in the elections of the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart). I wish to make the statement that I never cast a vote. I never attended a meeting, I never took part in any shape or form in a political content in South Lanark in my life and for the good reason that the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) does not require my assistance or that of any other outsider in order to secure his election in that county, so that the hon. gentleman's statement in that respect is entirely without foundation. So far as my position in North Lanark in the local election is concerned I may tell the hon. gentleman that just before the last local election took place there was a sort of temperance convention held in North Lanark. At that convention it was proposed that two temperance candidates should be put in the field—there were two in the field at that time and it was resolved that they should be supported. One Conservative moved and another seconded a motion to that effect, but there was not a single individual belonging to the Liberal party who would say he would support the man. The candidates for the Local House were there, they were quite prepared to give their support to the local candidates, but of course when it came to the candidate for the House of Commons they were not prepared to do it.

Mr. HAGGART. That was a horse of another color.

Mr. JAMIESON. That was a horse of another color. Under those circumstances we supported the man who was pledged to temperance legislation—just as much so as the Liberal candidate in the north of the county. The hon. gentleman pretends to ignore the Dominion Alliance. I am not prepared to say that the Dominion Alliance is entitled to dictate over all the members of this House or to the Government of this country, but when the Government, of which the hon. gentleman was a member, was in power in 1878 it was not beneath his dignity to consult the Dominion Alliance. In fact, I have a record in my hand, in which it is stated that at a meeting held in the city of Ottawa a draft of the Canada Temperance Act was made by a committee of the Alliance and presented to the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member. So that after all, the Canada Temperance Act was not framed by that Government, but by a committee of the Dominion Alliance. I have here the Year Book of 1883, in which that is stated, and I believe it to be correct. Now, Sir, so far as my position is concerned, it is this: In 1885, at a meeting of the Dominion Alliance, it was resolved to ask the Government of this Dominion to take charge of amendments to the Scott Act. It was resolved that in the event of the Government not doing so, I should be requested to do so, and to press the Bill as expeditiously as I possibly could. My position was this: The moment the Dominion Government refused to take charge of the amending Bill, and it as placed in my hands, I had to carry out the instructions given me by the Dominion Alliance, or throw up the measure altogether. My position further is this, that so long as I act on lines laid down by the Dominion Alliance, it does not rest with any hon. member in this House, or any man outside of this House, to charge me with inconsistency. That is my position, and I am satisfied I shall be backed up by every member of the Dominion Alliance, unless his views are distorted for party purposes. There was a statement made, I do not know whether on the authority of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) or not. If it is, I am only sorry, Mr. Speaker, that parliamentary usage will not permit me to characterise that statement as I would like to do. It is stated that in answer to an urgent request on his part that I should endeavor to place the Bill of which I had charge on Government Orders, I said I would serve my party first. Sir, the statement is as false as the bottomless pit; I never made such a statement in my life, and the hon. member who says so is stating—well, the House understands what I mean; I will not go any further. This is about all I have to say in reference to this matter. I do trust we shall reach a vote on this Bill to-night, instead of letting it stand over for another occasion.

Mr. HAGGART. As I have some remarks to make on this question, and, as it is evident at this late hour that we shall not be able to conclude this debate to-night, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I do not very often interfere with temperance questions, but I feel that the occasion to-night is one, on which for once as a friend to the temperance cause, I am entitled to say a word. Before dealing with the question on its merits, perhaps I may be allowed to refer to one or two statements that have been made by my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) in respect to the action which is said to have been taken by the Dominion Alliance on a previous occasion. He complains that my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) speaks lightly of the Dominion Alliance, and refers to the fact that in 1878 the Government of which my hon. friend was a member had so much confidence in the Dominion Alliance that they submitted to it the draft of the Canada Temperance Act for its approval. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he can refer to the time when his leader, since then, ever proposed any amendment to the Canada Temperance Act; and I would like to know when he ever got up in his place as a temperance man in this House, and indicated that he was not in party accord with his leader, when his leader was so systematically using his influence to prevent this Canada Temperance Act being amended. I say, so far as his position is concerned, that it ill becomes the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) to refer in any way to the action of the Dominion Alliance or of the two Governments as to their treatment of this question. I have a distinct recollection of how this question came before the House on that occasion. I remember how the petitions were poured in on us, and how this matter was urged on the House and the Government from year to year; and I remember that when it came to be dealt with, and when the temperance members of the House were asked to meet together and discuss the matter, we had not the face of a single Conservative to discuss the question or to tell us how the law could be put on the Statute-book or made effective; but, forsooth, when they were on this side of the House they were the men who were urging on the Government to take action in this matter. Sir, it sounded to me like ancient history when I saw my hon. friend's notice of an independent motion in favor of prohibition, and in favor of the Government enforcing it. Sir, just let me draw his attention to a resolution worded like that, and adopted by this House some years ago, and then ask ourselves how much progress these agitators have made in connection with this question. On the 15th of March, 1875, Mr. Schultz, then member for Lisgar, moved:

"That it is the opinion of this House that a prohibitory liquor law is the only effectual remedy for the evils complained of, and it is the duty of the Government to submit such measures for the approval of Parliament at the earliest moment practicable."

That sounds very much like the motion my friend voted down the other day, to re-affirm the abstract principle, after we have had the Canada Temperance Act a few years, and have pleaded and implored the leaders of this House to take some action, not that it should be made stronger or more prohibitive, but made fairly operative; and now my hon. friend stands up and complains because we ask the Government to move as his friends asked the Government to move then. I find that on that occasion the hon. Minister of Customs had something to say about this question, and I may say that the Government then were just like the Government now, a little slow to move, and the temperance men had to keep them up to their work. The hon. Minister of Customs delivered himself on that occasion in this fashion:

"The House was as well prepared now as it would be in a fortnight hence, after sixteen caucuses had been held, to come to a direct vote on the subject. The country was as well prepared now as it would be ten years hence, to decide whether it would have a prohibitory law, for the question had been discussed since he was a boy, and was agitated every year. The question should be left with the Government to grapple with."

That was the opinion of the hon. Minister of Customs when the difference was just this, that he was on this side of the House, and the Government of my hon. friend from East York was on that side. Now it strikes me that when our friends opposite talk so loudly about how they had advocated this great moral principle, and what they suffered and endured in the cause of temperance, when it was not so popular as it is now, and how they regret it has been made a political question, would it not be much better if they would stiffen up their backs and say to their leader: We intend to support you on all political questions, but as the price of our support we insist that you give us, not prohibitory legislation, but that you make the law fairly workable. If they would do this instead of coming down here to throw dust in the eyes of the people with these motions which mean nothing and saying it is a great pity a question of this kind should have been made a football of in the political arena, we might have some confidence in their protestations. I was amused at the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Freeman) when he expressed his regret that a great moral question like this should have been made a political question and declared that the Government ought to initiate legislation of this kind. He forgets that when his friends were out of office and when hon. gentlemen on this side of the House showed their faith and their principles by passing legislation, imperfect and contradictory, I admit, but at the moment the best that could be had, not one of hon. gentlemen opposite lifted a little finger to help them to improve the details of that measure. On the contrary, it had to be passed in the teeth of their active hostility or neutral opposition. Yet these hon. gentlemen to-day say to us that this should not be made a political question. I tell you, Sir, if the electorate would just stiffen the backs of these representatives by telling them instead of being Tories first and temperance men afterwards, you must be temperance men first, or we will leave you at the next elections and put honest men at your place, who will display more zeal than simply move resolutions that it is the duty of the Government to pass prohibitory legislation, and thus quietly strangle out of existence the temperant sentiment by your do-nothing policy, we would find a change in their mode of conduct. There is another gentleman who holds his position in this House to the stand he took at one time in connection with the temperance movement. I do not wish for a moment to throw discredit on a public man who, in the early days of his public life, advocated temperance principles and was paid for his advocacy; that is perfectly legitimate. But let me quote a few of the sentences which the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries uttered in 1885, when discussing one of the Bills which the hon. member for Lanark has brought up so often in the House that he has grown hoary and grey, and yet they are just as far from becoming the law of the land as when he first took them in hand. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had a little tiff with the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) who presides over the Factory Act, which is another measure that is a long time coming to maturity, and there was a little feeling as to which should come first, but finally the Factory Act had to stand back. The hon. the Minister of Marine said, and his words express exactly my sentiments, and I should have honored the man who had uttered such sentiments and stand by them:

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth).

"In the first place it is necessary, in order to carry out the good faith of Parliament, which was shown first in the enactments passed in 1878, and which was equally shown by making the law stronger in 1883, under which two pledges the people on 71 different occasions have come up to vote on this Act, and carried it in 59 by large majorities. Of those counties and cities which have adopted the Act, over 40 will be under its operation from 1st May, this year—and are looking to this Parliament—and a population of one million and a half of people are asking this Parliament to do its simple duty in the premises—keep its faith—and take away obstructions—not which the people have placed in the way—but which Parliament placed in the way of the Act and undesignedly too."

Further on he continued:

"If Parliament made a blunder, as in the opinion of the court of New Brunswick it did, and unwittingly cut away the machinery and the power from under that Act, it is in the carrying out of the good faith which should subsist between Parliament and the people that they should remedy that mistake and should give to the people what was asked for—and what was supposed to be given—a fairly workable Act. That is all we ask for."

And again:

"All we ask for, all the temperance people ask for, is that Parliament should carry out its pledged faith with a view of giving them a Canada Temperance Act which is made workable, and if under those conditions it proves a failure, the temperance people will be the first to move for the abolition of that law."

These are, to my mind, words that have the correct ring. They are words that indicate, as far as words can, a hearty and earnest belief in the duty of Parliament to promote temperance. There was no hesitation in the hon. gentleman saying what he then thought Parliament ought to do. But how is it that since then we have heard no more of these ardent utterances in favor of Parliament taking some action. This was on the 8th of April, 1885, and some time in December, 1885, the hon. gentleman became Minister of Marine. Is it possible that the yoke was so tight around his neck that he is no longer able to give utterance to those noble sentiments on behalf of the very cause that warmed him into existence and made a man of him. I respect a man who honestly changes his opinions, but I despise a man who sells himself for position and goes back on the men who warmed him into public life. How and in what view has the legislation of the Government with regard to temperance been introduced? Did it come to pass by the Government consulting the Dominion Temperance Alliance for the purpose of improving the Act? No; it came from the desire of the Government to grasp the power vested in the Local Legislatures and control the licenses for the purpose of giving a stroke at the Premier of Ontario, who stood in the way of the ambitions of hon. gentlemen opposite. It was through that action, it was not by any accidental circumstance, it was by the very decided action of the majority of this House that that decision became a matter of law in New Brunswick, which my hon. friend mourned on that occasion, and, as far as I know, has gone on mourning from that day onwards, until the Supreme Court said it was to be swept from the Statute-book and it was not worth the paper it was written on. My hon. friends are never done lamenting about the difficulties which surround the carrying out of this Act. I am inclined to join with them in that lament as long as they retain their present position. I do not find any fault with the leader of the Government for not doing better in regard to this Act, when he finds that the men around him who profess to support it do not stand up to their principles better than that, when he knows that they will get down on their knees whenever they are told to get down. I think I would do the same thing myself. If I knew that, when I said to my temperance friends, I do not think it is very handy for me to do this now, and you had better postpone it, they would be only too happy to postpone it, I think I would act that way myself, in view of those on the other side of the question. The liquor element is a great element in this country, and the Premier must consider it. When we had to fight for our rights, we had to fight, and I may say that anything that has rallied against the Scott Act is nothing to the future, but is simply the kindling of a great fire. But, when the Premier knows that, whenever he says to those hon. gentlemen, get down and be still, they will get down and be still, it is not likely that he will do anything to rouse them. It certainly does not lie in the mouth of my hon. friend from North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) to speak about the wonderful actions of the Dominion Alliance, when they have accepted so meekly their treatment by the Government. I was once foolish enough to go on a deputation to the Premier. The Dominion Alliance got it into their heads that this Act was not in good working order. No doubt there was something in that, and I was told—for I was not present at the meeting—that they had appointed a deputation to wait on the Government. You see, they had got accustomed to the Government paying attention to their statements, and they thought that, when our Conservative friends came into office, they would also have some respect for them, and I was told, we are going to wait on the Government, and we want you to go, as we want to have a delegation from the Alliance which will be non-political. I notice that they are very particular nowadays on the non-political question. However, I remember we made a great, big deputation. We filled the Premier's room so full that we had to stand up quite close against him, and there was scarcely room for my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who was the mouthpiece of the deputation on that occasion, to say what he was instructed to say. I never was a worshipper of that hon. gentleman since he stumped my county in the temperance interest against me, but I must say that on that occasion he presented the cause of the Dominion Alliance with moderation and firmness and definiteness and brevity, and I thought our cause was well put, and I thought the Premier, as I believe he always is on these occasions, was very courteous to us, very courteous. So I thought our deputation was going to do something, and I remember that the Premier just simply said, in a non-committal sort of way: It seems reasonable that an Act which is on the Statute-book of the country, and is not fairly workable, should be made so. I thought that looked reasonable, and I thought our spokesman had put our case in such a fashion as to convince even the Premier. We went away saying that we would hear about it. Well, it passed for a week, and then it passed for another week, and I do not know how others felt, but I began to feel that we had been sold, and I felt indignant when I saw that, in another branch of the Legislature, the leader of the Government there indicated that they did not intend to take any action in regard to the amendments to the Canada Temperance Act. If those hon. gentlemen opposite knew the indignation which existed, or felt it themselves, I think they would have constituted themselves at once another deputation and would have told the Premier formally that they were in earnest, that they believed these amendments were necessary, and that, in the glowing words of my hon. friend, it was necessary to keep faith with the people and to make this Act workable. But, as usual, they got down on their knees and accepted the situation, and from that time downwards, the Dominion Alliance and our friends who support the Government, have lost their grip on the temperance question, and from that time it was simply that they must do as the Government saw fit. I do not blame the Government, but I say the men who professed to have temperance principles made a great mistake. Their knees were too weak, and the result has certainly justified the statement of the leader of the Government in the Senate. Again, we find the Dominion Alliance, though, may be, they might have overtaken the Government by the exercise of some firmness, sending another deputation in 1886, suggesting a readjustment of the fines. I did not go on the deputation that time, but the published report is to the effect that the Dominion Alliance sent another deputation to my friend the Premier to urge certain reasons why there should be readjustment of the fines and penalties imposed under the Canada Temperance Act. Did they succeed any better than before? Let the Order in Council of the 15th December, 1886, show, in which, instead of travelling in the direction the deputation asked, the Government travelled in exactly the opposite direction. But I did not hear that the Dominion Alliance protested. My friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) may have protested, but he did not vote that way, and the man who protests, and then votes for those against whom he has protested, does not amount to much, no matter on which side of the House he is. I do not think the Government, on the whole, have treated the Alliance with the degree of consideration to which they have been entitled, but, as the Alliance have accepted it, I think that justifies the Government, and they are simply getting the treatment they deserve. I think the ground taken by my friend the Minister of Customs in connection with the temperance legislation of the country was the correct one. I think it is simply trifling with the temperance sentiment of this country, and casting dust in the eyes of the electors for any private member of this House to go on year after year introducing an Act as my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) has been doing, professing to amend the Canada Temperance Act. They may go on in that way till doomsday, they may go on until that Act is greyhaired, without getting any further. I want to quote here an authority high up in the temperance ranks, an authority so high up that, every time these gentlemen have anything to do, they put him in the seat of honor and get him to preside over them. That authority is Senator Vidal, who, as an hon. member near me states, is the president of the Alliance. I know he has been identified nominally with temperance ever since I can remember, as president, figure head, and general showman, and all this kind of thing; but I never heard of his voting against the Government, and until a man's faith is strong enough to lead him to do that, through a sense of right, I tell you, Mr. Speaker, the temperance reform is not going to make much progress. Now, the occasion I refer to was one on which the Premier introduced an Act to amend this Canada Temperance Act. It appeared that the original Act was defective in this respect, that the courts held that where there were no licenses in existence in a county, the Canada Temperance Act could not come into effect, for the simple reason that there was no time on which licenses expired, and the court apparently held that where there was no licenses to expire, the Act never could come into force. The Premier did agree to introduce legislation, and that was amended at his instance. Now, in looking over the Senate Report the other day I find some remarks delivered by Senator Vidal, on the 4th April, 1884, in connection with the amendment I have referred to. I may say, by-the-by, that the Premier, in introducing that matter to the House, made this remark: "It is quite clear that so long as the Act is on the Statute-book it should be made workable." A very good sentiment, but unfortunately the active operation of that sentiment stopped at about the time he got this amendment passed, and he pursued a retrograde course, or rather, as he expressed himself the other day, he did not know the Act required any amendments now. But on this occasion the hon. Senator alluded to spoke as follows:—

41-1888-5

"Very earnest letters came to us from Nova Scotia saying we must if possible obtain this amendment. We told them what has turned out to be the case that immediately on the introduction of the Bill in either House in all probability these would be an amendment offered to the Act by some opponent, which while professing to be friendly to it would really be fatal to its very existence. A conference of the members interested was held and we came to this conclusion: That it was no use for any private member to introduce a Bill of this nature. There is a moral certainty that if it is done by a private member it will just meet the fate which has attended former efforts to obtain such an amendment."

Now, these are sentiments uttered by the gentleman who is to-day president of the Dominion Temperance Alliance. Since 1884 have the appointments to the Senate, with one solitary exception, been likely to favor prohibitory legislation or have they been the reverse? Every child in the country knows, every temperance man in the country knows, how grieved he was when certain of those appointments were made—with one exception from Toronto. They felt, so far as the Senate was concerned, that it was hostile to that class of legislation formally, and that that hostility was being reinforced by recent additions to the Senate. Yet, so hopeless was the position in 1884 that Senator Vidal, an active temperance man, then openly and avowedly expressed the opinion that it was utterly useless to attempt to carry legislation through the House unless it was a Government measure. He went on to say:

"Between 20 and 30 members of Parliament waited on Sir John and his colleagues, stated their case and this Bill was the result. Mr. Wark enquired if it was a Government measure. Mr. Vidal said: This is what we understood because if it was introduced by a private member it would fail, and our only object in going to the Government to ask them to introduce a measure was that it should be a Government measure."

Mr. Speaker, could words be more distinct than that? Here was a man who knew of what he spoke, a man who has been in the inside centre of the temperance reform, and know all that has been going on in connection with temperance ever since I have known anything of the temperance cause. Yet, here was a man, in 1884, who had been a consistent supporter of this Government and a life-long Conservative, who said that it is utterly idle to attempt to pass legislation in this House unless it is a Government measure. Yet we find the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) going on from year to year, with the consent of this very Alliance of which this Senator is the head in this country, introducing legislation and expecting to get it passed. Now, Sir, I say it is an insult to the temperance men of Canada, it is an insult to the thousands of Conservative temperance men, because there are thousands of them, in spite of their political proclivities, who honestly believe that temperance laws could be enforced if they had a fair chance. and, Sir, to-day we see the result. Worried, worn, badgered, Mr. BAIN (Wentworth).

tired with the fruitless attempts to coax a Government not in sympathy with the cause, the result has been that on every resent occasion on which the repeal of the Scott Act has been submitted to the electorate in counties where three years ago it was carried by large majorities, those men have, by their vote, censured the Government and those temperance men that have idly stood by and allowed that Act to be killed by its own friends in this House. I said to my Conservative temperance friends at home: You do not need to leave the ranks of your own party, get your temperance representation made perfect, just set on the backs of the candidates you put in the field, and tell them you are in earnest." Did we not have a sample of that a year ago in this House? Look at the enormous vote that was cast to keep the Scott Act in existence, but the moment you undertook to amend it, that vote dwindled down until they were prepared to do anything rather than amend that Act. That showed that there were a lot of men in this House who knew full well that if they expressed openly their convictions on this matter, they dared not go back and face their constituents, or they would have been put to the right-about face. Yet this is the way this measure has been played with until the temperance sentiment of the country is worn out, and to day after all this disappointment, the result will probably be that the moment the Scott Act is submitted in these other counties it will be repealed, and then temperance men will be driven to another long and arduous fight to bring the Act up to that position where the Minister of Marine and Fisheries says it could be made fairly workable; then if it had proved a failure, all parties would have had agreed that it was desirable to repeal it. But now, baffled, wearied, betrayed, by the very men who professed to be their friends in Parliament, temperance men are left with an Act unworkable, and confronted with every obstacle that can be put in their way. Yet they come here, year after year, introducing this legislation. I say, Mr. Speaker, it is time the covering was torn off this class of legislation. Let us have some attempt at honestly dealing with this question. Sir, I have stood up in this House very little to open my mouth in connection with the temperance question, but when I came here at an early date I made up my mind to be found on the side of temperance always, and I hope I shall always be found there, whether it is pleasing or displeasing to hon. gentleman on either side of the House. All I have to say is this: That I expect to be a friend of the temperance cause in the country and in this House when the people shall wake up to the fact that they need to send men of better timber on the Conservative side than ever they have sent here yet, or else we will never get prohibition. I say, in so far as the operation of the Crooks Act is concerned in Ontario, the temperance people have no reason to be discouraged with the movement of temperance sentiments in the country. I say there is a steady, solid growth of sentiment in the country in the direction of restriction, and in the direction of reducing the consumption of liquor. I say it is a matter of extreme regret that this Act should not have been put in a fairly workable position. Let me draw your attention to one feature in connection with that much abused Act, called the Crooks Act, but which now even liquor men extol to the heavens as a grand matter. I had the curiosity to look into the report of the Ontario Government the other day to see what were the results in connection with the reduction of licenses and the general enforcement of that Act. I find that in 1875, when that legislation was initiated, there were 4,793 tavern licenses issued in the Province of Ontario, and 1,307 shop licenses. In the next ten years ending 1885 when only one or two counties had adopted the Act and when the whole country was still operating under the Crooks License Act, we find that the licenses had been reduced to 3,252 tavern licenses and 675 shop licenses, being a reduction of more than one-half in shop licenses and about one-third in tavern licenses issued in the various counties of the Province. In connection with this matter the temperance sentiment of the country has shown itself by a steady restriction of the licenses in counties that have not adopted the Canada Temperance Act, and to-day, as a consequence, public temperance sentiment is healthier and firmer in those counties than where the Canada Temperance Act has been enforced in a demoralised manner by the base neglect of its friends in the House, where it has been placed in a position such as to disgust its friends, and which has resulted in either one or two things as shown by the recent vote: either that its supporters were disgusted and stayed away from the polls, or else they took no interest in the matter. I believe in temperance legislation, at all events I should like to see a fair trial made; but I feel that the temperance sentiment of the country has been seriously misrepresented by many of the members of the House who have pretended to represent it, and while I can echo the sentiment of the hon. member for Queen's, N.S. (Mr. Freeman) that the question should be lifted out of the political arena, I tell that hon. gentleman that he and his friends have done more to discourage and damn the temperance cause by temperance legislation during the last four or five years than all the acts of the liquor dealers during the last twenty years put together.

Mr. FISHER. After the remarks of the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain) it is not necessary for me to deal with this question at any length; but the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) a little while ago made some remarks in regard to myself to which I must say a few words. I have alluded this evening to what the hon. gentleman has said as to the occurrences at the meeting last year to which he is so fond of alluding. I am not going to take up the time of the House at this late hour by repeating this statement. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) a little while ago said this is a question of veracity between he and I. I should prefer to believe it is merely a question of memory, and I do not wish to impute motives to the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson).

Mr. JAMIESON. I do not recollect stating it was a question of veracity.

Mr. FISHER. I understood so. I have already stated this evening my remembrance of those occurrences, and I have no reason to change that statement one whit or one iota. That may have been, as I said, a question of memory between the hon. gentleman and myself, but in regard to what the hon. member for Lanark has said about the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and his vote and action in this House upon this question, that is not a question of memory at all, but I regret to say emphatically a question of fact. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) a little while ago said that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) did not vote on that occasion last year. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), interrupting him, stated he did vote, and according to the rules of the House, after that denial of the hon. member for Bothwell, it was the duty of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) to have accepted the hon. gentleman's statement and withdrawn the assertion he made in regard to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). He did not do so. But a few minutes afterwards the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) placed the record of the Journals before the House showing that his name was in each one of the divisions. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) ought then, I say, to have withdrawn his statement. But no; he then tried to hide himself under what he said was contained in the record of the Hansard, and he said that the Hansard record, which I hold under my hand, and which is exactly the same volume as the hon. gentleman had under his hand, did not contain the name of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I have here the four votes that took place on 13th June last, and in every one of those votes, in the same volume which the hon. member for Lanark had, appeared the name of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills).

Mr. JAMIESON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; it is not so. It does not appear on the main motion.

Mr. FISHER. I will read the record, and it will show what was the statement when he had this volume under his hands, and when he professed to appeal to this volume and to quote it. First, there is the vote on the amendment of Mr. Cargill, which was for a repeal of the Scott Act. Under nays I find the name of Mr. Jamieson, and further down the name of Mr. Mills (Bothwell).

Mr. JAMIESON. Yes; I said so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No; you said I did not vote.

Mr. FISHER. The Hansard report to-morrow will perhaps show what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. JAMIESON. The hon. gentleman has an extraordinary memory. I said that he voted on the amendment, but when it came to the main motion his name did not appear. That is what I said.

Mr. FISHER. If the hon. gentleman will weigh a little more carefully what he is saying, he will find that I will be able to prove that he is wrong even in that statement.

Mr. JAMIESON. I appeal to Hansard when it comes out.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I told you my name appeared in the Journals of the House.

Mr. FISHER. The next amendment is that of Mr. Girouard, and I find Mr. Mills (Bothwell) voting there.

Mr. HAGGART. That is correct; he said so.

Mr. FISHER. Again, there is the amendment I moved myself, which was to obviate a vote upon the amendment of Mr. Sproule in reference to compensation. I find there also Mr. Jamieson and Mr. Mills again voted on the same side.

Mr. JAMIESON. Turn to the next division.

Mr. FISHER. In the division on the main motion as amended I find among the yeas Mr. Jamieson and among the nays Mr. Mills (Bothwell).

Mr. JAMIESON. I beg your pardon. If that is so, I am certainly mistaken. I examined it carefully and I could not find it.

Mr. FISHER. I regret that the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) should have allowed himself to make such a statement impugning the veracity of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in this House on such a cursory examination of the record as he evidently made.

Mr. JAMIESON. And other members examined it with me.

Mr. FISHER. Then the hon. gentleman was in very bad company.

Mr. JAMIESON. Will the hon. gentleman pass the book across here?

Mr. FISHER. It was the duty of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) to have accepted the statement of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills); but instead of doing so, he chose to deny it and even to deny the statement of the records of the House.

Mr. HAGGART. Send it over; let us see if it is there.

Mr. FISHER. I will not continue this controversy any further. I will simply say this in reference to the motion the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) now before the House, that the Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read this day six months. I must say I am surprised that the hon. member for Muskoka should have made this motion. He is a member who, I believe, has the courage of his convictions. I believe he sincerely desires to see the Scott Act repealed. I believe he is also glad to see that in his own county the Scott Act has been repealed, and he desires to see it removed from the Statute-book; but if the Act is to remain on the Statute-book he should be willing to make it as perfect as possible. Even those opposed in principle to the Act should allow us on this occasion to amend it. I have but one further remark to make in connection with the statement made by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) this evening, that the action of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was contrary to the declared opinion of the Dominion Alliance. I cannot allow that to go forth as being the truth in regard to the Dominion Alliance. They have made no utterance and passed no resolution whatever in that regard. Neither the member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) nor any of the other gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House made a motion at the Dominion Alliance condemning the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). They had not the courage in the Dominion Alliance to object to that action, or to say that the Dominion Alliance was against the motion, yet long after they come here and they emphatically state that, contrary to the desires of the Dominion Alliance. They have no foundation on which to make that statement whatever. I think I know enough of the Dominion Alliance to know that the Alliance does not pretend to look to itself as being the only exponent of temperance people in this country, or to insist that no temperance action should be taken in this House except from that enforcement. I may say also the Dominion Alliance on many occasions have made an effort to induce the Government to adopt the Scott Act amendments as their Bill, and they have invariably failed to obtain that action on the part of the Government. I believe as I have stated over and over again in the council of the Dominion Alliance, that until the Government do take up that Bill under their protection and make it their Bill it cannot be law. As a member of the Dominion Alliance I believe it our duty to endorse that action. I emphatically deny that all the members of the Dominion Alliance believe that this is the only way in which temperance legislation can be obtained in this House. The Dominion Alliance has made no utterance whatever on this motion of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and I know that the hon. members opposite had no foundation whatever to make the statements which they did here to-night.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to discuss the question of whether the Scott Act is a good Act or not, but I rise to discuss the amendment of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). The affect of that amendment would be to leave things exactly as they are now and it would merely leave the Scott Act with all its imperfections, which are acknowledged by its friends and opponents and which we all know it possesses. If I were asked for my opinion on the Scott Act as it now stands I must say that the Scott Act at present does not nearly as much restrain the sale of liquor as the Crooks Act in Ontario. I think there is more restriction to liquor selling in Toronto under the Crooks Act than there is in St. Thomas which is under the Scott Act. In Ottawa or in Toronto tavern keepers have to observe certain regulations while in St. Thomas where there are no licenses there are no regulations, and a man who sells at all will sell any day of the week and at any hour of the night Saturday and Sunday. There is no restriction in Scott Act counties except the fear of getting caught. I verily believe the Scott Act has really led rather to an increase than a decrease in the consumption of liquor in the county which I have the honor to represent and in the city of St. Thomas, the county town. This failure of the Scott Act is not due to any failure on the part of the local officers. The inspector for West Elgin, which includes the city of St. Thomas, is one of the most devoted temperance men and prohibitionists in the country. He has been frequently complimented by different temperance bodies for his strenuous efforts to enforce the Act and he has secured a great many convictions, but at the same time the sale of liquor goes on more freely there than it does in Ottawa to-day. That is my impression of the Scott Act as it stands. I do not see how I can vote for the motion of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) for it does not remove this inefficient Act from the Statute-book, but leaves it with all its acknowledged imperfections to continue in its failure in the purpose for which it was intended. Neither am I sure that any amendments that can be made to this Act will make it workable; however, I think it is only fair play to give the supporters of the Act an opportunity to show what amendments they propose to make and to convince us, if possible, that those amendments will make it workable, and in reality a prohibitory liquor law. If they fail to show that it will make it a moral Act, I cannot support it, and I will vote at the third reading, but in the meantime until we see what the amendments proposed in the committee are, I find it necessary to vote for the second reading.

Mr. FISHER.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before the question is put I just wish to say this: I had very distinct recollection of my vote relating to the temperance question in the House last year. The hon. member for North Lanark said I left the House with the speed of a "Maud S." The hon. gentleman had a distinct recollection of that fact. I sent out for the Journals of the House and I knew my vote would be there recorded, but the hon. gentleman not was satisfied. He declared there was some other official record than the Journals, and that it was there recorded that I did not vote. Well, Sir, notwithstanding the Hibernianism of the hon. gentleman I find that even in the official report of the Debates my vote is there recorded, and yet the hon. gentleman stood up in this House thinking that nobody else would examine the reports, or that we would take his statement for granted, and declare that in the official reports there was no record of my vote. The official report has been examined by other parties. My vote is there recorded and the House now sees how much credit is to be attached to a statement of the hon. gentleman who with a copy of the Hansard debates in his hand in which my vote is there recorded attempts to mislead the House on this question.

Mr. JAMIESON. I believe I have made a mistake on this question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. JAMIESON. As a member of Parliament and a gentleman it is my duty to withdraw the statement. I am not the first hon. member who has made a mistake. I certainly examined the record and other parties with me, and any gentleman who takes the Hansard will see how the mistake occurred. The name does not appear in order. I certainly made a mistake in that way and I wish to apologise.

An hon. MEMBER. What about the speed of "Maud S."

Mr. JAMIESON. I have made my statement.

The House divided on the motion to adjourn the debate.

YEAS :

Messieurs

Bain (Soulanges), Bergeron,
Be gin,
Burdett,
Burns,
Cargill,
Carling,

Dessaint,
Dupont,
Fiset,
Gauchois,
Guay,
Haggart,
Hickey,

Madill,
Marshall,
O'Brien,
Prior,
Putnam,
Skinner,
Small,

Caron (Sir Adolphe), Kenny,
Oimon, Labelle,
Gostigan, Labrosse,
Coughlin, Langevin (Sir Hector),
Couture, McCarthy,
Daly, McDougall (O. Breton),
Davin, McGreevy,
Denison, McMillan (Vaudreuil),

Smith (Ontario),
Tisiale,
Tupper (Pictou),
Tyrwhitt,
Wilson (Argenteuil),
Wood (Brockville), and Wright.—44.

Doyon,
Edgar,
Eisenhauer,
Ellis,
Ferguson (Renfrew),
Fisher,
Foster,
Freeman,
Gauthier, Gillmor,

Lovitt,
Macdonald (Huron),
McGulla,
McDonald (Victoria),
McDougald (Pictou),
McIntyre,
McLelan,
McMillan (Huron),
McMullen,

Trow,
Tupper (Sir Charles),
Tarcot,
Wallace,
Watson,
White (Renfrew),
Wilmot,
Wilson (Elgin), and Wilson (Lennox),

NAYS :

Messieurs

Amyot,
Bain (Wentworth),
Barron,
Borden,
Bourassa, Bowell,
Boyle,
Brien,
Brown,
Bryson,
Cameron,
Carpenter,
Cartwright (Sir Rich.),
Casey,
Charlton,
Cochrane,
Cook,
Davies,
De St. Georges,
Dickinson,

Girouard,
Guilbault,
Guillet,
Hale,
Henderson,
Hesson,
Holton,
Hudspeth,
Ives,
Jamieson,
Jones (Digby),
Jones (Halifax),
Kirk,
Kirkpatrick,
Landry,
Lang,
Laurie,
Laurier,
Lavergne,
Lister,

McNeill,
Meigs,
Mills (Annapolis),
Mills (Bothwell),
Mitchell,
Paterson (Brant),
Perry,
Platt,
Rinfret,
Robertson,
Roome,
Rowand,
Rykert,
St. Marie,
Scriver,
Somerville,
Sutherland,
Taylor,
Thérien,
Thompson,

Motion to adjourn the debate negatived.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I understand that there is a general wish on the part of the members that this Bill should go to the committee, and therefore with the consent of the House, I am quite willing to withdraw my motion for the six months' hoist.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read the second time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and House adjourned at 1.20 a.m. (Thursday.)

Printed by McLEAN, ROSS & Co., Parliamentary Printers, Wellington Street, Ottawa.

House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Thursday, April 26, 1888.

No. 42.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 26th April, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ACT RESPECTING THE SAFETY OF SHIPS.

Mr. FOSTER moved first reading of Bill (No. 112) to amend the Revised Statutes, chap. 77, respecting the safety of ships. He said: The object aimed at in this Bill is to make greater provision for the safety of vessels, chiefly in two ways: first, by providing better machinery for the inspection and surveying of vessels leaving our ports when they are supposed to be, or charged to be unseaworthy; and in the second place, it provides certain rules and precautions in reference to the storage of grain cargoes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I would like to ask the Minister of Marine if it is intended to apply to sea-going vessels, or only to lake vessels?

Mr. FOSTER. To sea-going vessels as well as to lake vessels.

SUMMARY CONVICTIONS ACT.

Mr. THOMPSON moved first reading of Bill (No. 113) to amend the Summary Convictions Act. He said: The principal objects of this Bill are to give greater facilities for procuring the attendance of witnesses. It empowers Justices of the Peace to issue subpoenas into other counties outside of their jurisdiction, and it likewise contains compulsory provisions as regards witnesses who fail to obey subpoenas. It likewise establishes the competency of witnesses in proceedings under this Act, notwithstanding they have a pecuniary interest, and it provides further for the methods of appeal.

RESOLUTIONS REGARDING THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the absence of Sir Charles Tupper, I beg to move that the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to-morrow to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That in view of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company having agreed with the Government of Canada to relinquish, for the consideration and upon the conditions herein set forth, the exclusive privilege possessed by it in virtue of Article fifteen of the agreement between Her Majesty and the Company, contained in the schedule to the Act 44th Victoria, chapter 1, it is expedient to provide that:

42-1888-1

(a) The Government of Canada will guarantee the payment of interest, until maturity, at three and a half per cent on bonds of the Company to an amount not exceeding fifteen millions of dollars; the principal of such bonds to be payable not later than fifty years from their date, and the principal and interest to be secured as hereinafter set forth.

(b) Such bonds shall be secured by deed of bargain and sale to Trustees of all the Company's title to the unsold lands forming part of the Company's land grant under the said Act, and such deed shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

(c) The proceeds of the sales of the lands hereinbefore mentioned shall be paid over to the Government of Canada, together with any other sums which the Company pays over, for the purpose, to the Government, and the whole shall constitute a fund which shall be held by the Government for the exclusive purpose of satisfying the principal of the said bonds.

(d) On the amount so set apart, not exceeding the amount necessary to redeem the bonds hereinbefore mentioned, the Government shall pay to the Company interest at the rate of three and a half per cent., such interest to be applied in satisfaction of interest of the bonds as the same accrues: but if the Company makes default in the payment of any interest falling due on any of the bonds aforesaid, the Company shall, if required by the Government, pay over all interest collected under uncompleted sales, upon the price of lands sold as well as principal realised from sales thereof, and the Government shall allow on the amount of such payments, interest at the rate hereinbefore mentioned, and shall apply the same and all interest accrued on the principal fund towards the payment of the interest on the said bonds.

(e) So soon as the aggregate amount of the said fund, in the hands of the Government, equals the principal of all the bonds of the said issue then outstanding, the Company may pay in a further sum to cover any interest up to date, and thereupon the mortgage shall be discharged, and thereafter all interest on such bonds shall be paid by the Government, as also the principal at maturity, but the Government shall be in no way liable for the payment of any part of the principal except so far as the Company have provided it with a fund for the purpose.

(f) Such Minister as is designated by the Government shall be one of the Trustees under the said mortgage deed, and the appointment of the other Trustees shall be subject to the approval of the Government.

(g) All land grant bonds which form part of the former issue by the Company and are now held by it shall be cancelled, and the mortgage hereinbefore mentioned shall be subject to the payment of such of the said land grant bonds as are outstanding, but all sums due or to become due for unpaid purchase money to the company on account of lands heretofore sold shall be applied to the payment of such land grant bonds according to the terms of the mortgage securing the same.

(h) If the Company, under any powers granted to it, sells or leases the branch of its railway east of Red River, between St. Boniface and the boundary of the United States, any incorporated company to whom such sale or lease is made, may operate such branch as if it had been incorporated for the purpose, but the moneys resulting from such sale or lease shall be applied either towards the payment of the bonds secured by the railway or towards increasing the security for such bonds by expenditure on the railway, or partly in one way or partly in the other.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the resolution be taken to-morrow? We will have the budget to-morrow.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is merely a formal motion.

Mr. LAURIER. I suppose the hon. gentleman will lay before the House all the correspondence with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think that the papers which are laid on the Table containing the correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Imperial authorities in reference to this disallowance question, have yet been printed. If they have not yet been printed they ought to be printed and put in our hands, as it is very necessary we should have them in printed form before the discussion proceeds. Will the hon. Minister see that the proper authorities get this done?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not know whether these papers have been printed, but of course we will have the matter looked into at once and the papers brought down, if they have not already been laid on the Table.

EMPLOYEES OF THE NORTHERN LIGHT.

Mr. WELSH. I wish to ask the Minister of Marine when the balance of those papers will be laid on the Table of this House connected with the men employed on the Northern Light?

Mr. FOSTER. I think very shortly. We had to write down to an agent at Charlottetown for the particular items. Just as soon as they come back they will be laid on the Table.

Mr. WELSH. I would like to ask the Minister of Marine if he has not the accounts from the men employed on the Northern Light last summer? They must be received in the department before this, and paid for. If those accounts had been sent into the department and paid, what necessity is there to write down for further documents?

Mr. FOSTER. If there was no occasion to write down for further information, it is not probable I would take the trouble to do so. The hon. gentleman was precise in asking a certain minute information, and I propose that he will get all information and get it as minute as it can possibly be.

Mr. WELSH. Those papers were moved for in the first Orders of the House.

THE CUSTOMS ACT.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 92) to amend Chapter 32 of the Revised Statutes, respecting the Customs.—(Mr. Bowell.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 31,

Mr. BOWELL. This is the only clause that was not passed. It was allowed to stand at the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), in order to ascertain how the amendment to section 148 would affect the time given for the entry of an action under clause 147. A careful reading of the two sections will show that section 145 relates to proceedings that may be taken against the individual officer of customs, whereas the proposed sub-section to 148, which was purposely worded as far as possible the same as section 145, refers to suits for the recovery of the thing seized. The one section refers to the individual, and the other to the thing. But still, for fear that any misunderstanding might arise in the administration of these two sections, I propose to add to sub-section 2 of section 148, the following words:—

Every such action, suit or proceeding shall be brought within three months after such decision has been given.

This, I am informed by the Minister of Justice, will meet the objection that was made to the sections as they now stand.

Mr. GILLMOR. What time have they now?

Mr. THOMPSON. Three months from the time the offence is committed, and this change makes it three months after the decision is given.

Committee rose and reported, and Bill read the third time and passed.

FRAUDULENT TRADE MARKS.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 91) to amend the law relating to Fraudulent Marks on Merchandise.—(Mr. Thompson.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

(In the Committee.)

On section 9,

Mr. THOMPSON. I propose that this clause should pass. I had some doubt as to the propriety of the proviso, as it is somewhat of a novelty in this country. I think this is the only case in which a person charged before a court of summary jurisdiction has the option to demand a trial on indictment for the offence. However, the clause is in the English Act, and I think it is well to have the procedure no more severe here than it is there.

Mr. LAURIER. It is always an inconvenience to have conflicting laws, and I think the hon. gentleman ought to endeavor to have the laws on that subject made uniform instead of exceptional.

Mr. THOMPSON. There is a great deal of force in that view, and I will ask to have the proviso struck out.

On section 10,

Mr. THOMPSON. I had doubts at first as to the right of Parliament to enact a section which treats of the contract of sale, but, on reflection, I am inclined to think it is within our powers. We have, of course, unlimited powers with respect to criminal matters, and this is simply an enactment that when a contract of sale is made it shall imply a guarantee that a crime has not been committed.

Mr. MILLS. I think this is merely a matter of civil right. The Minister of Justice is not dealing with this criminally at all; he is not dealing with it as an incident of crime, when he declares that a contract made between two parties, where a trade mark is involved, shall have a certain effect, by declaring that the vendor shall be a warrantor that the goods are the goods of the party entitled to use the trade mark. That is clearly a civil right. It is clearly a matter of civil contract, an ordinary matter of sale. Under our constitution, the Local Legislatures, in matters of civil rights, have the right to enact such criminal laws as may be necessary for the proper enforcement of those rights. While the criminal law generally is under our jurisdiction, special offences committed against the jurisdiction and authority or against the public policy of a Local Legislature may be dealt with by the Local Legislature itself. For instance, suppose that a Local Legislature provides for the trial of a general election, and the Province wishes to provide for the protection of the polls and for the punishment of fraudulent votes, clearly it has the power, under the constitution, to give effect to its own legislation and its own policy by criminal enactment. That is specially provided for in the 16th sub-section, and so it would be in a matter of this sort. If a party improperly uses a trade mark, the Local Legislatures may provide that he shall be punished or be held to warrant the goods he sold. That is within their jurisdiction, and it does not seem to me we have the power to extend our jurisdiction over civil matters by undertaking to deal with certain criminal features of it. The Minister would act more in consonance with our rights by abstaining from any legislation of this sort.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have not overlooked any of the points which my hon. friend has urged. They are certainly the views which present themselves on the first examination of the clause, but I cannot agree that the clause is entirely beyond our power. In fact, while I had some doubt on the subject at first, I feel strongly convinced now that the clause is within our power. We are making legislation on the subject of trade marks to this extent: we are declaring that the fabrication of a trade mark shall be a forgery; we are going further, we are providing that the goods with fabricated trade marks on them shall be seized by the Customs authorities, and we are therefore depriving the purchaser of his property in those goods and invading to that extent his civil rights. We have a right to go further, and say that the individual whom we have deprived of the right of property in those goods shall have recourse against the vendor, on the principle that the vendor must be taken to have warranted that the crime of forgery was not committed in respect of those trade marks. We have numerous illustrations of the same kind of legislation and of the way in which such legislation may be necessary. Supposing a promissory note was given for the purchase of a vote at a parliamentary election, that would be valid ; but in the course of our legislation for the prevention of corrupt practices, we certainly not only have the right to punish such a transaction with penalties, but to declare that the civil contract for which that note was a consideration should be null and void. If we assume that the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors is within our jurisdiction, and we forbid the entrance of intoxicating liquors into, and their sale in the country, we can legislate, with the view of frustrating the sale, that any civil contract made for the purchase of intoxicating liquors shall be null and void. It is with these views that I think the clause is within our jurisdiction ; and, if it were doubtful, as I admit it seemed to me at the first blush to be, I would still ask the House to enact this, unless it were clearly beyond our powers, because it can do no practical injury by being enacted. It confers a right in regard to which necessarily litigation must take place for its enforcement, and it must come before the courts for adjudication. If the view which I have taken is not upheld, it will be declared beyond our competence, but we should not refuse to enact a provision which is in force in all these other countries, unless it is clear that the clause is without our jurisdiction. If we did not, we would leave ourselves open to the objection that, having undertaken to adopt this convention and having become parties to it, we have omitted the legislation which might be a material part of it, and we might not be entitled to the representation at the convention to be held next year, or to the protection which the trade marks are entitled to in all countries which form the union. For all these reasons, feeling that this can do no harm, even if the view which I take and am strongly convinced of, is not a right one, I think it is wise to pass this Bill.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) It seems to me that the objection which has been taken has not been answered by the Minister of Justice. The objection, as I understand, is that by this Statute we are creating new offences. We have gone a step further than we are entitled to go, and have imported into a contract a stipulation for certain covenants which are not placed there under the common law. This section alters the entire import of the contract which the parties have made. It is not, as far as I can see, essential to the purpose of the legislation which is now before us. So far as it was essential, it might be argued that it was within our powers, but here we are going outside of our powers in saying that this contract shall have this additional condition imported into it.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is made criminal.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) That may be all right. I do not understand that my hon. friend called in question any part of the Bill which has that effect. The Bill in regard to this matter says that :

"On the sale or in the contract for the sale of any goods to which a trade mark, or mark or trade description has been applied, the vendor shall be deemed to warrant that the mark is a genuine trade mark, and not forged or falsely applied, or that the trade description is not a false trade description within the meaning of this Act, unless the contrary is expressed in some writing signed by or on behalf of the vendor and delivered at the time of the sale or contract to and accepted by the vendee."

Under the common law, the provisions would be very different. Here you import a guarantee which is not to be found at common law. You are going beyond your powers, and I feel that it is dangerous legislation for us to adopt, when we have all authority against us, and for us to leave it to the courts afterwards to determine this matter, unless we are perfectly clear that we are within our powers.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). By the 13th section clause of the 92nd section of the British North America Act, the Local Legislatures are given jurisdiction over "property and civil rights in the Province." The 15th clause of the same section says :

"The imposition of punishment by fine, penalty, or imprisonment for enforcing any law of the Province made in relation to any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section."

What are the civil rights? Clearly they are the rights which are regulated by law. It is true that, while generally the Local Legislatures have the right to deal with civil rights, there are certain special civil rights which are left to the jurisdiction of this Legislature. But, as those are named, they are limited. Everything which is not embraced within these specified limits falls within the general provision in regard to civil rights which are controlled by civil law, which the party may act upon so long as he does not interfere with the rights of others. It is clear from the provisions of section 92 of the British North America Act that this Parliament cannot obtain jurisdiction over a subject by declaring that it shall be punishable in a certain sense criminally. If the policy of the law is that the civil right, in order to secure its due enforcement, requires punitive legislation, that belongs, not to this Parliament, but to the Local Legislature ; but if the criminal features of the transaction are made the chief features of the legislation, then it falls under the criminal law, and comes within the jurisdiction of this Legislature. The hon. gentleman proposes to deal with this matter from the criminal point of view, and, so far as he has made the criminal features paramount, and has dealt with this fraudulent use of trade marks as a part of the criminal law, I do not object to it ; but when he goes beyond that, and infringes on the civil rights of the parties, and provides that persons other than the principals may be affected by the provisions of this Bill, I think he is clearly invading the province of the Local Legislature, and that is exhibited in the provisions of the 17th section, in which he says :

"On the sale or in the contract for the sale of any goods to which a trade mark, or mark or trade description has been applied, the vendor shall be deemed to warrant that the mark is a genuine trade mark."

Suppose the mark is genuine. I ask the hon. gentleman whether he has the right to put the party to the proof? That is not criminal. There has been no criminal offence committed. The use is legitimate, and he proposes to make a provision which in a civil contract, a contract of sale, would put the party to the necessity of proving a certain fact before that sale could be effected. Clearly that cannot be done. The hon. gentleman is creating a limitation under the existing civil right when he says that a party who has clearly a civil right in regard to a civil contract shall have that right limited in a particular way, and that that right shall not be effected unless a certain fact is established. That is formally an invasion of the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures, and has nothing whatever to do with the criminal law. This Bill cannot be confined to the offender. The hon. gentleman imposes certain penalties on a party who has not violated the law, and he says, unless you do certain things and prove them, your law is inoperative. I think the hon. gentleman will see that this is something which this Legislature cannot do.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and myself entertain very different views as to the extent to which this Bill affects civil rights. In my opinion, when we are in reality, substantially, and in good faith, dealing with these matters over which we have jurisdiction, we have a right, in so far as it is, in our judgment, essential to legislate fully on these subjects, to take possession of any subject that is relegated to the Local Legislature, civil rights included. Every time we deal with the subject of criminal law, every time we establish an offence which is not an offence at common law, we deal with the subject of civil rights. Every time we legislate in respect to interest, bills of exchange, or promissory notes, we affect civil procedure and civil rights; and every time we legislate with respect to the criminal law, as I said before, in creating a statutory offence, we are directly invading the province of civil rights. The hon. member says these are given to us. We are given power to legislate with respect to these subjects, and the giving of that power implies the power to legislate so fully that it may be necessary for us to take up other subjects which are not given to us at all. Every time we legislate with respect to rivers, harbors or the public domain, with respect to the erection of public buildings, lighthouses, and so on, we take power to expropriate private property, and invade in that way, and necessarily, in the fulfilment of our function, the domain of civil rights in its very citadel, the rights with respect to real estate in the Provinces. Now, are we doing so here or not? If the hon. member does not agree with me in this view of the constitution, of course I cannot expect to convince him; but if he agrees with me that that is the extent of our powers in legislating over matters which are given to our Parliament, I should hope to convince him that here we are doing nothing more than this: having made this a crime, as we have a right to do; having prevented the importation into the country, as we have a right to do; having prevented its sale in the country, as we have a right to do, we have also a right to nullify a sale, or to attach conditions to the contract or the sale itself. We have a right, even, to say that the making of that contract shall be a crime; we have a right to make that a felony, if we please; we have a right to attach any punishment, capital punishment, if necessary, to the making of that contract.

Mr. EDGAR. But you do not do it.

Mr. THOMPSON. No, we do not do it. We do a little less, but we do what is involved in that principle. Having the right to punish the making of a contract, having the right to declare it invalid, we have surely the right, although we punish parties for having made it, although we invalidate it, to attach conditions to it which will give the innocent purchaser a remedy for that in respect to which we have punished him. Now, the hon. gentleman is mistaken, as a matter of argument, in his contention that, in the case of a purchaser of goods properly paid for, we are putting the proof upon him of his innocence. No question can arise at all unless there has been proof that the trade mark was forged, that the crime was committed; but we are in no respect putting the burden of proof upon him, no more than you are putting it upon me if you accuse me, in any court of justice, of a crime that I did not commit. I am availing myself of my rights to that extent. Every man against whom there is evidence of an offence must be put upon proof that the offence was committed. But, as I said before, if we were imposing a criminal penalty which might be beyond our power, if we were doing anything by which the subject could be harassed or oppressed, I would think it well to keep far within the limits of our jurisdiction; and so I would say as to any kind of legislation which might have the effect of harassing or distressing the subject. But here we are dealing simply with the party to a fraudulent contract; the party who has committed a forgery, and where the matter must necessarily come before the court for adjudication before an innocent party could get the redress which we are endeavoring to give him. It does seem to me than no injury can result from the adoption of this, even if I am all wrong as to our powers.

Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. EDGAR. If an ordinary letter relating to the sale of an article which may be trade marked, is brought to a lawyer, and his advice is sought as to the liability of the party on that ordinary letter, with no warning, with no reference whatever to the trade mark, does not the Minister of Justice see how exceedingly unreasonable it would be that he should have to search all over the criminal laws of the Dominion to see if, by accident, some clause might not be inserted creating that to be a contract which does not appear to be so on its face, and when, in respect of that very contract, no criminal liability is attached? It does look to me as if the Minister of Justice were trying, whenever the subject of criminal law is before the House, to reach out in all directions to see if, by any ingenuity, he can bring a civil matter, a civil contract, into this legislation. I can not imagine, for instance, that the Minister of Justice would ever think of proposing such a clause in the criminal law of his own motion; but he finds it in a law which is of the nature of a treaty, and which it is considered advisable for this Parliament to pass. But a question of this kind can never have arisen in any of the countries which are concerned, because the Legislatures who enacted it have supreme power on all those questions. Surely it would be far better, if there is nothing essential in the criminal part of this statute, that the Minister of Justice should make the whole statute more nearly within the jurisdiction of this Legislature, by leaving that out or modifying it in some way, so that it would be connected with the criminal portion of the Act. Now it is distinct.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. He overlooks one feature of this altogether, because he bases his argument, to a great extent, on the supposition that we are not making the contract an offence. But the hon. gentleman will remember, when I recall it to his attention, that the making of that contract, that is, the contract of sale of fraudulently marked merchandise, is just precisely what we are making it, the committing of a forgery, by this act. Now, having made that a forgery, we say the forger shall be liable, not only to the penalty which we prescribe in this Parliament, but his contract shall be voided to the extent of the purchaser being able to recover back the amount of his purchase money.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman, I think, goes further than that. Under the section we are now considering, you are merely determining how far the contract shall be deemed to apply, while the party selling may be perfectly innocent. He may be knowingly selling an article with a trade mark on it, or he may be doing it innocently, but in any case you are importing into the contract a stipulation which is not there at all.

Mr. THOMPSON. He has committed the offence.

Mr. DAVIES. Not if he does it innocently.

Mr. THOMPSON. He has committed the offence.

Mr. EDGAR. Under what section?

Mr. THOMPSON. Under the section which makes it an offence to sell goods with the trade mark attached. But we have relieved him from the penalty. If he goes into court and the burden of proof being upon him, proves that he did it innocently, we relieve him of the penalty, but the offence has been committed. The moment he has made this contract of sale, although he has done it innocently, we say the contract shall be practically voided. That is about all we are doing. The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) spoke of the difficulty of counsel advising. I do not think that is a practical objection to the legislation. Counsel must be assumed to know the law and the legislation with reference to trade marks, and if there was brought to counsel a letter which constitutes the contract of sale and he was asked to put the proper construction on it, he would enquire whether that contract related to goods which had trade marks, and if so he would tell his client the conditions attached thereto. The difficulty of searching applies in this as well as in all copyright legislation, yet such legislation is necessary as a matter of public policy.

Mr. LAUNIER. I would be disposed to agree at the first blush to the principle which has been laid down by the Minister of Justice; that is to say, when we have power to legislate over matters here we have a consequent power to invade civil rights in so far as may be necessary to give effect to our legislation. Take the instance given by the Minister himself. We have power to legislate over election matters, and if this Parliament declares that a certain contract shall be a corrupt practice and be treated as such, we, I imagine, have the consequent power to destroy the civil effect of that contract by declaring it to be a corrupt practice and therefore within our jurisdiction. But it seems to me that this principle does not apply here. I could understand the reasoning of the Minister if the effect of the clause were to destroy the effect of the civil contract which is made a criminal offence; for instance, to declare that the sale of trade marks relating to spurious articles should be null and void. Then you would destroy the civil effect of the contract. The offence respecting the trade mark would be made a criminal offence, and so the civil offence would be null and void. That is not what is done by this section. The section is not to give effect to our legislation, but it is to import a new element into the contract. Suppose, instead of having our divided legislative power, we had full and paramount power in this House, what would be the effect of this section? The effect would be clearly to enable the party who would be the sufferer to bring a civil action to recover from the vendor damages upon that contract. This is not giving effect to our legislation, but it is importing an altogether foreign element which is not at all a consequence of the civil offence.

Committee reported.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to ask the Minister of Justice whether the Government have considered the suggestion which I made the other day, or which I submitted for a third party, touching the time at which this Act will be proclaimed?

Mr. THOMPSON. I did consider the matter, and I am convinced the writer of the letter misunderstood the purport of the Bill, because there can be no reason for delaying bringing this Act into force in so far as inconveniencing persons making importations. The importation of improper trade-marked goods is fully forbidden by the present law, so that if this Act were not in force the present law would apply.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

SPEEDY TRIALS ACT.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 93) further to amend the Speedy Trials Act, chap. 175 of the Revised Statutes.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire further to make this Act applicable to British Columbia. This has been requested by the Judiciary there and by the Provincial Government. I propose to provide that in the Province of British Columbia the judges shall be the Chief Justice or a Puisné Judge of the Supreme Court or a Judge of the County Court.

On section 2,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That certainly is not the Bill before us.

Mr. THOMPSON. It merely makes it applicable to British Columbia, at a request received from there after I introduced the Bill.

On section 3,

Mr. THOMPSON. It is precisely the same as in the existing Act, the words added being "British Columbia."

Committee rose and reported.

Bill read a third time, and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC PRINTING AND STATIONERY.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved second reading of Bill (No. 60) to amend Chapter 27 of the Revised Statutes, respecting the Department of Public Printing and Stationery. He said: It is a matter of mere detail and can be explained in committee. The first section gives to the clerk of the Printing Committee of both Houses the performing of the duties which in the Act formerly was given to the Clerk of the House or the Clerk of the Senate. It is proposed that the orders to be given to the Printing Department should be, first, by the deputy heads of each department; second, by the Clerk of each House, and third, for the common printing of both Houses, by the Joint Committee of Printing or by their clerk. The second section only changes the old Bill, in exempting from the necessity of an order of the department the stationery and books which are supplied to penitentiaries by chaplains, or for other books, and for books of the library, which was an oversight in the former Bill. The third section reinstates the Queen's Printer as a deputy head. The importance of the situation and the new duties which will devolve upon the Queen's Printer have decided the Government to make him a deputy Minister in the full sense of the word; meaning salary as well as position. When it is known that the Queen's Printer will control an expenditure, left to his own personal supervision, of over $400,000 or $500,000, we have considered that his duties would entitle him to the salary of a deputy Minister. The fourth section is as to the right to appoint in the printing office, officers by the Superintendent of Printing, who shall not be necessarily members of the Civil Service. We want to make that printing department really a commercial department. When I say "commercial" I don't want to say the Government will engage in trading, but that the department will be conducted on a commercial basis, that is to say, the officers there and employés will not be subjected to the provisions of the Civil Service—for instance, working from half-past nine to four o'clock. The Superintendent of Printing said: "I want my men to work like myself, beginning at eight, and finishing their work at six o'clock. The fifth section only says that the pay-lists for the officers may be made fortnightly as well as monthly. The sixth section is only continuing the provisions of the first section, that is to say, giving the duties to the clerks of both Houses, to the deputy chiefs of the department, and to the joint clerk of the Printing Committee to give the orders to the printing and stationery department. The seventh section is a consequence of the preceding one, and the last provides that the auditor may take stock annually instead of quarterly as in an ordinary commercial office. These are the only provisions in this Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read a second time.

House resolved itself into Committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I move to add, after the words "the clerk of the Joint Committee of the two Houses on Printing," the words "or other officer specially designated by that committee."

Mr. EDGAR. This section makes a decided change in the discipline of this House. I understand that all the subordinate clerks, including the clerk of the Printing Committee, are under the control of the Clerk of this House and subject to his discipline. This secures uniformity of action and avoids interference by outsiders with the affairs of this House, because, perhaps, Ministers may sometimes be called outsiders with regard to the affairs of this House. I have no reason to suppose that the present efficient clerk of the Printing Committee would cease to be an efficient officer, but we do not know how soon he may be superseded or retired, and I think it may be a serious thing to interfere with the control of an important functionary like the clerk of the Printing Committee.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. There is no difference in that respect. The discipline of the House will be preserved. The clerk of the Printing Committee will be under the clerk of the House, as usual. But in giving orders for the printing work of the Session, he is not more under the control of the clerk of the House now than he will be under this Bill. The committee is a joint committee of both Houses, and the orders given by the joint committee are orders given both by the Senate and the House of Commons, and his duties provided for in this clause are only to give the orders required for printing and printing paper during the Session. There is no abrogation of the rule, and certainly no usurpation of power.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I notice that for some days you, Sir, (Mr. Rykert) have had to discharge the duties of Deputy Speaker, and it does seem to me rather extraordinary that we should have a Deputy Speaker at a very considerable salary, and that for at least a fortnight he has not been here. I think, Sir, that while we have this Bill under consideration, it would be a very important duty on the part of the Administration to tell us why the business of the House is not conducted in accordance with the provisions of the law. The hon. First Minister sometime ago provided that there should be a Deputy Speaker, and that those duties should not be undertaken by an ordinary member of the House.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Is the hon. member in order?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is the very question of order, the irregularity of these proceedings, about which I am making these observations. I am not at all objecting to your fitness, Mr. Chairman, under ordinary circumstances; but I am asking the Government how it is that the ordinary proceedings of the House have been interfered with, and this irregular mode of procedure adopted under existing circumstances?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that discussion is altogether out of order. We are discussing a certain Bill, and are considering the first clause of that Bill. What has that to do with the Deputy Speaker? I really cannot see. I am not able to give the hon. gentleman information respecting the absence of the Deputy Speaker. I presume he has a good reason for being absent, or he would be here, just as the Minister of Railways has a good reason for being absent. I have no doubt that the regularity of the proceedings or the legality of the measure we may pass with the hon. member for Lincoln in the chair will not be disputed. The hon. gentleman may dispute it, because he is in a disputatious humor sometimes, but I do not think the courts will say that the measure we may pass through committee is in any way affected by the absence of the Deputy Speaker. As the hon. gentleman has brought up the matter, I will cause enquiry to be made, and ascertain whether his absence may be due to ill-health or to some other reason.

Mr. CHAPLEAU.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I wish to say that I am serious in my proposition. The hon. gentleman knows right well that this House could not proceed with business in the absence of the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker. There is a certain regular and proper mode of procedure required. The Speaker is required to be in the chair when the House is conducting business. The House undertook to amend the rules, and provided that there should be a Deputy Speaker, who should take the chair in the absence of the Speaker, and should take the chair when the House went into Committee. That change was made at the instance of the hon. First Minister. Now, the Deputy Speaker is absent, and an ordinary member of the House is called on to take the chair and discharge his duties. This may have been a regular proceeding before we created that office; I do not question that at all; but we amended the law at the instance of the hon. First Minister, who told us that it was quite unfair to call on an ordinary member to be constantly here to discharge those duties. The hon. gentleman now undertakes to treat the matter as a huge joke. If it is, his Bill is a huge joke, and the charge upon the public treasury is a huge joke.

Mr. MITCHELL. I must say I think the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is a little unreasonable in this matter. It is well known that it has become the practice and the habit of this House to allow the servants of the House, when important political exigencies demand their absence in the interests of the party, to leave the House, and go and attend to those interests. We know that within a very recent date three officers were punished by dismissal for leaving their duties and going to speak at political meetings. The hon. First Minister would imply that ill-health is the cause of the absence of the Deputy Speaker. I think I can give my hon. friend a better reason than that. I understand that the Deputy is in Missisquoi at this moment, aiding in the contest there for the Local House. I do not know what course may be taken by the House, but if the House is consistent with itself, and the hon. gentleman does his duty in this case, having discharged Messrs Tremblay and Poirier for taking part in political elections while in the pay of the House, if it is proved that the Deputy Speaker at this moment is in Missisquoi with the view of carrying the flag in triumph to the Local House of Quebec, surely my right hon. friend will feel it his duty, or the Secretary of State will feel it his duty, following out the rule he has laid down and the precedent he established the other night, to ask for the dismissal of Mr. Colby from his position of Deputy Speaker. At all events, if we can afford to have him absent from the House, his pay should not be inserted in the Estimates.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think it is fair to bring on this discussion while the hon. gentleman is absent. I may explain that on Thursday evening the Deputy Speaker told me he had very important personal business to attend to at home, that his daughter was coming from Winnipeg, and asked me, as a favor, if I would allow him to go home. I did not think at the time that his absence would cause this awkward constitutional point to be raised, and I thought that in giving him leave I was only imposing on myself the obligation of remaining in the chair nearly all the time, and that my personal discomfort would alone be the result. I told the Deputy Speaker, therefore, that I had certainly no objection to his leaving. I understand he arrived here last night and is now in the city, but that he is tired and unwell or he would be with us to-day.

Mr. IVES. He has not been in Missisquoi at all.

Mr. LAURIER. I am only too glad to accept the statement of the Speaker that the Deputy Speaker was absent on private affairs. Otherwise I would agree with the hon. member for Northumberland that his conduct was outrageous in absenting himself to go electioneering, and there would be but one voice in this House on both sides to condemn his action. I may be pardoned for bringing to the notice of the Speaker and the House the fact that several officers of this House, not later than last Saturday, were on the hustings in the county of Missisquoi.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am not aware of the fact, and no officer has been given a congé for that purpose.

Mr. LAURIER. I quite believe that no officer would dare go to you, Sir, and ask leave to go to Missisquoi in order to electioneer against the Liberal party; but still it appears that officers did go there, and did electioneer, without asking your permission. I have been told by parties who were present that translators of this House,—not Mr. Poirier or either of the Tremblays—but general translators of this House, were on the hustings last Saturday in Missisquoi.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I am very sorry my poor little Bill has been the cause of so much trouble.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend ought to be glad that I brought this to his notice, because he is rather touchy on that point.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friend wants to make an impression on the House, and takes the occasion of my presentation of this Bill to do so. I must say with regard to his last remark, as I was one of those who brought before the House the matter of officers dealing disrespectfully—personally—and discourteously with the members of this House, that his remarks do not alter the position which I then took and which the House endorsed; and if he or any of his friends will show that any one of the officers of this House has behaved on the hustings in a discourteous manner or interfered with the action of members of this House, such officer ought certainly to be punished. To come back to my Bill, I move that the amendment I suggested should be carried.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman has not given any reason why the committee should be empowered to appoint any other officer than the clerk of the committee to do the work which was assigned to the clerk of the committee.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is at the request of the Printing Committee, a delegation of which asked me to give them this power.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 3,

Mr. EDGAR. What is the object of this?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I have stated that the Queen's Printer is a deputy head, and now that the establishment of the printing office is an established fact, he is entitled to the salary of a deputy head. Last year that was objected to because the bureau was not then organised.

Mr. LAURIER. Who is the Superintendent of Stationery?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Mr. Young, who is, unfortunately, very sick, and who will likely have to be superseded. By the next clause we ask power to name the Superintendent of Printing, the Superintendent of Stationery and the Chief Accountant at a lower class, if the Government think fit, should it be necessary at any time to make new appointments.

Mr. LAURIER. Who is the Superintendent of Printing?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Mr. André Senécal is the Superintendent of Printing and Mr. Gliddon is the Accountant, both old officers of the department.

Mr. EDGAR. In section 4, the person selected to be Superintendent of Printing must have five years' experience in Canada. Is the choice to be restricted to Canada?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I propose to take away the words "in Canada." We might have some very good printers from the United States; and we have taken away the word "management" in the sixth line because a man might not be a manager and still be a very good man for the position.

On section 4,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. We want the Superintendent of Printing to appoint the officers necessary. This is for the good management of the printing office.

Mr. EDGAR. I cannot understand why the hon. gentleman has left out the words "skilled hands."

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I have no objection to restore those words.

On section 6,

Mr. EDGAR. I see that the Clerk of the House is still to furnish estimates.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The Clerk of the House and the Clerk of the Senate will give the necessary orders for each House, as in the departments the orders are given for each department, and the clerk of the Printing Committee will give the order for the printing and printing paper for both Houses.

On section 7,

Mr. EDGAR. The former provision was that the Auditor General should check the accounts quarterly; now it is annually—why is that change made?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The stock on hand will be so much as to devolve upon the Auditor and the other officers work which is certainly unnecessary, and this clause has been inserted at the special demand of the skilled officer of the Department and the Auditor himself, and we know that the Auditor does not shrink from the responsibility of keeping the accounts close.

Bill reported, and amendments agreed to.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No 106) further to amend the Indian Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I notice that the sixteenth and seventeenth lines are new. Under the statute as it stood, the half-breeds were allowed to withdraw from the treaty on their own motion, without any consent being required from the Indian Commissioner, or the Assistant Indian Commissioner. I see also that the two last lines of the section are new also, which embrace in the withdrawal the minor unmarried children. Has it been found necessary in the interest of the half-breeds to take away from them the power of determining for themselves when they shall withdraw, and putting this into the hands of the Indian Commissioner?

Mr. EDGAR. It seems to me that the withdrawal is to be surrounded with a great many difficulties. He has to signify his desire in writing, and that has to be sworn to and witnessed before two men. In addition, he has got to get the consent of the Indian Commissioner. What is the object of all that?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Many of the half-breeds have been accounted as Indians, because they have lived with a band for some time. When scrip is given to the half-breeds, they all become white men in order to get it. Then they withdraw from the white men to get the advantage of the annuities and then they want to get back into the band again. Having received their scrip as white men, and having expended it, they want to get back into the treaty again, to be considered Indians once more, and to receive their share of the annuities and supplies given to the Indians. We wish to prevent them moving from one stage to another, from being half-breeds now, then being Indians, and back again to be half-breeds, it, perhaps, being forgotten that they previously got scrip. To prevent this we provide that there shall be a consent given in writing by the Indian Commissioner. There is also, at the end of the clause, a provision that such withdrawal shall include the minor or unmarried children of such half-breeds—the children shall go with the parents.

Mr. EDGAR. All these new restrictions are to prevent them from getting out of the treaty. The old restrictions are in the first part of the clause, which prevent them getting anything except under special circumstances to be determined by the Superintendent General, or his agent. Now, the difficulty the Minister is trying to get over, apparently, is to prevent them getting out of the treaty.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With a knowledge of all the facts of the case.

Mr. WATSON. I would ask if many half-breeds or Indians are asking to get back into the treaty again?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not sufficiently aware to be able to state positively; but I have little doubt that a great deal of inconvenience has been caused by the half-breeds wasting their scrip and going back to the band, and then, by-and-bye, in a year or two, leaving the band again and becoming white men, and setting up a new claim for a second grant of scrip. In order to prevent any fraud of this kind, this provision is inserted. I think the hon. gentleman will see it is very necessary.

Mr. WATSON. I think it is very necessary, because it has been reported to me, in fact I know it is the case, that a large number of Indians were advised to take scrip by speculators.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is so.

Mr. WATSON. In fact I have been given to understand—I cannot prove it, of course—than an Indian agent benefited to the extent of $10 a piece on every Indian that he could advise to get out of the treaty and to take scrip. He advised these Indians that if they applied for scrip they would get it at that time, but that if they waited for two or three years the chances were that the Government would wipe out this annuity altogether, and they would receive nothing at the end of that time; and unless they received scrip before July, 1887, they would not be entitled to scrip at all. It was done for that purpose, and also for the purpose of placing these Indians on the voters' lists. A great number of these Indians were placed on the voters' lists during the local elections in Manitoba. The Indians I refer to particularly now, are the Indians around Lake Manitoba, and the name of the agent who has been reported to me as advising these people to get out of the treaty, is Martineau.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Is he agent now?

Mr. WATSON. He is agent still, I believe.

Mr. EDGAR.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will enquire about that.

Mr. WATSON. There is quite a number of those Indians that are not fit to go out of the treaty. They have spent all they received for their scrip, and they are now in a destitute state. I have no doubt that they are now, as the Minister stated, anxious to get back into the treaty and to get their little annuity when the paymaster comes round. These people should never have gone out of the treaty at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think every case of that sort is a proper subject for enquiry, and that where land so acquired is still held by the speculators, it should be resumed by the Crown. In every case where scrip has been obtained, and land obtained on that scrip by the speculators, it ought to be resumed by the Crown, and the Indians ought to be allowed to come back.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But the Indians should not be allowed to belong to the Indian band, and then, simply for the purpose of acquiring the right to vote, be permitted to leave the band by the permission of the Indian agent, and then allowed to resume their positions as Indians again. If they are entitled to vote as Indians, they ought to have a vote, in Manitoba, as well as elsewhere, and not evade the law. As I understand my hon. friend, this has been done in the local elections in Manitoba. But, in any case, it seems to me that if the person desires to withdraw and does withdraw, he should give reasons for it; and now, when power is taken from him to get out upon his own request, and leave is given him by the Indian Commissioner, it seems to me he should remain out. I see by the first part of the clause that only on very special circumstances can he re-enter, but then it is possible that the Government might consider some case of that kind as a special circumstance that would warrant him in being reinstated when it was not special. Not having full confidence in the Government, I consider this is giving them too much power.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, when a change takes place and when my hon. friend becomes Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, I shall have every confidence in his attending to the matter honestly.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I shall be sold, then.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that where an Indian agent has persuaded the Indians to leave the band, and has speculated out of the change, that agent should be dismissed, but I do not think the Indians ought to be punished by exclusion. The Government have acted upon the principle that the Indians are minors, and of course they could not hold them responsible to the same extent that other parties are held. If he is holding land himself, that is good reason for treating him as an emancipated Indian, and leaving him in possession of the land; but where the land has gone into the hands of speculators on scrip given to the Indians, it seems to me the proper course is for the Crown to cancel the scrip, to resume possession of the land, and ignore the party who has acquired the land altogether. It is a fraud upon the Crown, and there ought not to be for one moment any hesitation in refusing to recognise any claim so obtained.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think, of course, upon the fraud being proven the scrip should be cancelled, and the cancelled land, if possible, reclaimed. This clause, however, does not apply to Indians at all, emancipated or otherwise; it applies to half-breeds. The hon. member who was Minister of the Interior and managed the Indian Department knows perfectly well that the line between a pure blooded Indian and a half breed is very indistinct. If an Indian has some white blood in him he remains an Indian, and remains in the band until it becomes an advantage to him to say that he is a white man and not an Indian. I take it that a very considerable percentage of Indians, even in the North-West, are not pure Indians; they are considered to be Indians, but they are really half-breeds, having white blood in them. These men, having expended their substance, having thrown away their land into the hands of speculators, now want to get back to their former position. I hope the hon. gentleman was misinformed when he said that an Indian agent or a land agent had connived with speculators in regard to dealings in Indian lands, and it is a matter that will be enquired into. I have no doubt that every Indian with the slightest pretence to have white blood in his veins claimed to be a white man, and on their establishing that they had white blood they came under the law and became entitled to scrip. Now their complexions are dark and they are full-blooded Indians again, and they want to go back to their former position, for the reasons mentioned by the hon. gentleman, and we must have a check on them in that regard, and this must be done only by the consent, not of a subordinate, but of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, or the Assistant Superintendent.

Mr. WATSON. It is very difficult to find full-blooded Indians in Manitoba. Among the Indians around Lake Manitoba and those on Lake St. Peter Reserve, I question if there is one full-blooded Indian in either of the bands. I hold that an Indian agent or any person entrusted with the care of the wards of the Government, who has done wrong, should be punished; but so far as the cancellation of lands is concerned, they might have been purchased by scrip obtained from Indians originally and resold to innocent parties, and it would be unfair to cancel lands purchased by this scrip. I do not bring it in the form of a charge, although I make the statement on my responsibility as a member of this House, that it has been reported to me on very good authority that an Indian agent did advise Indians to take scrip and that he received some consideration for giving that advice. I hope the Government will enquire into the matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. I think, moreover, there will be sufficient evidence to back up my statement. The parties who should be punished are those who have thus advised the Indians and not innocent individuals who have purchased lands with scrip originally obtained from Indians. No doubt the Indians were led to believe they had as much right to vote as white men in the local elections in Manitoba, and they were so advised by the men who expected to get their votes. They did vote, but the spectacle presented at the polling place was very disgraceful. Indians walked up to the polls and on being asked their name did not know it, they did not know what name was put on the voters' list. They were afterwards told their names by the persons interested in the election of a certain candidate, and they were told how to vote.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What was your majority?

Mr. WATSON. They did not vote in the Dominion elections in Manitoba. This was in the local elections, and I may say that a candidate who received 19 majority of the intelligent electors was defeated by 58 majority by this particular Indian vote. Some of them, no doubt, were intelligent men, but a large number of them were men whose names should never have been placed on the voters' list. So much is the case that the Local Government of Manitoba have seen fit, under the new Election Act which they are preparing, to disfranchise all Indians, or at least to provide that an Indian must have been outside the reservation and independent of the Government for three years before he shall be entitled to vote. This is done so that Indians who have come out from the treaty a year or a year and a half or two years ago shall not be entitled to vote. The intention is to give them time to become sufficiently well acquainted with the questions of the day, to be able to give an intelligent vote, before they are given the privilege.

On section 2,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). This and the next three sections seem to be new provisions of the law, and they seem to be necessary. Has there been no provision in the Indian Act to cover this point before.

Mr. THOMPSON. No.

Mr. EDGAR. These provisions are very much the same as those contained in the Ontario Land Act. The seventh sub-section of this Bill makes provision that deeds shall be registered in the office of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. In Ontario and in Provinces where there are registry offices the ordinary registry laws should be made to apply, and in Ontario in case of sales by the sheriff for taxes there is a provision in the law that the deeds shall be registered within six months, and thus priority is preserved. It is unfortunate to make separate provision with respect to time and place for registering title-deeds in Provinces where there are registry laws now in operation.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is discretionary with the Superintendent General whether he will recognise certain conveyances, and it is quite necessary to provide that no person shall have a right to call upon him to exercise that discretion. The registration must be done within two years.

On section 3,

Mr. LISTER. I would like to ask, is it the intention of the Government under this Act to provide for cases now being examined into by a commission respecting the right of Indians to participate in Indian lands and bounties? I understand that the Chippewa tribe, and I believe other tribes, are very much exercised on account of a certain investigation which is being proceeded with by the Inspector of Indian Agencies throughout the western part of Ontario. Any person who has had dealings with the Indians knows that they are of a very suspicious nature, and this investigation to which I refer has created the greatest possible uneasiness among the Indian bands of western Ontario. Under the Treaty of 1827 made between the Government and the Indians, whereby the Indians relinquished to the Government the land, and in return secured certain reserves and an annuity to them and their descendants for all time to come, this treaty was signed only by a few members of the band, the chief, and I think some eighteen of the others. Since 1827 those people have been in receipt of annuities from the Government and have been in occupation of the land upon those reserves. At that time there were Indians living with the Chippewa band, who were, strictly speaking, not members of the band, but who were recognised as members, and whose children and grand-children living on the reserves have been participating in the annuities ever since that time. At that time the Pottawattamies were living with the Chippewas and became mixed with them. It appears now that some people say that they should not participate in the annuity. I may say that this tribe are in the large majority to-day, and to all intents and purposes they have more Chippewa blood than original Pottawattamies blood. It appears that a complaint has been made that they should be excluded from the same privileges as the Chippewa Indians, and this is the investigation which is going on among the Indians. Suspicious as they are, they believe the scheme is set on foot for depriving them of the lands on which they were born and which they were told belonged to them, and for depriving them of their share of annuity monies. I may inform the Government of a fact that perhaps they are not aware of, although I believe they are desirous of acting fairly in every way with the Indians. The great majority of the Indians on this reserve are unquestionably entitled to be called Chippewa Indians, and the band have passed resolutions acquiescing in the claims of those so-called foreign Indians and requesting that those proceedings should not be continued. But, in the face of this resolution and in the face of this action on the part of the principal men of the tribe, those proceedings are being continued. I think it is very unfortunate indeed, in the face of the action by those Indians themselves, that this investigation should go on. It can result in no good, for the Indians are willing that those people who have intermarried with their tribe and who have been recognised and looked upon as Chippewas in every sense of the word, should be allowed to participate in the rights and privileges of the Chippewas. I desire to bring this matter before the attention of the First Minister, and I may say that I have petitions and affidavits here proving the statement that I make.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The subject that the hon. gentleman has just alluded to does not come within the provisions of the Bill, and I see he has availed himself of the opportunity when we were discussing a measure relating to the Indians, to bring the matter up. This is a question I was formerly familiar with when I was Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. It is a very difficult question. The original Chippewas allowed the Pottawattamies to come among them. They allowed them certain privileges and they intermarried; but now a portion of the original Chippewas have pretended that they have no rights at all, and that they only afforded to the Pottawattamies Indian hospitality while among them. That is the story they have given. I know that the Chippewas, at least a portion of them, and I do not know how many, instead of being willing that the Pottawattamies should be recognised as the original Chippewas, have themselves complained some years ago when I was head of the department. I presume that to-day the Superintendent had those papers before him and he caused an enquiry to be made into it. If the Chippewas withdraw their demands for investigation into the position of the Pottawattamies, of course there is an end to the whole affair, but I fancy that is not the case. I fancy that they are still pressing. However, I will take an opportunity to enquire into it. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that, so far as I can judge at present, those Pottawattamies, after mixing with the original Chippewas for so many years and intermingling their blood, that it is quite impossible now to oust them out of their houses which they and their fathers before them have occupied.

Mr. LISTER. The great-grandchildren of some of them are there.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman is quite right in that regard.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I will ask the hon. gentleman, while on the subject, although not relevant to the Bill, whether that enquiry extends to the disputes between the Chippewas and Pottawattamies, and whether they are within the purview of this commission?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; it does not.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Justice on section 3, to the fact that this clause is new from the word "taxation," in the fourth line, and provides for Indian lands which have been surrendered being liable to taxation. I should judge that was right. There is, however, an exception made against the Crown, and any Indian locating on the land. I wish to ask why the exception is made as regards an Indian being located upon it? It is surrendered land; it is no longer a portion of the reserve at all, and any Indian living on surrendered land seems to me to be in the same position as other citizens, and that the land that is occupied by him would be liable to taxation the same as the adjacent land held by a white person; that it should contribute its share of taxation towards repairing roads, the maintenance of bridges, and the other municipal purposes for which adjacent property is taxed. Why is exemption given to an Indian if he ceases to be an Indian and lives on surrendered land?

Mr. LISTER.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. member has correctly stated the meaning of the clause. There is a reason for the land not being taxed as against the Crown, and the intention of the draftsmen evidently was that in making the liberal extension which we have by this Bill to the right of taxation by municipal authorities, we should prevent the Indian who is our ward upon those lands being ousted as the result of taxation. I would not object to that, I think it is right and as the Minister says it is a liberal provision which is being made in favor of the municipalities, but is an Indian living on surrendered land really in the full sense of the term a ward of the Government or not? I know he has not become an enfranchised Indian, but still he is not living on the reserve.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I presume he may be held to be living on the reserve. The Indians surrender the title to the Crown, so that a certain portion of the land can be disposed of for their benefit. Until it is sold it is de facto a portion of the reserve, and the Indians live on it; but having surrendered the legal title to the Crown, when any portion is disposed of, the Indians have to leave it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There is a good deal of force in that. They might be living there after the land has been surrendered, and any white person purchasing would purchase it knowing that that difficulty was in the way.

On section 4,

Mr. EDGAR. I see that, apart from some verbal changes, the chief change in this section seems to be that non-treaty Indians are proposed to be taken out of the class who are protected by the law from having intoxicants sold to them. The words "non-treaty Indians" are left out of that portion of the section. According to the Interpretation Act, a non-treaty Indian is not covered by the word "Indian," so that this must be a distinct change of policy, and I do not think it can be meant; it must be a mistake.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The word "non-treaty" should be in; it is an omission.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is another point on which I would like to have some information through the First Minister or the Minister of Justice. I observe that in the Province of Manitoba and the Province of British Columbia, on the evidence of the informer alone, if he is a credible person, two justices of the peace can sentence any person accused of giving liquor to Indians to no less than six months imprisonment with hard labor and a fine of $300. It appears to me that is putting in the hands of two justices of the peace an extremely large discretion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think it has operated unhappily. In the North-West, the hon. gentleman knows that population is very sparse.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But it is not the North-West alone that is concerned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In Manitoba the population is almost as sparse, and in British Columbia, where there is a great deal of liquor drinking among the Indians flocking from the mountains, if there is to be any protection at all, a single witness must be sufficient. If it is necessary to have two witnesses, there will be very few convictions.

And then, we have the power of pardoning in case there is any suspicion of injustice. Although the statute is more rigid than we would like to have it in the more settled parts of the country, in the interests of quiet and order the people on the confines of civilisation must submit to it. The fine is heavy, but the profits made by the men engaged in smuggling are enormous, and unless the punishment is exceedingly severe, the introduction of intoxicants cannot be prevented. The profits are so great that, notwithstanding this severe statute, there is an enormous amount of smuggling, and great quantities of spirits have been seized and destroyed, and the smugglers have been properly punished. We have had no complaints of any injustice having been done by the measure, and if there had been any, I think I would have heard of them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is quite true up to the present time, but the Province of Manitoba in particular is becoming much more densely inhabited than the North-West Territories, and it is to be hoped that that province will speedily become very much more densely populated than it is at present. The hon. gentleman will notice that the objection I take is not to police magistrates or judges or stipendiary magistrates having this power. It is simply to two justices of the peace, and he must know as well as I that justices of the peace are in many cases appointed without any great regard to their judicial skill or attainments. I have known justices of the peace who, having such a statute, would feel themselves obliged to commit anybody, even the hon. gentleman himself, on the evidence of any person who came before them. It is quite true that the power may not have been abused up to the present time, but I am speaking of the chance of danger in the future. I do not know the extent to which justices of the peace are appointed in Manitoba, but I have known counties where every fourth man was a justice of the peace.

Mr. BARRON. I suggest that there ought to be the power of appeal from the two justices of the peace. I do not think it would be right to give the power of conviction to them without appeal, especially when they can convict on the testimony of one witness.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Act provides for an appeal. It is perfectly true that some of the magistrates cannot be very fit for their duties. My experience of the decisions of unpaid magistrates in the country is that they are more liable to let people off than to enforce the law with great severity. The complaint is generally is that they do not inflict the law with sufficient promptness or severity.

Mr. DAVIN. I may add, for the information of the committee, that in the case of persons charged with selling liquor to Indians, there are always circumstances attending the sale that make up really a very strong case. Those persons are generally engaged in bartering with the Indians, from whom they get goods such as furs and other goods at such low rates that the business is very profitable. The Indians, once they get a few glasses of whiskey, will sell their furs for a hundredth part of what they are really worth, and hence it is necessary that a severe penalty should be inflicted, and that justice should be sharp and quick in order to prevent the Indians being tampered with.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). In the old clause these words are found: "Or causes or procures the same to be done, or attempts the same or connives thereat—" that is, furnishing Indians with intoxicants. I would like to know whether leaving these words out, the law will reach persons who would buy liquor for the Indians with the money of the Indians. For instance, an Indian enters a town; he cannot go to a merchant and buy liquor himself, but he may get some disreputable white man and give him the money to go and purchase the liquor for him. That person purchases the liquor from the merchant and then brings it to the Indian. The old section would cover this case, but I question whether the new section will.

Mr. THOMPSON. The words "supplies or gives" cover the case.

Mr. WATSON. I was going to suggest that it would be in the interest of the general public to have such a clause as the one which the Minister has given. It would be necessary in Manitoba, because we are not provided with all first-class justices of the peace in that country. We have some justices of the peace there who are not fit for the position at all. A year or two ago, about every other man was a justice of the peace. Every other man expected to be in the employ of the Dominion or the Local Government, and if there was no other position for him, he was made a justice of the peace. I called the attention of the First Minister, when he was at the head of Indian Affairs, to the importance of having some mounted police on the northern portion of Lake Manitoba, because a great number of Indians secure liquor from the traders who go there and who give whiskey in exchange for fish, &c. This is doing a great deal of harm, and one or two mounted policemen should be stationed at some point where they could watch those traders and follow them up. The trouble with us is that there are not enough informers. Even the fine does not induce them to inform, and in many cases the liquor is furnished by a third person. Men are known to make a living by simply waiting for the Indians, then taking their money and buying whiskey for them. Liquor is doing an immense amount of injury to the Indians throughout Manitoba. The settlement of the country is bringing the Indians in contact with the whites, and the Indians are becoming very much degraded through the influence of liquor, and the Government cannot be too strict in dealing with people who furnish the Indians with intoxicants. I thoroughly approve of the penalty, and would willingly see it increased.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think the law will be much plainer if we would insert the words of the old section to which I drew the hon. gentleman's attention. The question might arise as to whether a disreputable white person who purchased liquor with the Indian's money could be said to have supplied or given the liquor. It might be argued that as it was the Indian's money with which the liquor was paid for, the liquor was at no time the property of the white man who bought it, and that the white man simply procured the liquor for the Indian. I think the words of the old clause would leave no room for doubt: "Causes or procures the same to be done, or attempts the same or connives thereat."

Mr. THOMPSON. I have no doubt the clause does cover the case the hon. gentleman refers to, but I have no objection to add those words in order to make assurance doubly sure.

Mr. BARRON. The Act provides that no appeal shall lie from the fourteen sections next preceding except to a judge. That appears to assume that there is an appeal under the Summary Convictions Act, but I understand that that appeal is only from one justice of the peace, and not from two, and I do not think this section meets the case, because, under this Bill, the hon. gentleman is introducing an appeal from two justices.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have always acted upon that.

On section 5,

Mr. EDGAR. What is the intention of this?

Mr. THOMPSON. There is general legislation by which, where the disposition of a fine is not specially designated in the Act, it is to go to the Indian fund. It has been considered desirable that, in the Province of British Columbia, we should give the fines to the Provincial authorities, the Provincial Government undertaking the administration of justice under this Act.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the Minister of Justice prepared to make any statement in regard to the Supreme Court Bill, which he said was urgent, and he intended to proceed with at once?

Mr. THOMPSON. I would have moved the Bill a further stage to-day, but I understood it would be objected to unless it was printed, and it does not appear on the Order paper as having been printed, and therefore I have not moved it. Unless the Bill were passed to-day, we could not give the notice to those who are engaged in sufficient time, and I am afraid that, as it did not meet with unanimous approval, we shall have to abandon it.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SUPPLY—CABLE BETWEEN PELEE ISLAND AND THE MAINLAND.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the Speaker leave the chair for the House to again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. BRIEN. I desire to occupy a few moments, because some additional information has come to my hands of late in regard to a matter which, I believe, the Government have now under consideration, that is, in regard to laying a cable between Pelee Island and the mainland. I believe members on both sides of the House are willing to facilitate this work, and the Government have already a vast amount of information as to the necessity of this submarine cable. Every day there is some further evidence coming forward as to the necessity of this cable being laid. It is not so much a matter of local importance as it is a national question. It is of great interest to all those who are engaged in navigation, and a vast amount of shipping passes through the narrow channel between Pelee Island and the mainland, which is interspersed with reefs and shoals, making it very dangerous to navigation. Petition after petition has been placed in the hands of the Government, representing the case pretty fully, but so far we have not any definite information as to the conclusion the Government have come to. The people in that section will be very much disappointed, and all those who are engaged in navigation will be seriously disappointed if that cable is not laid immediately. Life and property are in danger. Several wrecks occurred there during last year. I cannot do better than read a letter which I received lately from a captain who is sailing upon the water in that section during most of his time:

"KINGSVILLE, March 5th, 1888.

"DEAR SIR,—Yours of the 29th February at hand, and contents fully noted. During the time I have been on the waters, I have become more acquainted with the waters at the head of Lake Erie, especially around Pelee Island. All the boats that pass through the Detroit River go between Pelee Island and Pelee Point, which is the natural channel. But you will remember that there are reefs extending north-east, from one to two miles from the north-east point on Pelee Island, which render it very dangerous to navigation. These reefs are called the Middle Grounds. Any boats getting on these reefs are plainly visible from the Island, and greatly exposed to all north-easterly and easterly gales, and a place that all mariners dread on account of there being no communications near by. In 1887 I relieved two steamers from the reefs, happening to see them from the Island. Again in 1887, there other crafts went to pieces near Pelee, over on Point Pelee, a distance of 7 miles from Pelee Island, and is visible from Pelee. The other two went to pieces on the south-west point on Pelee Island. In 1886 the big schooner Maggy McGray went ashore on the west side of Pelee Island.

Mr. THOMPSON.

and would undoubtedly have been dashed to pieces if I had not just happened to be passing with my boat, and released her just before another big gale came up. The captain was making arrangements to row from Pelee to main shore to telegraph for assistance, and would have had to do so, had I not happened to be around. The life of Captain Duich might have been saved if there had been any communications to the Island. At that time my boat was lying at Kingsville, and could undoubtedly have saved him if I had known it, and a great many other wrecks I could mention if it be necessary. Now, Sir, the loss of life and property is more or less due to the want of communication between Pelee Island and main shore. I would beg of you not to leave anything undone that would press on the minds of the authorities that there is great necessity of a cable being laid between mainland and Pelee Island. Besides what I have mentioned, it adds greatly to the convenience of the Island. Hoping to hear of a success of a cable being laid, I remain,

"Yours respectfully,

"CAPT. N. J. WIGLE,

"Kingsville, Ont.

"J. BRIEN, M.P.,

"House of Commons, Canada."

Any further information than this is scarcely necessary for the Government, I think. The estimated cost of this work would be only some $7,000 or $8,000; and that amount of property would be saved in one season. Now, considering the dangerous character of that coast, and the importance of that section of the country, the large interests at stake, and considering that the Government are taking every possible means, and very laudably so, to facilitate navigation, I hope that they will not forget that section of the country. It is a matter that is not only of local importance. I hope that the Government will give this matter their most serious consideration. I believe the Minister of Public Works is already convinced of its feasibility. If he can only convince his colleagues—and we are well aware that if he gets their consent, when we remember his activity and the energy which he brings to bear in every work he undertakes—the work will soon be accomplished. Therefore, without detaining the House any longer, I ask the Government to give this matter their most serious consideration. It is not a party question, it is not a local question, but one in which all are interested. If the Government will undertake this work, I do not think there will be a dissenting voice, either in the House or the country, and I am sure they will have the thanks and goodwill of all.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman, in bringing this matter before the House, gives me an opportunity of saying a few words on the subject. The hon. gentleman was not in the House in 1884 and the following years, when this matter was brought before the House and before the Government by the gentlemen who then represented South Essex and North Essex, I think Mr. Patterson and Mr. Wigle. But at that time we had not the necessary data to give an affirmative answer to the request and petitions that were presented to us on that subject. Since that time Mr. Patterson has prosecuted the scheme with the persistence he is known to possess. The hon. gentleman knows that when the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson) begins a matter of that kind, he sticks to it as long as there is a chance of carrying it to a successful completion. Well, the hon. gentleman has continued in the same course, and has presented petitions in 1886-87-88, as the hon. member now representing South Essex (Mr. Brien) is doing. The surveys have been made, and have proved that the petitions that were presented were such as would warrant the Government in going on with this work, if the revenues of the country would allow us. But as the hon. gentleman must see, I am not in a position just now to say what would be the policy of the Government on this matter. If, in conformity with the petitions which have been presented from time to time, and the pressure which has been brought to bear, the Government decide in asking Parliament to come to the relief of the settlers there, and especially to come to the relief of trade and the vessels, a sum will appear to that purpose in the Supplementary Estimates. Of course, if the revenues of the country will not allow us to do so this year, we will have to ask Parliament to wait for another year; but as I said just now, I am not in a position at the present moment to inform the hon. gentleman what course will be followed by the Government.

DEFALCATIONS IN THE KINGSTON POST OFFICE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In conformity with the notice which I gave last night, I desire to call the attention of the House to what appears to be a very serious miscarriage of justice in the case of certain defalcations which lately occurred in the post office at Kingston. If the facts have been correctly stated to me, they are of a rather important character. For some months back, in fact, I believe, for some years back, there have been complaints of a number of robberies committed in the post office at Kingston, and very recently, if my memory serves, since this House met, an important official in the post office, the deputy postmaster of Kingston, Wm. Shannon, was caught in flagrante delicto by one of the officials of the post office, in the act, as I am informed, of feloniously opening letters and extracting their contents. This was publicly known, and notwithstanding that, apparently, 24 hours was allowed to elapse without any action being taken by the post office authorities, and the culprit made his way to the United States. After remaining some time there, he returned, and it was known that he had returned, as I am informed. He was in Kingston, and I believe he carried away with him a considerable amount of money, largely composed, at least so it is alleged, of the balances he had collected in this way. I desire to call the attention of the House, in the first place, to the fact that a number of persons allege they have been ruined presumably by William Shannon, and the Government, according to the statement made by the Postmaster General yesterday, do not intend to recompense those parties. That, however, is a minor detail. What appears to me to be very serious indeed is that, if the facts were correctly stated to me, if this officer was detected by another officer—as I am informed by no less a person than the deputy inspector of post offices in that district—in the act of feloniously opening letters, and if he was allowed 24 hours law and then escaped to the United States, it appears to me there has been a very gross miscarriage of justice, and I cannot understand how the officers of the post office could have permitted a culprit under those circumstances to escape without being arrested. A very considerable number of persons have expressed their astonishment to me in this matter, and there is no doubt whatever that it does look exceedingly as if, by reason of the influential connections which this officer may have, he had escaped punishment which would undoubtedly have been meted out under such circumstances to any subordinate officer connected with the department. I shall be glad if there is any explanation to be made relieving those officers from what appears to me to be a grossly neglected duty; but most undoubtedly when we come to consider the nature of the offence, and the fact that this is only one, apparently, of a whole series of similar offences, it does seem that there has been very gross negligence in this man being allowed to escape, and after having escaped, to be allowed to return and pass through Kingston and move a considerable amount of property along with him, to the great prejudice of parties ruined by him; also, I think, to the great scandal of the Government if an officer in their service, after committing such offences as these, is allowed to escape without being brought to justice. I shall be very glad to hear any explanation which the hon. the Postmaster General may have to offer on the subject.

Mr. McLELAN. I admit there has been some want of vigilance and promptness on the part of my officers at Kingston in this matter, and the excuse they give for it is this: That Wm. Shannon had been for a generation an officer in that department; he had never been suspected of doing anything wrong; he was a man well advanced in life, he being some 64 years old. When he was caught handling letters improperly by one of the clerks, the clerk gave information to the inspector. The inspector sent for Mr. Shannon, and he admitted he had three letters in his possession and showed them. They were unregistered letters, ordinary letters passing through the mail; one of the letters contained five cents in coin and twenty cents in postage stamps. The other two letters were without enclosures. The inspector, as he stated himself, was so overwhelmed with surprise that he did not act promptly, and delayed until he could make further inquiries, and when he communicated the next day with the department here, he also stated the fact that he had found Shannon had left the country. The hon. gentleman, I think, has been misinformed as to Mr. Shannon's return. I am informed by the inspector, who has recently reported, that, so far as he can ascertain, Shannon has not been within the Dominion since 17th March.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My information came from persons of credibility who stated that they had seen him.

Mr. McLELAN. The information conveyed to the department here was that he had returned, and immediately I caused a telegram to be sent to have him arrested. An information was laid by the county attorney against him, but the officers were not able to find him and they reported that he had not been in the city. I stated yesterday, in answer to the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that the Government had not paid anything. The question was, Had the Government paid anything?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Or agreed to pay.

Mr. McLELAN. I may state now in answer to the hon. gentleman that Mr. Shannon's friends have lodged with the officers of the Department a certain amount to meet any losses that may have been sustained by private individuals, as soon as we can calculate what those losses are. None of the letters were registered. Some complaints have been made that letters which should have passed through the Kingston post office in their natural course had not reached their destinations, and the statement is made by the senders that they contained enclosures of money. My officers are making enquiries into these cases, and when it is clearly ascertained and when it has been clearly traced that those letters passed in a mail that went through the hands of Shannon, in all probability the losses will be met from the amount placed in the hands of my officers by Shannon's friends. I need not state the amount, because perhaps that might induce persons to make claims, but every care is being taken to ascertain what letters have been lost of those that really passed through the office and through the hands of Shannon. It has already been ascertained that some letters said to have passed through Shannon's hands were sent at dates when he was not in the office; so all these matters will have to be investigated and the truth ascertained as far as possible that justice may be done to the parties who have suffered loss. I may say that I regret as much as any one can that my officers did not act with that promptness which they should have shown immediately on detecting the wrongs of which Shannon had been guilty. But the explanation they gave is this, that Shannon, an old man, an old servant of twenty-five or thirty years' service in the department, had not been suspected through all that lifetime of doing anything wrong, and the officers were so overwhelmed with surprise at what had been done and at the insignificance of the amount traced in his hands at the time, twenty-five cents, that they refrained from acting with that promptness which they should have shown, and they express regret for it.

Mr. WILSON. I certainly think the explanation offered by the Postmaster General is a weak one indeed. As I understand it, the post office clerks are supposed to be directly responsible to the Government. They are civil servants in the employ of the Government, and it is, therefore, the bounden duty of the Government to see that they perform their duties faithfully. I am also surprised to hear that the inspector, having ascertained without any doubt that this man Shannon had been guilty of meddling with letters in the post office, whether the amounts were large or small, did not proceed at once to execute the law and take steps that the man might be punished. The plea that he was an old servant and about 60 years of age put forward by the Postmaster General to this House as an excuse for the negligence of his officers, is a frivolous excuse indeed. Many people deposit their money in the Post Office Savings Bank or send their money through the mail, considering that the Government are responsible for the safe delivery to the parties to whom they are sent, and if the public feel there is an uncertainty as to the safety of the letters, the fact will very materially interfere with the efficiency of our post office service. Not only that, but if it becomes known, as it appears, that the Postmaster General indicated to-night that there are delays to compensate to those who lose money under such circumstances, this will cause distrust in the efficiency of the service. But perhaps the mover of this motion is a little too hard. It may possibly be found that this man Shannon was not an ordinary friend of the Government, and it may be found that, perhaps, in years gone by this man Shannon or some of his friends or relations had been very intimately connected with the then representative of the city of Kingston. It may have been that, perhaps, this man Shannon may have had some information that if he had been arrested, and an attempt made to punish him for his wrong-doing, he might possibly have been in a position to have divulged something that would not be very creditable to the Government of the day. It is possible that this leniency may have been caused by that, instead of on account of the small amount contained in the letters that he had abstracted from the Post Office Department. I maintain that this ought to have been examined into, and whether the man stole five cents or five hundred dollars he was equally guilty of wrong-doing as a civil servant, and he was equally responsible to the Government of the day. Perhaps, if we refer back a few years, we may find that a Mr. Shannon had performed an important service in that locality, and we may be able, perhaps, to come to some conclusion why it was that the Postmaster General was so kind towards this man Shannon, and that he, through his inspector, neglected to perform the duties that were incumbent upon him. Let me call your attention to an election trial that took place in Kingston some time ago, and not very many years ago for it was in 1874. I have no doubt the First Minister will remember the election trial that took place at that time, and I have no doubt he will remember that he had a very ardent friend, and whether it was this Mr. Shannon or some of his relations, it certainly was a Shannon, and, perhaps, it was on that account the Postmaster General felt it would not be hardly right for him to proceed very actively against this man, but to wait until a telegram should be sent down to him asking him what he should do under the circumstances. This particular old friend had got into a difficulty, and he ought to proceed and punish him as they would any other criminal under the circumstances, but, perhaps, it was on account of past services rendered and the strong attachment between himself and the First Minister, that it was considered whether it would not be a little better to give him an opportunity that he might get out of the country and not divulge some secrets that might be in his possession. We find that a trial took place at Kingston when the First Minister was being tried for bribery and corruption. To his credit be it said, that no personal charges on that occasion were proven against him. He was situated on that occasion pretty well, but not as well as he was on the last trial, for although in 1874 he retained his qualification, his seat was voided. It was sworn on that election trial as follows:

Mr. McLELAN.

"James Shannon sworn. I live in Kingston and took an active interest in anything that concerned Sir John A. Macdonald."

I believe that is the present Premier.

"Was not a member of the committee, at least did not remember that I was, had some doubts whether a committee was formed. Spent about $400 in election. This was not my own, received this and also $500 from Sir John A. Macdonald, and $1,000 more, part from Mr. Patton."

I suppose the First Minister will remember Patton.

"I got $1,000 from other parties, which was not all spent. I gave the balance $900 back to the Hon. Mr. Campbell with a memorandum showing the disposition of the money that had been spent."

I think Mr. Campbell was not at the trial on that occasion and I suppose the First Minister will state why he was not there.

An hon. MEMBER. He was in the States.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). My friend says he was in the States. You don't suppose a Conservative would run to the States in order to avoid giving evidence at an election trial. It would be too horrid to imagine anything of the kind.

"Q. Why did you give it to Mr. Campbell?"

"A. He was acting for Sir John A. I received the money from Sir J. A. personally in Kingston, it was for election expenses. I think it was by cheque."

"Q. What was Sir John giving the money for? What did he say?"

"A. He gave no directions. I knew what the money was, it was for necessary expenses. Sir John asked me to take charge of it. I had charge of money for Sir John previously."

"Q. What did you do with it?"

"A. I did not spend over $400 or $500, speaking in round numbers."

This may turn out to be the same Shannon who took the letters in the post office. He continues:

"I gave to different friends of Sir John $30 or $40; to Armstrong McCormick, about $30; Isaac McNabb, $20; Jos. O'Brien, $10; telegraph company, $25; to bill-sticker, $25; Flanagan, for cab-hire, $18, and $10 to Courroy."

Then comes another portion of the evidence, showing that Shannon was working earnestly in the Kingston election. Parkhill sent Hunter to Shannon with the following letter:

"The bearer, James Hunter, is an elector; has a horse and sleigh; had better look after him. J. O.'s men are looking after him this morning. Must do something now, else it will be too late, put him in the way at once."

J. A. PARKHILL."

Now as it would appear, we have found there are several Shannons in this locality, and that they had been friends of the First Minister, and if the First Minister possesses one good quality it is the quality of remembering old friends. He being the leader of the Government, perhaps, the Postmaster General was not so much to blame for the course he took, because after receiving instructions from his inspector in that locality he would have to make enquiries as to this man Shannon—whether it was the Shannon who worked so energetically at the time the election took place there—before he could move in the matter. At all events 24 hours elapsed and, therefore, Mr. Shannon escaped to the other side. The Postmaster General says that he is back in the country, but as far as that is concerned he should never have had an opportunity of getting away to the United States. I repeat again that I think the lax manner in which the civil servants perform their duty in the post office should be carefully looked to. People depositing their money there, many of them poor people, should be protected by the Government. The Government should feel that for every dollar lost in the post office they should be held accountable. I hope my hon. friend from South Oxford will not feel too hardly against the Government on this occasion, because very likely he will find, if he examines carefully into the matter, that this man Shannon had been a useful and important individual in an election trial, and deserved some consideration at the hands of the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot conceive for a moment that this is a concerted scene between the hon. member for South Oxford and the hon. gentleman who has just sat down; but the coincidence is rather remarkable. When the hon. gentleman, in his anxiety for the public interest, and to see that crime is punished and that the official performs his duty, brings this matter up, it is rather a singular coincidence that the hon. member for East Elgin should have hunted up the records of my trial in 1874, in which I was unseated. It looks very like as if the question was put and the remark made, not for the purpose of public justice, but to give the hon. member for East Elgin an opportunity of exercising his malignity by trying to drag my name into this matter respecting Mr. Shannon. It looks marvellously like it, and it will take a good deal to white-wash the hon. member for South Oxford from the suspicion that this is a concerted arrangement. The only thing that makes me doubt it is that the hon. gentleman is barking up the wrong tree; he has waked up the wrong passenger; he has got the wrong Shannon. The Shannon he speaks of is Mr. James Shannon, who is a friend of mine and a most respectable man; and the hon. gentleman having been elected for one of the ridings of Elgin, must be supposed to be a respectable man, but he would be higher in the estimation of the hon. members of this House than he is now if he held the character of Mr. James Shannon. Mr. James Shannon was the trusted bookkeeper and accountant of my firm for many years; he took care of my money, took care of my accounts, and managed my affairs; and although this person who opened these letters is a relative of Mr. James Shannon, I may tell the hon. gentleman, if he would like to know it, that the two brothers have not spoken or had any communication except on business for many years; and I suppose the fact that that was known must have been the reason why the clerk, instead of going to Mr. James Shannon, the postmaster, went to the post office inspector. The hon. gentleman, in his desire, I may say his malignant desire, to make an attack, says what? He says the Postmaster General has been guilty of great laches, and, in order to favor a supposed friend of mine, neglected to have him arrested. The hon. gentleman heard what the Postmaster General said. He said that the first intimation he had of the matter was in the letter he received from the post office inspector, who resides at Kingston, informing him that the deputy postmaster there had been discovered opening letters, that the clerk who discovered him had informed him, but that the inspector did not cause him to be arrested as he ought to have done; and when he got instructions to arrest, which he did the moment the Postmaster General heard of it, the bird had flown, the man had gone. The hon. gentleman heard this statement, and yet he has the face to get up in this House and make this statement. It only shows how far political malignity can go, that he could try to make a little capital by reviving the recollections of the trial against me in 1874, and making the defalcations of this officer in 1888 a peg to hang a malignant attack on.

Mr. RYKERT. I would like to change the subject for a few minutes in order to bring to the notice of the Government and of the House what I consider to be a very important matter, that is, the claim of Mrs. Gowanlock. In the early part of this Session the hon. member for North

Victoria (Mr. Barron) asked the Government whether or not they intended to pay Mrs. Gowanlock, the widow of J. A. Gowanlock, who was killed by Indians at Frog Lake in the North-West rebellion, a pension in the same manner and to the same extent as they had paid Mrs. Delaney. The House will recollect that during the late rebellion Mrs. Delaney and Mrs. Gowanlock were seized by the Indians immediately after their husbands were murdered by the Indians at Frog Lake; and hon. members will recollect what an excitement there was throughout the country about the fate of those two ladies. I venture to state that if this House had been asked at that time to restore these ladies to their homes, it would have granted almost any sum of money. The hon. Minister of the Interior, in reply to the question of my hon. friend from North Victoria, stated that Mrs. Gowanlock's husband was not an employé of the Dominion Government, while Mrs. Delaney's husband was. The ground taken by the Minister of the Interior and the Government has been that Mrs. Gowanlock's husband not being an employé of the Government, she was not entitled to compensation or a pension. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that during the late Parliament a pension of $400 a year was granted to Mrs. Delaney. Now, I think I can show by documents which have been brought down to the House that Mr. Gowanlock was considered an employé of the Government. The facts are these. The Indian Department were desirous to have a mill erected at a place called Onion Lake in the North-West Territories, and called for tenders for the erection of that mill. Mr. Gowanlock and Mr. Laurie, his partner, put in tenders for the work, and entered into an agreement with the Government to run that mill for ten years. The agreement bears date the 17th of September, 1884, and is between the Hon. Edgar Dewdney, Indian Commissioner for Manitoba and the North-West Territories, of the first part, and John Alexander Gowanlock and Richard Carney Laurie, of the second part, and provides:

"Witnesseth that the party of the first part being desirous of having a saw and grist mill established at a point adjacent to Onion Lake Reserve near Fort Pitt in the North-West Territories, upon the conditions and terms following, that is to say: First,—The parties of the second part agree to erect a good substantial building according to the plans and specifications hereto attached, marked No. 1, and that the capacity of the saw and grist and machinery used in construction with the same will be according to the specifications hereto attached, marked No. 2.

"The mill to be erected and in operation by the fifteenth January, 1885.

"The parties of the second part agree that they will keep the said mill in good operation for at least ten years; that they will constantly have a competent miller in attendance at said mill, that the Indians shall have the preference over other customers in the gisting of their grain and that they shall be charged less toll by one-fourth for two years, and one-sixth for the eight succeeding years than white customers.

"In consideration of the above, the party of the first part binds himself to pay to the parties of the second part the sum of $2,500, the said sum to be paid as follows: $1,500 when the machinery is on the ground and the balance, namely, $1,000, on completion of the work."

It is well known that although $1,500 were advanced by the Government for building that mill, the mill was destroyed before it was completed, and as the late hon. the Minister of the Interior stated, upon an investigation made into the pecuniary loss sustained by the firm, a certain amount was awarded to the firm for the material and the building which was destroyed, from which was deducted the $1,500 granted by the Government. It is said that Mr. Gowanlock was not an employé of the Government. I have before me two letters from the Department of Indian Affairs, in which the department very plainly referred to Mr. Gowanlock as an employé of the Government; but I say whether he was so or not, the Government are bound to take notice of the facts and to place Mrs. Gowanlock in the same position as Mrs. Delaney. This will establish no precedent whatever, as the circumstances never can occur again.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know about that.

Mr. RYKERT. Humanity alone demands for this woman, placed in this sad position, consideration at the hands of the Government. Mrs. Gowanlock lives in my constituency. I see her frequently, and I know that she may not live many years in consequence of the trials and sufferings she endured; and the circumstances of her case are such that they will justify the Government in showing more liberality towards her by giving her fair and reasonable compensation, and I am sure that the House will endorse the Government in any action it may take to this end. I have a letter of the 21st April, 1887, from Mr. P. B. Douglas, Assistant Secretary of the Department of the Interior, addressed to Mr. Henry Johnson, the father of Mrs. Gowanlock. In this letter, Mr. Douglas says:

"I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th inst., and to inform you that a copy of that portion which relates to the pension desired for Mrs. Gowanlock has been referred to the Department of Indian Affairs, of which her husband during his lifetime was an employé."

I find also a letter addressed by Mr. Douglas to Mr. L. Vankoughnet, dated 21st April, 1887, in which I find the following:

"I have the honor, by direction, to refer to you, herewith enclosed, an extract from a letter from Mr. Henry Johnson, Tintern, Ont., asking that a pension be granted to Theresa Gowanlock, widow of the late John Gowanlock, who was in his lifetime an employé of your department, such pension to be maintained to her during her widowhood."

These letters clearly indicate that Mr. Gowanlock was in the service of the Government. At any rate, we have the fact before us that he was bound, under heavy penalty, to carry on his mill for a period of ten years, and to grind grain for the Indians at a cheaper rate than for the whites. In that respect, he was as much an employé of the Government as any other person. It seems to me this is a case deserving the favorable consideration of the Government, and I hope that the Government, on considering the facts, will show generosity towards the petitioner. Mrs. Gowanlock saw her husband killed before her eyes, she was submitted to indignities and insults by the Indians for two months, and if any case was ever worthy of consideration, it is hers.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have much pleasure in sharing in the recommendation of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert). The case of Mrs. Gowanlock is one of extreme hardship. Mrs. Delaney was with Mrs. Gowanlock and suffered the same great calamity. Both of them lost their husbands at the same time. Mrs. Delaney was born in the county I represent, and I have known her from my childhood. She has told me of the terrible incidents of that terrible time, and I do think, under the circumstances, as the hon. member for Lincoln has pointed out, that Mrs. Gowanlock is entitled to the same privileges and indemnity, to the same kindness and consideration, at the hands of this House and the Government as Mrs. Delaney. I had great pleasure in bringing the case of Mrs. Delaney under the notice of the hon. First Minister. He received me with the utmost kindness and consideration, and granted her a very proper indemnity which will make her comfortable for life. I think that, under the circumstances, the representations of the hon. member for Lincoln should receive consideration, and I am sure they will receive consideration at the hands of the Government. I am quite sure that every hon. member from the Province of Quebec will be quite willing to accord to the woman of Ontario the same rights, privileges and indemnity which they accorded to the woman of Quebec.

Mr. BARRON. I am exceedingly glad that this matter has been brought before the House by the hon. member for Lincoln, and I sincerely hope that his efforts in the direction of getting justice done to Mrs. Gowanlock will meet with a more favorable result than mine in the past. It will be in the recollection of this House that I brought up the case of Mrs. Gowanlock last Session, and also a short time ago this Session. I confess I have not been able yet to appreciate what I consider to be the invidious distinction drawn between the case of Mrs. Delaney and that of Mrs. Gowanlock. As the hon. member for Lincoln has stated, the distinction is sought to be drawn from the alleged fact that the husband of Mrs. Delaney was in the employ of the Government at the time of his death, and that such was not the case with the husband of Mrs. Gowanlock. That statement was made last Session by the hon. the Finance Minister and also this Session by the late hon. the Minister of the Interior. Without going into the question at present as to whether or not Mr. Gowanlock was really in the employ of the Government, I do not think that can be a reason for always refusing what one would suppose was only justice to the widow and children of the deceased person. That cannot be a reason in this case. If in Mrs. Delaney's case it was a reason for granting the pension, then, in every case in which an employé of the Government dies, his widow and children could advance that argument that because their husband or their father as the case might be, was, during his lifetime and at the time of his death in the employ of the Government they should receive a pension. But that was not the sole reason. There was something else for granting Mrs. Delaney a pension. What was that other reason? It was the sad, harrowing circumstances under which her husband met his death, and those circumstances apply just as much in the case of Mrs. Gowanlock as they did in the case of Mrs. Delaney. And therefore what was done for Mrs. Delaney should, on the very self-same argument and for the self-same reasons, be done for Mrs. Gowanlock. My hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) has stated shortly the sad circumstances under which Mr. Gowanlock met his death. Will the House allow me for a moment to read Mrs. Gowanlock's own statement from her own lips of the circumstances under which her husband met his sad death:

Mr. RYKERT.

"Neither I nor my husband understood the Indian language, and so were not addressed by them, but we understood we were prisoners and had to go with the rest. When we left Mrs. Delaney's house no one knew what was going to happen, and I do not think it was really supposed any of us were in danger. We all left Mrs. Delaney's house together. My husband at the time was outside, and as we left the house he met me and took me with him and we walked on together. We had only got a few paces from the house when the Indians began firing. Mr. Dill, Mr. Quinn, and Mr. Gilchrist were shot first, though I did not see them shot, but as soon as I saw Mr. Willscroft, an old greyheaded man, fall in front of us I then knew all were being killed. I became greatly alarmed. I saw an Indian aiming at my husband by my side. In a moment he fell, reaching out his arms towards me as he fell. I caught him, and we fell together. I laid upon him, resting my face upon his, and his breath was scarcely gone when I was forced away by an Indian. It was not the Indian who fired that dragged me from my husband. I was almost crazy with grief, but I remember seeing the two priests shot and also Mr. Delaney. They were in front of me. One of the priests when shot was leaning over Mr. Delaney."

I have also here Mrs. Delaney's statement, taken from her shortly after she was rescued from the Indians, and her statement is almost the same as that of Mrs. Gowanlock. It will be seen that the exceptional circumstances—because they were and are very exceptional circumstances—that induced the Government to grant a pension to Mrs. Delaney apply equally to the case of Mrs. Gowanlock. Their husbands were at that time doing their best, as they thought, to defend the lives of the people who were then more or less under their care, and I therefore heartily join with my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) in hoping that the Government will do justice to Mrs. Gowanlock, apart altogether from the question of whether her husband was or was not an employé of the Government at the time of his death. But I think I can also support my hon. friend in his argument that Mr. Gowanlock was at that time, if not technically, at least sufficiently for the purposes of the argument, in the employ of the Government. My hon. friend from Lincoln has read the agreement which was made with him, and I think the preamble of that agreement shows that Mr. Gowanlock was to go to Onion Lake to construct a mill which was to be of invaluable use to the settlers in that locality; and he also read a letter showing that officers of the department treated Mr. Gowanlock as being at that time in the employ of the Government. Therefore I think that not only from the standpoint of justice, but also from the fact, as I maintain, that the husband was in the employ of the Government, Mrs. Gowanlock should be treated in the same way as Mrs. Delaney. But I find, on looking into the granting of pensions in England, that they do not confine these pensions by any means to the widows and children of husbands who have been in the employ of the Government. I find that on the 31st July, 1885, Mrs. Sherwin was granted a pension of £100 on the ground of the literary merits of her sister, the late Mrs. Jameson. I find that Miss Leech was also granted a pension on account of the merits of her brother, the late Mr. John Leech, as an artist; and several other sisters are also granted pensions on the same ground. Then, Mr. Huxley was granted a pension because of his eminent services to science. This shows that the rule is not inflexible that the person at the time of his death must necessarily be in the employ of the Government, and I think, as has been stated by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Wright), that members on both sides of the House will join heartily in supporting the Government in granting to Mrs. Gowanlock the same pension that was granted to Mrs. Delaney. Perhaps the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) stated what, I am afraid, is correct, that if a pension is granted to Mrs. Gowanlock, she will not be permitted, owing to the serious trouble and anxiety which she suffered in the North-West, to enjoy it very long. I hope this House will grant it to her, and will in that way perform an act of justice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think the hon. gentleman who has last spoken has strengthened his case by quoting the pensions granted in England to Mr. Huxley and to the sister of John Leech the artist, because, though he may not be aware of it, there is an annual sum of £1,200 voted by Parliament under a statutory provision for the purpose of granting pensions to persons who have gained such rewards for literary and artistic services. That is voted annually, and is divided, on the advice of one of the Ministers, among artists and literary people who have become in rather reduced circumstances. I quite agree with the hon. gentlemen who have spoken that Mrs. Gowanlock's case is a very sad one. She saw her husband murdered before her eyes, and she suffered a great deal in mind and body as well as did Mrs. Delaney. It would be always an agreeable task for the Government of the day, who have hearts in their bosoms, to deal with such cases of hardship, and I may say of horror, if they thought it was their duty to do so, if they thought it was within their power to do so; but it is very easy for a Government to be very liberal with the money of other people, with the money of the public, and we had to consider in these two cases what we had a right to do, and what we had power to do. Of course, without coming to Parliament, we could not in any way whatever be justified in granting a pension to Mrs. Gowanlock. Her husband was in no way an employé of the Government. The case was simply this: The Indians on that reserve had raised a good deal of grain, but they had no means whatever of using it because there was no mill there. The Indian Department tried to find some person enterprising enough to put up a grist mill, and it was stated, as the House will well understand, that it was a country which would naturally be settled by whites, and that a bonus would be given if anyone would go at once and establish a mill, which, it was expected, would not be profitable when it simply had to grind the scanty crops of the Indians, and, therefore, a bonus would be given until it became a profitable milling establishment in consequence of settlement. Tenders were called for, and Mr. Gowanlock succeeded in getting the contract. It was simply a case of contract, by which he was told, if you put a mill of a certain size there and grind for a reasonable rate the grain of the Indians, and if you will continue, when the white settlers come in, to give the preference to the Indians and not to shove them away with their little crops, and will give security that you will maintain that mill for a certain number of years, we will give you a bonus of $1,500 for that time. His death by the hand of an Indian, although it took place under the most dreadful circumstances, and at the same time when the clergymen were killed, and Delaney, the civil servant, was killed, and other men were killed, still the Government had to look at the circumstances. The case stood in the same position as if an Indian had killed a white man in any other part of the North-West. And we had to consider that giving a pension to Mrs. Gowanlock might be held to establish a precedent that in any cases where murders were caused by Indians—and they generally act with very considerable barbarity if their blood is up—that in any honorable case of this kind, where a white man was slain by an Indian, his relatives had a claim on the public treasury for a pension. We had to consider that, it was our bounden duty to consider it. As I have already said, it would be a very agreeable duty for us to ask Parliament to confer a pension upon Mrs. Gowanlock; if that is the general consent, the Government will be ready to come down.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is, Sir John.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If that is the general consent of the House; but we know perfectly well, in the first place, that the two cases do not stand on the same footing at all. All Governments take care to provide for the families of their civil and military officers who have fallen in their service. Delaney was an officer there on the outskirts, in the very act of dealing out food to these Indians when he was barbarously murdered. He was a civil servant, he had moved there with his family at the orders of the Government. As I have said, in such cases all Governments provide for the families of their servants slain on duty, but that is not the case with Mrs. Gowanlock. Parliament is not very partial to granting pensions, but if I can gather that it is the general consent of this House that this should be made an exception, and if they are not afraid of setting a precedent, Government will take this case into favorable consideration.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman has exhibited a regard for the public purse to which he has not accustomed us.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Allow me to say one word more. I think that full compensation was given to the estate of Mr. Gowanlock for his property which was destroyed at the time of his death.

Mr. LAURIER. However, I think in this instance Parliament will not grudge the money that will be given to the widow; not only for the reasons which were mentioned by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) and in which I would be disposed largely to concur, but also for this other reason, that Mr. Gowanlock was one of the first victims of the rebellion. Now, we have had a commission sitting to investigate the claims of losses sustained in consequence of the rebellion, and I can see no reason why, if we should compensate a man who has been a victim of the rebellion in losing property, we should not also indemnify his family for the loss of his life.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is opening a very wide door.

Mr. LAURIER. Perhaps it is, but, after all, the rebellion was caused by the action of the Government, and I cannot see why the country should not compensate the evil that has been done. In this matter I believe the Government will see their way to allow a grant to the widow, and that both sides of the House would be glad to ratify the action of the Government in this matter. Now, there is another matter to which I want to refer, and to which I was about to refer when the hon. member for Lincoln rose, and that is the case which was brought forward by the hon. member for Oxford a moment ago. The Prime Minister, in answering the speech of the hon. member for Elgin, said that no doubt it was a mere coincidence that my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) had brought the subject up, and that the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) had spoken in the manner he did. Well, coincidences will sometimes occur. It was, perhaps, a mere coincidence that there was a thief in Kingston by the name of Shannon, and at the same time another man in Kingston by the name of Shannon, who happened to be a bosom friend of the Prime Minister. It was, perhaps, a mere coincidence that prevented the arrest of the one who was guilty, and that another man bore the same name was the friend of the First Minister. I would have been disposed to consider it a mere coincidence, but after having witnessed the exhibition of temper which the First Minister gave us a moment ago, I began to suspect that, after all, the hon. member for West Elgin had touched the true spot. No one who listened to the Postmaster General but must have come to the conclusion that the reasons which he gave to explain why this man was not arrested when he was caught in the act, were extremely flimsy, to say the least. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is evident from the language of the Postmaster General himself, that there were grave irregularities in the post office; and I believe, from the little that has been said,—for I never heard the statement before to-day—I believe from the little that has been said by the Postmaster General, that the deputy inspector who was there, and who caught the thief in the act, was there for the purpose of detecting the guilty party who had been committing frauds for some time previous. The hon. gentleman says no, but it is evident from his language, at all events, that frauds were going on. He said, and I took note of his words, that parties were making claims to-day for money lost at the post office, upon the friends of Shannon. It was said that money had been extracted when Shannon was not in the post office, and that consequently he was not the guilty party. Therefore it is evident that at the time this man was caught in the act, there were great irregularities going on, since claims are made to-day which cannot reach the guilty party, but which must reach other parties as well. Therefore, I say it is probable, at all events, that the deputy inspector was there to investigate that case, and to find the guilty party, but finding, probably, the man whom he did not expect to find guilty, finding a man by the name of Shannon—

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman is not correct. The deputy inspector lives in Kingston, and has his office in the post office. The clerk went up and told the inspector.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, he went up and told the inspector. He could not have told the inspector that Shannon was the guilty party, since, according to the statement made by the Postmaster General, the deputy inspector caught Shannon in the act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. McLELAN. The clerk saw him handling the letters improperly and he told the deputy inspector, and the inspector sent for Shannon to come up to his room.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. LAURIER. Very well, let it be so—is there any difference? The moment the man had been caught in the act, why was he not arrested?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And so he ought to have been.

Mr. LAURIER. But instead of arresting him, the gentleman thinks he must consult the authorities at Ottawa. Why? If it had been any other man than the man who bore the name of Shannon, probably he would have been arrested in the act. I can see no reason why he was not arrested in the act, and why in such a glaring matter of crime as that, the deputy inspector should not have arrested the man at once, instead of sending to Ottawa. No explanation has been given why this man was not arrested at once, and why it was thought proper to consult the authorities at Ottawa before ordering the arrest.

Mr. McLELAN. No, he did not consult the authorities at Ottawa. When he conveyed the information that the crime had been committed, he at the same time conveyed the information that the criminal had left the country.

Mr. LAURIER. It makes the case simply worse. Instead of consulting the department the officer thought he would let him go, and after giving him 24 hours leave he writes to Ottawa and states that the man has left the country. Why was not the man arrested? That is a circumstance which requires explanation. My hon. friend behind me thinks the explanation is this, that this man was related to a gentleman who was a friend of the Prime Minister in former years, and who was a friend at a trial which was of great moment to the First Minister at that time; and probably he said, as he naturally may have said: I being an officer of the Government, it would be too bad to bring disgrace on the name of a man who is related to the friend of the Prime Minister, and I will give him a chance. I see no other reason for the conduct of the official, and this is the reason which my hon. friend behind me gave. Whatever was the conclusion at which my hon. friend arrived, whether it was right or wrong, the First Minister had no right to impute motives to him in the disrespectful manner in which he did impute them. This is a free Parliament and every member has a right to express his views so long as it is done in parliamentary language, and the First Minister should be the last man to reflect on a member who in the discharge of his duty may use language rather warm. My hon. friend did nothing but discharge his duty to the best of his ability, and certainly no man in this Parliament should be taken to task because he discharged his duty in that manner.

Mr. McLELAN. I desire to say in explanation to the hon. gentleman that there has been no complaints against the Kingston office in particular. Notice had been given that letters were missing which had passed through a circuit 100 or 150 miles and through a number of post offices, and as they were not registered they were not under the direct supervision of any one particular officer. There was no special suspicion directed against the Kingston office until the clerk saw the assistant postmaster improperly handling two or three letters. He then went up stairs to the inspector's room and informed him of the fact, and he sent for Shannon, who confessed to having three letters, in one of which there was 25 cents, the other two containing no enclosures whatever. I may state further that the greatest attention is given to the security of money transmitted by post, and to induce people to aid the post office officials in tracing letters, the fee for registration has been placed at a merely nominal sum; we only charge 2 cents for registration while ten cents is charged in the United States. Out of three and a half millions of letters registered during the past year, 1887, there have only been lost 58 to the million, which is an infinitesimal percentage of letters registered and placed in a position that the post office officials can trace them. The letters that have been lost in this case or on this circuit, passing through some twelve or twenty post offices, were unregistered, and the letters that Shannon tampered with were also unregistered. Since he was detected in that act enquiry has been directed to special transactions in the Kingston office under the suspicion that Shannon had tampered with other letters passing over that circuit, and information is being gathered and facts obtained which I think will lead to the restitution to parties who claim to have lost money from letters passing over that circuit in which Kingston is one of the offices.

Mr. LISTER. While this post office matter is before the House, I have a small case which I wish to bring before the attention of the Postmaster General, and I think this is an exceedingly suitable opportunity to do so. It appears, so far as my experience of the management of the post offices of the country is concerned, that if the incumbents of the post offices happen to be supporters of the hon. gentlemen opposite, they are treated with extreme leniency, but if they happen to have been appointed by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House when they occupied the Treasury benches, the slightest pretext is seized by the Government to dismiss those gentlemen from the offices, and often this is done without any intimation being given to those officers as to the nature of the charges made against them. It seems to me from the slight experience I have had in these matters, that the post office inspectors are officers appointed by the Government for the particular duty of dismissing officials who are offensive to the Government of the day. In my own county there is a village called Arkona, and in 1870 when the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was leader of the Government, a reputable and responsible citizen, a man respected by the whole community, was appointed postmaster. He is responsible in every way, financially and otherwise; but this Government recently, without any charge being made against him, without any investigation of any charges being made, summarily dismissed him from the office which he held for the past ten years. The letter which I hold in my hand is the only information that gentleman received that his services as postmaster of the village of Arkona were dispensed with by this Government, and it is in these words:

"I am to acquaint you that on receipt of the books the post office of Arkona will be transferred from your charge to that of Robert Dunn. Please govern yourself accordingly."

Why was he dismissed? I know that in my county postmasters have been in arrear and in default in connection with the money order department, that those charges have been known to the Government and the inspector, and yet those men have been retained in the office and hold their office to-day. No such charge has ever been made against Mr. Everest; it could not be made against him, for he is eminently responsible for everything in connection with the office; and yet he has been dismissed in this summary way because he happens to be a Liberal in politics. The Postmaster General has had no ground whatever for dismissing him from office except that it was necessary to find a place for a supporter of the gentleman who opposed the late member for East Lambton. What excuse do the Government give? They say that Mr. Everest is not a resident of Arkona, but that he has been become a resident of the village of Forrest. That is only partly true. He owns business establishments in both places. He carries on a drug store in Forrest. His family are as capable as he is of attending to the business of the department, and the office has been attended to. There have been no complaints made against him, and yet the Postmaster General without any investigation dismissed him in this summary manner. The inspectors of the Government are apparently in office for the purpose of making places by removing men who are holding positions. I have nothing to say against the man whom the Government have selected; he supported the Government with all his might, and of course it was necessary that some place should be found for him, and in order to do it the Government have removed an honorable, reputable and responsible official to make a place for this Mr. Dunn who now holds the post office. If that is to be the game let us know it. Our men will go out, but God help yours when we came in, that is all there is about it,—and we will get there before long. If this system is to be the policy we want to know it, for these gentlemen should not be dispossessed and turned out of office until some substantial complaints have been made and proved against them. The conduct of the Government, so far as this man is concerned, is unjust, and it is unworthy of hon. gentlemen occupying the position that hon. gentlemen do governing the country to-day.

Mr. McLELAN. If the hon. gentleman had been disposed to do what was right in this matter, he would have followed the example of his leader from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and have given notice of the particular charge he intended to make to-night.

Mr. LISTER. What would have been the good of the notice. We would never have got to it.

Mr. McLELAN. Oh, yes, you would.

Mr. LISTER. Not this Session.

Mr. McLELAN. If you had given an intimation that you would bring up the matter I would have been prepared with the facts bearing on the case. I have only to deny the charges that he has made; that this Government has appointed post office inspectors for the purpose of making reports against postmasters of Liberal politics. It is not true that I have ever enquired what are the politics of any inspector on the staff. I have been told by members of Parliament, and I have been told by residents in different parts of Ontario, that a number of the inspectors are in politics Liberal, and opposed to the present Government. I have never supposed that those men would have had their reports affected by their politics. Not at all. I have felt confidence in every inspector that he will discharge his duty fairly and honorably by the department, and by the offices under his control. So far as my experience goes they have all done that, whether they have been Liberal or Conservative in politics. Now, as regards this particular case. My recollection of it is this and I speak only from memory, because with the multitude of post offices we have and the number of incidents connected with almost every office in the country, it is impossible to remember all the details. My recollection of it is this: that some two years ago the inspector reported that the man who had charge of the post office at Arkona was resident out of the town of Arkona for six days out of the seven, and it was only on the Sabbath that he was a resident of the town of Arkona, also that the business of the office was kept in a slovenly manner and that it was the practice of the postmaster on Sunday when he was home to sign, in blank, the returns necessary to carry on the business of the office and leave them in blank in charge of somebody. A few months ago the question again arose that the postmaster was still an absentee from the town and that the same practice was being continued. I asked the inspector to make a report and he reported substantially the same; that this gentleman was doing business in the town of Forrest, some miles away, where he spent six days out of the seven, returning to Arkona on Saturday evening, remaining over the Sabbath, and leaving the post office in the hands of some assistant, and with blanks signed in charge of the assistant.

This having been the second report, I thought it was an improper practice and I changed the postmaster.

Mr. LISTER. Without notifying him.

Mr. McLELAN. Two years ago when the matter was reported on, it was brought to his notice that he was an absentee. In any case if I know of any similar instance whether the postmaster be grit or conservative, I should feel it my duty to change the postmaster who was responsible for the office, and see that he was a resident of the town so as to oversee the business of the post office.

Mr. LISTER. Is it so or is it not so, within the hon. gentleman's own knowledge that he has retained postmasters who have been behind in their money order accounts?

Mr. McLELAN. I find that there are a great many postmasters who are in arrears in their accounts, and I am making extra exertions to have those collected. I want to ascertain whether this is in consequence of neglect, or whether the arrears in the accounts are not brought to their cognizance by officers in the department—whether it is really a fraud or detention of moneys. I am making exertions to have all those accounts brought square before the 30th of June, and to make an entire change in the style.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman has not stated whether he notified this postmaster of any complaint before dismissing him.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. As I understand the Postmaster General he has laid down the principle in appointing postmasters that a resident of the town should be appointed to the position.

An hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. That was what he said.

An hon. MEMBER. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. A vacancy occurred in the village of Plattsville caused by the death of the former postmaster, and a petition was got up by the residents of that village signed by almost every person in that village and neighborhood, asking that the post office be kept in the family of the deceased gentleman who had occupied that position for a great many years; but the Postmaster General did not comply with that. Even the Conservative paper on the borders of the riding in Woodstock complained that the Postmaster General had not appointed a member of the family of the deceased postmaster but went outside of the village of Plattsville and hunted up a boy—a son of the Government candidate who opposed me in the last elections—and forced him upon the residents of that village against the expressed desire, by petition, of the whole of the residents. This does not coincide with the statement of the Postmaster General that he wishes to appoint a resident to a position of that kind.

Mr. LISTER. The Postmaster General did not inform this House that this postmaster in Arkona had a deputy. It was not necessary that he did live in the village of Arkona so long as the duties of the office were properly discharged. He had a deputy to discharge the duties properly and there was never a complaint except that the papers were kept slovenly. He was not of the right complexion and that was the real trouble.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am rather surprised to hear the Postmaster General say that no one was ever dismissed on account of his political opinions. I can mention a case that I know personally. Mr. James C. McDonald of Duart was dismissed because he was a Reformer and voted for the Reform candidate. The hon. gentleman's predecessor offered the position to a Mr. McCallum who refused to take it, and it was given to a man who was in the habit of carrying the mail, a Mr. Curtis, who was utterly incompetent and who was obliged to employ someone else to take charge of this office on his behalf. In making this statement I state what I know personally, and I have no doubt there are many other cases in which precisely the same thing has been done. I am rather surprised at the statement the hon. gentleman has made in regard to the impartiality of the inspectors. I would like to know is there not a Mr. Griffin the inspector at Kingston who was the former inspector at London, and had not the Government some reason for removing Mr. Griffin from London to Kingston? Will the hon. gentleman bring down the papers regarding the change of Mr. Griffin from London to Kingston? Does he not know there were serious irregularities in the post office?

Mr. McLELAN.

Mr. McLELAN. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does he not know that a person was persuaded to resign his position in the London post office to save the guilty parties.

Mr. McLELAN. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think I have papers in my possession which will inform the hon. gentleman. I do not wish to delay the House, but I think it would be worth while to bring the matter to the attention of the House, for it does seem to me that very serious irregularities have grown up in connection with many post offices in this country.

Mr. COOK. I wish to direct the attention of the Government to the fact that there is a vacancy in the customs house in the town of Penetanguishene, in the county of Simcoe. The customs officer sometime ago resigned his position, and I believe there are a great many applicants for the vacancy. The appointment should be made at once, because I can tell the Government that the petition against the member for East Simcoe is withdrawn and there is no necessity for keeping the place open.

Mr. WRIGHT. I would like to separate the cases of Mrs. Gowanlock and Mr. Shannon. The hon. First Minister kindly stated that if both sides of the House would express an opinion on the subject of Mrs. Gowanlock's claim, he would look into it. I have seen this unhappy woman, on whose brow still rests the shadow of the great peril that befel her, and who is not long for this world; and I hope the hon. First Minister will treat her with the same kindness that he did Mrs. Delaney. I think both sides of this House will gladly join in expressing the opinion that the Government should do so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. From what has been said on both sides of the House, I take it that there is a general assent, and therefore I may state that the Government will submit a proposition.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the case of Mrs. Gowanlock is out of the way, I would venture to make a remark to the Postmaster General about a vacancy in the post office at Newcastle. It will be in his recollection that last year I called his attention to the great neglect that occurred in that post office in the delivery of that leading organ of public opinion, the Montreal Herald, of which I sent a good many copies to my constituents in order to prevent misrepresentation, to keep them right, and to let them know what was going on in this House. I think I stated to the hon. gentleman last year that a great many copies of the paper, particularly just preceding the election, were thrown aside, some into the furnace. I have not heard that the hon. gentleman made any enquiries which he told me he would make. The occupant of the post office at the time was a son of the postmaster himself, who had been an invalid for a number of years. He was a very respectable man, and I am sure, had he been in his place, he would never have countenanced the disposal of the papers in the manner in which they were disposed of by the son, who was acting for him. The postmaster has been dead for some months, and I have not heard that a successor has been appointed. I did see that the Conservative Association, presided over by the gentleman whom I honored by beating him, had a meeting, or rather several meetings, of what is called the Liberal Conservative party in that town, and had several ballots, as to which of the numerous applicants should get the appointment; but I am not aware that any recommendation was made by that body to the Postmaster General on the subject. I would like the hon. gentleman to answer me, first, as to whether he made any enquiry into the complaints I made of the disposal of the newspapers which I thought it in my interest to send to some hundreds of my constituents, and next, whether any recommendation has been made by the Liberal Conservative club of that town, and if so, who has been appointed?

Mr. McLELAN. I called the attention of my officers to the remarks made previously by the hon. gentleman and directed them to remedy anything that was wrong. I may state that an appointment has been made to the post office.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask who it is?

Mr. McLELAN. I can scarcely give the name now; I can hardly recollect it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Perhaps you will let me know tomorrow.

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I approve of the conduct of the Government with respect to Mrs. Gowanlock. I think it is desirable that she should receive some compensation for the great hardships she has sustained. But I must say I think it an unfortunate thing, and calculated to create just and well-grounded suspicion on the part of the people of Canada, that the Postmaster General has no better explanation to offer than that which he has given to the House, of the most scandalous and infamous failure of justice that took place, whereby a felon, a man caught in the act of felony, was allowed, for whatever reason it may be, to escape to another country, whereby the ends of justice have been utterly defeated. If any man deserved to be sent to prison, it was a man who, in the position of deputy postmaster at Kingston, was found tampering with letters. I think the hon. Minister has been misinformed on one point. I would state to him that I have been informed that it was known to the postmaster for many months that irregularities were committed, and that officials were kept under suspicion of being the guilty parties.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am glad the Government have come to the conclusion to give some compensation to Mrs. Gowanlock. The discussion on the subject of the postal service generally I do not think will be amiss. If there is one subject on which this House should give a decided and united expression of opinion, it is that when the people's mail matter is entrusted to the officials of the Government, it should be forwarded to its destination without being tampered with; and it will be a very unfortunate thing if it should go forth to the postmasters that any laches on their part will be condoned by the Government. I very much regretted the tone of the hon. First Minister's remarks to night, because they will be taken as a palliation of the conduct of postmasters who tamper with the people's letters. The Opposition in this House have always held that the Post Office Department should be administered for the people, and when the Government have asked for money for that purpose, it has readily been granted; and because I feel that that department should be administered, not in the interest of party, but in the interest of the people of this country, I very much regretted the tone of the Premier's observations, because it may lead those in charge of the postal service to take for granted that if they are faithful to the Government they may tamper with the people's mails and open their letters, and will still be retained in the service. It is most unfortunate and most calamitous to the officials of the country that any such sentiment should go abroad that those guilty of wrong-doing in the postal service are to be maintained in office so long as they are faithful to the party. That principle should be stamped out on both sides, and the Government should be particular that no utterance of theirs would give the slightest sanction to public servants in the post office believing that they might with impunity, so long as they were true to party allegiance, tamper with or delay the mails or filch money from the letters. A gentleman has just showed me a telegram stating that a letter which he mailed from Ottawa to Mount Forest on the 4th April, did not reach Mount Forest until to-night. If we are to be treated to the excuses and palliative utterances, which the hon. the First Minister gave us to-night, we will have these delays repeated. Last year there were lost of registered letters 204 in the Dominion of Canada, and of letters not registered 273. This should not be. Why should those letters have been lost? They were not stolen but they were lost in Toronto in the mail. In my riding, a letter was sent by the bank to a distance of 11 miles, and although this letter contained $690, it did not reach its destination for six months. There has been no prosecution, there have been no dismissals, but every official has been kept in office. I must presume those officials were appointed by the Government, and the Government gave them to understand that so long as they were faithful to the Government it did not matter what became of the letters. In view of these facts, the remarks of the hon. the First Minister to the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wilson) were not at all justified; and the hon. member for Elgin struck at the root of the evil when he said the conduct of the postal service should not be ruled by party feeling. The postal service should be administered for the people, and the safe transmission of letters should be the paramount consideration of the Government. No sanction should be given to any wrong-doing on the part of the officials. I entirely disapprove of a gentleman holding the position the First Minister does, sanctioning a crime such as was committed at Kingston, where letters were opened and the money taken out, and then ridiculing an hon. gentleman who made a statement in accordance with the facts, and which struck at the root of the evil. I have no personal feeling towards the right hon. gentleman, but I say it is not consistent with the high position he holds that he should condone a crime and try to divert attention from it by ridicule. If more severity were exercised in the treatment of officials guilty of wrong-doings, we would not find so many letters going astray and so many delays in their transmission.

Motion agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Dorchester Penitentiary $46,304 50

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman know how far the building has progressed and what quantity of land the penitentiary has under cultivation and what work is done by the convicts?

Mr. THOMPSON. The buildings are completed, and we expect to occupy the new wing on the first of May. There is a large tract of land under cultivation. The convicts have been fully employed so far. We have very satisfactory workshops and also manufacturing machinery which give employment to the convicts.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What I wanted to know was whether any satisfactory arrangement had been made for employing them in the way of anything like a permanent manufacture.

Mr. THOMPSON. We have not made any permanent arrangement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand that they are employed in work in the prison and about the farm, and in the manufacture of buckets.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I wonder if this will be affected by Mr. Abbott's Bill in regard to bucket shops.

Manitoba Penitentiary..... $49,914 48

Mr. THOMPSON. Under the Penitentiary Act of last Session, there was a maximum allowance for a surgeon of $1,200. Dr. Sutherland had been the surgeon of the Manitoba penitentiary for some time, and had been receiving $600, but he had not been required to give his whole time to the prison. He was living in Winnipeg, and the fact that he had to go so far to attend to the penitentiary was found to be a great inconvenience. It is a prison in which there is an unusual number of prisoners requiring medical and surgical aid, and it was found, especially in winter, that it was impossible for a surgeon living in Winnipeg to properly attend to the wants of the prisoners, so it was thought better to require him to live at Stony Mountain and to give his whole time to the Penitentiary, and so he was allowed the maximum of the amount granted for surgeons, $1,200. The other increases, as regards salaries, are in accordance with the statute of last year—they are simply statutory increases—except that an additional guard has been provided for, and indeed was provided for in the Supplementary Estimates of last year. In the maintenance, there has been a decrease of 307, because so much convict clothing is not expected to be required. In the working expenses, there is an increase of $369, the principal item being in connection with the maintenance of buildings, for small repairs.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I notice that the hon. gentleman observed that the convicts in this Penitentiary require a great deal of medicine, and I agree with him, for I see that $639 was expended for these 100 convicts for drugs and medicine, while only $271 was expended for 175 convicts in the Dorchester penitentiary. It certainly appears to me that that is a monstrous disproportion.

Mr. THOMPSON. I made some remarks on this question before, and the only explanation I can give is the same as I gave then, that a very much larger quantity of medicines and drugs is required in Manitoba than elsewhere. We have there a number of Indians and half-breeds, and these are persons who, after a short period of confinement, almost invariably develop disease, and require care and stimulants and medical aid.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many Indians are there?

Mr. THOMPSON. I cannot state the exact number.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are there twenty?

Mr. THOMPSON. No; I think about fifteen.

Mr. WILSON. Does the hon. gentleman mean by "stimulants" supplied to Indians liquors, or what?

Mr. THOMPSON. We have some there who are far advanced in consumption, and occasionally liquors have to be provided for Indians.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that the Minister took power in a Bill which was passed to-day to provide that, if anyone gave spirits of any description to an Indian—whether it was a doctor or anyone else—he would be liable to a fine and to imprisonment. Am I to understand that the Minister is making provision now to give spirits to the Indians and to make the doctors violate the law and make themselves liable to be fined and imprisoned. Either the Government must amend the law passed this afternoon, or they must do away with the spirits. It seems to be very absurd that they should provide that this surgeon Sutherland should be fined every day for supplying liquors to Indians, while they furnish the whiskey for the purpose. I do not understand it. I think the warden must be very weak and delicate and must require a great deal of stimulants, because I see in the warden's department there is no less than $129 45 paid for drugs and medicine. I should like the Minister to explain how this happens. Perhaps he will state whether there are any Indian patients in the warden's department who require stimulants and nourishment on account of lung disease.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. THOMPSON. There are no such patients in the warden's department. I hope the hon. gentleman will acquit me of any desire to lead astray any member of his profession. I could not hope to do that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not know exactly what sort of rations may be required in the Manitoba penitentiary, but it does appear to me that the quantities set down here for a year's consumption is rather extravagant for 100 convicts and some 20 or 25 guards. I find there are 211 lbs. of bacon, which is not extravagant, 57,353 lbs. of beef, 927 lbs. of mutton, 3 barrels of pork, and 182 lbs. of veal. It seems to me that those rations are calculated on a very extraordinary scale. Speaking roughly, I should say it would amount to a ration of about 2 lbs. of meat per diem for each man, which seems very much in excess of the ordinary prison allowance, and I think is very much in excess of the rations allowed to Her Majesty's soldiers. I think a pound of meat per diem is all that is allowed to a soldier, and if I am wrong the Minister of Militia can correct me. However, it is clear that these allowances are out of all proportion to what might be supposed to keep a man in health and strength during the year. I have no objection whatever to these men being properly fed. It would be very improper to deprive them of a reasonable amount of nutriment, but, if the hon. gentleman will make the calculation for himself, I think he will agree with me that this amount is unreasonable.

Mr. THOMPSON. Under the old system, the guards were supplied with rations.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are only 25 of them.

Mr. THOMPSON. We supply them no longer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, but the hon. gentleman should know that 100 convicts and 25 guards could hardly be expected to consume the quantities I have alluded to. It is enormously in excess of the rations granted in the military service, and those are supposed to be quite sufficient to keep men at the very top of their condition.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to enquire whether it is the intention to continue this extra allowance of $400 to Mr. Bedson, the warden.

Mr. THOMPSON. I cannot give the hon. gentleman any explanation as to the rations, but I will promise to do so the next time we go into Supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it should be looked into, because it is vastly in excess of what it ought to be. If the hon. gentleman will look back to the rations in other cases, he will see that it is enormously in excess of what seems to be supplied there. Now, by way of comparison, if he will look at Dorchester penitentiary, he will see there that the quantity of beef is 16,000 lbs. as against 57,000 lbs. There is a little more pork, apparently—24 barrels of pork, and only three here, but as far as I can see, running my eye over it, the rations received in Dorchester Penitentiary, would, per head, hardly be one-third part of those that are alleged to have been consumed in Manitoba.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I think when on this item before, the drugs used in Manitoba penitentiary in the warden's department, came up incidentally and the Minister promised us that he would be able to give us later more detailed explanations as to the nature of this item. I have been waiting patiently for his explanation, and deferred my remarks until we came to the item. I hope he will now fulfil his promise.

Mr. THOMPSON. If I made the hon. gentleman that promise, it has escaped my memory altogether. I suppose the explanations I gave the other evening were satisfactory, but if he will allow me, I will promise to make the explanations the next time we go into Supply.

Mr. TROW. I notice an unusual number of guards employed at that penitentiary. It is well known that the warden of that penitentiary is a very large herder of buffalos, that roam at large over the prairies, and I am persuaded that some of these guards are employed in keeping them within reasonable limits. He has some 35 or 40 buffalos. I know that they are guarded, and I would like to know whether he employs the guards of the penitentiary for that purpose.

Mr. THOMPSON. There are no guards employed at any work of that kind, and none of the present employes. I may give as one reason why so many guards are required, the fact that there is no wall and no fence at all about the present grounds.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I think we have not had such full explanations as we ought to have in reference to this penitentiary. A number of years ago I remember distinctly that the reasons given why the expenses were so unusually large were on account of the cost of living, and the cost of maintenance in that locality. But to-day, although they have good facilities, and the expense of living ought not to be any greater than in any other province, we find that the expenditure per capita in Manitoba is increasing from year to year. The expenses of running that institution are becoming greater. We find, according to their own estimates, that in 1886-87, the cost per head was $1.53; in 1885-86 it was $1.43, and in 1884-85 it was $1.31. Now, that shows a gradual running up, contrary to what they promised. They told us that, after a time, as the cost of living decreased, the expenses of the institution would decrease. Now, what is the reason of the constant increase? I must confess I do not think we have had any sufficient explanation. Is it the warden who is at fault? Does he make requisitions upon the Government that they cannot resist? If the Government find that the warden is more extravagant than he ought to be, let them take steps accordingly. He may be an efficient man, but it is their duty at once to refuse to grant the requisitions he makes upon them. I cannot for the life of me see why the expense should be so enormous. I know there is a large number of Indians usually sent to this institution, and the expenditure increased on account of their being there. I believe you will find that the cause of the increased expenditure, I may say the reckless extravagance, in the institution is traceable to the warden himself, and the sooner the Government make full investigation and curtail the expenses, the more satisfactory will it be to the House. While I am perfectly willing that every facilities should be given to the unfortunate inmates, I am afraid, judging from the appearance of the amount, and judging from the explanation given to us by the Minister, that the unfortunate inmates are not the extravagant ones, that these various extra delicacies are not intended for the inmates, but they are intended for the officers, and I think it is high time for the Minister to make an examination and try to conduct the institution in the future in somewhat such a manner as it ought to be conducted. When we take all the various items, we find that the expenditure is much larger than it is in any other institution of the kind, either in this or any other country, and I cannot for the life of me see why the Government should allow it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is understood, of course, that on these items as to which the hon. gentleman promises further explanation, full discussion will be allowed on concurrence. Now, in support of the statement of my hon. friend behind me, I may just point out a sample instance of how things are managed in the Manitoba penitentiary. I see a charge of $52 for a single item of ink. Well, now, in the name of all that is wonderful, how is it that the ordinary correspondence of the officers of a penitentiary like that in Manitoba could require $52 worth of ink in one year. I find that at Kingston $30 was sufficient, although that institution has 600 convicts. I think when the hon. gentleman comes to overhaul the accounts of the Manitoba penitentiary he will find that there has been great laxity somewhere.

Mr. WATSON. There is no doubt that there is ground for complaint with regard to the management of this penitentiary as compared with other penitentiaries; and if we look at the items it must be apparent to every member that there is gross extravagance in connection with that institution. The heavy expenditures in connection with the Manitoba penitentiary are apparent when we consider those made for other penitentiaries. While the expenditure for rations is $69.33 per head in Manitoba it is only $46.20 in British Columbia, and yet rations can be purchased as cheap if not cheaper in Manitoba than British Columbia. Take the items as between Manitoba and British Columbia. Wardens and officers' quarters, Manitoba, average cost, $11.86; British Columbia, 17 cents; travelling expenses of inspector, Manitoba, $6.36; British Columbia, 4 cents; livery and feed Manitoba, $4.41; British Columbia, nothing. The quantity of fuel consumed in Manitoba penitentiary is something enormous; coal 486 tons, costing $3,251; wood, 2,117 cords, costing $7,582. These are very extravagant items. Then there is also the warden's salary of $2,000, which is all right, but there is also the warden's storekeeper and accountant. I do not know who he is, for his name is not mentioned, possibly it may be Mr. Bedson himself.

Mr. THOMPSON. The name is McGowan.

Mr. WATSON. I supposed that, perhaps, Mr. Bedson might keep his own accounts, judging from the way in which they are kept. In the tailoring department there is a tailor and an instructor of tailoring. Is it necessary to have an instructor of tailoring when a tailor is employed?

Mr. THOMPSON. The only tailor now employed is now engaged in instructing the convicts in tailoring.

Mr. WATSON. Then as to the cost of living. We explain to people coming to Manitoba that it is a cheap country to live in. But the cost of maintenance at the Manitoba penitentiary increased from $1.31 per day per convict in 1884-85 to $1.43 in 1885-86 and $1.53 in 1886-87. I submit that these figures should be reversed, because the cost of living is cheaper now than it was in 1885. I especially desire that some explanation should be given with respect to the travelling expenses.

Mr. THOMPSON. The expenses of the inspector are those paid to the inspector of penitentiaries who goes from Ottawa to make the inspection, and they have no relation to the expenses of the prison itself. The reason why they are so much larger for Manitoba as compared with British Columbia, is that the New Westminster penitentiary is so far away that it is very rarely visited from Ottawa, I think only once within three or four years. The hon. gentleman knows better than I do the exposed situation of Manitoba penitentiary and the difficulty experienced in heating it. The building is, I think, very ill-designed for the prairies. Under the old system by which allowances were made to wardens and other officials, these have all been discontinued since last July.

Mr. TROW. I should imagine that the cost of living in Manitoba would be much cheaper than that of any other penitentiary in the Dominion, for the simple reason that they have an almost unlimited extent of land. The institution raises its own root crops, onions, beets, potatoes and so forth, and it must have at least ten acres under cultivation, this being land of inexhaustible fertility which is cultivated by prison labor. The expense, consequently, should not be so large as in other penitentiaries where there are not such advantages.

Mr. THOMPSON. We pay two cents per pound more for beef for the Manitoba penitentiary than for any other.

Mr. WATSON. What do you pay?

Mr. THOMPSON. 8 cents per pound.

Mr. WELSH. I find that 85 prisoners in Manitoba penitentiary cost about the same amount as 143 in Dorchester penitentiary.

Mr. THOMPSON. Because the prices are so much higher.

Mr. COOK. There are two barrels of apples for Manitoba at $11, which is a pretty high price. Had the duty anything to do with the price? There is one item that I do not think is sufficiently high, and it is that for bibles and books; I am afraid the Government are neglecting the convicts in that respect. They should pay a little more attention to church matters there and give the convicts a little less beef, and their morals will be improved thereby.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is it the intention of the Government to continue the $400 for extra cost of living for the warden in Manitoba penitentiary? Mr. Bedson receives $2,000 a year, and last year he received $400 for extra living.

Mr. THOMPSON. There is no allowance for extra living granted to any prison official. The salary is fixed by law; the minimum salary of the warden is $2,000 and he goes by increases to $2,400. The extra allowance to which the hon. gentleman refers was made in this connection: when the large influx of prisoners incurred in consequence of the rebellion the warden was required to vacate his quarters and remove his family to Winnipeg. One member of his family was very seriously ill and the illness resulted in death, and an allowance was made in consequence of his extra expenses. In order to save expense the inspector was ordered to go on one or two occasions to the Regina and Prince Albert jails.

Mr. WATSON. Has he any consideration for that outside his salary.

Mr. THOMPSON. Not except travelling expenses.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I would like the Minister to explain the item of sugar. I find there are 5,551 pounds, costing nearly 7 cents a pound. I also find there are 100 pounds of "Paris lump." Would he explain why this "Paris lump" was used.

Mr. THOMPSON. I cannot explain that just now. I find the contract is 10 cents a pound for sugar and the estimate for the coming year is 2,500 pounds.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). That would be only about half the amount that is down here.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is not 10 cents a pound an extraordinary high price to be paid for sugar to be supplied to a prison?

Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. THOMPSON. I can only explain what the hon. gentleman asks about this sugar by saying that under the former system on which those accounts are based, rations were allowed to the warden and deputy warden. I suppose the supply was for them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I must have misunderstood the hon. gentleman if he says that sugar of a sufficiently good quality for penitentiaries cannot be obtained in Winnipeg less than 10 cents a pound.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is the statement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister of Customs can tell us something about this article. It can hardly be 10 cents a pound.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is the cost of transportation. We pay 12 cents in British Columbia.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That should only cause a fractional difference between the price in Winnipeg and the price in Toronto and Montreal. The cost of transportation even on the Canadian Pacific Railway cannot be so material as to involve such a considerable difference in price.

Mr. WATSON. We can buy granulated sugar in Winnipeg for 8½ cents per pound.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would be very happy to give a contract at that price.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). You bought the Paris lump sugar at 10 cents per pound.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is the brown sugar we are estimating for now.

Mr. McMULLEN. In connection with the Manitoba penitentiary I think there is evidence that its expenses requires the careful attention of the Minister. I have no desire in the world to find unnecessary fault, but I have made a calculation which shows that there is something wrong with the Manitoba penitentiary. In Kingston there are 572 inmates at a cost of $187.10 each for all expenses during the year; in Dorchester there are 143 at a cost of $298.90 for all expenses, and in Manitoba there are 85 at a cost per capita, for officers and all expenses of $558.80, or very nearly $600 an inmate. In British Columbia there are 95 and they cost only $368.14 each. Now we find that for the feeding alone of those inmates, in Dorchester they cost $66.80 each; in Manitoba $111.25 each, and in British Columbia, where I think certainly food should be quite as dear as Manitoba, they only cost $108.30 each. In the central prison in Toronto they only cost 55 cents per head, per day, while in Manitoba they cost $1.53, and in Dorchester 81 cents, in which the inmates are equal in number to the Guelph central prison. When you come to Manitoba the charges there are enormous, and I think the Minister should have a full investigation of all items of expenditure in connection with that penitentiary and see that they are reduced to something within reasonable limits.

Mr. COOK. I suppose they keep horses there. I see one charge for a buggy at $200. Is it for the purchase of a buggy?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. COOK. I see items for livery and horse feed, $243, and horse hire $24. If they have horses what is the necessity for hiring horses?

Mr. THOMPSON. The livery was for the surgeon.

Mr. COOK. There is a very large item of $321.60 for telegrams.

Mr. THOMPSON. Telegraphing is expensive there.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I think you will find there are separate items in reference to the surgeon's livery, and it appears in the officers department there is another charge for livery and feed. It must have been for some of the other officers.

Mr. THOMPSON. Probably for both, I will enquire about that.

British Columbia penitentiary,.....$43,827 85

Mr. THOMPSON. There is an increase of $1,530 in the salaries. The increase is to give the warden the minimum salary provided by the statute, which is $2,000. There is an increase also in the salary of deputy warden on account of the special duties that he has to perform. In addition to his duties as deputy warden and chief keeper, which of course may well be discharged by the deputy there, he has qualifications as a farmer. He has been successful in bringing a large area under cultivation, and he attends to the duties of the farm, thus saving the expense we have to incur elsewhere for the employment of a farmer. He does it very successfully indeed, and we thought under those circumstances he should get an increase of $100. The warden has asked to have a carpenter instructor and a baker appointed, and that has been recommended by the inspector. I need not tell the committee that it is very useful to have a carpenter instructor where so many convicts are employed either at practising or learning the trade; and it has been recommended as decidedly in the interest of economy that a baker should be employed instead of having the bread furnished by contract, as at present. The other increases are only statutory increases. In the maintenance there is a decrease of $3,323.40, on account of a smaller estimated prison population than last year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How is that?

Mr. THOMPSON. The fact is that we have had for two or three years past an abnormally large number of convicts, principally in consequence of the kind of population that was left stranded in the country after the completion of the railway works; but the influx of prisoners to the penitentiary has since been much less. There is a small decrease in the working expenses.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not see that there is much ground of complaint there; but if the hon. gentleman will look at the Auditor General's report of 1886-87, he will see that the complaints which have been made regarding the Manitoba penitentiary are amply justified. If you take the item of meat, you will find that in Manitoba, including the guards, there will be about the same number of persons as in the British Columbia penitentiary, and yet they consume four times the quantity of meat that was consumed in British Columbia. It does look as if that required a considerable overhauling.

Mr. THOMPSON. There is no doubt that that ought to have careful enquiry. I may say that a very diligent accountant has been appointed in the Manitoba penitentiary; he was formerly employed in the Dorehester penitentiary, and I have every confidence in any accounts that pass under his hands. He was appointed about two years ago.

Regina Jail.....$13,000

Mr. THOMPSON. We have at present merely organised the staff in anticipation of the wants of the prison. I estimate that we shall require two more guards when, as we expect about the 1st July, we shall take the prisoners who are confined in the police barracks throughout the North-West and transfer them, as far as we can accommodate them, to the Regina jail. We have not had any prisoners there heretofore.

42-1888-4

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What kind of an arrangement is likely to be made with respect to all the jails throughout the North-West? The Dominion will have to support the penitentiaries, but does the hon. gentleman contemplate the establishment of several ordinary jails throughout the new North-West Territory, because it will be a tolerably expensive business.

Mr. THOMPSON. We must do so, because we have to look after the administration of justice there, which devolves on the Provincial Governments elsewhere, and I have asked the hon. Minister of Public Works to provide on an economical scale for several jails and lockups in the North-West. The fact is, we make an allowance to the Mounted Police for keeping prisoners in the guardrooms and cells in their barracks, which are in most cases unsuitable places for keeping convicts. At present the only prisons erected are at Regina and Prince Albert, and this is the only one yet occupied.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Do I understand that you are making provision to keep lunatics at this jail permanently?

Mr. THOMPSON. No, the lunatics are confined in the asylum at Selkirk, and an allowance is made by the Provincial Government for their support. The Selkirk asylum is full, and at present, I am sorry to say, there are lunatics confined in the police barracks of necessity; but I made arrangements with my late colleague, the Minister of the Interior, a month or two ago, for the removal of all those to the Manitoba penitentiary, where they can be better cared for.

Salaries, House of Commons$66,650

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here is a considerable increase.

Mr. SPEAKER. The increase $2,100 under this head is made up as follows: Thirty clerks are entitled to the annual statutory increase of $50, making $1,500. For years past it has been found necessary to have one of the messengers attached to the stationery office to attend to the supplying of stationery to the members, and holding copy in proof-reading, which is done in that department. The person so employed became necessary to the office, and therefore, instead of having his time divided between the messengers' room, and the stationery office, it was deemed advisable to attach him to the stationery office as a junior clerk. The change has been found to work well, as attending at the counter and proof-reading can be proceeded with at the same time. His salary is $600, being only $10 more than he had before.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This item embraces sessional clerks. How many are there?

Mr. SPEAKER. I am quite sure we will not exceed the usual vote for that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is a great curiosity on the part of many young members like myself to know what the duties of those sessional clerks are.

Mr. SPEAKER. Their duties are varied. Of course, they cannot always be employed, but sometimes they have all the work they can do. The custom has been followed by many members employing them on their own account when they are not working for the House. They employ them as private secretaries, and I think that on the whole they are useful to the House and very often to the members. When asked to copy something, they are always ready.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If hon. members employ them, it is at their own expense.

Mr. SPEAKER. They can employ them on public business, for instance copying electoral lists. They are also employed in some of the departments when required.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then a member of the House can have any official work of that kind done by one of these clerks?

Mr. SPEAKER. Certainly; the moment the application is made to the Clerk of the House, these clerks are supplied to do any work that can be called public business.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Do I understand the Speaker to say that he does not know the number?

Mr. SPEAKER. The number is not greater than in other Sessions.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). In 1886 you had about 37.

Mr. SPEAKER. To-day I should say we have not more than 20 or 28.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As Mr. Speaker has kindly imparted to us this information, it might be interesting to know how he distributes these clerks when wanted by various gentlemen in the House. If available, they should be available in due proportion. We should have them appointed in the same fashion as we appoint commissioners. A certain section should be attached to the service of hon. gentlemen on your right, and a certain section on your left. I am a pretty old member, having been in office a good many years, and I have never obtained any advantage or assistance from the gentlemen of the sessional clerk department. If Mr. Speaker will see that the division be made proportionately, I suppose my hon. friends will not say much about it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I had pretty nearly forgotten there is one right side and one left side. I do not attend to these details, but I understand from the clerk of the House that any member who applies to him for the assistance of a sessional clerk for doing his work, when that work may be called public business, a clerk is always supplied to him. I am quite sure that if the hon. gentleman would see his friend, Mr. Bourinot, he would have any number of clerks he wanted.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is information to every hon. gentleman on this side. There are 30 or 40 of those clerks now. At one time there were 110.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. In 1878.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It would be a great convenience to have these clerks; but if we are to have gentlemen waiting, we should have the privilege of appointing those who are to serve us. Sometimes those public documents are of a confidential nature, and there would be an advantage in having clerks in whom one might have perfect confidence when giving them such documents to copy. It has so happened, so far in the distribution of those clerks, that, although we do a very fair proportion of public business on this side, not one of these blessings has ever fallen to us.

Mr. SPEAKER. You did not care much for them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker has never given us an opportunity of letting him know how much we would appreciate advantages of this sort.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Just try it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am inclined to think that if we were to make the trial, we would find they are always engaged to the full extent of their powers by hon. gentlemen opposite. A few years ago, I know we had a number of these gentlemen, and they sat in the galleries, and were correspondent of newspapers supporting hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. There were a few not exactly of that class. I think Mr. King Dodds was one who was appointed an extra sessional clerk one Friday, and on the following Monday he left, but his appointment was antedated forty days, he drew $160, and he was allowed to return home in order to engage in an election canvass. That is the way in which he performed his duties. Then, another gentleman made a representation to a member for the city of Ottawa, but his services were not required immediately, for the reason, I believe, that they could not find a room to put him in, so that he might be out of the way; but the member representing this city received a letter from him at the end of the Session thanking him for the appointment and stating that he had received his money all right, though he had not been required to come to the House at all. I hope Mr. Speaker has not any of that class at this time. I hope the present clerks are all actively and earnestly engaged in discharging those duties which the hon. gentlemen on the other side find so extremely convenient and so necessary in the public interest; but it does so happen that not one of those sessional clerks has ever been placed at the service of any hon. gentleman on this side of the House. I must say that I never supposed it was any part of their duty to write the addresses on parliamentary literature which hon. gentlemen were sending to their constituents. On this side of the House, when hon. gentlemen have had anything of that kind to do, I believe they have been obliged to pay for it out of their own pockets; but, on that side of the House, thanks to the generosity of the Ministry and to the large sums in the public treasury, hon. gentlemen are not put to any inconvenience of that sort, and those gentlemen find that it is highly convenient to have these clerks engaged as their private secretaries—for that is what it amounts to—and paid out of the public treasury. The Minister of Finance has for some time been engaged, I think, in trying to cut down the public expenses. The hon. gentleman will see that here is an opportunity. Every little counts in this matter, and, as the hon. gentleman is, as we on this side are, a friend of unrestricted reciprocity with the neighboring Republic and anxious to extend our trade relations with that country, and is desirous to economize in order to bring this about, it is highly proper that he should see that this element of public waste comes to an end. It seems to me, if we are to accept the statement of Mr. Speaker, if he is not mistaken—and I apprehend he is not mistaken, as to what these men are engaged in doing—we have been paying out of the public treasury the salaries of parties who are simply the private secretaries of hon. gentlemen on that side of the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think it can be properly inferred from what I have stated that these clerks are only employed in assisting the members on this side of the House. I said we were obliged to keep a larger staff than we otherwise would because at times business is so pressing and there is so much work for them to do that we have to keep a large number of them so that the work on hand can be done at once. When they have leisure, I do not see why these sessional clerks should not be employed profitably in the public interest by members who might want them, but, if they are so employed, it might be considered as a favor. The clerk of the House has always allowed that. I do not think he has done it only for members on this side of the House, but I think he has done it equally for members sitting on the other side. Still, it is only when these men are at leisure, when they are not employed in the work of the House, that they are disposed of in that way, and I think the argument of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is not fair in this sense, that it does not prove that it is not a necessity to have these sessional clerks on hand when they are required. Hon. members might say the same thing in regard to a great many of the employés of this House. Most of them are only employed for three or four months, for the time of the Session. Is that a reason why their services should be dispensed with, because the whole work might be done in the twelve months of the year by a smaller staff? The work has to be done during the Session, and, if these officers have leisure after the Session, that is no reason for dismissing them. The same reasoning applies to the sessional clerks, and, when they have nothing else to do, we have to utilise them in some way, and we have to keep them on hand because they may be required at any moment in order that the work of the House may be done with expedition and with celerity, so that the work of the House may not be impeded. I do not think it would be fair that we should infer from what I have said that these sessional clerks are paid uselessly or that their time is wasted.

Mr. HESSON. I must entirely repudiate the statement of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are utilising the services of the sessional clerks. I have been a member of this House for seven years, and I have never asked any sessional clerk for five minutes of his time. I think there are many on this side of the House who can say the same as I do. Can hon. gentlemen on the other side say as much? I know that there is one gentleman who has had 7,000 pamphlets or speeches sent out in a very short period, and I do not think that he addressed all the envelopes himself. If sessional clerks were at his disposal, if he asked the Clerk of the House to allow him to obtain their services, no doubt if they had leisure he would have obtained their services.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. HESSON. I utterly repudiate—

An hon. MEMBER. Name the man who sent out 7,000 speeches.

Mr. HESSON. Will the hon. gentleman have patience? I repudiate the statement of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that it is customary for members on this side of the House—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is not my statement; it is the Speaker's statement.

Mr. HESSON. The Speaker did not make that statement, that these clerks were only at the disposal of members on this side of the House. He stated the contrary. He said that, if hon. gentlemen asked for their services, the Clerk would give them to hon. gentlemen opposite. I have nothing more to say on this subject, but I do not want to have the accusation hurled at me that we use the services of these gentlemen. Probably we have more work to do than hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I know that I have a great deal of work to do, and I am willing to do it, and I do not ask for any favor from the Government or from any Government employés. I believe it is necessary, as a great deal of work has to be done sometimes in this House, to have men employed to do that work; and, when they have too much leisure, it is well that they should be employed in other ways. I do not think it is fair to assume that they are only available for the services of gentlemen on this side of the House, when hon. gentlemen opposite are well aware of the fact that if they want the services of these men they can have them. For myself, I have never had one of them employed for five minutes, and I presume there are other gentlemen on this side of the House who can say the same thing.

Mr. FISHER. The hon. member who has just sat down says that the Speaker did not say that these gentlemen were employed only for the service of members on that side of the House. I did not understand the Speaker to say that, but the Speaker did say that these gentlemen were at the services of members on both sides of the House. As a matter of fact we know that in the past members on this side of the House not only have not employed, but were not even aware that they could employ these clerks, and as a matter of fact, members on this side have not employed them. In the past, hon. members opposite have had the full advantage of the services of these gentlemen; but in the future, I suppose that hon. gentlemen on this side will avail themselves of the services of these employés. But there is another point to which I wish to allude. How are these men paid?

Mr. SPEAKER. By the day.

Mr. FISHER. I would like to ask whether, when they are absent from the city of Ottawa, their pay goes on, or whether their time is docked whenever they are absent from the city? I have known some of these gentlemen who are most of the Session away from Ottawa, but I have understood that they collected their full pay for every day of the Session. I do not know whether all the employés of the House are in the same position and are paid in the same way; but I have, myself, within the past three days, seen an employé of this House down at Bedford in the county of Missisquoi who was present on a platform at the nomination of candidates in a local election, and that gentleman was not present in Ottawa doing his duty as an employé of this House from Friday of one week until Monday evening of the next week. An hon. gentleman near me asks me whether he was working for the Tory candidate. I did not speak to him, but I know he was there, and I would like to know from the Speaker whether this gentleman is allowed to draw his pay at so much per day, even though he may be absent from his duty and away in the country, apparently doing work in an election campaign.

Mr. MADILL. I would suggest that hon. gentlemen opposite appoint our Ministers.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am not aware that permission has been given to any sessional clerk to do this: such a thing is not allowed. He is not entitled to his pay if he has been absent during a working day, and if he is absent without leave, he ought to be reported.

Mr. FISHER. What are working days?

Mr. SPEAKER. I suppose the days on which the House sits. On Saturday after one o'clock I suppose every clerk is at liberty to go away, like all other civil servants.

Mr. FISHER. I would like to ask Mr. Speaker what he calls working days?

Mr. SPEAKER. Every day of the week, except Saturday afternoon.

Mr. FISHER. I understand, then, that these men's services extend during the ordinary hours that civil servants work, or during the session of the House?

Mr. SPEAKER. Sessional clerks must be on hand during the sittings of the House. When we adjourn at two or three o'clock, sometimes, they have to remain here until four or five in order to get everything ready for the members next morning. It depends entirely upon the kind of work they have to do.

Mr. FISHER. Then I understand that if these gentlemen are away for a part of the time during which the House is sitting, and during which they are supposed to be here, they ought to be docked their pay for that time.

Mr. SPEAKER. Well, if they were absent half a day, I suppose they would not be docked half a day's pay.

Mr. LAURIER. There is more than that in the question of my hon. friend. If an employé of this House goes and takes part in an election, even while the House is not sitting, surely the Speaker will not permit that, and he would see that such an employé was called to a better sense of his duty. This has been a common practice in the past, but in the future I hope it will not be tolerated. No one, I am sure, can countenance any officer of this House going to take part in an election such as the officer which the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) has just mentioned.

Mr. SPEAKER. As the hon. member says, I do not think we ought to countenance clerks or other employés of this House taking an active part in elections. Of course they have their right to vote, but I should say at once that they have no right to take such a part in elections as to make themselves obnoxious in any way, either to the public or to members of the House. That rule should be followed strictly. I suppose the election to which the hon. member has referred is a provincial election.

Mr. FISHER. Certainly.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have not decided what should be done in that case, but I should say that if a clerk was on the hustings where a member of this House was present, and if he did not conduct himself like a gentleman towards a member of the House, of which he is a servant, he should be dismissed at once. But I do not think that we can go so far as to say that officers of this House cannot mingle in provincial elections, or in municipal elections. They have their rights, and they can enjoy them as well as any other citizen, but they should not engage actively in elections. But as I said before, I have not decided the point. No complaint has been made to me yet in reference to officers of this House taking part in provincial elections.

Mr. LAURIER. I would not like to make a complaint that would involve the dismissal of an officer of this House, but I call the attention of the Speaker to a fact that has come under my notice, not with a view of procuring the dismissal of the offender, but with the view of preventing a practice which seems to me most objectionable. Mr. Speaker says that he is not disposed to say at present whether an officer of this House should be allowed to take part in a local election. I have no hesitation in saying that he should not be allowed to do such a thing. It is my opinion, and I think it is the opinion of the majority of this House, that no officer should be allowed to leave his business at Ottawa while he is a servant of the House, and go and take part in any election whatever. If there is a municipal election here in Ottawa, or a provincial election, or a federal election, let him go and register his vote; but that he should leave the city here, leave his work, and go and engage in any electoral campaign whatever, ought not to be allowed. But this has taken place recently, I will not even mention the name; I do not want the officer to be dismissed; but I mention the fact in order to prevent a vicious practice which has been growing up.

Mr. FISHER. I would go a little further and say that if an employé of this House has a vote in any constituency where an election is going on, it would be perfectly competent for him to ask permission to leave his work here and go and cast his vote. I would not object to that at all, provided he were a voter in the constituency, and provided he obtained his leave of absence, and ceased drawing his pay while he was away. I do object most emphatically to employés going away apparently without the knowledge of their chiefs and taking part in elections in which they have no interest beyond their party interest, because I may state for the information of Mr. Speaker that this gentleman has no vote in Missisquoi and does not live there. I am not going to give his name, because I do not wish him to be dismissed on this charge or to be reprimanded, but I desire that such conduct should be put an end to in the future. I am told, although I cannot state it from personal knowledge, that this gentleman made remarks against the integrity of the hon. gentleman who sits in front of me, remarks most objectionable to that gentleman and his followers who heard those remarks. At the same time I do not wish to make any charge or to have him dismissed in consequence of his action. I do not think this is desirable, because the Government have not chosen to issue an order that employés should not do that work, but I hold that an order should be issued by Mr. Speaker directing that employés shall not meddle in political matters during the time they are employed by this House and paid by it.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The rule of the House with regard to extra sessional clerks is that no one is entitled to receive pay except for the period of time he is here. The only thing that justifies Mr. Speaker in appointing an extra sessional clerk is the urgency of public business. If as a sessional clerk he is employed in order to perform certain work he is supposed to be here; he has no right to leave here for any purpose whatever, and I think it would be extremely improper for such a clerk to obtain leave for the purpose of voting in any particular constituency. We know what the result would be. There would be such a paucity of public business he would not be required here, if he were on the right side of politics; but if he happened to be on the other side public urgency would prevent his being absent. Then the practical way is that if he wishes to exercise his franchise he ought not to engage in the public service, but if he is engaged here as an extra sessional clerk then he should remain here to discharge his duties. When my hon. friend says he will not give the name of the party lest that might lead to his dismissal, I do not think there is the slightest danger. I dare say hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches may have sent this party into Missisquoi to engage in the canvass.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman cannot suppose such a thing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The innocents are not abroad, the innocents are at home.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, I see them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Only the other parties are sent abroad. Mr. O'Donohue, a clerk in one of the departments, is away canvassing. Several hon. gentlemen have met him in Russell.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I hope they have made his acquaintance.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has made his acquaintance.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I know him very well.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Sometimes he has enjoyed the confidence of the hon. gentleman, and at other times there seems to be a serious misunderstanding between Mr. O'Donohue and his distinguished friend who leads the House. The hon. gentleman knows that the high estimation in which he holds Mr. O'Donohue, is not always reciprocated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, but he has found out differently.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is wonderful what influence money from the public treasury has on even a man with such a cynical disposition as Mr. O'Donohue. If he had broad and generous views he would not suspect anything but the most lofty and pure sentiments on the part of the First Minister. But Mr. O'Donohue has entertained different views in regard to the right hon. gentleman.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps even the hon. gentleman has thought the same way of me, but he has changed his mind.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not always express my thoughts; but if I were to make a frank confession to the right hon. gentleman I would say that I have not the utmost confidence in him even at this moment. I am inclined to think, notwithstanding all the good intentions and good resolutions the right hon. gentleman has made, after all his efforts to start in a new path, it has become so much a matter of habit with him that notwithstanding these good intentions the hon. gentleman when he would do good evil is present. But it is not the hon. gentleman who does it but the sin that dwelleth in him. No doubt the hon. gentleman has a large number of these people engaged outside. The truth is that the public interest suffers by it either by the appointment of a larger number than is necessary in order that there may be individuals detailed from the service, or it suffers by a large number of those officers being away from their post of duty. I think Mr. Speaker has enunciated sound principles with regard to this matter, and I hope he will act on them, and that he will see that the extra sessional clerks absent from duty and engaged in political canvassing will not be paid out of the public treasury. It is all very well to come down handsomely in election contests.

Some hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear." Hon. gentlemen opposite always do come down handsomely in election contests; but, unfortunately, they come down by putting their hands into the public treasury instead of putting their hands into their own pockets. That is the difficulty. Hon. gentlemen know there are some gentlemen on the Treasury benches who have got into difficulty from not distinguishing between what belongs to the public and what does not. I say that because they may have gone wrong occasionally, that is no reason why every clerk should be trained to go wrong in precisely the same way. Hon. gentlemen who say "hear, hear," know pretty well that they have themselves been, perhaps, rather generously aided in election contests in this way, and it may have been all very well in the past, but we hope—we are a progressive people and the hon. gentleman claims to represent a progressive party—they will initiate a better state of things which will be entered upon at an early period. If they do that we shall have less ground for complaint, and we shall not have these clerks employed by Mr. Speaker and the House, and paid out of the public treasury, sent out to canvass for and aid Tory candidates in the county of Russell or elsewhere instead of being here at the post of duty.

Mr. LABELLE. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) has made an assertion that one of the extra clerks has been on the hustings and has made disparaging remarks respecting the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier). I hope he will give the clerk's name, because he richly deserves to be put out of his employment if he has done so. The hon. gentleman knows the attitude I have taken in the Tremblay case, and, if the hon. gentleman makes the charge, that clerk does not deserve to be an employé of the House. I hope the hon. gentleman will make a complaint if not in the House at least to Mr. Speaker, and I shall be one of the first to sustain Mr. Speaker in dismissing him from his employment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Whilst the hon. gentlemen opposite are making such serious charges against the Administration for employing the servants of this House in connection with the election campaigns it would be perhaps well for the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to spare a little of that advice and to offer it to Mr. Mowatt, the purist of the Province of Ontario. I may say to the hon. gentleman that in the campaign I had the honor to wage against their candidate—in the election for Haldimand—I have met the officials of the Ontario Government in various portions of the riding engaged in working for the Reform candidate.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But you had Her Majesty's assistants.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have no doubt the argument of Her Majesty would have little effect on the mind of the hon. gentleman. For fear he would not rely on my word solely in making those charges against the servants of the Ontario Government, I hold the print of a letter written by Mr. Thomas Paxton, M.P.P., in 1872.

An hon. MEMBER. He is dead now.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, it is no crime for him to be dead. There are various others who might be dead to the greater benefit of the country. This letter is to Mr. A. P. Cockburn and reads in this way:

"Mr. D. M. Card is authorised to do some work for the Ontario Government in your part, wishing to make your acquaintance and get your advice. * * * * Mr. Card is a first-class man in an election contest. Of course I am aware he must be cautious what he was doing under the circumstances."

The public accounts of the next year show that Mr. Card was paid $3,504.28 out of the public funds of the Province of Ontario. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has said something with regard to the expenditure of public money, and though it may not be very relevant to the subject under discussion, yet as that discussion has taken rather a wide range I desire to call his attention for a moment to a matter circulated in the county of Kent at the present time, presumably in the interest of Mr. Campbell, the Reform candidate in that constituency. I saw it published in the papers to night and that is my authority for making the statement, but hon. gentlemen opposite know as to the fact, and if that circular is not now being circulated they will deny it. It is an extract from a paper and it says:

"GOOD NEWS FOR RALEIGH.

"THE ONTARIO GOVERNMENT RELIEVES THE TOWNSHIP OF $17,000 INDEBTEDNESS.

"On Thursday, the reeve, first deputy and Messrs. Morrison and Dolsen, a deputation appointed by the council of Raleigh, waited upon the Hon. C. F. Fraser, Commissioner of Public Works, at Toronto, to urge the remission of a portion of the indebtedness due the Government of Ontario on the Government drains, in order to enable the township to provide a sufficient outlet by deepening Jennet's creek, without increasing the burdens on the ratepayers. After a full discussion of the case, Mr. Fraser, on behalf of the Government, offered to throw off the last five payments, and reduce the interest on the debenture indebtedness of the township to four per cent. which reductions of principal and interest relieve the township of an indebtedness of at least $17,000. This grant reduces the cost of the drains from $64,000 to $48,000, leaving only some $9,000 to pay instead of $26,575—the amount heretofore due the Government. This generous act on the part of the Reform Government of Ontario will be appreciated by the ratepayers of Raleigh, who will thereby be enabled to improve the entire drainage system and provide a sufficient outlet for all the waters of the township without adding to their taxes. The electors of Raleigh know that the promises of a Reform Government are sincere and will be carried out to the very letter, and that a promise of the above nature is worth a thousand of the election promises of Henry Smyth and his friends. Mr. Smyth's insincere and absurd proposal to dredge Jennet's creek has often been used to assist him in entrapping innocent voters always doomed to disappointment. The promises of Mr. Campbell and his friends are not so numerous but they are always fulfilled."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is extremely desirable no doubt, that great economy should be exercised in all matters of the public service, and I notice in connection with the county which the hon. gentleman represents for the time being and perhaps not for very long a most remarkable instance of economy which he can compare with the liberality to which he has alluded as about to be exercised by the Ontario Government. I notice, Sir, that in that county there is a little town called Cayuga, with a population at last census of 790 people. I notice they had a net post office revenue after paying all expenses of $450, and I observe that a liberal and wise minded government have lately put in the estimates a sum of about $8,000 odd, to provide a post office for the town, which has a population of 790 souls and a net receipt for post office purposes of between $400 and $500. So, Sir, they will be able to pay the interest on the amount of expenditure for this post office, and have probably about $80 clear out of the annual income received from the post office in Cayuga. As the hon. gentleman is desirous of promoting economy here is an instance which must commend itself to this House. There are about 300 towns—I am not sure if there are not more—containing a population of 800 souls in the Province of Ontario and if the hon. gentlemen are desirous of promoting economy—they have only a deficit this year of $850,000 in the management of the post office this year—where there are such deserving citizens as the hon. member for Haldimand, there is a most admirable illustration of how you can save public money and promote economy. I have no doubt the Minister of Finance will expound to us, to-morrow evening I hope, the scrupulous care with which the finances of this Government are managed, and this I submit as one of the nice little illustrations of the mode in which—we will not say votes are influenced in the county of Haldimand—but one of the modes in which a deficit of nearly a million a year is made good in the Post Office Department.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I may say, Sir, in connection with that grant, that it is the first the county of Haldimand ever got from the public treasury. I have to say further, that when I was engaged in that contest my opponents were the strongest advocates for the erection of that public building. They claimed it was a necessity and a justice to the county, and the only argument they produced against me was that the Government would never build it. If it was not a correct expenditure why did the hon. gentleman allow it to pass last year?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because I had not the majority to stop it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No, but because he was afraid to influence the minds of the people against his candidate, and now when the hon. gentleman knows that Haldimand has gone from their grasp and that they never can redeem it, he is willing to vote against it. So far as his insinuation that I shall only be here for a short time is concerned, I may say that my hold on my people is not so flimsy, not so small nor not so slight as the hold of the hon. gentleman on the various constituencies which I shall not tax my mind to remember to-night. I have come here to represent the electors of Haldimand and I believe I have come here to stay as long, or longer, than the hon. gentleman did in his constituencies.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So long as the hon. gentleman is supplied with returning officers of the kind that elected him, and a sufficient number of ex-convicts, so long as he may find his way here and no longer.

Mr. MONTAGUE. So far as the returning officer is concerned against whom he is desirous to use the tongue of slander, so far as his present conduct is concerned, he is just as honorable a member of the community in Haldimand, as the hon. gentleman himself is in Kingston.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have no doubt whatever that he is a very fit associate for the hon. gentleman—not the slightest doubt at all, and also for the men who appointed a returning officer who would appoint such convicts.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to say a few words on this before it is carried. Hon. gentleman need not think that any of their insinuations or utterances will stop me from saying what I am going to say. If they attempt anything of that kind they will get enough of it before the Session.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

is over. I notice in the Auditor General's report that there are 16 officials who got an extra allowance of $50 each last year. I do not understand why 16 messengers were allowed a gratuity of $50 extra. I notice that one man, a sessional clerk, got $50 for clothing. I would like to know under what circumstances he got that.

Mr. SPEAKER. Some of the messengers got that gratuity on this ground: They are only paid like the other messengers, but some of them, for instance the doorkeeper of the Chamber, have to be provided with uniform, and being not better paid than the others, the hon. gentleman will understand that it would be unfair to them, and they would be really less paid than the others if they did not receive that gratuity at the end of the Session.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know if uniforms have been supplied to those at the outer doors, or only to one.

Mr. SPEAKER. There are five or six who are required to have special uniform, not more.

Mr. McMULLEN. I may say that there has been a complaint made that the French messengers got this allowance last year, and the others did not. I would like to know if there is any truth in the statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am not aware that there is any truth in the statement, and I am astounded that there is a complaint made that I would give anything to the French messengers that I would not give to the English messengers. In fact, I do not know their nationalities, and I would add that not more than one-fourth of the employés of this House belong to the French nationality.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would say that the complaint was made in my hearing by a messenger; and I am glad that the Speaker has been able to deny that there is any truth in it. I did not think myself that possibly there was, but when a complaint is made, it is just as well to know whether there is any partiality of that kind or not.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may say it is not my fault if Mr. Turgeon, who is chief messenger here, has received a gratuity. I do not know Mr. Hogg, whether he is English or French. Mr. Samson, who is at the door, was not placed here by me. There is old Mr. Laflamme, who has been employed in my department, I think, for forty years, and I think it would be pretty hard for me to dismiss him now because he is a Frenchman.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would just make another remark about a remark which was dropped by the hon. member for North Perth. He said there was one member of this side who sent out 7,000 pamphlets, and who employed the clerks to send them out, and I heard North Wellington mentioned. I would say that no sessional clerk has ever performed an hour's work for me without my paying for it, and they always professed to do what they did for me after hours. I noticed on several occasions that they were doing nothing, and fancying that they would be willing to earn a dollar, I, on one or two occasions, engaged them to address matters for me; but every single item they did for me I paid for out of my own pocket.

Mr. HESSON. I did not use the hon. gentleman's name in connection with that, but if the cap fits him, I presume he felt it more applicable to him than to anybody else.

Some hon. MEMBERS. You were asked the name.

Mr. HESSON. I am aware that I was asked the question, but I was not bound to give the name.

Mr. McMULLEN. I may just say that I have not sent out 2,000, let alone 7,000, and if the hon. gentleman had any reference to me, he is quite mistaken.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman got 7,000 envelopes.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is not true.

Salaries of officers of the Library..... $16,630 00

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask whether that includes the salary of the librarian at the Supreme Court.

Mr. HESSON. No, the librarian at the Supreme Court is a messenger of the Department of Justice.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He is an intelligent man, and I think his pay is a very small amount for one occupying that position.

Purchase of works on America for library..... $1,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What special works on America is this money devoted to?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A general collection of works on America.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to have this devoted to certain special lines so that it will not be all frittered away. It would be more valuable if directed to procure a certain class of works than if spent in an indiscriminate fashion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understand from the Librarian that this is to complete all our works, historical, geographical, and otherwise relating to the continent of America. Of course, we have a great many books on that subject, but there is a number wanting.

Preparing and reprinting the catalogue of the library of American history..... $2,500

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That has been recommended for two years by the Library Committee, and their report was adopted last year.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is this to be a yearly expenditure?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, it is only for this year.

Printing paper and book binding..... $80,000

Mr. MITCHELL. What does this include, and are tenders called for it?

Mr. BOWELL. The printing is done after public tender is had. The printing paper is furnished after tenders have been advertised for and specifications sent to the different manufacturers. My impression is that the lowest tenders were those of two manufacturers in Montreal for the two classes of paper. Mr. Rolland was one; I forget the name of the other.

The Committee rose and reported the resolutions.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What business will be done to-morrow?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I expect to proceed with the financial statement immediately after the House meets at 3 o'clock.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the Minister of Finance then be able to lay upon the Table the Supplementary Estimates for the ensuing year?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, I regret to say that I will not be able to lay on the Table the Supplementary Estimates for the ensuing year.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.15 a.m. (Friday).

Printed by McLEAN, ROGER & Co., Parliamentary Printers, Wellington Street, Ottawa.

House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Friday, April 27, 1888.

No. 43.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 27th April, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORTS ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That the time for the reception of reports from Committees on Private Bills be extended until Wednesday, the 9th May next.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 107) respecting the York Farmers' Colonization Company (from the Senate).—(Mr. McCulla)

Bill (No. 114) amending the different Acts relative to the Board of Trade of the City of Toronto (from the Senate).—(Mr. Small)

THE HARBOR OF MONTREAL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the House, on Monday next, resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide:

(a) That the Government of the Dominion of Canada may release and discharge the Corporation of the Harbor Commissioners of Montreal from all liability to repay to the said Government the whole or any part of the advances made to the said Corporation to enable them to widen and deepen the channel in Lake St. Peter and the River St. Lawrence, from Montreal to Quebec, or any interest thereon, beyond the amount of interest already paid by them to the Government (it being understood that no portion of the amount heretofore paid for interest is to be refunded);

(b) That the Government may pay to the said Corporation of the Harbor Commissioners of Montreal a sum not exceeding the sum of $37,405, which they represent as being the excess of their expenditure (apart from the expenditure on capital account), over their net revenue during the calendar year 1887;

(c) That the Government may, in addition to the said payment last mentioned, expend, through the medium of the said Corporation or otherwise, in the work of completing the said channel, the amount now remaining unexpended of the sums authorized by any Act heretofore passed to be advanced to the said Harbour Commissioners of Montreal for the purpose of completing the said channel;

(d) That no tonnage dues shall be hereafter levied on, or collected from, any sailing vessel or steamer at the port of Montreal;

(e) That the dredging plant and appliances heretofore used by the said Harbor Commissioners, in connection with the said channel works, shall hereafter belong to the Government of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

43—1888—1

THE HARBOR OF QUEBEC.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the House, on Monday next, resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide:

(a) That the Graving Dock built at Lévis, opposite Quebec, shall become a public work of the Dominion of Canada, under the control of the Minister of Public Works of Canada, and administered by him, and the Corporation of the Quebec Harbor Commissioners shall cease to have any control over it, and all powers, privileges and authorities in them vested shall cease and the same shall thenceforward be vested in the Government of the Dominion of Canada.

(b) That the Corporation of the Quebec Harbor Commissioners shall be released and discharged from any obligation to repay to the Government of Canada the whole or any part of the advances made to them by the said Government for the purpose of constructing the said Graving Dock, and from any obligation to pay to the said Government any sums of money to provide for the payment of interest thereon, or for the formation of a sinking fund in connection therewith.

(c) That out of the bonds of the Corporation of the Quebec Harbor Commissioners now held by the Minister of Finance and Receiver General to cover advances made to the said Corporation of the Quebec Harbor Commissioners by the Government of Canada to meet payments on account of improvements in the Harbor of Quebec and in connection with the wet or tidal dock at the mouth of the River St. Charles, there shall be returned to the said Corporation of the Quebec Harbor Commissioners such amount of bonds as shall be equal in par value to the amount which has been paid out of capital by the said Corporation of the Quebec Harbor Commissioners to the said Government for interest and sinking fund on the bonds so deposited as aforesaid with the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, and the said Corporation of the Quebec Harbor Commissioners shall thenceforth be released from any obligation in connection with the bonds so to be returned as aforesaid and the advances represented thereby.

(d) That from and after the first day of January, 1888, the rate of interest to be paid on all the bonds so deposited as aforesaid, and on all bonds thereafter deposited to cover further advances for the same purpose, shall be 4 per cent. per annum without sinking fund, and that all of the said bonds remaining in the hands of the Receiver General, after deducting the amount to be returned as above provided, shall be replaced with bonds of the said Corporation of the Quebec Harbor Commissioners for the same par value, in such form as he may approve, bearing interest at 4 per cent. per annum without sinking fund: Provided always, that all amounts actually paid to the Government by the said Corporation of the Quebec Harbor Commissioners for sinking fund on their said bonds shall be the property of the Government of Canada and form part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER, in moving that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty, said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to move that you do now leave the Chair for the purpose of going into Committee of Ways and Means, I must again ask the indulgence of the House from the fact that, owing to the circumstances connected with the administration of the affairs of the country, I have been under the necessity of being absent from Ottawa for a considerable period since the last Session. Although my department has been watched over during my absence, first in London and afterwards in Washington, by my colleague, the hon. the Minister of Customs, with his usual ability, yet this House will expect from me, as Finance Minister, the usual statement as to the financial condition of the country. With this brief preface, I will pass at once to the consideration of our condition in that respect. I will first give explanations as to the variations in the financial statements made in May last respecting the year expired 30th June, 1887, and then review the condition of affairs of the current fiscal year, and finally indicate to the House the position that the Government expect will transpire during the next financial year. Taking first the financial affairs for the year ended 30th June last, we estimated that the revenue received from all sources would amount to $35,300,600. In May last, when making the annual statement, I endeavored to deal with our expectations in as careful a manner as I could, and not to overestimate to any extent the probable revenue likely to be received. It is with pleasure that I remind the House that the total revenues for the year were $35,754,993, or an increase over the estimate of $454,993. The yield from Customs which we estimated would amount to $22,000,000 actually amounted to $22,378,800. This increase was no doubt mainly caused by the revenue of the following year being anticipated, owing to the changes made in the tariff. Before passing from this branch of the subject, I think it will be interesting to point out to the hon. members some of the features which might be termed the curiosities of Customs revenue. In the year ended 30th June, 1886, the amount of duty collected on coal and coke was $1,012,332. The revenue on these articles for the year 1887 amounted to $1,178,964, or an increase of over $100,000 over the preceding year, although 150,000 tons of anthracite coal were admitted free of duty in this latter year, a striking indication of the progress which Canada made during that year in manufactures. In the matter of luxuries such as fancy goods, there was an increase from $332,246 in 1886 to $608,776 in 1887. In silks and manufactures of silks there was an increase from $702,465 in 1886, to $860,335 in 1887; and whilst on these luxuries the revenue has increased it will no doubt be gratifying to the members of the House to find that in the year 1887, 1,207,284 gallons only of spirits and wine were imported against an importation of 1,400,690 gallons of the same commodity in the year before, and that the revenue therefrom in 1886 amounted to $1,941,601, whereas in 1887 the yield was only $1,700,076, showing conclusively that the temperate habits of the people are gaining ground. Let me add that this conclusion is borne out by the report of my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue. In 1887 the quantity of spirits taken for consumption was 2,864,935 gallons as against an average of 3,376,410 gallons for the two years preceding. I take the average of the two previous years, inasmuch as the quantity taken for consumption in the year 1885 was abnormally large owing to an anticipated increase of duty, and the figures for 1886 are smaller in consequence. The average of the two years is fair and just for comparison. The revenue from sugar of all kinds shows an increase in 1887 of over $800,000, the amount of duty collected thereon in 1886 being $2,303,397, and in 1887, $3,167,528; on wool the duties increased from $2,499,246 in 1886 to $3,176,741 in 1887. Coming to matters of Excise we estimated that the yield from this source would be about $6,000,000. As a matter of fact the yield was $6,308,201. This increase is accounted for by the fact that an exceptionally large quantity of spirits was entered prior to 1st July, 1887, when the provision of the Inland Revenue Act came into operation respecting the enforced warehousing of spirits for two years prior to sale.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does that $6,300,000 include simply the spirit and beer and tobacco duties under the head of Excise?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It includes all the excise duties, and the increase is due to the change that was made in the Excise Act, which requires spirits to be aged for two years before going into consumption, and which induced a very large amount to be taken out of excise previous to the end of the year. In miscellaneous items there was a slight decrease, but the Post Office showed an increased revenue of over \$100,000, and in Public Works, including Railways, there is an increase of about \$200,000. We estimated that the expenditure for the year would be \$35,600,000, leaving an estimated deficit of \$300,000. The actual expenditure for the year was very close to the estimate, being only an excess of \$57,860, and the estimated deficit of \$300,000 has been turned into a surplus of \$97,313. In view of the statements made last year the Government cannot, I think, be accused of laying an over-sanguine statement before the House when we compare the estimate with the final realizations. I now come to the probable result of the year 1887-88. Having explained to the House the result of the operations of the last fiscal year, I have now to ask their attention to the probable expectation of the present year. It will be recollected that in the last budget speech I stated that the total revenues expected to be realized for the fiscal year 1887-88, \$36,400,000, made up as follows: Customs, \$22,500,000; Excise, \$6,400,000; Miscellaneous, \$7,500,000. Taking first the Customs revenue, I may state to the House that during the year we have experienced a series of ups and down. It might have been thought likely about last Christmas that the revenue from Customs would not realise what was anticipated, and this might have been justified from the fact that, as has been before mentioned, the revenue from that source exceeded expectations in 1886-87 by about \$300,000, no doubt to a great extent owing, as before stated, to duties having been paid in advance of the alterations made in the tariff last Session. But after Christmas the revenue from Customs began to recover itself, and on the 10th March the amount received exceeded the amount received in the corresponding period of the previous fiscal year by \$100,000. Since 10th March the revenue from this source has again dropped, and I regret to inform the House that up to the latest returns, those to the 20th April, the yield from Customs, as compared with last year, has fallen off \$227,000. As the total revenue from this source in 1886-87 was \$22,378,000, I do not think it would be right to calculate on a greater revenue than \$22,000,000, although we may hope that the early spring may tend to the revival of business and that a possible increase of revenue may again be our portion during the latter part of the fiscal year. But I have mentioned before I do not think it would be advisable to calculate on a greater yield from Customs than \$22,000,000. The Commissioner of Inland Revenue has informed me within the last few days that the amount that will be received from Excise revenue will be slightly in excess of the \$6,450,000, and we may estimate from this source a revenue of \$6,450,000. The estimate of Miscellaneous Revenues has been revised by the officers of the Finance Department, and it is thought that from the various sources forming that revenue the amount likely to be received will be \$7,550,000. The total estimated revenue for the current fiscal year will therefore, we believe, be in the neighborhood of \$36,000,000. Coming to the expenditure side of the account it will be seen that Parliament during the last Session granted supply which with the statutory expenditure amounted to \$35,969,981.98. As hon. members are aware we have brought down estimates in addition thereto of \$1,112,000. These two sums would amount to \$37,082,000, and taking the usual savings into account in the estimates, and these last year amounted to \$100,000, I think it is very probable the expenditure will be in round numbers \$37,000,000; and I have already mentioned that the estimated receipts will be about \$36,000,000. It is but fair, however, that the House should take into account that in the year 1886-87, as I have informed the House in the financial statement I made last year I anticipated a deficit of \$300,000. In reality this has been turned into a surplus of over \$97,000; and it is but right to estimate that this sum of \$100,000 was paid in in anticipation of 1887-88. With respect to the probable result of this year I consider that this fact should be taken into account, and having due regard to economy in the expenditure, I trust that the accounts for the present and coming year, taken as a whole, will balance. I come now to what will probably be the results for the year 1888-89. I am inclined to think, from the general tendency of trade, that the merchants of Canada will be careful in the matter of importations, and that it is not likely that there will be any material increase in the amount of importations over those in the last and in the present fiscal year. To be within bounds I put down the Customs revenue likely to be received as \$22,500,000, being \$500,000 in excess of the estimates for the current year. I am informed by the officers of the Inland Revenue Department that, under the present condition of their revenue as compared with the last two years, they calculate that the Excise yield for 1888-89 may safely be placed at \$6,650,000. As regards Miscellaneous I have informed the House that the revenue estimated to be received from this source during the present fiscal year will be \$7,550,000. If we add to this sum the normal increase of revenue likely to be derived from the Post Office Department I think we can safely estimate that the revenue from miscellaneous sources during 1888-89 will reach \$7,750,000. I therefore put down the total revenue from all sources at \$36,900,000. Hon. members have had before them the Estimates for the Public Service for 1888-89; and as, owing to the new departure, many votes have already been taken into account and explanations given in regard thereto it will hardly be necessary to offer any very extended observations as to the variations in the estimated expenditure as compared with the Estimates asked for in supply last Session. The amount of the Estimates now laid before Parliament is \$35,421,440.22, but, as hon. members are fully aware, no sums have been placed in the Estimates for mail subsidies and steamship subventions. That question was laid aside in order that we might give more careful consideration to it than we could give before the main Estimates were brought down. There will, therefore, have to be added to the amount already brought down sums sufficient to cover these services, and further amounts will undoubtedly be asked from Parliament in the supplementary Estimates to complete the services of the year; but I believe that taking all these into account at the close of the year 1888-89, hon. members will find the statement I have made verified, that having regard to the results of the operations for the years 1887-88 and 1888-89 the balance for the two years will maintain an equilibrium. It is but right to mention some items in the expenditure likely to be incurred next year which show variations and which call for remarks. The interest on Public Debt shows an increase of \$116,000. This increase, as will be seen by reference to the Estimates, is chiefly made up by the amount \$63,000 required for the Savings Banks in consequence of the increased balances held by the depositors on the 31st December, 1887, and by the probable amount required to meet further indebtedness, \$250,000, less interest on loans maturing, in round numbers, \$200,000. We have also asked for an increase of \$68,000 in the investments for Sinking Funds, that amount being required to meet additional dividends requiring to be invested. The votes for Civil Government have already passed the House, and explanations have been already given of the increase of \$32,000 therein, and also of the increase of \$14,000 in the Administration of Justice. In Pensions and Superannuations there is an increase of \$21,000, largely made up of pensions to officers who have been retired owing to abolition of their offices, and to a great extent this increase is offset by savings in other branches in the service. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence will explain the increase in his services, mainly in the cavalry and infantry schools. In railways and canals (income) there is an increase of \$78,000, of which \$45,000 is for overhauling the foundation of the St. Ours lock and the balance is made up chiefly for expenditure on the Welland canal and the Trent River navigation. The Lighthouse service requires an additional expenditure of \$10,000; \$6,000 of this amount being for maintenance and repairs to lights and \$4,000 in the salaries and allowances of the lighthouse keepers. In Miscellaneous there is an increase of \$55,000 made up by the increased cost required for the government of the North-West Territories, the expenditures at the Banff Park, and the plant required for the Government printing office and bindery, explanations of which will be supplied in due course. The other large increase is \$290,000 in the service for Railways and Canals. This amount is made up by the \$300,000 required in the increased cost of repairs and working expenses of the Intercolonial railway. On the other hand the Immigration vote has been reduced by \$100,000, being the estimated saving in the general immigration expenses owing to the abolition of assisted passages and other causes. The £20,000 sterling (\$97,000), the contribution of Canada to the Imperial Institute having been paid, is of course dropped. The Public Works in the vote asked for shows a decrease of \$735,000, but I am afraid this vote will be supplemented to a certain extent. Generally, however, the Estimates have been framed with the full desire to add as little as possible to the expenditures of the country, and the Government have endeavored to ask for nothing more than sufficient to keep the Public Service in a state of efficiency consistent with economy. Having thus explained to the House to the best of my ability the probable outcome for the coming financial year, I will now, with the permission of the House, direct its attention for a few minutes to the Debt Account. By the monthly statements published in the Canada Gazette, which show fully the financial position of the country, it will be noticed that at the present moment we are in debt in England for temporary accommodation to the extent of £1,000,000. Since May last the country has experienced a certain amount of financial stringency, and one of the results has been that three banks have ceased to transact business. The past summer was one of unusual heat and drought in the Province of Ontario, and the harvest was not up to the average. The same cause has operated against the extensive lumber industry, and on account of the lowness of the water, timber which had been cut and which lay in the streams, could not be made marketable. This has caused a certain drain on the resources of the banks in order that the legitimate requirements of those engaged in the industry should be provided for. But against this we have occasion to be gratified by the splendid harvest in Manitoba and in the North-West. Still it must be borne in mind that we were going ahead rather too quickly. In our cities, and especially in Toronto, there has been a certain amount of speculation in real estate. In the end, I believe it will be found that the short crop in Ontario and these other attendant circumstances, will prove a blessing in disguise by the curtailment of importations. However, by the exercise of economy and prudence, Canada will soon recover from the present stringency; her trade is, I am satisfied, sound at the core, and will soon return to its normal condition. At the commencement of the fiscal year the Government, chiefly in deference to the banking community, lowered the limit of deposits in the Savings Banks, and fixed the amount to be received from any depositor to be \$300 in any one year, and \$1,000 in all. Originally, the Savings Bank deposits were unlimited; a reduction was then made to \$10,000, and afterwards this was again brought down to \$3,000; now the limit is, as I have said, \$1,000. The effect, however, on the Government Savings Bank deposits, has been that some of the larger deposits held by the Government have been withdrawn, and have gone to swell the general business of the country by transfers to the banks where enhanced rates of interest were offered. The deposits in the Post Office Savings Banks show an increase, and if we set one side against the other, the Savings Bank balances, since the 1st July last, are nearly stationary, that is to say, the deposits equaling the withdrawals. Still, the country is to be congratulated that the deposits have increased in a marked manner from the poorer classes, showing that labor is fully employed and adequately paid. To illustrate this I may state that the number of depositors in the Post Office Savings Bank on the 31st March last, were over 100,000, an increase of over 10,000 since the 30th June last, and the number of depositors in the other savings banks under the control of the Finance Department, increased from 56,000 to 57,000 in the same period. The stationary character of the Savings Bank balances is not to be put down to any withdrawal of capital from the country; these moneys have undoubtedly, for the reasons before stated, gone to the banks, and have been placed in other investments. The Government are of opinion that, by lowering the limit of deposit in the Savings Bank, the funds thus set loose, eased the strain on the banks throughout the country, and had the effect of mitigating the stringency. As a result, however, of the stationary character of these balances, the capital expenditure of the country, to a large extent, has had to be met out of the ordinary revenue, and the Government have been obliged to have recourse to the English market, and have borrowed to the extent already named. The million pounds sterling, which I have already stated, was borrowed in England, represented the amount that we anticipated to receive from our own depositors. It therefore became necessary, to complete the capital expenditure, as shown in the Estimates submitted to Parliament, and to pay the several subsidies to the various railways, as detailed in the Public Accounts, that further borrowing powers should be authorized, and a Loan Bill will be introduced hereafter, when it can be definitely ascertained how much the Government will have to place on the market. But I am glad to inform the House and the country that the Government have determined, for the present, with unimportant exceptions, to stop any further outlay on Capital Account beyond that to which the country is now committed. Having so far dwelt on the financial aspect of Canada, I would venture to detain the House by showing, to the best of my ability, how far the tariff changes of 1887 have affected the Canadian iron industry. It is well known to the House that at the outset much hostile criticism was provoked in England. No doubt this was because our position at that time was not clearly understood. But owing to the explanations made, and owing to a fuller consideration of the Canadian fiscal policy adopted since 1879, hostile criticism has been greatly modified, and generally speaking, that portion of the British press which deals with financial interests, now view in a friendly spirit our efforts to develop, on Canadian soil, the stores of mineral wealth within our borders. Of course, although much has been done, yet sufficient time has so far not elapsed to demonstrate fully the effects of the new tariff, the Act having virtually come into operation at the beginning of the present fiscal year, as the special provision for the admission of goods at the old rate of duty up to the 30th of June, was fully taken advantage of, and in many respects the requirements were to some extent, anticipated. It may be further mentioned that the amount of capital required for the production of iron from the ore, is so large, that great developments cannot be expected in a short space of time. As hon. members know, time is the essence of a bargain, and capital is cautious and very slow to move in new fields of enterprise. Confidence in the permanency of our fiscal policy is a further requisite before capital can be invested in the development of the large works required to build up the iron industries. And here I may state, to show how fully our neighbors are alive to the necessity of a permanent policy, that in the Mills Bill, now before Congress—that is, the Bill introduced into the House of Representatives by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and which embodies the policy of the Administration, and of the great Democratic party in that country—the iron and steel duties are touched with a sparing hand. And the same thing is to be observed with regard to the measure introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. Randall, whereby no material reduction in the duties on iron and steel is proposed. The course pursued in the revision of the tariff shows a fixed determination, on the part of our neighbors to the south, to continue an efficient measure of protection to that great industry. In the production of iron and steel the United States lead every country in the world, having obtained this position after 26 years of uninterrupted protection. The changes under either of the proposed Bills leave the iron and steel duties largely in excess of the present Canadian rates. Mr. Mills, under his Bill, estimates the reduction of duties on iron and steel at \$1,000,000, exclusive of \$5,706,433 duties received last year on tin plate, proposed to be transferred to the free list. Of this reduction of \$1,000,000, nearly \$350,000 is on steel rails, leaving \$700,000 for other articles. Separating tin plate and steel rails from the other iron imports, we find the imports of “iron and steel and their manufactures” into the United States for the year ended 30th June last as follows: Value, \$32,736,976; duty, \$14,165,133; showing an average rate of duty of $43\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Deducting \$700,000 from this duty, as proposed, the average rate is 41 per cent. From this it would appear that apart from tin plate and steel rails the reduction in duties on iron and steel and their manufactures is only from $43\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., as formerly, to 41 per cent., as now proposed. Taking the whole importations of iron and steel and their manufactures into the United States and entered for home consumption for the year ended 30th June last, the average rate of Customs duty was 41 per cent. ad valorem, and allowing \$1,000,000 for the reduction of duty proposed under the Mills Bill, the average rate of Customs duty on the same importation would be 39 per cent. ad valorem. On the other hand, the average rate of Customs duty on iron and steel and their manufactures imported into Canada for home consumption for the year ended 30th June last was $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and for the nine months ending 31st March, 1888, under the amended tariff, the average rate of duty on these articles has been $23\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. ad valorem. Comparing the United States Customs tariff on all goods imported for home consumption with the Canadian tariff on similar imports, the Trade Returns show this result for the year ended 30th June, 1887:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

| | | |
|--|---------------------------|---------------------|
| Average rate on United States imports..... | $31\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. | ad valorem . |
| Average rate on Canadian imports..... | $21\frac{1}{2}$ “ | “ “ |

Comparing dutiable articles under the United States Customs tariff with the same articles under the Canadian tariff, the Trade Returns for 1886-87 show the average duty on United States imports for home consumption to be 47 per cent. ad valorem against an average of $28\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. ad valorem on Canadian imports for the same period. Under the Mills Bills the average Customs rates on dutiable articles, based on United States imports for home consumption for 1886-87, is estimated to be $43\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. ad valorem, whilst under the amended Canadian tariff for the nine months ended 31st March, 1888, the average Customs rates on dutiable articles entered for home consumption has been $31\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. ad valorem. I might also remark, before going into details, respecting the iron duties, that in addition to requiring time and in addition to the necessity of having a permanent policy we have to overcome the opposition of those interested in the handling and manufacture of the foreign product. But Sir, the people of Canada have faith in the advantages which local industries confer on the country, and our people of every shade of politics have shown unmistakably the importance they attach to the operation of active home industry by the readiness with which free sites, exemption from taxes and cash bonuses are offered to start new enterprises to provide industrial employment in the several localities. With these introductory remarks, I may say, as I shall show in the details which I shall lay before the House, that the action taken last year is endorsed by the representatives of the principal plate and bar rolling mills, who express their satisfaction with the present tariff as a whole, and with its working. It is my intention to give an account of the effect on the market prices, caused by the changes made last year in the tariff, and it may surprise hon. members to be told that the effect of the tariff on market prices of iron has been to make a small increase, but not to the full extent of the increased duty. I propose to take, by way of illustration, the value of warrants in Glasgow, that being the best gauge of the general level of the iron market, and as at Glasgow prices were pretty even during February and December, 1887, I will take these months for comparison. Taking pig iron, the price in Canada was only from \$1 to \$1.25 per gross ton higher in December than in February, 1887, while the additional duty, which took effect 1st July, was \$2.24 per gross ton, indicating that the foreign maker, carriers and importers, &c., had made a concession of about \$1 to \$1.25 per ton to retain the trade. In other words, the consumer paid fully one half the amount of duty contributed to the revenue. As to bar iron, the price was as follows:—In February, 1887, \$1.60 to \$1.65 per 100 lbs.; in December, 1887, \$1.85 to \$1.90 per 100 lbs., showing an advance of only 25 cents per 100 lbs., while the extra duty was 45 cents per 100 lbs. As to cast-iron water pipes, the contract prices for the Corporation of Montreal averaged as follows:—

| | |
|-------------------|------------------------|
| For 1885 | $18 50 per gross ton. |
| " 1886 | 26.21 " " |
| " 1887 | 33 14 " " |
| " 1888 only | 32.10 " " |

although the increase in duty has been $3 per ton. The Montreal corporation water pipes for 1888, above referred to, have been contracted for and are to be made in Canada from Canadian ore. The increase of price over the average for 1885 and 1886 is thus about half the increase in duty. I now come to the effect of the tariff in the explorations made as to new fields for the development of this industry, and I am glad to be able to state that very extensive and valuable deposits of iron ore have been discovered in the vicinity of Port Arthur, Ontario, and on Hunter's Island near the boundary line. When the Thunder Bay Colonization Railway reaches these points the opening up of these deposits will be facilitated. South of the Canadian Pacific Railway crossing of the Seine River, about 100 miles west of Fort William, an immense deposit of high grade Bessemer iron ore has been discovered. It is said to be the largest and purest body of ore ever found in America. The ore is a black magnetic oxide and analyses from 64 to 70 per cent. of metallic iron. Having briefly noticed the effect of the changes in the tariff as shewn in the new discoveries, I will now trouble the House for a few moments to point out what has been done in the Dominion towards the organisation of new iron works. The Bristol Mine in the county of Pontiac, Quebec, which had been closed for a time, has been recently acquired by a company who have been employing about 300 men around the mine. Roasting kilns have been erected for calcining the ore, but operations have been interrupted pending the completion of needed railway facilities. The various individual interests in the iron mines along the line of the Kingston and Pembroke Railway have been consolidated into one company with sufficient capital to operate them. Some of the ore shipped from this district to Chicago has been pronounced by experts to be the purest ore ever received there, the percentage of phosphorous being extremely low. I am informed that preliminaries have been arranged for the erection of a blast furnace at Trenton, and in the iron districts of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia a good deal of exploratory work has been done. The Pietou field has attracted marked attention, having been visited by a member of one of the leading firms of English ironmasters and by representatives of other capitalists, for the purpose of examining and reporting on the ores. The situation for the manufacture of iron and the quality of the ores have made a favorable impression, and negotiations now in progress, it is stated, point to an early arrangement for the erection of large iron works in that locality. Having thus briefly referred to the new discoveries and to the works that have been organised, it becomes also my pleasant duty to show to the House how the industries in existence prior to the change in the tariff have been expanded, and of this expansion and progress there is already substantial evidence. The foundries, machine shops, bridge works and kindred factories throughout the Dominion have been fully employed last year and have shared in the general prosperity. There can be no question but the general effect of the new iron duties has been to stimulate home industries and will cause the great bulk of our iron to be produced in the country, at the not distant future. At Londonderry the works of the Steel Company of Canada, which have been in liquidation for some years, were acquired at the end of February last by a new company of English and Canadian capitalist, who propose running them to their full capacity and extending their operations. One of the smelting furnaces which suddenly gave out in January is undergoing repairs, and the other furnace which has been silent since 1884, is being rekindled. These furnaces have a capacity for turning out 25,000 tons each of pig iron per annum. Puddled iron bars in considerable quantities were manufactured last year by the company. The employment for labor afforded in December, 1887, at the works shows an increase of more than 50 per cent. over the corresponding month in the previous year, as will appear by the following statement:—

| | Dec. 1886. | Dec. 1887. |
|---|------------|------------|
| Number men employed..... | 300 | 500 |
| Disbursements for fuel, flax, other materials and freight, representing labor indirectly employed | $16,000 | $25,700 |
| Value of product | 29,300 | 47,500 |

Product and operations at the iron works, Londonderry, 1887:

| Particulars. | 1st half year, 1887. Tons. | 2nd half year, 1887. Tons. |
|-------------------------------------|-------------------------------|-------------------------------|
| Ore mined | 22,205 | 26,358 |
| Limestone used | 7,112 | 8,748 |
| Coal (including coke) used | 30,423 | 47,014 |
| Pig iron made | 9,613 | 9,886 |
| Puddled bars | | 2,128 |
| Bar iron, N. plate axles, etc | | 1,470 |
| Scrap bar | | 445 |
| Castings | 54 | 80 |

Disbursements.

| | | |
|-----------------------------|----------|-----------|
| Wages paid to employés..... | $70,000 | $100,700 |
| Paid for fuel | 29,500 | 52,000 |
| " lime | 6,815 | 8,007 |
| " sundries | 5,000 | 8,000 |
| " railway freight | 46,686 | 66,941 |

| | | |
|--|-----------|-----------|
| Total | $158,001 | $235,651 |
| Wages to employés from March, 1888 | | $21,000 |
| The number of operatives on Londonderry pay-roll, March, 1887. 343 | | |
| " " " " 1888. 630 | | |

Increase..... 317

At New Glasgow the recent tariff changes have had the effect of largely increasing the sales of the Nova Scotia Steel Company, as the following statement shows:—

| Time. | Shipm't Tons. | Shipm't Value | Coal Consumed. | Wages Paid. | Railway Freight. |
|------------------------------|------------------|------------------|-------------------|----------------|---------------------|
| July 1st to Dec. 31st, 1886. | 1 728 | $ 69,465 | $ 5,647 | $ 28,300 | $ 13,123 |
| July 1st to Dec. 31st, 1887. | 2,712 | 133,400 | 10,465 | 34,900 | 17,332 |
| Increase in 1887..... | 62 pr. ct. | 92 pr. ct. | 85 pr. ct. | 33 pr. ct. | 32 pr. ct. |

The orders now in hand are greater than the entire shipments for the last six months of 1886. The company has been consolidated with the Nova Scotia Forge Company, and arrangements made for the addition of a new smelting furnace, which will double the output of the Steel Works and will mean a disbursement of nearly $250,000 a year for wages, fuel and railway freight. At St. John, N.B., reports from the Cold Brook Rolling Mills are to this effect. I quote from a letter received from the President of the Company:

"By the operations of the tariff, the imports of iron now are less, consequently our output now is proportionately greater and the benefit to the manufacturer rests on a large turnover on small margins. We are able to sell our goods to the merchants at lower figures than they could be imported for previous to 1886."

There were, it appears, 50 per cent more men employed in the Rolling Mills in 1887 than in any of the years 1884, 1885 or 1886. At Montreal, Pillow, Hersey & Co. have converted themselves into a joint stock company with a capital of $800,000, and the Canadian Pacific Railway contemplate the erection during the present season of a shop for passenger car work, and when this is completed all of their rolling stock of every description will be made in the country. The company built 24 locomotives in 1886 and 24 in 1887. And they have not purchased any locomotives outside of Canada since October, 1884, excepting two special ones for the mountain grade. All of their freight cars for several years back have been built in Canada, and practically all of their passenger cars are now built in Canada, excepting some of the sleeping and dining cars. The Montreal Rolling Mills Company have added to the capacity of their bar and plate mills by running night and day. 1887 was the first year during which the bar mill was run at night, and last year they worked 10,000 tons of iron of all sorts and used about 10,000 tons of fuel. They have recently put in an extensive wrought iron pipe embodying the latest improvements, which can turn out 6,000,000 feet of piping per annum, using up 4,000 tons of material to do so. The new pipe mill is running day and night. A German firm from Dusseldorf have decided, as I am informed, to erect extensive works for the manufacture of wrought-iron pipe and boiler tubes, which will be a new manufacture in this country. At Kingston, important changes have taken place in the locomotive works. Messrs. Dubbs & Co., of Glasgow, one of the largest manufacturers of locomotives in Great Britain, have invested in the Kingston locomotive works. They now manage and control them and have in view their operation on a larger scale. At Hamilton, as one effect of the recent tariff changes, an establishment has been erected capable of giving employment to 400 hands in the manufacture of wood screws, carriage bolts and the like. In cast-iron pipe manufacture at Hamilton the immediate result of the tariff has been that the Canada Pipe Foundry has been steadily employed during the past season, and will soon necessitate its increase to double the present capacity. The Hamilton Bridge Company report:

"We use iron of local manufacture very largely, and find it of at least equal quality to that imported, and the price, as far as our experience goes, is reasonable and not so high as the full tariff increase would warrant. We also have the great advantage of ordering and obtaining this material when wanted, and without having to lay in our stocks."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Burrow, Stewart & Milne, of Hamilton, say:

"We are using half of all the iron that we run of Canadian make, and find the quality first-rate, A1."

The Ontario Rolling Mill Company report with regard to the new tariff:

"We are now beginning to feel the beneficial effects and expect we shall be called on by spring to make far more iron than ever before. We shall be able to turn out by spring nearly double the tonnage we ever made here. We are also arranging to start up the mill we have in London either there or elsewhere, so that by May we can, if necessary, make in that mill about 35 tons per day."

The Hamilton Iron Forging Company say:

"In our own business we have felt the good effects of the wise and judicious policy of the Government, notably during the last four months, having largely increased our output by running our force full time both night and day, and within the past few days have started another furnace in our establishment with all the necessary equipment capable of turning out one car load more of finished bar iron per day; this will give active employment to 12 skilled men besides day laborers; we have also increased the capital stock of our company for the purpose of further developing the business, and in the near future we propose placing in position another mill plant with a capacity of 6,000 tons per year."

"In conclusion we have much pleasure in stating we never heard a consumer of iron complain of the tariff changes; moreover, we desire to place on record the general feeling and satisfaction expressed by them in having their wants supplied promptly at home without having, as in the past, to purchase abroad and carry large stocks and pay cash for them. They can now secure iron within a reasonable time that at once goes into legitimate consumption, thereby giving a healthy and vigorous tone to business."

"The continuation of an iron policy wise in its inception and having for its object the development of the mineral resources of this country covering the whole Dominion of Canada, meets with our hearty approval, and must eventually lay a foundation broad and enduring that will be materially helpful to every class of men living between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans."

As closely connected with the development of manufactories and as an evidence of the steady progress of the country, it may be mentioned that, in addition to the expansion of the iron industry, the changes in the tariff had a beneficial effect in the output of coal from the mines. In the Nova Scotia and Cape Breton coal mines the following is a close estimate of the output—I give the totals of Cumberland county, Pictou county and Cape Breton:—

| | 1886. | 1887. |
|------------------------------------|-----------|-----------|
| Cumberland County Mines, tons..... | 416,000 | 469,242 |
| Pictou County Mines, " | 369,000 | 338,050 |
| Cape Breton Mines, " | 588,000 | 717,000 |
| Totals | 1,373,000 | 1,524,292 |

In 1879 the coal raised at Spring Hill was 92,000 tons; in 1887, the output had increased to 442,000 tons. At this mine 1,400 men and boys are employed, the largest force at any mine in Canada. Having thus, I trust, shown to the satisfaction of the House the effects of the tariff changes on the iron industry, I propose to show what has been done towards the development, and extension of the West India trade. The West India trade for the past year has been on the whole profitable. The present prices of fish in the West Indies during the past year would have been considered good. The price has advanced so much that our fishermen have greatly benefitted thereby; and I have no doubt that part of the benefit, though not so much as went to the fishermen, accrued to the merchant shipper. It must be borne in mind that an important factor in the West India trade is the return cargo of sugar. It is gratifying to see that the recent change in the sugar duties, putting the same duty upon all sugars for refining purposes according to their polariscopic test, has had the effect of encouraging the importation of sugar from the West Indies, especially into Nova Scotia. The importation of West India sugar into Canada (including British Guiana sugar) amounted for the following years, viz.:—

| | Lbs. |
|----------------------------------|------------|
| Year ended 30th June, 1886 | 59,854,645 |
| " " 1887..... | 51,021,331 |

| | Lbs. |
|----------------------------------|------------|
| Year ending 30th June, 1886..... | 19,830.723 |
| “ “ 1887..... | 21,398.201 |

| | 1878. | 1887. |
|---|-----------------|-------------|
| Flour..... | Bbls. 637,778 | 753,480 |
| Grain..... | Bushels 331,170 | 1,016,334 |
| Live stock..... | No. 46,498 | 80,732 |
| Lumber..... | Feet 56,600,000 | 161,100,000 |
| Manufactures..... | Tons 140,858 | 820,000 |
| Other articles (not including fire wood)..... | “ 230,741 | |
| Total freight..... | “ 522,710 | 1,131,334 |
| Passengers..... | No. 618,957 | 940,144 |

| Year ended December. | Tons. |
|-------------------------|---------|
| 1879 | 570 |
| 1880 | 10,246 |
| 1881 | 30,629 |
| 1882 | 35,039 |
| 1883 | 54,891 |
| 1884 | 112,898 |
| 1885 | 165,791 |
| 1886 | 175,512 |

| | |
|--------------------|----------------|
| From Halifax..... | 88,996 |
| " Moncton | 56,992 |
| Total | 145,988 |

| | |
|--|----------------|
| To Montreal..... | 3,143 barrels. |
| " Other Stations on Grand Trunk Railway..... | 33 " |
| " Quebec..... | 3,081 " |
| Total..... | 6,267 " |

| | |
|------------|---------------|
| 1887 | 197,774 tons. |
| 1880 | 47,142 " |

The New Brunswick Cotton Mills report an increase in sales of $52,437 in 1887 over 1886, and total sales of $599,147 during the past three years to the upper Provinces. The Moncton Cotton Mills report an increase of $12,495 in 1887 over 1886, and total sales of $366,622 in three years to the Upper Provinces. The Halifax Cotton Mills report total sales to the upper Provinces in four years of $528,-

400. The Windsor Cotton Mills report total sales in four years to the upper Provinces of $437,522. The Nova Scotia Steel and Forge Company report total sales of their product to the upper Provinces during the past four years of $850,478. It is gratifying to note that in every instance the returns show a steady increase. Thus the shipments by railway of the products of the Steel and Forge Company in 1887 were 155 per cent. more in value than those of 1884, notwithstanding the decrease in price of 45 cents per ton in 1887 as compared with the average price of 1884. In addition to coal, the Intercolonial carried in 1887 over 6,000 tons of stone, nearly 20,000 barrels of plaster, over 45,000,000 lbs. of iron, 13,300 barrels of pickled fish, over 3,000,000 of fresh fish, 4,250,000 lbs. of dried fish, 750,000 lbs. of canned fish, and 16,000 barrels of oysters, all for the upper Provinces. Besides these, numerous other articles of commerce, as well as railway plant and the like, have found their way to the upper Provinces from the maritime section.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Has the hon. gentleman a comparative statement of the receipts of the Intercolonial Railway for the periods included in the statements he has just given?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will be able to furnish my hon. friend with that. I thought the question of inter-provincial trade was transcendent in importance, and that it would not be necessary to go into the question of receipts.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But it does go into it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would be very glad, in discussing the items in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, to furnish the information the hon. gentleman has suggested. It does, no doubt, go into it; but, after all, I must be excused for saying that I think it is a matter of secondary importance to the great one of building up a large interprovincial trade between one section of our country and another. We must also bear in mind that there is a very large water-borne trade, as indicated by the shipping employed in coasting. The tonnage employed in the coasting trade between Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island in 1887 aggregated 9,358,735 tons, against 5,321,726 tons in 1887, an increase of nearly 76 per cent. Taking the three Maritime Provinces, in 1877 I find that the various ports of the section saw 12,268 arrivals of vessels, and as many departures. That seemed a good business, but so vast has been the change that in 1887 these ports witnessed 23,611 arrivals and as many departures of coasting vessels. In 1877 there were 21,323 arrivals and as many departures of coasters in the whole Gulf and Atlantic coast, and in 1887 the arrivals had risen to 33,330, with as many departures. Moving all along the coast and river line, as far up as Montreal, these coasting vessels have found in inter-provincial trade a development they never would have found confined in the limits of their respective Provinces. The increase in the number of arrivals and departures marks the development of trade and intercourse that has taken place between the Provinces by the sea and those on the St. Lawrence River. This development is the more marked because it has taken place during the very years that the Intercolonial Railway has been in operation. That railway is a continuous coasting vessel day and night conveying the goods of one part to the other parts of the Dominion, from the Maritime Provinces to the upper Provinces, and vice versa. So great has been the increase of interprovincial and of provincial trade, general internal commerce, that the demand for coasting vessels has gone on increasing until now there are nearly 60 per cent. more trips made in the year by the coasting marine of the country on the Gulf of St. Lawrence and Atlantic coast than ten years ago, and the tonnage employed has increased 76 per cent., showing the employment of a superior class of vessels. In the United States, as hon. gentlemen who have looked into this subject at all are, no doubt, aware, the completion of the railway has resulted in diminishing the enrolled and licensed tonnage employed in the Atlantic coasting trade. In Canada there has been found increasing employment for the railway and for the coasting vessel, the first showing an increase of freight carried of 116 per cent. in ten years, and the latter, judging from increased tonnage, of 76 per cent. As a single illustration of the growth of the trade between the upper and the Maritime Provinces, I may state that the tonnage of vessels arrived at the port of Quebec from the Maritime Provinces during 1887 was 193,000 tons, being an increase of 33 per cent. over the preceding year, and an increase of 47 per cent. over 1885. Hon. members will be interested to learn, as a further evidence of inter-provincial trade, that the coasting trade of the whole Dominion has been steadily increasing, judging from the tonnage employed, until now it is double what it was ten years ago, as the following figures show:—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

| | Tonnage. |
|-----------|------------|
| 1877..... | 8,968,862 |
| 1878..... | 11,047,661 |
| 1879..... | 12,066,633 |
| 1880..... | 14,053,013 |
| 1881..... | 15,116,766 |
| 1882..... | 14,791,064 |
| 1883..... | 15,683,566 |
| 1884..... | 15,473,707 |
| 1885..... | 16,944,421 |
| 1886..... | 16,368,274 |
| 1887..... | 17,513,677 |

If hon. members will allow me, I will here state to the House that the chief results of the Canadian trade in 1886-87 were pretty much as follows:—The total exports exceeded those of the previous fiscal year by $4,250,000, being 8 per cent. in advance of the average of the 20 years of Confederation. The export of the fisheries show an increase of 15 per cent. over the average of the preceding twenty years, the total amount being $32,000 more than in 1885-86. The export from the mines of Canada show an increase of 13 per cent. over the average of twenty years, but a decrease of $150,000 compared with the previous year. The forest export shows a decrease of 7 per cent. compared with the twenty years' average and a decrease of $500,000 compared with 1886. I referred before to the fact that the great drought and the want of means to get the lumber and the material for its manufacture down the rivers, had a serious effect in checking our trade in lumber. The export of agricultural products, show an increase of 80 per cent. over the twenty years, average and an increase of $1,200,000 over the year 1886. The export of animals and animal products show an increase of 50 per cent. over the twenty years' average and of $2,200,000 over the export of 1886. The imports for home consumption were 8 per cent. more than the average for twenty years and $6,000,000 more than in 1886. The total imports were $8,400,000 more than in the previous year. The imports of woollen manufactures were 28 per cent. more than the twenty years' average and $2,500,000 more than in 1886. The imports of cotton were 54 per cent. less than the twenty years' average and $300,000 less than in 1886. The total tonnage of shipping employed in external trade was 14,000,000, being 130,000 tons more than in 1886 and 16 per cent. more than the twenty years' average, and as I have said before, the total tonnage employed in the coasting trade was 17,500,000 tons, being 1,200,000 tons more than in 1886 and 21 per cent. more than the twenty years' average. The tons of freight brought into and carried out of Halifax by shipping increased 73 per cent. in 1887 as compared with 1878. The shipping carrying cargoes into and from Halifax in 1887 was 125 per cent. more than in 1868. Halifax increased during the past ten years in the tonnage of cargo carried in, and out more than any other port, Montreal having increased 67 per cent. while Halifax increased 73 per cent. Having detained the House at some length with these statistics, which are always very dry, but which I think are not uninteresting, considering the great importance we all attach especially to interprovincial trade, and to the fact that Confederation has become more than a name, that instead of its being a Confederation on paper, a mere union by which these Provinces are brought under one central Government, it is found that, notwithstanding some geographical difficulties from the great length and the comparatively narrow breadth of our country, a very rapidly increasing and a very large trade is growing up, showing the intimate commercial relations which are being established between one portion of our country and the other,—I do not intend to detain the House by going over at any length the statistics which bear upon the year's progress, to which I alluded a year ago, when making the financial statement. I have had prepared by Mr. Johnson a series of diagrams in the same form, though I believe somewhat improved, as those which were presented to the House last year, and I have had these placed in the hands of every hon. member, so that he may ascertain the exact position we are in and the progress we are making.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There are some new tables in this.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, there are some additional tables which I thought would be of interest to the House as illustrating the subject with which I am dealing, and that is, endeavoring to put before the House something which will give information as to the position which the country occupies, not only in regard to a large number of financial questions, but also in reference to the trade and commerce and development of the country, and I have had them put in such a form as to attract the attention, not only of the members of this House and the people of the country generally, but of any persons who may be desirous to take an increased interest in this country.

CANADA Federal Gross Debt with Assets, for Years ended 30th June :—

| | Gross Debt. | Assets. |
|--|---------------|---------------|
| 1867 (Confederation created)..... | $ 93,046,051 | $ 17,317,410 |
| 1869..... | 96,896,666 | 21,139,631 |
| 1869 (Better terms to Nova Scotia)..... | 112,361,998 | 36,502,679 |
| 1870 (Manitoba created a Province, debt $172,090)..... | 115,993,706 | 37,783,964 |
| 1871 (British Columbia admitted, debt $1,666,200)..... | 115,492,682 | 37,786,165 |
| 1872..... | 122,400,179 | 40,213,107 |
| 1873 (Prince Edward Island admitted, debt $1,927,060)..... | 129,743,432 | 29,691,970 |
| 1874..... | 141,163,551 | 52,838,586 |
| 1875..... | 151,663,401 | 35,655,023 |
| 1876 (Intercolonial Railway opened)..... | 161,204,687 | 36,653,173 |
| 1877..... | 174,675,834 | 41,440,525 |
| 1878..... | 174,957,268 | 34,595,199 |
| 1879..... | 179,483,871 | 36,493,683 |
| 1880 (Intercolonial Railway finished)..... | 191,634,440 | 41,182,852 |
| 1881 (C.P.R. begun)..... | 199,861,537 | 41,465,757 |
| 1882..... | 205,365,251 | 51,703,601 |
| 1883..... | 202,159,104 | 43,692,389 |
| 1884 (Provincial Debts assumed, $7,172,297)..... | 242,482,416 | 60,320,505 |
| 1885 (C. P. R. finished last spike 7th Nov.)..... | 264,703,607 | 68,295,915 |
| 1886 (Temporary loan to C. P. R. of 20 millions. Manitoba debt assumed, $3,317,226)..... | 273,164,341 | 50,005,234 |
| 1887 ($10,189,521 added to debt being purchase money of 6,793,014 acres of land from C. P. R.)..... | 273,187,626 | 45,873,611 |

CANADA Taxation, being Customs and Excise Duties collected, during Years ended 30th June :—

| | Excise. | Customs |
|-----------|--------------|--------------|
| 1868..... | $ 3,002,588 | $ 8,578,380 |
| 1869..... | 2,710,028 | 8,272,880 |
| 1870..... | 3,619,612 | 9,334,213 |
| 1871..... | 4,295,945 | 11,841,104 |
| 1872..... | 4,735,652 | 12,787,984 |
| 1873..... | 4,460,682 | 12,954,164 |
| 1874..... | 5,594,904 | 14,325,193 |
| 1875..... | 5,069,687 | 15,351,011 |

| | Excise. | Customs. |
|-----------|-----------|------------|
| 1876..... | 5,563,487 | 12,823,838 |
| 1877..... | 4,911,898 | 12,546,988 |
| 1878..... | 4,858,672 | 12,782,824 |
| 1879..... | 5,390,763 | 12,900,659 |
| 1880..... | 4,232,427 | 14,071,343 |
| 1881..... | 5,343,022 | 18,406,092 |
| 1882..... | 5,884,860 | 21,581,570 |
| 1883..... | 6,260,116 | 23,009,582 |
| 1884..... | 5,459,309 | 20,023,890 |
| 1885..... | 6,449,102 | 18,935,428 |
| 1886..... | 5,852,905 | 19,373,562 |
| 1887..... | 6,308,201 | 22,378,801 |

TOTAL Exports of Canada for Years ended 30th June :—

| | |
|---|---------------|
| 1868..... | $ 57,567,888 |
| 1869..... | 60,474,781 |
| 1870..... | 73,573,490 |
| 1871 (Manitoba created a Province, 15th July, 1870)..... | 74,173,618 |
| 1872 (British Columbia admitted, 20th July, 1871)..... | 82,629,663 |
| 1873..... | 89,789,992 |
| 1874 (Prince Edward Island admitted, 1st July, 1873)..... | 89,351,928 |
| 1875 (Revenue Tariff)..... | 77,886,979 |
| 1876 do..... | 80,966,435 |
| 1877 do..... | 75,875,393 |
| 1878 do..... | 79,323,667 |
| 1879 do..... | 71,491,255 |
| 1880 (Protective Tariff)..... | 87,911,468 |
| 1881 do..... | 98,290,823 |
| 1882 do..... | 102,137,203 |
| 1883 do..... | 98,085,804 |
| 1884 do..... | 91,406,496 |
| 1885 do..... | 89,238,361 |
| 1886 do..... | 85,251,314 |
| 1887 do..... | 89,515,811 |

RELATIVE VALUE of 10 principal Exports (home production) from Dominion of Canada, Fiscal Year 1887 :—

| | |
|-------------------------------------|--------------|
| Wood and manufactures..... | $21,166,530 |
| Grains, barley, peas and flour..... | 16,001,897 |
| Animals..... | 10,461,442 |
| Cheese..... | 7,108,978 |
| Fish..... | 6,875,810 |
| Furs and hides..... | 2,323,908 |
| Eggs..... | 1,825,559 |
| Coal..... | 1,522,272 |
| Meats..... | 1,091,076 |
| Gold..... | 1,017,401 |

TOTAL Imports into Canada, for Years ended 30th June :—

| | Dutiable. | Free. |
|---|---------------|---------------|
| 1868..... | $ 73,459,644 | $ 71,985,305 |
| 1869..... | 70,415,165 | 67,402,170 |
| 1870 (Manitoba created a Province)..... | 74,814,839 | 71,237,603 |
| 1871 (British Columbia admitted)..... | 96,092,971 | 86,947,482 |
| 1872..... | 111,430,527 | 107,769,116 |
| 1873 (Prince Edward Island admitted)..... | 128,011,281 | 127,514,594 |
| 1874..... | 128,213,582 | 127,404,169 |
| 1875..... | 123,070,283 | 119,618,657 |
| 1876..... | 93,210,346 | 94,733,218 |
| 1877..... | 99,329,962 | 96,300,483 |
| 1878..... | 93,081,787 | 91,199,577 |
| 1879..... | 81,964,427 | 80,341,608 |
| 1880..... | 86,489,747 | 71,782,349 |
| 1881..... | 105,330,840 | 91,611,604 |
| 1882..... | 119,419,500 | 112,648,927 |
| 1883..... | 132,254,022 | 123,137,019 |
| 1884..... | 116,397,043 | 108,180,644 |
| 1885..... | 108,941,486 | 102,710,019 |
| 1886..... | 104,424,561 | 99,602,694 |
| 1887..... | 112,892,236 | 105,639,428 |

CANADA Imports for Home Consumption, divided into Free and Dutiable, during Years ended 30th June :—

| | Dutiable. | Free. |
|-----------|---------------|---------------|
| 1868..... | $ 43,655,696 | $ 28,329,610 |
| 1869..... | 41,069,342 | 26,332,928 |
| 1870..... | 45,127,422 | 26,110,181 |
| 1871..... | 60,094,362 | 26,853,130 |
| 1872..... | 68,545,718 | 39,163,398 |
| 1873..... | 71,409,196 | 56,105,398 |
| 1874..... | 76,235,853 | 51,168,316 |
| 1875..... | 78,141,432 | 41,477,229 |
| 1876..... | 60,243,346 | 34,489,872 |
| 1877..... | 60,919,960 | 36,380,523 |
| 1878..... | 59,776,589 | 31,422,988 |
| 1879..... | 55,430,012 | 24,911,596 |
| 1880..... | 54,182,967 | 17,599,382 |
| 1881..... | 71,620,725 | 19,990,879 |
| 1882..... | 85,757,433 | 26,891,494 |
| 1883..... | 91,688,339 | 31,548,680 |
| 1884..... | 80,010,498 | 28,170,146 |
| 1885..... | 73,269,618 | 29,440,401 |
| 1886..... | 70,658,819 | 28,943,875 |
| 1887..... | 78,120,679 | 27,518,749 |

IMPORTS of Iron and Steel, and Manufactures thereof, into the Dominion for Home Consumption, for years :—

| | | | |
|------|--------------|------|--------------|
| 1868 | $ 6,885,365 | 1878 | $ 9,398,306 |
| 1869 | 7,385,780 | 1879 | 7,962,295 |
| 1870 | 7,760,867 | 1880 | 10,128,660 |
| 1871 | 10,808,645 | 1881 | 12,955,855 |
| 1872 | 15,913,179 | 1882 | 17,499,488 |
| 1873 | 25,435,020 | 1883 | 20,080,274 |
| 1874 | 20,700,387 | 1884 | 14,790,727 |
| 1875 | 18,199,198 | 1885 | 11,415,713 |
| 1876 | 12,965,117 | 1886 | 11,053,365 |
| 1877 | 11,082,321 | 1887 | 13,595,046 |

DISCOUNTS given by the Chartered Banks of Canada, June 30th :—

| | |
|--|---------------|
| 1868 | $ 50,500,316 |
| 1869 | 53,573,307 |
| 1870 (Manitoba created a Province, 15th July) | 62,252,569 |
| 1871 (British Columbia admitted, 20th July) | 83,939,756 |
| 1872 | 107,354,115 |
| 1873 (Prince Edward Island admitted, 1st July) | 117,646,219 |
| 1874 | 133,731,260 |
| 1875 | 123,786,038 |
| 1876 | 128,645,238 |
| 1877 | 126,169,577 |
| 1878 | 124,888,552 |
| 1879 | 122,502,537 |
| 1880 | 118,916,970 |
| 1881 | 144,139,875 |
| 1882 | 177,521,800 |
| 1883 | 177,222,569 |
| 1884 | 160,459,183 |
| 1885 | 158,209,174 |
| 1886 | 165,044,608 |
| 1887 | 169,357,325 |

CANADA, Overdue Notes and Debts in Chartered Banks, proportion being to total amount borrowed from Banks for Years ended 31st October :—

| | | | |
|------|---------|------|---------|
| 1873 | $ 2 07 | 1881 | $ 2 68 |
| 1874 | 2 02 | 1882 | 1 97 |
| 1875 | 4 73 | 1883 | 2 45 |
| 1876 | 4 30 | 1884 | 3 57 |
| 1877 | 4 45 | 1885 | 2 45 |
| 1878 | 4 56 | 1886 | 1 63 |
| 1879 | 4 90 | 1887 | 1 61 |
| 1880 | 4 24 | | |

BUSINESS Failures in Canada, years :—

| | |
|--------------------------|--------------|
| 1873 | $12,334,000 |
| 1874 | 7,696,000 |
| 1875 (Revenue Tariff) | 28,843,000 |
| 1876 do | 25,517,000 |
| 1877 do | 25,523,000 |
| 1878 do | 23,908,000 |
| 1879 do | 29,347,000 |
| 1880 (Protective Tariff) | 7,988,000 |
| 1881 do | 5,751,000 |
| 1882 do | 8,587,000 |
| 1883 do | 15,872,000 |
| 1884 do | 18,939,000 |
| 1885 do | 8,743,000 |
| 1886 do | 10,387,000 |
| 1887 do | 16,311,745 |

CANADA Bank Notes in circulation during years ended June 30th :—

| | Bank Notes. | Dominion Notes. |
|------|--------------|-----------------|
| 1868 | $ 8,307,079 | $ 3,795,000 |
| 1869 | 8,063,198 | 4,794,000 |
| 1870 | 14,167,948 | 7,294,103 |
| 1871 | 18,339,893 | 7,244,341 |
| 1872 | 25,040,077 | 10,813,548 |
| 1873 | 29,516,046 | 11,314,256 |
| 1874 | 26,583,130 | 12,175,579 |
| 1875 | 20,902,991 | 10,780,324 |
| 1876 | 20,288,158 | 11,534,731 |
| 1877 | 18,265,356 | 10,680,493 |
| 1878 | 19,351,109 | 10,435,696 |
| 1879 | 18,090,814 | 10,790,510 |
| 1880 | 20,186,176 | 13,665,959 |
| 1881 | 26,102,368 | 14,539,795 |
| 1882 | 32,229,937 | 15,786,538 |
| 1883 | 32,211,915 | 16,005,243 |
| 1884 | 29,654,511 | 15,344,474 |
| 1885 | 29,692,803 | 15,423,229 |
| 1886 | 29,200,627 | 16,269,452 |
| 1887 | 30,438,152 | 15,064,835 |

Sir CHARLES TUPPER,

DEPOSITS by the People in the Chartered Banks of Canada, 30th June :—

| | |
|---|---------------|
| 1868 | $ 32,808,104 |
| 1869 | 35,823,333 |
| 1870 | 50,767,100 |
| 1871 (Manitoba created a Province, 15th July) | 55,763,067 |
| 1872 | 53,986,818 |
| 1873 | 55,547,607 |
| 1874 (Revenue Tariff) | 65,991,047 |
| 1875 do | 58,367,942 |
| 1876 do | 63,320,858 |
| 1877 do | 63,241,128 |
| 1878 do | 68,603,757 |
| 1879 do | 63,635,952 |
| 1880 (Protective Tariff) | 77,891,498 |
| 1881 do | 86,507,571 |
| 1882 do | 99,100,729 |
| 1883 do | 99,364,750 |
| 1884 do | 92,413,313 |
| 1885 do | 99,383,673 |
| 1886 do | 103,583,950 |
| 1887 do | 107,154,483 |

CANADA, Deposits by the People in Savings Branches, Building Societies and Loan Companies, for Years ended 30th December :—

| | | | |
|------|------------|------|--------------|
| 1868 | $ 959,054 | 1878 | $ 8,269,295 |
| 1869 | 1,485,014 | 1879 | 9,426,148 |
| 1870 | 1,942,575 | 1880 | 11,713,633 |
| 1871 | 2,399,136 | 1881 | 13,460,268 |
| 1872 | 2,590,778 | 1882 | 14,241,783 |
| 1873 | 2,869,382 | 1883 | 13,954,461 |
| 1874 | 4,614,813 | 1884 | 13,876,516 |
| 1875 | 5,020,607 | 1885 | 15,435,084 |
| 1876 | 6,126,378 | 1886 | 17,712,885 |
| 1877 | 7,102,186 | | |

DEPOSITS in Savings Banks of Canada, 30th June :—

| | | | |
|------|--------------|------|---------------|
| 1868 | $ 4,360,692 | 1878 | $ 14,222,074 |
| 1869 | 5,723,567 | 1879 | 14,702,715 |
| 1870 | 7,591,978 | 1880 | 18,237,496 |
| 1871 | 9,367,941 | 1881 | 24,331,202 |
| 1872 | 10,526,376 | 1882 | 31,093,718 |
| 1873 | 12,933,894 | 1883 | 35,189,426 |
| 1874 | 15,101,195 | 1884 | 38,003,116 |
| 1875 | 14,125,477 | 1885 | 41,990,776 |
| 1876 | 13,838,201 | 1886 | 45,072,886 |
| 1877 | 13,391,014 | 1887 | 50,944,785 |

CANADA, operations of the Money Order System for years ended 30th June :—

| | Orders issued. | No. of orders issued. |
|------|----------------|-----------------------|
| | Amount. | |
| 1868 | $ 3,352,881 | 90,163 |
| 1869 | 3,563,645 | 96,629 |
| 1870 | 3,910,250 | 110,021 |
| 1871 | 4,546,434 | 120,521 |
| 1872 | 5,154,120 | 136,422 |
| 1873 | 6,239,506 | 161,096 |
| 1874 | 6,757,427 | 179,851 |
| 1875 | 6,711,539 | 181,091 |
| 1876 | 6,866,618 | 238,668 |
| 1877 | 6,856,821 | 253,962 |
| 1878 | 7,130,895 | 269,417 |
| 1879 | 6,788,723 | 281,725 |
| 1880 | 7,207,337 | 306,088 |
| 1881 | 7,725,212 | 338,238 |
| 1882 | 8,354,193 | 372,248 |
| 1883 | 9,490,900 | 419,613 |
| 1884 | 10,067,834 | 463,502 |
| 1885 | 10,384,211 | 499,243 |
| 1886 | 10,231,189 | 529,458 |
| 1887 | 10,328,984 | 574,899 |

CANADA POST OFFICES.

Number of Post Offices :—

| | | | |
|------|-------|------|-------|
| 1868 | 3,638 | 1878 | 5,378 |
| 1869 | 3,756 | 1879 | 5,606 |
| 1870 | 3,820 | 1880 | 5,773 |
| 1871 | 3,943 | 1881 | 5,935 |
| 1872 | 4,135 | 1882 | 6,171 |
| 1873 | 4,618 | 1883 | 6,395 |
| 1874 | 4,706 | 1884 | 6,837 |
| 1875 | 4,892 | 1885 | 7,084 |
| 1876 | 5,015 | 1886 | 7,295 |
| 1877 | 5,161 | 1887 | 7,534 |

Distribution of Post Offices :—

| | | |
|-------------------------|------------|------------------|
| Ontario | 1 to every | 64 square miles. |
| Quebec | do | 142 do |
| Nova Scotia | do | 16 do |
| New Brunswick | do | 26 do |
| Prince Edward Island | do | 7 do |
| British Columbia | do | 3,250 do |
| Manitoba and North-West | do | 225 do |

Letters and Postal Cards posted :—

| | | | |
|------|---------|------|--------|
| 1868 | 18,100* | 1878 | 50,455 |
| 1869 | 21,920 | 1879 | 50,840 |
| 1870 | 24,500 | 1880 | 53,600 |
| 1871 | 27,050 | 1881 | 57,810 |
| 1872 | 30,600 | 1882 | 67,500 |
| 1873 | 34,579 | 1883 | 75,740 |
| 1874 | 39,358 | 1884 | 79,680 |
| 1875 | 42,000 | 1885 | 82,200 |
| 1876 | 46,446 | 1886 | 86,110 |
| 1877 | 46,960 | 1887 | 90,656 |

* 000 omitted.

Newspapers carried by Postal Department :—

| | | | |
|------|---------|------|--------|
| 1868 | 18,860* | 1878 | 39,936 |
| 1869 | 18,700 | 1879 | 42,380 |
| 1870 | 20,150 | 1880 | 45,120 |
| 1871 | 22,250 | 1881 | 48,690 |
| 1872 | 24,400 | 1882 | 50,846 |
| 1873 | 25,480 | 1883 | 53,140 |
| 1874 | 29,000 | 1884 | 55,990 |
| 1875 | 31,300 | 1885 | 58,381 |
| 1876 | 33,550 | 1886 | 60,064 |
| 1877 | 39,000 | 1887 | |

* 000 omitted.

Postal Revenue :—

| | | | |
|------|-------------|------|-----------|
| 1868 | $1,024,710 | 1878 | 1,620,022 |
| 1869 | 973,056 | 1879 | 1,534,363 |
| 1870 | 1,010,707 | 1880 | 1,648,017 |
| 1871 | 1,079,767 | 1881 | 1,767,953 |
| 1872 | 1,193,062 | 1882 | 2,022,098 |
| 1873 | 1,406,964 | 1883 | 2,364,384 |
| 1874 | 1,476,207 | 1884 | 2,330,741 |
| 1875 | 1,536,509 | 1885 | 2,400,062 |
| 1876 | 1,484,886 | 1886 | 2,469,379 |
| 1877 | 1,501,134 | 1887 | 2,603,256 |

Postal Expenditure :—

| | | | |
|------|-------------|------|-------------|
| 1868 | $1,053,570 | 1878 | $2,110,365 |
| 1869 | 1,079,828 | 1879 | 2,167,266 |
| 1870 | 1,155,261 | 1880 | 2,286,611 |
| 1871 | 1,271,096 | 1881 | 2,333,189 |
| 1872 | 1,369,163 | 1882 | 2,459,356 |
| 1873 | 1,553,604 | 1883 | 2,687,394 |
| 1874 | 1,695,480 | 1884 | 2,931,387 |
| 1875 | 1,873,241 | 1885 | 3,097,882 |
| 1876 | 1,959,758 | 1886 | 3,380,411 |
| 1877 | 2,075,618 | 1887 | 3,458,101 |

RAILWAYS in Canada, 30th June :—

| | Miles. | | Miles. |
|------|--------|------|--------|
| 1868 | 2,522 | 1878 | 6,143 |
| 1869 | 2,580 | 1879 | 6,255 |
| 1870 | 2,679 | 1880 | 6,891 |
| 1871 | 2,950 | 1881 | 7,260 |
| 1872 | 3,018 | 1882 | 7,530 |
| 1873 | 3,609 | 1883 | 8,726 |
| 1874 | 4,022 | 1884 | 9,575 |
| 1875 | 4,826 | 1885 | 10,773 |
| 1876 | 5,157 | 1886 | 11,523 |
| 1877 | 5,574 | 1887 | 12,292 |

| | Cost per mile. | Population per mile. |
|---------------|----------------|----------------------|
| Great Britain | $ 206,500 | 1,930 |
| Germany | 103,000 | 2,065 |
| France | 134,000 | 2,110 |
| Italy | 94,700 | 5,000 |
| Belgium | 123,400 | 2,102 |
| Holland | 95,200 | 3,400 |
| Russia | 97,200 | 5,965 |
| United States | 61,000 | 417 |
| Canada | 61,000 | 491 |

CANADIAN Railways, Passengers carried, for years ended 30th June :—

| | No. of passengers carried to each inhabitant. |
|------|---|
| 1868 | No returns |
| 1869 | " |
| 1870 | " |
| 1871 | " |
| 1872 | " |
| 1873 | " |
| 1874 | " |
| 1875 | 5,190,416 1.33 |
| 1876 | 5,544,814 1.30 |
| 1877 | 6,073,233 1.50 |
| 1878 | 6,443,924 1.57 |
| 1879 | 6,523,816 1.57 |
| 1880 | 6,462,948 1.50 |
| 1881 | 6,943,671 1.57 |
| 1882 | 9,358,325 2.01 |
| 1883 | 9,579,948 2.12 |
| 1884 | 9,981,358 2.16 |
| 1885 | 9,672,599 2.08 |
| 1886 | 9,861,024 2.08 |
| 1887 | 10,685,508 2.20 |

RAILWAYS of Canada, Tons Carried :—

| | Carried tons per inhabitant. | Tons. |
|------|------------------------------|--------------|
| 1876 | 160 | $ 6,331,757 |
| 1877 | 170 | 6,859,796 |
| 1878 | 193 | 7,883,472 |
| 1879 | 200 | 8,348,810 |
| 1880 | 235 | 9,938,858 |
| 1881 | 277 | 12,065,323 |
| 1882 | 306 | 13,575,787 |
| 1883 | 293 | 13,263,255 |
| 1884 | 299 | 13,712,269 |
| 1885 | 312 | 14,659,271 |
| 1886 | 325 | 15,670,460 |
| 1887 | 335 | 16,367,987 |

SEA-GOING and Inland Lakes : Shipping employed, not including Coasting Vessels :—

| | Tonnage. | Sea-going Departed. | Tonnage Arrived. |
|------|------------|---------------------|------------------|
| 1868 | 12,982,825 | 2,215,312 | 2,104,009 |
| 1869 | 10,461,044 | 2,537,482 | 2,459,083 |
| 1870 | 11,415,870 | 2,476,354 | 2,608,519 |
| 1871 | 13,126,028 | 2,594,460 | 2,521,573 |
| 1872 | 12,808,160 | 2,956,911 | 2,988,793 |
| 1873 | 11,748,997 | 3,032,789 | 3,032,746 |
| 1874 | 11,399,857 | 2,973,374 | 3,077,987 |
| 1875 | 9,527,155 | 2,708,074 | 2,521,134 |
| 1876 | 9,911,199 | 2,938,305 | 2,972,459 |
| 1877 | 11,091,244 | 3,348,835 | 3,295,887 |
| 1878 | 12,054,890 | 3,342,919 | 3,341,465 |
| 1879 | 11,646,812 | 3,039,029 | 3,049,521 |
| 1880 | 13,577,845 | 3,298,979 | 3,487,735 |
| 1881 | 13,802,432 | 4,071,391 | 4,032,946 |
| 1882 | 13,379,882 | 4,003,410 | 3,933,152 |
| 1883 | 13,770,735 | 3,968,420 | 4,004,357 |
| 1884 | 14,359,026 | 4,233,636 | 4,250,665 |
| 1885 | 14,084,712 | 3,843,951 | 3,800,664 |
| 1886 | 13,969,232 | 4,018,156 | 4,026,415 |
| 1887 | 14,317,099 | 4,125,671 | 4,236,767 |

CANADA sea-going Shipping (arrived and departed) by nationalities :—

| | Registered Tonnage. |
|------|-------------------------|
| 1876 | 1,896,663 |
| | Canadian 1,634,333 |
| | United States 1,597,828 |
| | Foreign 782,389 |
| 1877 | 2,216,516 |
| | Canadian 1,897,094 |
| | United States 1,716,800 |
| | Foreign 814,412 |
| 1878 | 2,294,688 |
| | Canadian 1,928,531 |
| | United States 1,670,057 |
| | Foreign 791,078 |
| 1879 | 2,155,444 |
| | Canadian 1,786,310 |
| | United States 1,534,016 |
| | Foreign 662,780 |
| 1880 | 2,642,935 |
| | Canadian 1,794,210 |
| | United States 1,594,333 |
| | Foreign 755,236 |

| | Registered Tonnage. |
|------|------------------------------|
| 1881 | British..... 3,526,005 |
| | Canadian..... 1,865,612 |
| | United States..... 1,793,206 |
| | Foreign..... 919,514 |
| 1882 | British..... 3,164,839 |
| | Canadian..... 1,892,290 |
| | United States..... 1,884,654 |
| | Foreign..... 994,779 |
| 1883 | British..... 3,001,071 |
| | Canadian..... 1,886,166 |
| | United States..... 2,096,148 |
| | Foreign..... 989,392 |
| 1884 | British..... 3,257,219 |
| | Canadian..... 1,880,993 |
| | United States..... 2,239,576 |
| | Foreign..... 1,106,513 |
| 1885 | British..... 3,007,314 |
| | Canadian..... 1,598,894 |
| | United States..... 2,118,767 |
| | Foreign..... 919,640 |
| 1886 | British..... 3,101,289 |
| | Canadian..... 1,783,623 |
| | United States..... 2,190,700 |
| | Foreign..... 969,963 |
| 1887 | British..... 2,657,619 |
| | Canadian..... 2,314,109 |
| | United States..... 2,288,067 |
| | Foreign..... 1,102,641 |

CANADA Coasting Trade, Tonnage employed :—

| | Registered Tons. | Registered Tons. |
|------|------------------|-------------------------|
| 1868 | No returns. | 1878..... $ 11,047,661 |
| 1869 | " | 1879..... 12,066,633 |
| 1870 | " | 1880..... 14,053,013 |
| 1871 | " | 1881..... 15,116,766 |
| 1872 | " | 1882..... 14,791,064 |
| 1873 | " | 1883..... 15,683,666 |
| 1874 | " | 1884..... 15,473,707 |
| 1875 | " | 1885..... 15,944,421 |
| 1876 | $ 10,300,939 | 1886..... 16,368,274 |
| 1877 | 8,968,862 | 1887..... 17,513,677 |

TOTAL Production of Coal in the Dominion, Net Tons of 2,000 Pounds :—

| | Tons. | Tons. |
|------|-----------|---------------------|
| 1868 | 623,392 | 1878..... 1,109,595 |
| 1869 | 687,527 | 1879..... 1,152,783 |
| 1870 | 734,285 | 1880..... 1,456,795 |
| 1871 | 804,431 | 1881..... 1,514,642 |
| 1872 | 1,018,349 | 1882..... 1,845,548 |
| 1873 | 1,228,852 | 1883..... 1,831,819 |
| 1874 | 1,068,166 | 1884..... 1,997,368 |
| 1875 | 993,104 | 1885..... 1,973,987 |
| 1876 | 950,483 | 1886..... 2,104,170 |
| 1877 | 1,020,875 | 1887..... 2,387,875 |

NOVA SCOTIA coal Sales, (in Tons).

| Year. | Total Sales | Sales to Neighboring Provinces. | Sales to other Countries. | Sales for Home consumption. |
|-------|-------------|---------------------------------|---------------------------|-----------------------------|
| 1868 | 453,624 | 102,814 | 233,179 | 117,631 |
| 1869 | 511,795 | 129,148 | 266,210 | 116,427 |
| 1870 | 568,277 | 172,978 | 265,147 | 130,152 |
| 1871 | 593,419 | 164,578 | 278,209 | 149,632 |
| 1872 | 785,914 | 280,553 | 300,055 | 205,306 |
| 1873 | 881,106 | 337,977 | 327,834 | 215,295 |
| 1874 | 749,127 | 338,754 | 195,408 | 114,965 |
| 1875 | 706,795 | 381,711 | 112,454 | 212,630 |
| 1876 | 634,207 | 317,843 | 90,706 | 225,658 |
| 1877 | 687,065 | 291,447 | 136,828 | 255,790 |
| 1878 | 693,511 | 303,728 | 109,661 | 279,172 |
| 1879 | 688,624 | 341,391 | 69,113 | 278,120 |
| 1880 | 954,659 | 453,301 | 148,445 | 322,913 |
| 1881 | 1,035,014 | 503,611 | 148,950 | 382,413 |
| 1882 | 1,450,179 | 666,476 | 124,751 | 458,952 |
| 1883 | 1,297,523 | 688,111 | 138,085 | 471,327 |
| 1884 | 1,261,650 | 691,817 | 76,783 | 493,050 |
| 1885 | 1,254,510 | 769,643 | 40,215 | 454,652 |
| 1886 | 1,373,666 | 835,324 | 78,105 | 460,237 |
| 1887 | 1,519,684 | 970,037 | 80,183 | 469,464 |

SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

| Year. | Analysis of sales to neighboring Provinces. | | | |
|-------|---|-------------------------|-----------------------|-------------------------|
| | Sales to Quebec. | Sales to New Brunswick. | Sales to P.E. Island. | Sales to New-foundland. |
| 1868 | 187,059 | 68,217 | 26,840 | 55,861 |
| 1869 | 162,269 | 78,841 | 41,948 | 55,696 |
| 1870 | 189,754 | 85,968 | 43,641 | 62,348 |
| 1871 | 117,303 | 101,890 | 46,908 | 51,742 |
| 1872 | 95,118 | 104,818 | 45,169 | 49,342 |
| 1873 | 83,710 | 115,245 | 43,412 | 61,361 |
| 1874 | 154,118 | 84,731 | 44,891 | 57,651 |
| 1875 | 239,091 | 97,817 | 46,767 | 69,626 |
| 1876 | 268,628 | 123,526 | 49,313 | 62,174 |
| 1877 | 383,031 | 153,617 | 50,096 | 79,732 |
| 1878 | 410,605 | 167,740 | 48,088 | 61,678 |
| 1879 | 396,782 | 158,420 | 50,399 | 86,216 |
| 1880 | 493,917 | 148,634 | 52,770 | 74,322 |
| 1881 | 538,762 | 175,918 | 49,168 | 71,476 |
| 1882 | 650,858 | 186,511 | 50,615 | 82,053 |

TOTAL Consumption of coal in the Dominion, net tons of 2,000 pounds :—

| | Tons. | Tons. |
|------|-----------|-----------|
| 1868 | 714,893 | 1,665,814 |
| 1869 | 636,704 | 1,748,164 |
| 1870 | 859,630 | 2,094,844 |
| 1871 | 852,217 | 2,260,680 |
| 1872 | 1,227,653 | 2,708,654 |
| 1873 | 1,398,403 | 3,085,689 |
| 1874 | 1,454,636 | 3,566,873 |
| 1875 | 1,362,363 | 3,439,745 |
| 1876 | 1,466,531 | 3,515,769 |
| 1877 | 1,761,031 | 4,110,778 |

FIRE Insurance in Canada. Amount at risk Dec. 31st :—

| | $ | $ |
|------|---------------|-------------------------|
| 1869 | $188,359,809 | 1879..... $407,357,985 |
| 1870 | 191,594,586 | 1880..... 411,563,271 |
| 1871 | 228,453,784 | 1881..... 462,210,968 |
| 1872 | 251,722,940 | 1882..... 526,856,478 |
| 1873 | 278,854,835 | 1883..... 572,264,041 |
| 1874 | 306,848,219 | 1884..... 605,507,789 |
| 1875 | 384,421,029 | 1885..... 611,794,479 |
| 1876 | 454,608,180 | 1886..... 586,738,022 |
| 1877 | 420,342,681 | 1887..... 633,523,697 |
| 1878 | 409,899,701 | |

LIFE Insurance in Canada. Net Amount in force :—

| | $ |
|------|---------------|
| 1869 | $ 35,680,082 |
| 1870 | 42,694,712 |
| 1871 | 45,825,935 |
| 1872 | 67,234,684 |
| 1873 | 77,500,896 |
| 1874 | 85,716,325 |
| 1875 | 84,660,752 |
| 1876 | 84,344,916 |
| 1877 | 85,687,903 |
| 1878 | 84,751,937 |
| 1879 | 86,273,702 |
| 1880 | 90,289,293 |
| 1881 | 103,290,932 |
| 1882 | 115,044,048 |
| 1883 | 124,106,875 |
| 1884 | 135,453,726 |
| 1885 | 149,962,146 |
| 1886 | 171,315,696 |
| 1887 | 191,566,168 |

CANADIAN Bank Stocks, Highest and Lowest Quotations in Montreal during years ended Dec. 31st :—

| | No. of Banks. | Quotations. |
|------|---------------|-------------------------------------|
| 1868 | 13 | Highest 111 1-10 Lowest 104 2-10 |
| 1869 | 13 | Highest 120 Lowest 209 8-10 |
| 1870 | 13 | Highest 134 7-10 Lowest 108 7-10 |
| 1871 | 14 | Highest 143 7-10 Lowest 120 |
| 1872 | 16 | Highest 132 Lowest 113 |

| | No. of Banks. | Quotations. |
|-----------|---------------|-------------------------------------|
| 1873..... | 16 | Highest 120 8-10 Lowest 111 6-10 |
| 1874..... | 17 | Highest 122 8-10 Lowest 113 2-10 |
| 1875..... | 20 | Highest 121 1-10 Lowest 100 4-10 |
| 1876..... | 20 | Highest 112 3-10 Lowest 102 9-10 |
| 1877..... | 20 | Highest 106 2-10 Lowest 93 |
| 1878..... | 20 | Highest 100 5-10 Lowest 83 |
| 1879..... | 17 | Highest 93 4-10 Lowest 74 5-10 |
| 1880..... | 18 | Highest 115 7-10 Lowest 89 1-10 |
| 1881..... | 19 | Highest 126 8-10 Lowest 103 8-10 |
| 1882..... | 19 | Highest 133 Lowest 118 8-10 |
| 1883..... | 20 | Highest 132 6-10 Lowest 111 6-10 |
| 1884..... | 20 | Highest 120 3-10 Lowest 99 6-10 |
| 1885..... | 21 | Highest 114 6-10 Lowest 100 6-10 |
| 1886..... | 21 | Highest 129 3-10 Lowest 113 1-10 |
| 1887..... | 19 | Highest 137 2-10 Lowest 122 6-10 |

PRICES of Canadian Securities in London, in month of March :—

| Loan of | Amount. | Nature. | Ave. Rate Interest. | Average rate at which taken. |
|---------|--------------|---------------------------------|---------------------|------------------------------|
| 1869 | £ 3,000,000* | { $\frac{3}{4}$ Guaranteed | 4 p. c. } | Premium £ s. d. |
| 1873 | 1,800,000* | { $\frac{1}{2}$ Unguaranteed... | 5 p. c. } | " 4 7 8 |
| 1874 | 4,000,000* | { Guaranteed | 4 per cent. | " 9 19 3 |
| 1875 | 2,500,000* | { $\frac{1}{2}$ Unguaranteed... | 4 p. c. } | " 18 4 |
| 1876 | 3,500,000* | { Unguaranteed.. | 4 per cent. | " 9 0 0 |
| 1878 | 3,000,000† | { $\frac{3}{4}$ Guaranteed | 4 p. c. } | " 3 8 3 |
| 1879 | 3,000,000† | { $\frac{1}{2}$ Unguaranteed.. | 4 per cent. | " 4 18 1½ |
| 1884 | 5,000,000† | { Unguaranteed.. | 3½ " } | " 9 0 0 |
| 1885 | 4,000,000† | { Unguaranteed.. | 4 " } | Premium 1 1 8½ |

* Sinking fund of 1 per cent.

† " " " " for unguaranteed.

‡ No sinking fund.

TOTAL debt payable in London, July 1st, 1887 :—

| Rate of Interest. | Amount. |
|-------------------|---------------|
| 3½ per cent | $ 24,333,333 |
| 4 " | 140,856,599 |
| 5 " | 2,433,333 |
| 6 " | 4,052,473 |

Total.....$171,675,736

Interest paid.....$6,850,745

Average rate of interest:—1867, 5·55 per cent.; 1874, 5·35; 1877, 4·74; 1882, 4·39; 1887, 3·99.

I do not propose to detain the House very much longer, but, before sitting down, there are two or three questions to which the House will no doubt expect me to allude. When making the financial statement a year ago, I was obliged to state to the House that there was one cloud on the horizon. I think I would hardly be wrong in saying that there was a cloud both on the political and the commercial horizon; and that cloud was the very unpleasant relations which at that time threatened to arise between us and our great neighbors to the south of us, between the United States of America and Canada. I am happy to be able to congratulate the House on the present occasion, upon that cloud having been entirely swept away; and I am glad to be able to give to the House the most conclusive evidence that, I think, could be required on that point, by reading brief extracts from very high authorities, and which, I think, the House will regard as entirely conclusive upon that question. I will first read an extract from the Message sent by President Cleveland to the United States Senate, in submitting the treaty that was recently arranged at Washington between Great Britain and the United States of America, in which that gentleman used the following language:

"The treaty now submitted to you has been framed in a spirit of liberal equity and reciprocal benefits, in the conviction that mutual advantage and convenience are the only permanent foundation of peace and friendship between States, and that with the adoption of the Treaty now placed before the Senate, a beneficial and satisfactory intercourse between the two countries will be established, so as to secure perpetual peace and harmony."

Mr. Bayard, in a letter which I had occasion to quote, and which was made public in the United States, and which he addressed to parties who had invited him to go to New England to make a speech, said:

"Conciliation and mutual neighborly concessions have together done their honorable and honest work in this treaty, and paved the way for the relations of amity and mutual advantage."

I think, Sir, with that evidence, I am justified in congratulating the House that the only cloud that we could see upon the horizon has entirely passed away. The House of Commons of Canada have ratified that treaty by their action, and I have no doubt that the other branch of the Legislature, the Senate of Canada, will ratify that treaty; and I am still sanguine that that treaty will not be rejected by the Senate of the United States of America. But, as I said before, come what may, we have the fact placed on record from the very highest sources connected with the administration of that great republic, that the Government of Canada and the Parliament of Canada have been prepared, by mutual concession, to ratify a treaty which would dispose of any question that was causing so much unpleasantness between the two countries; and whatever may be the action of the Senate of the United States upon this question, I think I am not too sanguine in expressing the conviction that nothing will occur to disturb that continued harmonious intercourse between the two countries, that friendly reciprocity of good neighborhood, that will not only dispel any cause of anxiety in regard to our relations with the great republic, but will lead us to anticipate a larger and freer commercial intercourse than has hitherto taken place. I do not intend to ask the House, in going into Committee of Ways and Means, to make any alteration in the tariff. As I said before, nothing is more important in regard to the trade and business of a country, than confidence on the part of commercial men in the permanence of existing arrangements; and I feel that we can scarcely do a greater service to the country and to the development of our best interests, than by showing that it is not necessary continually to change our tariff arrangements. I am satisfied that no gentleman who has ever held the high position that I now occupy as Finance Minister, has been less troubled than I have been with applications for a change of tariff. I am quite certain that my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), when he held that position, had a hundred applications for a change of tariff during every year that he administered the duty of Finance Minister, for every single application that I have had during the present Session. I may be told that a hint which we gave to the country, rather discouraged applications; but at the same time I believe that it has, to a large extent, arisen from the fact of a general satisfaction upon the part of the country with the tariff which we now have upon the Statute-book, and a disposition not unnecessarily to disturb it, but to allow it to have an opportunity of being fairly tried and fairly tested. A year ago it became my duty to submit a very startling proposition to this House in regard to the iron industry of the country; it became my duty to make a very radical change in the tariff in regard to that industry. I think, considering the difficulties to which I have adverted, that capital is extremely cautious, that the capital required for the establishment of new iron industries is so enormously large, still we have every reason to be satisfied with the indication we see that there will be no want of capital in a short time, and that at no distant day we shall be able to manufacture, on Canadian soil, and with Canadian ore, all the iron—and a very enormous consumption per capita it is—that is used in our country. It has been a source of great gratification to me to be able to read to the House, as I have done, the evidences that we have on all sides from parties connected with the development, not only of the iron industry, but parties who are engaged in the various manufactures of iron, of uniform satisfaction; and I am safe in saying that I have not received from any source, from either a company or any important and prominent individual desiring to invest money in the iron industry, a single remonstrance against the very great change that was made a year ago. I have been pressed, and strongly pressed, to take another step in that direction, for the purpose of having steel rails manufactured in our country. I mentioned to the House a year ago that Canada was the only country in the world possessing 12,000 miles of railway within its borders, that did not manufacture its own steel rails, and I had the evidence presented to me that, by giving proper protection, such protection as we gave the other branches of the iron industry, we might succeed in establishing rolling mills for steel rails. But we had to take into consideration the fact of the enormous importance of the railway development of a country like Canada, and under those circumstances we have, although we considered it a subject worthy of attention, whenever it can be properly taken up—but considering the great and vital importance of railway extension to the prosperity of this country, we felt that we must postpone, at all events, for this year, making such a change as would lead to the establishment of rolling mills in this country for the manufacture of our own rails. I am glad, as I say, to be able to state to the House the uniform satisfaction that seems to be expressed all over this country in regard to the present tariff. I will not say more upon the subject than refer to the Bill that I propose to introduce in connection with the resolutions that are on the Table, when we go into Committee on Ways and Means. And that is to a large extent to meet the changes in the Act proposed, what I have termed the Mills' Bill. I need not remind this House of what I said a few days ago, that both parties in this House, whether in power or out of power, had been exceedingly anxious to obtain a return to the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, or such reciprocal trade relations as were enjoyed between Canada and the United States under that treaty. I am bound to say, I am quite certain every hon. gentleman who has looked into the subject with the care and attention I have,—and no doubt, considering its importance, a great many hon. gentlemen have done so,—I am bound to say that I believe this country would be greatly disappointed if the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 were re-enacted. While that treaty gave the most undoubted stimulus to the trade and business of Canada, while that treaty, advantageous as it was to Canada, was still more beneficial to the United States than it was to us, I cannot forget that a great change has taken place in this country and in the United States in a great many very important points that would bear upon the operation of that treaty if it were re-enacted to-morrow. But the House is perfectly aware that all the efforts, and they have been great and continuous, made by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House when in power to obtain a return to the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, have proved abortive. It would, perhaps, be a waste of time to go into the causes that have resulted in that; suffice it to know that all our efforts in that direction have ended in failure. The House is aware, from my statements on a former occasion, that we not only endeavored to obtain a re-enactment of the reciprocity treaty as a question of treaty, but that we also endeavored to promote a freer intercourse of trade, freer commercial relations between Canada and the United States, by the placing upon our Statute-book for a very long period of what was held to be a statutory invitation to the United States to meet us half-way in reference to certain articles. Those articles did not cover all the articles that were in the reciprocity treaty, but as long ago as 1849, Canada, before Confederation adopted that clause, and it has been re-enacted in every re-enactment of the Tariff Act, I believe, from that time down to the present period. The object of that was to direct the attention of our American neighbors to the fact that we were anxious to promote freer commercial intercourse between the two countries. It appears that certain articles that were named in that statutory clause were made free two or three years ago in the United States. Attention was not drawn to it, I believe it escaped the attention of hon. gentlemen on either side of the House, and the attention of the Government was not drawn to it until a very recent period.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Excuse me for mentioning it, but attention was drawn to it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We had an hour's discussion on it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In 1886.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then I must say, in justification of myself, that I do not think I was here in 1886.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think you were not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. At all events I do not remember, and I am not as a rule deficient in memory, the subject having been brought under the notice of the House, and although I have been a tolerably close observer, whether here or abroad, of what has transpired in this House, I do not remember to have seen any reference to the subject. If, as the hon. gentleman says, and I must of course, accept his statement, attention was drawn to it, I regret my own attention has not been drawn to it. However, the question when presented from that standpoint, and I may here mention that no communication down to this hour has been had with Her Majesty's Government on the question that certain articles contained in that statutory invitation had been made free in the United States, and I make this statement as I wish to correct an improper impression that has gone abroad that we had been in communication with Her Majesty's Government on this subject—when at a very critical period in the relations between the United States and Canada our attention was drawn to the question, we felt that under all the circumstances the wisest course to pursue was to meet the proposal that had been made and to put on the free list the articles that were contained in that clause and which had been made free by the action of Congress. I see a very erroneous impression is abroad in many quarters as to the effect of these resolutions which are placed upon the Table with a view to the amendment of that clause, or rather to its repeal and the substitution of a somewhat different clause, and that is that the effect of that action will be to destroy the effect of the proclamation which put the articles named on the free list. That is an entire misapprehension. Parliament clothed the Governor General in Council with power to put certain articles under certain conditions, upon the free list, and, that power having been exercised, those articles are on the free list of Canada and duties can only be imposed on those articles on the re-enactment of a new tariff placing duties upon them. I mention this because it has been stated in the press, and I do not consider it is an attempt to misrepresent the position, but it is a statement likely to create a very erroneous impression on that point. I have drawn the attention of the House to the fact that those difficulties having been removed, this cause of irritation, commercial and political, between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain and between the Governments of Great Britain and Canada, at a very early period we found a Bill introduced by Mr. Mills, Chairman of the Commission on Ways and Means, placing a number of articles in which we are very much interested in Canada, upon the free list. And I will say this, that it is one thing to make a treaty and another thing to make a statutory arrangement, to make a legislative reciprocity. You may be induced to put a large number of articles into a treaty that you do not desire to be made free, that if you had your choice you would not put on the free list, but you agree to it for the purpose of getting other articles there which you very much desire to be there; consequently a treaty is made a matter of mutual arrangement, of mutual concession, and it has the advantage that being a treaty it cannot be affected during its continuance by any legislative action on the part of one country or another. But under legislative reciprocity the whole thing is entirely changed, as the House will see, and we cannot imagine for a single moment that the policy of that great country is going to be materially influenced by any reference to Canada. When we take the proposal to put lumber on the free list, as it is proposed in the Mills' Bill, a Bill regarding which I still entertain a very sanguine hope, it will become law during the present session of Congress. I say when we find that to be the case, we know at once that it is not for the purpose of furthering Canadian interests. It is done simply because, in carrying out the policy of the Democratic party of the United States, they desire to make that article free in the interests of their own country, and in the interests of their own people. So in regard to a large number of other articles. But, as I have said, that proposal in the Mills' Bill is coupled with the statement that lumber will only be free to countries that have no export duty on logs. The consequence was that I introduced this Bill of which I have given notice in the resolutions, by which the export duty can be taken off logs by an Order of the Governor General in Council. If the Mills' Bill, a month hence, become law, and lumber of the other countries be free, our lumber would be met in the United States by the same duty as before the passage of that Act. Consequently it became necessary, as every gentleman in the House will see, that in order to give Canada the advantage of having this large industry relieved from the heavy duty which is imposed upon its products in the United States of America, it became absolutely necessary to arm the Governor General in Council with power, when that Bill became law, to repeal the export duty on logs, in order that we might enjoy the advantage that is thus given under that Act. But, Sir, we must not forget that although lumber may be made free, although a large number of other articles in which we are greatly interested may be made free under that Bill, that it is only an Act of legislation. It is not a treaty, it is not a matter of arrangement for ten or twelve years, as on former occasions of reciprocal action between the two countries which was arranged by treaty. We have the disadvantage of knowing that there is not that fixity in legislative arrangements that there would be under a treaty, but counterbalancing this we are left in Canada as free as the statesmen of the United States are left, in altering or modifying their legislation, and under a reciprocity of tariffs each country remains perfectly free from Session to Session, to make just such changes in extending the free list or in curtailing it and imposing duty upon articles that have previously been made free, as they had before. There is no obligation resting or binding upon either country, and, under those circumstances, I felt that it was right for the protection of Canadian interests that we should modify this clause and only embrace in it such articles as we were all quite satisfied it would be in the interest of Canada to make free, whenever they were made free in the United States of America. Salt stands in the same way. In the Mills Bill it is provided that salt shall be made free, but only that coming from such countries as do not charge duty upon salt going into that country out of the United States. So in the same way as in reference to lumber, in order to get the advantage of that Bill, if it were to pass to-morrow or a month hence, it was absolutely necessary the Governor General in Council should have power to deal with that subject so as to put salt on the free list, and give—as I have no doubt that action would give—a very great impetus to that very large and important industry in the Province of Ontario. Now, Sir, I do not think it will be necessary for me to say more in reference to that, but I want to draw the attention of the House for a few moments to a subject of very considerable importance. When I was standing here a year ago I congratulated the House, and I congratulate the country upon the fact, that the anxiety that parties wishing and desiring to invest their capital in the manufacturing industries of this country and in the development of our industries, had, in consequence of the doctrines held previously by the Liberal party, disappeared on account of the action of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I congratulated the House, and I congratulated the country, upon the fact that the great leader of the party opposite—I refer to the Hon. Mr. Blake—who was then and who so long led with so much ability in this House the party opposed to the Government—I congratulate the House that in the most formal and authentic manner, that hon. gentleman, on a most important occasion, on the eve and in the very throes of a general election, had declared to the people of this country that the antagonism of the Liberal party to the policy of protecting Canadian industries had ceased, and the hon. gentleman not only spoke with the high authority which attached to his name, and which attached to his position, but feeling that it was desirable on an occasion of that kind that there should be no misunderstanding; that everybody in this country should understand that we were as one upon this great question which had been so long a subject of such fierce controversy; referred especially to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and undertook to state to the country that he was expressing that hon. gentleman's views and expressing the views of the great party of which he was the leader still, when he made that important announcement. I do not hesitate to say that as a party man, as one who believes very earnestly that the best interest of Canada is intimately bound up with the success of the great Liberal Conservative party in this country, I read that announcement of Mr. Blake's with a good deal of dismay. Looking at it from a party standpoint I felt that he had made a great stride on the march to the Treasury benches. I always felt secure that so long as that hon. gentleman kept his party in battle array against giving such fostering protection to the industries of Canada, as had been found necessary to vitalise them and bring them into existence, that we were safe. But I felt that, however much we were in danger by the fact that the hon. gentleman had stepped upon a higher plane and placed himself before the people of this country in a position that took away one of the strongest arguments we could present to the country to induce them to keep hon. gentlemen opposite discharging the important functions of a loyal and constitutional Opposition—I say, Sir, although I felt this, I felt also that the loss to the party was more than counterbalanced by the gain to the country, in the assurance to the capitalists of the world and the telling to them: You need not fear, you are no longer in danger, there is no party with free trade colors nailed to the mast, you need not fear that if we get into power we will destroy your capital. It reassured not only the capitalists, Sir, but that body which is of more vital and greater importance than the capitalists, the laboring class of this country. In informing the laboring man who had been lifted by this policy of fostering our industries from the condition of helpless poverty into one of comfort, the laboring man would no longer tremble at the thought of hon. gentlemen opposite obtaining a position on this side of the House, and discharging the administrative functions of the Government of the country, because they were told that all these fears might be at once and forever thrown aside, and that the party had shown that it was possible that they could learn something. They had shown that it was possible for them at last when face to face with the great throbbing pulse of the public sentiment of this country, to ascertain what the people of this country had deliberately resolved upon, a policy that the people had deliberately and again and again affirmed was the true policy to be pursued in this country. Still, Sir, I need not tell you with what regret I learned that all these congratulations that I had offered to hon. gentlemen opposite, all these congratulations I had offered to this House, all these congratulations I had offered to this country, had to be re-called. I need not tell you, Sir, the regret with which I learned of this—not again as a party man, because, looking at it from a party standpoint, I felt that hon. gentlemen opposite could do us no greater service as a party than to fall back from the high position they had taken, and to take back this deliberate announcement made in the most formal way to the people of all Canada as to what the future trade policy of hon. gentlemen opposite would be. Well, Sir, what was proposed? Why, Sir, when that great and distinguished leader of the party was obliged, by causes which we all deplore, to deprive the Parliament of Canada of the great advantage of his presence, we know that very soon, notwithstanding the amiable qualities of the gentleman who has so worthily succeeded him, notwithstanding that he is a gentleman whom we all respect, we found that the Liberal ship was drifting without a rudder. Instead of the firm hand of the captain on the tiller, we found a vacillating hand. The hon. gentleman with his conservative instincts—so conservative that I have always wondered, ever since I have had the honor of meeting him in this House, that he was not on our side instead of where he is—I say the hon. gentleman, with his conservative instincts, when it was proposed to go back on the policy propounded by his leader and accepted by his party, and deliberately sanctioned by the people who sent them to this House—when it was proposed to the hon. gentleman to go back on all that, he hesitated long; and when it was propounded to him further that we should take so radical a step as to virtually change the constitution of our country, the hon. gentleman showed more than a disinclination to be led into that course. But, Sir, we found the Liberal ship, having lost its rudder, in the hands of the hon. gentleman opposite, scarcely apparently knowing in what direction to attempt to move. We found it drifting upon the rock of commercial union. Sir, I am glad to believe that the hon. gentleman did not commit himself to that policy; I hope, for his own sake, and for the sake of the record that will remain of him as a public man after we all pass away, that he did not commit himself to that policy; but it cannot be forgotten, Sir, that hon. gentlemen holding high and commanding positions in the party, were ready to adopt commercial union as the policy of the Liberal party. We know, Sir, that commercial union was developed by Mr. Wiman, a gentleman of great ability, a gentleman of immense pecuniary resources, and I think I would not be doing him a particle of injustice if I were to add—for it is no disgrace to him—a gentleman of unbounded ambition, living in the city of New York and a resident of the United States for many years, and who left his country greatly to his own advantage undoubtedly; and I congratulate him on his success most heartily. If we do lose a man, if a Canadian goes to the United States, I care not in what capacity, I want to see him occupy the highest and most important position a man can occupy. But, Sir, what did we see? We found that gentleman prepared to place himself at the head of the great Liberal party of Canada. We found that gentleman, not only with the ambition, but the vanity, notwithstanding the great names and the great abilities possessed by a large number of gentlemen in that party, to aspire to place himself at their head, and dictate to the Liberal party of Canada what should be their policy with respect to the most vital and important and momentous issues in this country. Well, Sir, it is a great advantage for a movement to have a man of unlimited pecuniary resources associated with it. Everybody knows that in these days it is no detriment to a cause to have men in it who have not only the will, but the means to put their hands in their pockets to advance its interest.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Like Sir Hugh Allan.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Wiman had those other advantages, and I do not hesitate to say he had the still greater advantage of being a man of marked ability. Well, Sir, what was the result? Why, Sir, he soon—whether by some human device or not, we are not able to fathom—secured the services of two leading journals of Canada, the Globe newspaper and the Mail newspaper, to advocate the cause of commercial union. But, Sir, we found not only these two leading journals committing themselves to the policy of commercial union, but we found one after another of the great lights of the Liberal party giving more than countenance to that policy. Where is it now, Sir? Why, Sir, a discovery was made, and I feel that a meed of praise is owing to the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) in this regard. I believe he is the man who held out the beacon light to keep the great party with which he is connected from drifting on the rock which he had the sagacity to see, would have consigned it to political perdition. We not only found that hon. gentleman becoming alive and awake to the dangerous direction in which his party was drifting, but we very soon found that he had influence enough to rescue the organ of the Liberal party from a policy that would have undoubtedly ended at an early day in the utter destruction of the party. And what is the result? The result is that Mr. Wiman, with all his money, with all his ability, with all his ambition, stands to-day alone on the policy of commercial union, without a follower, without a supporter, in the whole of Canada. That, Sir, is the position. He found himself face to face with the loyal British sentiment that is too deeply rooted in the hearts of Canadians to allow them for one moment to adopt a policy which every man with a particle of sagacity must see would result in Canada either occupying the most deplorable and contemptible position that any free country could ever occupy, that of having its tariff and taxes imposed by a Government with which it had no connection, or taking the next and inevitable step, of becoming a part of that great country. Brought face to face with that sentiment, which fills the breasts of Canadians to an extent as great as it does those of the people of any portion of Her Majesty's Empire, the ship was steered away, and, Sir, what for? Only to escape destruction on the rock of commercial union, to be stranded on the shoals of unrestricted reciprocity. There it lies to-day, Sir, a great party, a party possessing men of the highest order of talent, a party embracing a great body of the independent yeomanry of this country, who give it an enthusiastic support, a party possessing every quality necessary to lead it to power except fixed principles, in accord with the sentiments of the country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope my hon. friend will allow me to take that back, if he supposes me to use the expression in the sense of unprincipled. Not at all. What I say is this, and I say it in no invidious sense—I say that the seeking of power, the desire to obtain power for the sole purpose of governing a country, is, in my judgment, the most unworthy one that could ever stimulate a party. I say that the object of obtaining office must be, if it is to be useful to the country, inspired by the conviction that the attainment of power will be the means of enabling the party to carry out such a policy and such principles as will promote the progress and prosperity of the country. When I speak of the want of principle, I speak of it in that sense; I speak of the want of any fixed principle that will commend itself to the judgment of the independent yeomanry of Canada as inspiring the party which seeks their suffrages.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Something like the standing offer that you refer to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will not occupy the time of the House much longer, but I want to draw the attention of the House for a single moment to the supreme folly of any Canadian statesman talking about unrestricted reciprocity. I put aside as a minor matter the question that in order to get unrestricted reciprocity you must bring the people face to face with the consequence of direct taxation. That I take to be admitted by the gentlemen opposite.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If they do not, they ought to admit it, for it is plainly to be seen. No man who has yet undertaken to give during this long debate, to which I was sorry not to have the pleasure of listening but which I read, a single statement asking this country to commit itself to what I conceive to be the mad folly of unrestricted reciprocity, has ventured to put before this House or formulate any system by which it could be carried out if we got it to-morrow. If they say they are going to let the United States supply Canada with everything without a farthing of tariff being imposed on it, where is the revenue to come from? The United States are perfectly able to supply this country with everything we require, and I want to know in that case where is your revenue to come from? But, I am not going to waste the time of the House in discussing the wildest chimera that was ever put before a sensible people. I put aside the question of the enormous direct taxation that would crush the people of this country. I put aside the question of imperilling the industry, the capital, the labor of this country, as they would be imperilled. I put aside the fact which everybody knows, and which my hon. friend admitted, when he stood here battling with heavy deficits and struggling to make the revenue of this country meet the very moderate necessities of this country, the hon. gentleman then was impelled to pursue a very economical and moderate course in reference to public expenditure. I say, when he was face to face with deficits, when he, as Finance Minister of Canada, told the people of this country that he could not add a small percentage to the duties on imports, that he could not increase the revenue to even a small extent unless he did it by direct taxation —

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not say that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If my hon. friend says he did not say that, I will say that his memory and mine are not together on that question.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Quite so.

43-1888-3

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And he knows better perhaps than I do; but I understood the hon. gentleman to say, when he was admitting a serious and formidable deficit, that he would be glad to provide for it, but that he did not know of any means of further increasing the revenue except by direct taxation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, I did not say that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says I misunderstood him.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Quite so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And I suppose I have misunderstood him. But independently of that, what is the fact? Why, he knows that Canada was then the slaughter market of the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He knows that every interest in Canada was paralysed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not a bit of it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman knows that every interest in Canada—that is my opinion—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is all right, but you said I knew.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That Canada was made a slaughter market for the United States. Does the hon. gentleman want to take Canada back to 1874, 1875, 1876, and 1877?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. She was in a great deal better position then than she is in to-day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does he want to allow the enormous capital, the great skill, which has made the United States to-day one of the foremost manufacturing countries of the world, to sweep our younger industries, with their smaller capital, out of existence, and to compel the labor of this country, which, after all, it is our most vital and important consideration to keep in our midst, to go, as it had to go in those dark years of Canada, down to Boston and New York, to do in another country the work required to be done in Canada, and which a subsequent Canadian Government found that Canadians could do on Canadian soil? I have used a strong term; I have said this scheme of unrestricted reciprocity is a folly, a mad folly; and I say so for this reason, that if every man in this House was of opinion that Canada should commit suicide, as it would have to do by adopting unrestricted reciprocity—I say if that was the position of every man of both sides of the House, we would have no more chance of obtaining unrestricted reciprocity with the United States than we would have of dictating to the Imperial Parliament who should advise Her Majesty's Ministers. Not a bit more. I can scarcely find any simile or language that would show the helplessness and the utter futility of adopting such a policy. This subject has been discussed now for many months, it has been put forth in the most captivating form by the ablest men on the opposite side of the House, both in this House and abroad through the country, and they have found papers so wanting in information and so blindly subservient to party influences as to advocate their scheme—and what has been the result? Why, point me to a paper in the United States, Republican or Democratic, mugwump or anything else—show me a single paper possessing the slightest influence in that country that would ever give support to a scheme which would take away the barriers between the trade of Canada and the trade of the United States, and leave Canada free to admit the products of England.—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.—and the other parts of the world.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is what you call unrestricted reciprocity.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say you will search in vain.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I dare say.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You will find no man in Congress who will support such a scheme. Mr. Butterworth, in his Bill, provides that nothing shall be done until there is an arrangement by which all this is to be managed. In these vague terms, he seeks to get over the difficulty, but he knows that neither in the Senate, nor in the House of Representatives, nor in the press, nor among the public men or statesmen of that great country, could you find a man occupying influence or position who would dare to stand up in that country and propound the policy that Canada should have free trade with the United States, and make as low a tariff as she pleased at the same time with England.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I dare say not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the reason why, in my judgment, I am not using too strong a term, when I say that a madder act of folly for a party to commit itself to could not be discovered, if they offered a premium to any person to discover it. Yesterday these hon. gentlemen stood face to face with the people of Canada with a policy that everybody understood. Yesterday they stood face to face with the people of Canada declaring that they had learnt something by their long term in Opposition, and were prepared, if entrusted with power, to protect the labor and the capital and the industry of the country. To-day they have escaped sudden destruction on the rock of commercial union only to be stranded on the shoals of unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You were very near there yourself.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says I was very near there myself. I am puzzled to know what sort of a mental organisation a man must possess who cannot discover the distinction between an unrestricted offer and unrestricted reciprocity. When as a negotiator, when as one of Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries, it became my duty to ascertain whether the United States were prepared to meet us half way or to do anything to remove the obstructions to the freer commercial intercourse which we all desire, when I was in that position, I put an unrestricted offer before them certainly, but did I say anything about unrestricted reciprocity? What was that offer? Did it commit me to anything except that I was prepared to negotiate in regard to the question of freer commercial intercourse? The hon gentleman said, you made an unrestricted offer. I said I did, and I did so deliberately, because if the statesmen of the United States were prepared to offer us unrestricted reciprocity, I wanted to know it, but I was not committed to it. I said that I was prepared to negotiate the settlement of the fisheries, difficulty on the basis of freer commercial intercourse, but I ask any hon. gentleman on the other side if I would not have had a perfect answer to any proposition, either that the proposal did not go far enough or that it went too far.

Mr. MACKENZIE. You made an offer, but you did not mean it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says that I made an offer which I did not mean. That would be a very mean thing to do. I think my hon. friend cannot mean that. I made an offer in a broad, comprehensive and statesmanlike form, meaning exactly what I said, that I was prepared or that the British plenipotentiaries, who authorised me to make the offer, were prepared to negotiate the settlement of the fisheries question upon the basis of greater freedom of intercourse between the United States and Canada; but did that commit me? I was asking for what every public man in this country, every man on both sides of this House, has endeavored to obtain and has asked for over and over again.

Mr. MACKENZIE. If they accepted your offer, would not that have committed you?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, it would not have committed me to this. I tell my hon. friend, as I have already explained, that, if they had accepted the offer and had said, Yes, we will settle this question on terms of greater freedom of commercial intercourse, and had then said: We are prepared to negotiate in regard to those terms, and had asked: What greater freedom do you wish? I would have formulated the greater freedom which we desire and would have put a distinct statement before them. Then I would have been bound to formulate my policy and to say how far I was prepared to go or how far I required them to go in order to negotiate the question on that basis. If I had to take up more time to teach hon. gentlemen the difference between an unrestricted reciprocity, I should despair, and I will save my breath for something more important. When we took up this question of fostering our native industries, many parties in England attacked me in reference to it, and asked, what do you mean by turning your back upon the English free trade policy and taking up the United States protective policy? I said: If you were placed in our position, with a population of five millions alongside of a country with sixty millions of people, and with only an invisible line dividing the two countries, you would understand. I said to them, as I have stated in this House, that no Canadian statesmen can formulate a fiscal policy for this country without having regard to these policy of the nation to the south of us; and I said further that it was of the greatest interest to Canada to have the freest intercourse possible with them, consistent with safeguarding the best and highest interests of the people of Canada. Now, what do you find? You find the Republican party of the United States standing firm by a protective policy, you find them standing by a policy of high protection for American industries. That is their policy. Do you find any free trade party in that country? If you think there is any such party, read Mr. Mills' Bill, and that is the exposition of the views of the administration of the United States and of the great Democratic party. Do you find any free trade in that Bill? I have shown that he proposes the enormous reduction on all the iron industries of the United States from 43½ per cent. to 41½ per cent. That is the free trade proposed under Mr. Mills' Bill. He proposes, it is true, what is also our policy, to make raw materials and natural products free, but that is also a protective policy. Everything that makes the living of the artisan cheaper and furnishes the raw material to the manufacturer cheaper, enables you to raise the same revenue and at the same time to protect the article. There you have the great statesmen of that country, who have been able to excite the admiration of the civilised world by the great condition of prosperity and progress into which they have brought their country; you have Republican and Democrat united in demanding and maintaining a system of protection for the capital, for the industries, and for the labor of the people of the United States. This is their position, and it is ours. I do not intend to weary the House with any further remarks, except to say that, although I have had the unpleasant duty to perform—and I hope my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) will not press me too hard on that ground—of showing that we have had a little check on our onward progress, he must not forget that the policy which was adopted of fostering the industries of this country so as strengthened the hands of the Government and of Parliament, so filled the treasury of the country, as to enable us to construct public works of the most gigantic extent, and of the most undoubted importance to every section of this country; he must not forget that Canada has built these great public works—and not only one side but both sides of the House have been concerned in that, because hon. gentlemen opposite completed the Intercolonial Railway, as far as it can be said, I suppose, ever to be completed—from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and the people of Canada have found the means to construct one of the most gigantic works that any five millions of people in any part of the world have ever been able to construct. We have found means to stimulate the various interests of the country, we have found means to promote every industry except lumber, which, I hope, in a very short time is going to have its innings, under the Bill which I am at present laying on the Table. We have a country vast in extent, illimitable in resources, whether by sea or land; we have inexhaustible riches in the seas which surround us, and it is in our own hands to develop them. We have a mercantile marine which would be the pride and admiration of any country, and which is only surpassed by that of four nations in the world. Sir, I remember the hon. gentleman opposite, on one or two occasions, endeavoring to cover me with ridicule because I made a calculation of how much wheat could be grown in the North-West by 100,000 farmers, cultivating 320 acres of land each, with a yield of 20 bushels to the acre. What does he say now? Will he repeat that to-day when we have the facts before us, that 16,000 farmers in Manitoba and the North-West of this country, have produced from 13,000,000 to 16,000,000 bushels during the past year? Sir, the abnormal difficulties that were experienced there, the inexperience of the country by the new men who went into it, and a variety of other difficulties, have disappeared, and so far as the development of that country is concerned, we are now entering upon a career of rapid advancement that I believe will, at an early day, give us much greater surprises than that which is at this moment occupying the attention of thoughtful agriculturists over the civilised world, that is, a country producing 50 and even 60 bushels to the acre, upon the average, over large farms. I do not mean to say that is the average in the country, but I mean to say that, on a number of large agricultural holdings in the North-West and I am told that when the grain was threshed out it measured from 50 to 60 bushels per acre, covering the whole crop on the farm. I hope that is true. Hon. gentlemen opposite will be as glad as I will be if that statement turns out to be true. I say, under the circumstances, what has Canada to be afraid of, if we have accomplished all this, if we have brought our country to the position which she occupies to-day? There is no member of this House who does not know that both in England and the United States Canada is beginning to attract an amount of attention that a few years ago the most of us would have believed it impossible to attain. I say, Sir, what have we to be afraid of, with a hardy, enterprising and intelligent population, with men who, man for man, are ready, in a fair field, to enter into competition with the men of any other country in the world—with a fair field, not handicapped mind you, but with a fair field—I say, what have we to be afraid of? Sir, we have the most abundant evidence that it is only necessary for us to have confidence in ourselves, and to devote ourselves unsparingly in the future to the great task of developing the inexhaustible resources of this country. Then, whenever the time comes that, as hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think, we shall have the management of these matters entirely in our own hands, we shall be able to enter upon even terms, into negotiations with other countries for the extension of our commercial relations. I say, Sir, that we not only have the advantage of this great domain, with its inexhaustible resources, but we have over us the flag of the mightiest empire in the world, and under its ægis we can go forth with greater confidence than any man can possess, representing a community of only five millions of people, we can go forth knowing that in the remotest section of the world that flag is waving over our heads, that there are behind us an army, a navy, and a moral force of a great empire that will give Canada all the protection that she can desire. Sir, under these circumstances, to throw away our birthright for a mess of pottage, to go looking for commercial reciprocity with a foreign country—even if we could obtain it, I say a policy of that kind would be, in my opinion, to make us forget what Canadians never will forget, the gratitude they owe to the great empire of which we form a part, and the duty of building up on this northern portion of the continent of America, a power to which every Canadian will feel proud to belong.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Call it 6 o'clock.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps it would be as well, but I wish to say one or two words to the hon. gentleman. I regret extremely, for his own sake, that he was not present during the reciprocity debate. It would have interested us all to have heard what he had to say then. Had he been present then, he never would have talked the intolerable rubbish he has done to-night about unrestricted reciprocity. But I agree with him that it is not possible just now to enter into a discussion of that subject, and so, as the hon. Minister has suggested, I will call it 6 o'clock.

It being 6 o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 72) to incorporate the New York, St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Wood, Brockville.)

Bill (No. 30) to authorise the town of Kincardine, in the county of Bruce, to impose and collect certain Tolls at the Harbor in the said Town.—(Mr. Rowand.)

Bill (No. 61) respecting the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Rykert.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the speech of the hon. the Minister of Finance may be said to be properly divided into three parts. The first version was a candid and businesslike statement of the affairs of the country, carefully prepared and carefully read; a departure no doubt from our ordinary custom but one under which the circumstances I do not think anybody ought to object to, inasmuch as it is extremely desirable that a Minister of Finance in making such a statement should guard against any incautious or ill-considered words, which might per- adventure, be afterwards used, or misunderstood, to his detriment. I have my doubts, Sir, if the hon. the Minister of Finance quite clearly saw the full import of all the statements which he made in the early part of his speech. I have my doubts whether he entirely comprehended their bearing on certain proposals to which he alluded, and very gingerly indeed, in the course of the discussion, but of which we will hear more I do not doubt, before this debate is closed and assuredly before this House is prorogued. The second part of his speech was mainly devoted to an advertisement, or, perhaps, I might more properly describe it a prospectus, lacking nothing in fulness of accuracy and detail of the Londonderry steel works and all that pertains thereto, saving and excepting a list of the shareholders past, present and to come, but possibly this may be in the documents the hon. gentleman handed to the reporters. But in the third part of his speech, the old Adam asserts itself, and we hear once more those thundering tones impassionately declaimed, with which the hon. gentleman was wont to tickle the ears of the groundlings on that side of the House when he had the honor of sitting here and when we had the honor of sitting on the opposite benches. There was the same glorious inconsequence, there was the same magnificent audacity, and the same superb self-confidence which has so often led the hon. gentleman to wrestle with facts, and so often resulted in facts getting the worst of it. Mr. Speaker, it is hard to say what we are to admire the most, and I use the word admire rather in the American sense than in the English in this matter, whether it was the tender solicitude for the welfare of the Liberal party displayed by the hon. gentleman—and the hon. gentleman knows how sincere it was—lest we had made a mistake and thereby put off indefinitely our chance of returning to office which the hon. gentleman no doubt most sincerely declared or implied, that he desired in the interests of the country, if only we would alter our position in one little matter, or whether the House should most admire the hon. gentleman's grand and magnificent explanation of the devotion to fixed principles, which has so uniformly distinguished not only the hon. gentleman but all the hon. gentleman's colleagues in all the many years he has been acquainted with them. It does infinite credit to the hon. gentleman's command of face, when we recall the events of the last few months and recollect that the apostle to-night of fixed principle is the same Minister of Finance, who was a member of the self-same Cabinet about a year ago, when they explained to the British Government and to this House, that the concessions demanded by the Americans could not possibly be made to them without treason to their country and without utterly destroying the entire value of our fisheries, and who twelve days ago came down with propositions to this House enforced with all the hon. gentleman's eloquence and energy, in which he proved to us most conclusively that his late colleagues (or his present colleagues I should say) had not quite fully understood the situation, that they had gone a little too far, and that he in his wisdom had come to see the necessity of a totally different conclusion and to make them see it too. Sir, is this adherent, this apostle as I said, of fixed principles the self-same hon. gentleman, a member of the self-same Cabinet who twelve months ago compelled this House by an enormous majority to declare that disallowance must be rigorously practised in Manitoba at the peril of the most tremendous consequences to the people of this country who had invested so many million dollars in developing that country, who about three months ago, as the papers laid on the Table of the House show, addressed a formal communication of the greatest weight to the English Government, in which he pointed out that the greatest interests of Canada would be imperilled if these pernicious Manitobans were permitted to construct a railway of 60 miles to the American frontier; and who are at this present moment in the act and instant—not of free grace or free will, but on compulsion, applied directly to them by these same despised Manitobans—of proposing to us to add to the enormous burdens of the people of this country in order to compensate a well-paid corporation for giving up a monopoly which those men of fixed principles told us could not be given up without the greatest peril to this country? Are they the self-same parties who a few weeks ago declared—although there the hon. gentleman was not inconsistent—that it was in the highest degree treasonable and traitorous to this country to ask that certain goods which the Americans had put on their free list, should also be placed on ours, and who, about a week thereafter, at the instance of the hon. gentleman, who had the good sense to see where their senseless obstinacy was leading them, issued a proclamation to do that which they declared, only a week before, could not be attempted without treason to this country? Sir, one is almost tempted to ask, are there, if I may be permitted to use the phrase, two Tupperts or one Tupper in the field? We know that the hon. gentleman can show two distinct faces rather irreconcilable to the situation. But are there two wholly different gentlemen, one of whom was present twelve months ago, and one of whom is present to-day? I rather think not; I rather think that when nature made the mould in which the hon. gentleman is cast, she broke it forthwith; and perhaps it was just as well. Sir, here we have this same hon. gentleman, who is so touchingly afraid lest the Opposition should become inconsistent, declaring in one breath—and there I agree with him—that Canadians in a fair field are able to hold their own in any country under heaven, and in the next breath deprecating competition by these same Canadians with the people of the United States. We have had these gentlemen boasting of what Manitoba has done in spite of a high and vile tariff, in spite of a viler land policy, and in spite of a vilest railway monopoly; and we hear this same hon. gentleman, who is responsible for the tariff and the land policy, and more than any other man in Canada responsible for the railway monopoly, absolutely congratulating us on the progress which is likely to ensue in Manitoba when these disabilities, and most of all, this last disability, are removed. Sir, we had the hon. gentleman declaring, in one breath, that unrestricted reciprocity was a folly, and in the next admitting that he had offered that same thing, just to see what the Americans would say about it. Sir, the hon. gentleman told us—and there again I rather agree with him—that it did not commit him to anything. What, Mr. Speaker, in the name of wonder, could commit this Government or any member of it to anything, I should like to know? He asked us why it was that the Liberal party never reminded the Government of the statutory offer of the United States—as if it was our business to acquaint them with what passed in the United States. I have the Hansard of 1886 under my hand, showing that for an hour I, myself, my hon. friend from Bothwell, and others of my hon. friends here, pleaded with the hon. gentleman, who sits behind him, not to impose those enormous and exorbitant duties on green fruits and other things coming into the country, because the Americans had made them free, and because, as I told him, we were bound, by our statutory offer likewise, to put them on the free list. The hon. gentleman declared, and perhaps declared truly, that I had a hundred applications to add to the burdens of the people in the shape of new taxes for one which was made to him. Sir, that may be true. What, I should like to know, have the hon. gentleman and his colleagues left untaxed? Look over the free list from end to end, and can he or any of his friends point out to me one single article which enters into the general consumption of the people of Canada that is left untaxed, save only the articles of tea, and one particular species of coal? The hon. gentleman desires to know if we should go back to 1874. Sir, there is no such luck for the people of Canada. I would to heaven that we could go back to 1874. I would to heaven that we could undo the villainous mischief, the era of folly and extravagance which have disgraced the history of Canada during the last ten years. But, Sir, unhappily no such thing is possible, and we must recognise the changed situation. The hon. gentleman declared—and upon my word, audacious as he is, I wondered to hear any man in his position, or any position, make such a statement—that the effect of putting additional duties on iron was to produce new discoveries of iron ore in the neighborhood of Port Arthur and elsewhere; and he also declared, on the authority of a gentleman who had been greatly enriched by his iron taxation, that he never heard of a consumer who complained of those duties. Sir, the hon. gentleman must have been deaf in both ears. If there is one subject more than another on which complaints have been rung into my ears from the day the hon. gentleman put on his duties to the present time, it is the oppressive incidence of those iron taxes on vast classes of our population. And then, Sir, the hon. gentleman wound up by declaring that no man in the United States, no party in the United States, and not one single journal of repute in the United States, would go in for unrestricted reciprocity, but he did not add, as defined by a high commissioner and plenipotentiary, Sir Charles Tupper. Sir, I agree with the hon. gentleman in this, that if our proposition had been such as he defined it to be, if it had been one for annulling and repealing the whole system of trade of the United States, and for turning Canada into a vast smuggling depot from which people at pleasure might import goods into any part of the United States, it was the maddest folly to propound any such proposition. But, Sir, when did any man in this House, when did any journal of the Liberal party, or any other party, ever profess to expect that the Americans would entertain any proposition for unrestricted reciprocity which at the same time meant free trade with England? If the hon. gentleman had done me the honor to read the speech I delivered on the question, he would have seen that several pages were devoted to pointing out that it was of the essence and necessity of any proposition made by Canada for unrestricted reciprocity, that we must discriminate in certain lines of goods against England and all other countries; and I defy the hon. gentleman to say that he can name any journal or any man of note in the United States, who, if that had been explained to them, who, if the proposition had been placed before them as I have placed it in document before this House, would have declared that they would refuse to consider it. If the hon. gentleman will look at the language of Secretary Bayard, if he will look at the language which President Cleveland, time and again, has addressed to the Congress of the United States, if he will look at the language used by Mr. Mr. Butterworth in his Bill, he will see that he is wholly mistaken in supposing that such a proposition as the one we advanced has been refused or criticised in an unfriendly fashion by the distinguished gentleman to whom I have referred, or, for that matter, by any other public men of note in the United States. But it is interesting to note—and I call on my hon. friends to take special note of it, I call on the press to take special note of it, I call on the people of Canada to take special note of it—that the hon. gentleman by his own words admits that he and his party are utterly unable to solve or to grapple with this problem. I well believe it. There is no doubt whatever that to grapple successfully with the great enterprise to which we have set our hands, requires the greatest prudence, and the greatest economy. There is no doubt it requires a knowledge of the first principles on which honest taxation should be based, it requires the greatest wisdom for the welfare of Canada and not for retaining place by grants to combines and trusts and monopolies; it requires the greatest statesmanship and patriotism—a statesmanship and patriotism not of the order which, in two periods amounting together to fifteen years, has trebled the debt and the taxes of the people of Canada; not of the order of statesmanship and patriotism which has succeeded in those periods in driving away something like two millions of people from our shores; not of the order of statesmanship and patriotism which succeeded in provoking two rebellions in the North-West and would have provoked the third, had these hon. gentlemen not cooled down in time and surrendered to force and threats what they would not give to justice and reason. For the rest, I have to tell the hon. gentleman what he, as a medical man of renown must know, that it is not our business to prescribe until we are called in. If he and his friends cannot solve this problem, I can tell him that we can, and are prepared to do it in case of need. But I am not going to commit the gaucherie of drawing up a budget, out of which he may take such plums as he pleases, and hold me responsible.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT,

Mr. HICKEY. Very sour plums.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I was inclined to smile at the tribute which the hon. gentleman paid to my worthy friend, Mr. Blake. I have no hesitation in saying that in the language he used with respect to that eminent statesman, he spoke the simple and literal truth; but it is most noteworthy that these worthies on the other side never discover the purity of statesmanship and the worth of any Liberal leader until that Liberal leader is out of their way. They belong to the tribe, they are the true spiritual descendants of that people whose fathers stoned the prophets and whose descendants built their tombs. So long as Mr. Blake was here, using his great power to unmask the schemes of those hon. gentlemen, how few compliments were paid to him from these benches. So long as my hon. friend Mr. Mackenzie was able to lift his voice, as he was wont to do, in defence of the right and truth, so long was his reputation not particularly respected by these hon. gentlemen, but when these two gentlemen have been stricken by the hands of disease, we find all of a sudden hon. gentlemen opposite are awaking to their great virtue and patriotism, particularly if they think any word of theirs can, by any possibility, be twisted to the detriment of the Liberals who survive. I would not wonder that if anything should happen to me and I were compelled to absent myself from political life, I might be canonised in my turn. My patriotism, my loyalty, my statesmanship, and all the rest of it might be flaunted in the faces of my hon. friends on this side, if any good opportunity presented itself, by hon. gentlemen opposite. But I am on the whole content to be where I am; I am not anxious for premature exaltation in that way.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Even at the price?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Even at the price. I must, however, on behalf of my hon. friend, Mr. Blake, take serious exception to the very gross misconstruction which was placed on his words by the hon. the Minister of Finance. What did Mr. Blake say? I know what he said. I know what Mr. Blake meant, and I have to tell the hon. gentleman this: Let him take my hon. friend's speech from end to end, and you will not find one syllable in it in favor of protection, or in approval of the National Policy. What my hon. friend did was to point out, in very express and particular language, the monstrous injustice of the present tariff, more particularly as it affected the poorer classes of the community and the agricultural classes. What he did was to point out how very grievously the interests of consumers at large had been set at naught in the framing of that tariff, and it is noteworthy that in that very speech, in the speech—because they will not quote the speech, they quote merely fragments from it which suit their purpose—but even in that little fragment quoted my hon. friend expressly declared, in so many words, that relief from these difficulties was to be sought in freer trade relations with the United States. What he did say was this, and hon. gentlemen opposite are welcome to make the most of it: He did state that the folly and extravagance of which those gentlemen and their friends have been guilty for the past ten years had most grievously complicated the whole question, that it would take time and consideration to work our way through it, and, furthermore, that the parties whose interests were affected had the right to be heard. That is what my hon. friend, Mr. Blake, said, and that was a proper and statesmanlike utterance. I agree with that. I say undoubtedly these gentlemen have complicated the case; I say that time and consideration are required to deal with it, and I say, also, that the parties concerned have a right to and should be heard. But that was all. And I may tell hon. gentlemen this: I made not quite as many speeches as did my hon. friend, Mr. Blake, but I addressed, in all human probability, about 100,000 voters in various parts of Ontario, preliminary to the last elections, and in not one single, solitary speech that I made did I fail to point out to the audience I addressed that the position was so seriously complicated by the extravagance and folly of the Government that I saw no chance of great permanent relief except in much freer trade relations with the United States, and if the hon. the Minister of Finance wished it, I could bring witnesses, not by the score or by the hundred, but by the tens of thousands, to testify that on every possible occasion I indicated freer trade relations with the United States, as the one avenue of relief which was opened to the people of Canada. We can judge perhaps better of the extraordinary accuracy of the hon. gentleman in regard to Mr. Blake's speech, by remembering what he said but a few hours ago with respect to Mr. Mill's new tariff Bill. I have here the speech dated 20th April, in which Mr. Mills introduced that Bill to the Congress of the United States, and I will call the attention of the House to the language which Mr. Mills used with respect to that Bill, as to which the hon. gentleman gave us to understand it is practically a protective measure. What says Mr. Mills?

"The policy which is being pursued now, may for a while suit the demands of the capitalists who have money invested in the various factories and enterprises of that kind in the country. They may be able by the aid of these pools, trusts and combines, which seem to be springing out of the earth all around us, to secure for a time the capital invested. But what, I ask you, is to become, in the meantime, of the poor laborer when they shut off their fires, when they turn him into the streets and determine that they will limit the product of their establishments in order to keep up prices so as to save the profits on their investments? And yet they call this the American policy. I repel it, Sir, it is not American. It is the reverse of American. That policy is American which clings most closely to the fundamental idea that underlies our institutions and upon which the whole superstructure of our Government is erected, and that idea is freedom—freedom secured by the guarantees of Government; freedom to think, to speak, to write; freedom to go where we please, select our own occupations; freedom to labor when we please and where we please; freedom to receive and enjoy all the results of our labor; freedom to sell our products, and freedom to buy the products of others, and freedom to markets for the products of our labor, without which the freedom of labor is restricted and denied. Freedom from restraints in working and marketing the products of our toil, except such as may be necessary in the interest of the Government. Freedom from all unnecessary burdens; freedom from all exactions upon the citizen except such as may be necessary to support an honest, efficient, and economical administration of the Government that guarantees to him protection to 'life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.' Freedom from all taxation except that which is levied for the support of the Government; freedom from taxation levied for the purpose of enriching favored classes by the spoliation and plunder of the people; freedom from all systems of taxation that do not fall with 'equal and exact justice upon all'—that do not raise the revenues of Government in the way that is least burdensome to the people and with the least disturbance to their business."

I think that, when having access to that document, which was as free to him as to me, the hon. gentleman should have so thoroughly misconceived the spirit of Mr. Mills' resolutions, he can hardly be held to be a very good or a very accurate guide as to the meaning of a particular passage in Mr. Blake's speech at Malvern. I feel that, to a certain extent, this debate has been discounted. A good deal that might properly come in the course of the Budget debate has been anticipated in our debate on unrestricted reciprocity, and I must add that, while I was disappointed that the hon. gentleman was not present during the other debate, I was also somewhat disappointed in the line which he has taken to-day. I had thought, and I had some reason to think, that the hon. Minister had recognised in a great measure the difficulties of our situation. If he has, and I am not certain that he has not, realised these difficulties, at any rate to a great degree, then the statement we have heard is only another proof of the extreme difficulty, even in the case of a capable and resolute man, as I admit the hon. Minister to be, in retracting his steps and getting out of the difficult position into which the country has been plunged. I thought he had seen the signs of the times, and I think that to some extent he still does see them, and that he saw the changes which are imminent in the United States and how they would inevitably affect us, but the hon. gentleman perhaps is indifferent, perhaps he has made up his mind to leave us, and under those circumstances it may be that the hon. gentleman does not care needlessly to embroil himself with his colleagues further than he has already done. Still, it is to be regretted, because the hon. gentleman had at this moment the opportunity, if he so saw fit, of bringing about, I think, a great and wholesome alteration in the policy of this country; and, as I have said on another occasion, I am inclined to believe that the hon. gentleman really and truly desired to do so, although circumstances were too strong for him, and he was obliged to leave the work he had begun unfinished. I noticed that, in his preliminary remarks, the hon. gentleman called our attention to the fact that he had expected a deficit of $300,000 on the transactions of the year 1887, and that, by some remarkable exercise of skill and ingenuity, that deficit had been avoided. I proceed to point out to the House how it was that the misfortune of having to declare a deficit has been avoided. I find that the first expedient which suggested itself to the hon. gentleman was a simple one, to be sure. The hon. gentleman stated as you will observe, that, whereas he had expected a deficit of $300,000, he found himself unexpectedly in possession of a surplus of $97,313, and this is the way in which that pleasant result was brought about: For the last four or five years, after discussion, after special agreement on the part of his leader, it has been arranged and agreed that receipts for Dominion lands sold in the North-West shall go to capital account, as shall also the expenditure for surveys and purposes of that nature go to capital account. That has been done ever since 1880, as these public accounts show. What does the hon. gentleman? All of a sudden he reverses the policy formally enunciated by the Prime Minister, and charges the expenditure to capital account, but credits the amount of $191,781 for receipts on account of sales of Dominion lands to income; and so, unexpectedly as he says, he converts a deficit of at least $300,000 into a surplus of over $97,000. But the hon. gentleman was not then at the end of his resources. In former years, under his predecessor for two successive years, the cost of suppressing the rebellion in the North-West was properly charged to consolidated revenue, inasmuch as we had nothing but gunpowder smoke to show for that expenditure; but it was not convenient to do that on the present occasion, and so the hon. gentleman opens a new account which he calls a territorial account, and he credits to that $293,917 on account of this North-West Rebellion expenditure, instead of charging it in the ordinary way. Thus, by getting rid of items which his predecessors had charged to consolidated revenue for years and years, to the amount of $456,000, he forces a balance of $97,313. The hon. gentleman's original statement, it turns out, was perfectly correct, because the actual deficit was $348,996; but it was not convenient to have a deficit reported when he was leaving the Finance Department, and, so, by a species of legerdemain, this deficit has been turned into a surplus. It is very ingenious, but I am sorry that the hon. gentleman, for the sake of producing a wholly fictitious balance, should have allowed himself to be a party to what is purely and simply a case of cooking accounts. If you take the Public Accounts for 1887, you will see that, from 1881 to 1886, not one farthing of the receipts for Dominion lands was credited to the consolidated fund, and you will also see that the Postmaster General, during his time, most properly and correctly charged to ordinary expenditure the very large sums which were expended in 1885-86 for the purpose of putting down the rebellion in the North-West and defraying the losses thereby. Now, in that respect I am bound to say that the Postmaster General set the Minister of Finance an excellent example, and it is very much to be regretted that he departed from it, more particularly after the special agreement which was entered into on that subject between myself and the First Minister, and to which, for fear of accident, I will call the attention of the Minister of Finance, because I really think the item ought to be reversed. This matter came up as far back as 28th April, 1880, and after some discussion between myself and the present Premier, after I had pointed out the necessity of having the account arranged in this way, if he chose to charge the expenditure for service to capital account, he replied:

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

"A special land account can be kept for this, for which credit will be given for all moneys received, and in which all charges for surveys, &c., will be charged."

That was repeated the year after, and an account was opened, as I have shown, for four or five successive years by the hon. gentleman's predecessor. Now, Sir, I will not detain the House at present by pointing out, as I have often done before, the fact that it is a very dubious policy indeed to allow expenditure for ordinary rolling stock on the Intercolonial Railway to be charged to capital account. I think the good sense of the House is with me in thinking that such matters as rolling stock on the Intercolonial Railway should certainly come under current account; otherwise we will never be able to know where we stand as regards the expenditure upon that railway. I have my doubts whether it is altogether in consonance with sound book-keeping to go on keeping a perpetually open account for every building that he chooses to add to the enormous pile of buildings which we have already erected here for parliamentary purposes. I think it is time, also, that that account should be closed. However, I am not going to insist on that. The points I have alluded to, I think, admit of no dispute, and they show only too clearly that on the present occasion the public accounts of Canada have been cooked, and cooked to the extent of $456,000, so as to convert a real deficit of $350,000 into a nominal surplus of $97,000. Sir, in reviewing the estimate which the hon. gentleman has brought down, and as to which he correctly stated that he believed a large addition would have to be made on the public works and mail subsidies, I find that he proposed to spend $35,421,000. Now, the hon. gentleman gave us no hint whatever as to what amount would be required for mail subsidies, but I am strongly inclined to believe that we will be fortunate if we escape, under existing circumstances, with less than about $500,000 on that account. I fear, also, that, looking at the experience of previous years, which is the only guide we have, that the Indians and Mounted Police together are likely to absorb a couple of hundred thousand more than the hon. gentleman has estimated for. There is no doubt whatever that he will have to ask for at least $500,000 additional for public works. It is probable that railways and canals, judging from the statements which the hon. gentleman himself brought down, and for which I am indebted to him, in which I observe a charge of $477,000 in addition to the large sum already asked for on railway expenditure—it is only too probable, I say, that we may add at least $200,000 more to the amount estimated for railways and canals. For interest, as I understood himself to admit, something like $200,000 is likely to be charged; and there remains if we are to have an Election Act at all the necessity of providing for the registration of voters, which on the plan laid down by the hon. gentleman, cannot be done for less than $250,000. Now, Sir, the total result is this, that we have arrived, and this is substantially in accord with the statement of the hon. gentleman, to an annual expenditure of $37,000,000 a year, and if we have a Franchise Bill, of thirty-seven millions and a quarter, not to speak of other matters which I shall presently allude to. Sir, the hon. gentleman admitted candidly and frankly, it is to his credit, that, so far as he could not see, things had come to such a pass that our probable income would hardly exceed $36,000,000 and our expenditure would be about $37,000,000. So that we are not only confronted with a past deficit as I said of $300,000 or $400,000 and I fear a possible deficit for this year, but an almost certain deficit on the hon. gentleman's own showing of $1,000,000 for 1889. Now, I say that is rather a serious state of affairs and more particularly as the hon. gentleman made no proposition whatever for the purpose of grappling with that deficit. He trusts to the chapter of accidents, he leaves it to his successor. Sir, the time was when I recollect that the hon. gentleman used to denounce such a policy in a most ferocious language and he could find hardly any words sufficiently severe to stigmatise my colleague when under very peculiar circumstances he thought it was the lesser of two evils to save the people from excessive taxation and to face a possible deficit of $1,000,000 a year. Now, it is important that we should be accurate here, because although the hon. gentleman treated the matter very lightly indeed there can be no doubt that there are very heavy liabilities looming up before the people of Canada. The House will remember that I took occasion to warn and caution the hon. gentleman last year of the inevitable result which would ensue from the grant which he proposed to make to Prince Edward Island. I pointed out to him that if he gave half a million to that island on any pretext whatever, he must lay his account to be confronted with an equal demand from all the other Provinces in the Confederation. I pointed out to him, also, that this pernicious system of railway subsidies, which he is now apparently desirous of stopping, involved consequences which could not be stopped, that he had opened the door wide and he could not shut it. He had laid down a principle which involved the necessity, if the case was fairly and honorably dealt with, of dealing with it on a large and generous scale, and of compensating those localities which were not provided with railroads, or had spent their own money in providing themselves with railroads. I pointed all that out, and if the hon. gentleman had any doubts as to the correctness of my foresight on that occasion, I think that the resolutions passed at the Interprovincial Conference which took place a few months ago, must have roused him from his dream and dissipated his delusion. There, Sir, he finds that the Premiers and the Ministers of the various Provinces united in council, took the ground, and took it, so far as I can see, incontrovertibly, that the present Government, by their conduct in violating the Federal Act, by their conduct in making these grants without reason, or any special cause, to particular localities and particular Provinces, had utterly destroyed the whole financial basis of this Confederation. As the hon. gentleman well knows, they proceeded to formulate their demands, involving, if these demands are acceded to—and the hon. gentleman and his colleagues have rendered it exceedingly difficult to find any just ground for refusing them involving in addition to the public burthen of about a million and a half a year, if capitalised, an addition to our total indebtedness of something like 40,000,000. Then, Sir—and a remarkable omission it was from beginning to end—I did not hear one word used by the hon. gentleman to point out to us the fact that there is now on the journals of the House a proposition by himself and his Government, involving a charge of $525,000 a year for 50 years to come in favor of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Not one word respecting that very heavy liability did the hon. gentleman say. Sir, the hon. gentleman might have, with propriety perhaps, deferred the discussion of this until these resolutions were before the House; but in a financial statement the hon. gentleman, I think, was bound to call the attention of the country to the fact that engagements had been entered into by the Government of which he was a member with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company involving a charge for more than the lifetime of every man I now address of $525,000 a year. I am not going to discuss that in detail, I will merely say at the present moment that seems to me to be trebly objectionable. It seems to be objectionable, in the first place, because the hon. gentleman does not propose apparently to give us any data by which we can estimate the real value of the rights we are called upon to purchase; nor do I think it would be possible for him to give it. In the next place, it is quite clear that the concession will involve other very large concessions to various other portions of the Dominion, that we will not be allowed to guarantee this half million to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, without making concessions to other parts of the Dominion that will involve a loss of many millions to our assets and practically an addition of hundreds of thousands of dollars a year to our public burden. I might add that it appears to me, likewise, that the hon. gentleman and his friends were guilty of very gross negligence in this, that when they were making concessions in times past to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, when that company was suing them for aid, which it was necessary for it to receive, although cautioned and warned by us of the necessity of arming themselves with power to deal with this very monopoly, they obstinately refused to do so. They had the power then to have got control of the monopoly question into their own hands, and if they had thought it was in the public interest they could have maintained it, but under those circumstances, we would have been free agents in dealing with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I need not comment on the utter violation of pledges made time without number by hon. gentlemen to this House and to the people of this country. Here is another final, final, final bargain with the Canadian Pacific Railway. Sir, every man knows, and none better than the First Minister and none better than the Finance Minister, that the moment the ink is dry on this contract new propositions will be made, new demands will be made; the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is certain to have some other proposition to make, and it will seek to rescind its bargain when convenient that it should be rescinded. Nor did the hon. gentleman, although he has formally announced, or his colleagues have formally announced to this House that there were negotiations now going on with the Island of Newfoundland for its admission into the Union. Did he say one word to us of those negotiations, or did he ever allude in the slightest way to the responsibilities we might be called on to assume, and the additional burdens that might be imposed on the people of this country if we entered into any arrangement with that island? I warn those hon. gentlemen that they have no right to entangle this country further at the present time. That is a matter to be gravely considered. There might be situations, there might be occasions on which it might be reasonably prudent for us to undertake the question of the acquisition of Newfoundland; but I say, and I will prove it before I sit down, that of all conceivable times and periods this is the most inopportune to add largely to the burdens of the people of Canada. We have past experience to warn us. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that it was a most unwise and ill-judged step on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite to precipitate as they did the union of British Columbia with us, although Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

there was a great deal more to be said for that step than can be said for the present negotiations with Newfoundland. It did no good to British Columbia, and it very seriously hampered and embarrassed our whole future, and I am afraid the union was one of the greatest blots and the greatest mistake in point of statesmanship that was ever conceived; it was at least ten years too soon, and it would have been infinitely better for the people of British Columbia had they attained their autonomy for that space of time. Sir, I fear again we see Imperial interference. I am afraid the British Government, finding Newfoundland a troublesome colony to deal with, are egging on hon. gentlemen opposite, without much regard to the interests of the people of Canada or the people of Newfoundland in order to rid themselves of the trouble; and I call the attention of the House again to this, that in dealing with Newfoundland there is a series of unsettled and troublesome questions which have bothered and perplexed the British Government for many a long year past. Why, it is well known that one of the most thorny questions in diplomacy are the rights which the people of France still assert over a large part of the Newfoundland coast; and does the hon. gentleman suppose, does this House suppose, after the experience we have had of our fate in dealing with our own possessions in Nova Scotia and elsewhere, that if we get possession of Newfoundland with all these questions involved, Imperial necessities would not compel us to play second fiddle to the people of France just as they have compelled us to play second fiddle to the people of the United States on the fishery question. Sir, I have no time to speak of all the other propositions alleged to be in the air, although the hon. gentleman has declared that, with certain exceptions, which he was too wise to specify in detail, he and the Government want to stop all expenditures on public works and all expenditures of capital account. Who does not know that there are demands for canals, for railways, for bridges across our great rivers, who does not know that all these different proposals are being pressed on hon. gentlemen opposite, and that under certain political exigencies these demands will be conceded? I should like the House to consider what the sum would amount to if these projects or demands for which the hon. gentleman has opened the door so wide be carried out? I venture to say we will not escape from our settlement with the Canadian Pacific Railway, including sums we will have to pay to other parties to get their support to the bargain, for one penny less than $25,000,000. I venture to say that if we allow ourselves to be entangled in negotiations for the acquisition of Newfoundland, it will mean a charge of about $1,000,000 to the annual expenditure of this country in one way and another over and above all we can obtain from that colony. I venture to say that sooner and later, and probably sooner than later, hon. gentlemen opposite will find they will have cut the ground completely from under their feet by their past actions as regards the demands of the several Provinces, and they will have to concede to them a sum which, if capitalised will amount to $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 more. There is a sum of one hundred millions of dollars of added debt, if those sums were capitalised, staring us in the face, largely in consequence of the unexampled imprudence and folly with which hon. gentlemen opposite have conducted the affairs of this country. Sir, I say this has arisen to a very great degree from one fundamental error, I might add from one fundamental crime, because from first to last hon. gentlemen opposite have deliberately disregarded the very essence of our federal constitution. From first to last they have grasped at more than they could manage, they have insisted on taking the second step before they have taken the first, and now we see the consequences of that folly. Some weeks ago I showed, and I will not repeat what I said, where this had landed us. The Finance Minister might possibly have made a better defence of the conduct of the Government than his colleagues made had he been here, but up to the present time the facts I then advanced has had no refutation, and have hardly met with a contradiction. We had the flimsiest apology for the deplorable condition into which the hon. gentleman's party has brought Canada. Now, Sir, it is perfectly notorious that from the first, the present leader of this Government never liked the federal system, never approved of it and never believed in it. I will not say that he has maliciously and of set purpose applied himself to destroy the federal constitution, but I will say this, that the worst foe of the federal constitution would have acted precisely as that hon. gentleman has done. I say that from first to last, in every possible shape and way, the hon. gentleman has set himself to destroy and undermine the leading principles of our constitution. And at what a cost in men and money to Canada has that been done? Why, Sir, from 1867 to this present year of 1888, our own records, our own census returns, our own statistics show that the conduct of the hon. gentleman has cost us about one million of native-born Canadians and about three-quarters of a million of immigrants who sought our shores intending to stay here. In that same space of time, if I am to include the possible indebtedness which the hon. gentleman is now prepared to add, he has added something like $200,000,000 to our national debt. In that same space of time, if you regard, not the nominal sum which goes into the treasury, but the real addition to the taxes of the people, the hon. gentleman has added about $30,000,000 a year to the annual taxation—the real genuine taxation which comes out of the people's pockets. That, Sir, is a record of which very few other men indeed, in this or any other country, can boast, and there is no doubt, Sir, that the hon. gentleman for once, at any rate, in his life, spoke the exact and simple truth, when at Quebec some months ago, he declared that one thing his friends might be certain of, and that was: If the wretched Grits succeeded him they would find no surplus to dissipate. Never, Sir, was there a prophet who so thoroughly believed and who is more determined to keep his word than the hon. the First Minister. Now, Sir, I am going to address myself to-night to show two or three matters of most practical moment to the people of this country. And first of all, I shall point out the relative expenditure of Canada as compared with the expenditure in England and the United States, in those matters which are not fixed charges and which are under the control of Government and of Parliament. You will recollect, Mr. Speaker, that we were told that no economy could be practised; no substantial economy could be practised in the affairs of Canada. We were told, Sir, that with such skill, and with such excellence were our affairs managed that it would be practically impossible for me, or for anybody else to affect any material reduction. Sir, I am content to point to my past record. We found a controllable expenditure of some $9,000,000 a year and we cut it down to something like six and a-half million dollars, and, Sir, what we did before we can do again. But what I want to call your attention more particularly to is the actual present controllable expenditure of Canada and the United States. I have here, Sir, the Treasury returns of the United States and I call the attention of this House to them for a few moments. It is a very curious thing that the actual expenditure of the United States for the past year amounted to $267,000,000 all told. Of that $75,000,000 were for war pensions, $47,000,000 for interest on debt, and some one hundred odd millions were for army, and navy, and such purposes as these. The total expenditure, less the army and navy charges and war pensions and items such as we head under "collection of revenue," the total expenditure of the United States for the purposes such as we call controllable expenditure, with the solitary exception of the expenditure on our militia amounted to $54,732,000, the rest was for army and navy and interest and pensions and customs and inland revenue charges, and here are the details in my hand. The United States, Sir, with 60,000,000 of people require $54,000,000 for all ordinary purposes of expenditure, that is to say they carried on their controllable expenditure for just 90 cents per head and about the same amount I notice is estimated for the year 1888-89. What is our expenditure? I will not go over it in minute details but I will imitate the hon. gentleman and give the details to the reporter here. Canada for present purposes has similar items:

43-1888-4

| | |
|--|---------------------|
| Civil Government..... | $ 1,300,000 |
| Legislation..... | 700,000 |
| Superannuation and Judges' Pensions.... | 290,000 |
| Public Works..... | 2,250,000 |
| Indians..... | 1,200,000 |
| Mounted Police..... | 800,000 |
| Fisheries..... | 400,000 |
| Penitentiaries..... | 360,000 |
| Justice..... | 700,000 |
| Emigration Account..... | 350,000 |
| Franchise Bill..... | 300,000 |
| Miscellaneous..... | 500,000 |
| Light-houses..... | 600,000 |
| Minor items..... | 300,000 |
| Mail Subsidies and Ocean Service..... | 700,000 |
| Deficits Post Office and Public Works..... | 2,000,000 |
| Total..... | $12,950,000 |

I will say comparatively that beginning with civil government, $1,300,000 go for legislation and superannuation and public works and including—as it is included here—the deficits of post office and public works, our expenditure amounted to $12,950,000. Assuming our population to be 4,500,000 whites or 4,600,000, if hon. gentlemen opposite like, our controllable expenditure for the same purposes is $3 per head nearly for the people of Canada as against 90 cents per head for the people of the United States. This is a fact that may well make hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House ponder, and if they want the details I shall be happy to supply them to the Minister of Finance or any of his friends. More than that, Sir, those hon. gentlemen perhaps will object to the United States as being a Republican country, and they are too proud spirited to take a lesson in needed economy from republican countries. I have looked to the expenditure in England and I find in England a similar state of things to the United States. England be it remembered is a country having a legislative form of Government and a comparison, therefore, is not fair to England. It is too much in our favor, unless I were to include our subsidies which I do not propose to do. I find in England, excluding services of education and similar services and their legal expenditure, I find their civil list amounts to £1,000,000 sterling; their public works £1,708,000; their civil departments £2,468,000, with which we have nothing to compare; their foreign and colonial services, £617,000, of which we have nothing to compare either. Such of their non-effective and controllable services as may be fairly put in comparison is £500,000; miscellaneous, £48,000. So that, Sir, in England they contrive to discharge substantially the same services that we discharge for $12,950,000 (or deducting our charges for justice $12,200,000,) they in England discharge those for £6,321,000 sterling or about $31,000,000 a year with a population of 36,000,000 of people, or nearly the self-same amount that the people of the United States require. You get, Sir, this rather remarkable result, that we in Canada, a young nation and by no means as wealthy a nation as England or the United States, for those controllable services which are under the special charge of the Government and Parliament and in which economy can be exercised, we require to-day per head about three times as much as is needed in England or the United States. What makes this matter very much worse in my judgment is this: This huge expenditure, for huge it is, either in comparison with our resources, or in comparison with the expenditure of England and the United States has raised up a system of taxation of which I say that it would be hard to find in any other country a system more oppressive to the great mass of the people. Now, Sir, that is denied by Ministers. When I made this statement in the course of a recent debate the late Minister of the Interior took occasion to say that under the present system the poor men could get on practically without any taxation at all. Sir, I take issue in the strongest possible terms with any such assertion. I say in the first place that no system of indirect taxation can spare the poor man if it is an oppressive system of indirect taxation and not supplemented by heavy direct taxation. I say, in the second place, that our system is especially a bad one. Our system taxes the poor man's food, or many portion of it; it taxes his tools, it taxes his medicine, it taxes his clothes, it taxes his furniture, it taxes his crockery, and everything that he has, except possibly the one article of tea. All other things, with the exception of certain descriptions of food, are heavily taxed under our tariff. He was followed by the hon. Minister of Marine, who declared, like the hon. Minister of the Interior, that the tariff does not press on the poor man; and challenged us to name any article the duty on which pressed on the poor man. Sir, I reverse the challenge. I challenge him, I challenge the hon. Minister of Finance, I challenge any and all of those gentlemen, to name one single article which enters into the consumption of the poor man which we import which is not taxed, except the one article of tea. You can get old masters free, you can get rough diamonds free, you can get raw cottons and other articles for the benefit of the manufacturers free; but you will not find on our free list one single thing that enters into the consumption of every man that comes in free except the one article of tea. Then the hon. gentleman undertook to dilate on the case of the farmer, declaring that every article that goes into the food of the farmer's family escapes taxation. What about sugar, I should like to ask him? Does it not go into the food of the farmer's family, and does it escape taxation? What about dried fruits, rice and a host of minor articles? The hon. gentleman is virtuous, no doubt, but he would surely admit that there would be more cakes if he would cut off the ale, which some people deem a necessary article of consumption. Now, Sir, the truth is this: Our system of taxation, among its many other evils, is especially hard on the thrifty workingman and artisan. I have the details of the average expenses of an ordinary family, of which the head possesses an income of $400 a year; I have had several estimates given me, and have made a sort of rough average of the amount of taxation paid in Canada by an ordinary mechanic receiving that income, and having a wife and three or four children. I find that such a family will consume 2 lbs. of sugar a day, on which the taxes, although not necessarily going into the treasury, amount to at least $5 a year; it would consume of dried fruits, rice, and similar articles about $10 worth a year, on which the taxes would amount to $3; its clothing—and it is a low estimate—amounts to about $85, on which the taxes amount to about $30 a year; and when you take into account the increased cost of their outfit of tools, furniture, bedding, crockeryware, &c., there is not the slightest doubt that their annual taxes on these items amount to not less than $10 a year. In other words, an ordinary artisan or mechanic receiving $400 a year, is taxed under your tariff, though the taxes do not necessarily go into the treasury, but are for the benefit of some trust or combination, to the tune of $48 a year on the average. And, Sir, where in some cases, as in the city of St. John, you may fairly make an addition in consequence of the taxes on flour and meal, the taxes of such a mechanic would be increased some $8 or $10 more. Now, Sir, I turn to England. Hon. gentlemen are always quoting England. I wish they would pay her the compliment of an enlightened adoption of her system. An Englishman, with an income of 30 shillings a week, which is almost equivalent to $400 a year, only pays necessary taxes—I am not speaking of excise taxes, which are voluntary—at the outside on 20 lbs. of tea, amounting to $2.50, and on an equal quantity of dried fruits, amounting to about $1 per annum. So that the English artisan, or operative, or mechanic, with $400 a year escapes with a taxation of $3.50 a year, while his Canadian brother has to pay $48 a year under this beneficent tariff, which the Ministers of State tell us does not practically add one farthing to the expenditure of the poor man. Why, Sir, the very organ which hon. gentlemen opposite have lately established in the city of Toronto, had a calculation the other day which I was rather amused to see, in which it pointed out that a man with an income of $500 a year was apt to run behind under existing circumstances to the tune of $60 or $70 a year; and it stated rightly that that was a very unfortunate condition for thrifty, industrious mechanics to find themselves in. Now, Sir, I will point out further that this is exceedingly aggravated by the incidence of the specific duties which hon. gentlemen opposite have imposed. Sir, I need hardly waste many words on this subject, because it must be obvious to everybody who gives the subject one moment's reflection, that when you raise a large portion of your revenue from specific duties, they must necessarily press very heavily and unjustly on the poor man, and give an undue advantage to the wealthy consumer. Now, I find that in such articles as coarse tweeds, for instance, which are worth about a shilling a yard, there is an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent. and a specific duty of 7½ cents per pound; so that the man who uses such tweeds has to pay from 44 to 46 per cent., while the rich man using tweeds costing 7 or 8 shillings a yard only pays 20 or 25 per cent. The same is the case with such articles as blankets, on the cheaper kinds of which the duty amounts sometimes to 70, 80, 90 or a 100 per cent., as compared with a duty of 20 or 25 per cent. on the richer and superior article. I am quite aware that it is one of the misfortunes of a heavy tariff that when you have heavy duties they constantly provoke fraud, and it is very much easier to detect frauds on richer goods, by imposing specific duties, than it is by imposing ad valorem duties; but there is also this effect, that a specific duty conceals from the people the weight of the taxes and the extreme injustice of those taxes to the poor man in favor of the rich. The hon. gentleman was good enough to devote a large part of his speech to a eulogy of the beneficial results of those enormous taxes on iron which he imposed last year, and he had recourse to a very old and very stale artifice. Instead of pointing out to us what was the amount of the duties imposed on those kinds of iron which went into consumption, he masses his duties together and says that the average is only so much. Now, I have here a statement from a gentleman in the trade, in which he points out that the hon. gentleman's charges are now as follows:—On pig iron, which at present—or when this estimate was made out—was worth about $12 a ton, the hon. gentleman places a duty of $4, amounting to 33 per cent.; on puddled bars, which were worth at the time of this estimate, $16 a ton, the hon. gentleman charges a duty of $9, or 60 per cent.; on ordinary bars, which were worth $22 a ton, he places a duty of $13, amounting to about 60 per cent. also. These are not, by any means, the worst of these duties. There are some duties which range up to 75 per cent. or 80 per cent., and I will call the attention of the House to the way in which those duties affect an ordinary farmer, in order that we may see what right the agricultural classes have to consider that their interests are protected under the present tariff. Some time ago, I caused to be made by an exceedingly competent party an estimate of the amount of iron which would be used in a very ordinary dwelling house if erected by a farmer. I find it would require some $86 worth of iron, on which the duty ranges from $24 to $36 in the articles required. I find that stoves and cutlery, of one kind or another, would cost about $40, on which the duty would amount to $12 or $15; I find that in building his barn, the farmer would require iron to the value of $64, on which the duty would be $20 or $25. Such ordinary tools as he must have would cost $20 and a duty of $5. If, as very frequently is the case now in Canada, owing to scarcity of wood, and is universally the case in the North-West, he found it necessary to use wire fencing on his farm, he would probably require for an ordinary farm about 30 cwt. on which he would have to pay some $45. That is a mere illustration of the incidents of this taxation on iron, as regards certain necessary expenditures on an ordinary farm. But if you want to see how mischievously, how grievously the whole future of the country is compromised—and the words are not too strong—by this suicidal policy of taxing what has now become a prime necessity in farming operations, because no man requires cheap and good iron more than the farmer, I must refer you to the case of a farmer going to Manitoba with the intent of occupying a considerable quantity of land and hoping to bring it into cultivation in a short space of time. In the case of the four first articles I have named, the dwelling, stoves, barns and tools, the estimate is pretty much the same. On the first four items, the Manitoba settler would be mulcted in about from $61 to $75. Of wire fencing he would probably require a considerable amount, because there is no wood at all in most parts of Manitoba, he would probably require about 50 cwt., on which he would have to pay a tax of $75; and in order to farm properly in Manitoba, the farmer must have a large quantity of agricultural implements, not less, as I am informed, in order to start fairly and properly, than $600 or $700 worth. Well, on those implements our beneficent Government, for the purpose of encouraging settlement in Manitoba, has placed a duty of 35 per cent., and has, at one blow, in that article alone, added $200 to $250 to their cost. When you add to that the enormous taxation on clothing, bedding, lumber, furniture, even the tarred paper used in his shanty, and on every article the settler needs, you must allow for at least $120 or $140 more. And it is absolutely demonstrable that this policy of high taxation practically inflicts a fine of $400 or $500 on every settler who goes from Ontario to Manitoba and desires to farm any considerable quantity of land and possesses means enough to supply himself with the proper outfit. This may be said to be in some cases a little mitigated by the exemption on settlers' effects, and that, perhaps, applies with more force to persons who come from the older countries as regards the latter line of articles, but it is of no use to settlers coming from the other Provinces of the Dominion, and those are the most valuable settlers. I might add further that the effect of these huge taxes on iron is inevitably to add to the cost of working and constructing railroads, and in that respect hits the farmer both ways. You tax him on everything he requires for his outfit, and you likewise tax the railroads which convey his produce to market, and thereby rob him still further of the proceeds of his toil. I was rather surprised to hear the hon. gentleman tell us, with all our experience in these matters, that really, after all, although he had put on this enormous taxation, manufacturers are so kind and so good to us that they do not take full advantage of the taxation; and that although he has put on a tax of $2 a ton on some articles, he found by experience the manufacturers only take $1.25 out of us. We should have some explanation of this benevolent feeling on their part. They do not want, perhaps, to pinch the people too suddenly, or, what is the most probable explanation, they have probably not had time enough to form a combine or trust, and so we have escaped with a charge of only $1.25 instead of $2. But the hon. gentleman knows well that this enormous taxation which he has put on, in addition to all the other evils I have described, tends most seriously to interfere with the proper sanitary condition of our cities. It is a direct impediment to the putting down of gas works and the construction of water works. It is preposterous nonsense to talk of these things being given to us by these manufacturers as cheaply as if there were no extra duty. What does the hon. gentleman take us for? Does he not know we have a committee of this House investigating at this moment the various arts, and modes, and ways in which these manufacturers, after brief competition, combine together to put prices up to the highest point that the taxation imposed by the Government will allow. That is the most preposterous argument I have ever heard advanced. If these gentlemen can manufacture as cheaply as we can buy in other countries, what need have they of a protective tariff at all? Sir, I say that this whole policy is both foolish and wicked, and I warn hon. gentlemen and I warn the House, and, as far as I can, I warn the country that we are only beginning to feel the results of this foolish policy. Why, consider for one moment what the tax of $40 or $50 a year on frugal, industrious mechanics, factory operatives, artisans, and people of that kind, means. It means nothing more or less than depriving them of the means of making provision for themselves and families in their old age. The tax you take out of them for the purpose of furnishing them with manufacturing associations, wisely used, would supply these men, if they chose to put the money away, with the means of effecting an insurance to the large amount of $2,000 or $2,500, to be paid them when they obtain the age of sixty years, or to be paid their families or their agents. It would enable every man to provide himself with a home and a reasonable plot of ground attached. More than that, let the hon. gentleman consider what a terrible disadvantage all this is likely to put us to in entering into competition with our neighbors. No doubt, we are on the eve of seeing great changes in the American tariff policy, and if we go on loading down our farmers and artisans with this heavy taxation at the same moment when the people of the United States are reducing theirs, all I can tell the hon. gentleman is that he will find that we will be exposed to a very much more intense competition with them than we have hitherto experienced. Now, there are a few fallacies and there are a few errors which are constantly cropping up, some of which I noticed in the hon. gentleman's remarks, and in regard to which I would like to say a word or two. In regard to this alleged cheapness which he told us we would obtain from the promotion of home manufactures, in the first place, it is a most dubious question whether there is any increased cheapness at all. I believe that, in a great many cases, it will be found that our manufacturers, when they say they are giving us cheaper articles, are really deteriorating the quality, as has been done in other cases and in other places; but, supposing this is true, if these men can manufacture as cheaply at home as goods can be manufactured elsewhere, what need is there of hedging them round with an artificial protection? Are they not perfectly able to compete in the open market with other people? So far as there has been any reduction in the price of goods, it has arisen from worldwide causes, from causes largely affecting the cheapness of the raw material which enters into the manufactures, and in no way or shape or form is it due to the increased taxation which we have heaped upon ourselves. Then, I would like to say a word or two as to the fears of our manufacturers. As I conceive, the real danger to the manufacturers of Canada will begin the moment the United States reduce their present heavy tariff. Then, as Mr. Chamberlain pointed out, American manufacturers will become very formidable rivals not only to English manufacturers but also to Canadian manufacturers; then there will be a slaughter market in earnest, and your present tariff will be inadequate to keep them out, and the manufacturers, not being able to send their products to the United States, will suffer ten times more than they did in the old time of the so-called slaughter market. I am quite aware that the manufacturers are now in some respects in a difficult position. They need, and they know that they need, a much larger market than they now have; and the better class of our manufacturers are in favor of obtaining admission to a larger and freer market. There is no doubt whatever in my mind that, in the case of a great many manufacturers, the cost of production has been increased by the operation of this tariff. Their workmen require more wages in order to live in comfort under the increased cost of articles under the tariff, and, more than that, the necessary effect of a high tariff is to utterly destroy the export trade, as we have had proof advanced time and again by my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson), and as is shown by the Trade and Navigation Returns. Then, we find in the last place, that the artificial and foolish stimulus which is given to placing capital in certain particularly favored lines ends in producing a home competition which is much more formidable than the foreign competition, or results, as we have seen, in inducing the manufacturers to combine together for their own profit, but to the great injury of the consuming public. Then, there is another fallacy which is constantly advanced by the hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not think the Minister of Finance mentioned it to-night, but it is often brought before the attention of the House. That is the fallacy that it costs nothing to the people of this country to assume provincial debts, that, though a Province is managed as foolishly or as extravagantly as you will, it costs nothing if the Dominion steps in and relieves the Province from the results of its extravagance. I deny that altogether. I say that is contrary to the fundamental principles on which our federal constitution is based. I say it is at once a wrong to the Dominion and to the Province, and I have regarded from the first with the greatest possible apprehension the consequences of the policy which the hon. gentlemen have introduced, and which having now been adopted, renders it almost imperative that we should revise the constitutional basis of Confederation, if it be possible to adopt some system or some scheme by which we can put an end once and for all, to the incessant forays which are made on the Federal Treasury. I think we have shown that a most radical reform is necessary. We have indicated to the hon. gentlemen how that might best be obtained. We have pointed that out, and, as the hon. gentleman was not here at the time, I will briefly point out the uncontradicted and uncontrovertible reasons which have led us to this conclusion. We have pointed out how formidable has been the movement of population as against us. We have pointed out that in 20 or 25 years we have lost 2,000,000 of our people or of those who came here in order to settle in Canada. We have pointed out that in that space of time there has been an enormous reduction in the volume of trade, measured per capita, so that in 15 years, the total volume of trade per capita is 50 per cent. less than it was long before this policy was introduced. We have pointed out that the hon. gentlemen have contrived in that time to treble our debt and to treble our taxes. We have pointed out—and it is one of the very few points that the hon. gentleman attempted to contravene to-day—that there was, after all, a complete failure to create an interprovincial trade of any magnitude. We did not deny that there had been some intercourse, but we pointed out that so weak and feeble was the current of trade that, after all the enormous expenditure to which we had gone for the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, the hon. gentlemen were unable to make that railway pay its own working expenses by many hundreds of thousands of dollars a year, and there can be no better proof than that of the total failure of their efforts to create an interprovincial trade. If that interprovincial trade could be properly obtained, it would not be necessary to convey goods from one part of the country to the other at less than the cost of transport, and that is what has constantly been done on that railway, and that is the real cause of the constant deficit which has already been pointed out in regard to that road. The hon. gentleman has been compelled to admit that this augmentation of trade of which he boasts has been obtained absolutely and entirely by conveying goods on that road below the cost of transport, and there can be no greater condemnation than the policy which he has adopted. As for his allegation touching the large increase in the coasting trade, it may be as well to remind him of the explanation which was given a short time ago by one of my hon. friends from Prince Edward Island, who pointed out with great force that the nominal increase of trade was almost entirely due to the fact that the customs regulations were more strictly enforced, that there were not any more ships or any more real business, but that more reports were made of vessels which went from one port to another, and that there was hardly any increase in the coasting trade, if there was any. We have pointed out the lamentable failure which had attended the efforts of the hon. gentlemen to settle the North-West in spite of the enormous expenditure of money which has been made there. We have pointed out their failure to make their other public works pay. We have pointed out that practically there were but two customers for Canada to deal with, the people of England and the people of the United States, and we have shown very good reasons for believing that, were we able to obtain free trade with the United States, our commerce would spring up by leaps and bounds, that it would vastly increase, and that it would become not less than one hundred fold in excess of what we are ever likely to obtain by all the steamship subsidies, all the delegations, all the arrangements which the hon. gentleman can make with the antipodes, or with South America, or with all the ends of the earth, to which he proposes to send his trusted friends. And we pointed out also the fact, bearing very heavily on us at present, that we had completely reversed our position towards the United States, that whereas we started on our career with a debt one-third that of the United States, with taxation only one-third that of the United States, our debt to-day was two and a-half times as great as that of the United States, and our necessary taxation was at least 50 per cent. greater than the necessary taxation of the United States. Well, what answer was made to all that? Why, Sir, practically the very facts I stated were admitted. I do not believe a single fact of importance was challenged; I know that not a single fact which I advanced was overthrown. There were two feeble attempts made to reply, and two only; one was as to the value of lands in the Province of Ontario, and another was as to the egress of population from 1873 to 1879. Now, I will say a word or two on that subject. My statement was, and I repeat it here, that there has been, within the last few years, a decided and heavy fall in the actual selling value of property throughout the Province of Ontario. What was the reply of the hon. gentlemen? They did not dispute my assertion that there had been a fall in the actual selling value, but they said: Look at Mr. Blue's statistics, and you will find that Mr. Blue reports a small increase in the value of farm lands in 1887 as compared with the average value of farm lands for several years back. Well, I looked at Mr. Blue's statistics, and I found this very important fact: I found that Mr. Blue gave the value of land in the Province of Ontario as follows:—In 1883 the number of acres in occupation was 21,458,067; the value of land, $654,793,000. In 1887 Mr. Blue gives the total quantity of land at 21,799,017 acres, that is, 340,950 acres more; and he gives the value of land, not the selling but the estimated value, at $636,883,000, being just $17,909,000 less than in 1883, and, Sir, that was the case, although 340,000 acres of new land had been added, and 560,000 acres more had been cleared. There, Sir, according to the authority that these hon. gentlemen quoted, the value of land in Ontario was less in 1887 than it was in 1883 by 28,000,000, after allowing for the additional acreage brought in. Sir, it so happened that on the very day and hour that I was speaking a gentleman well acquainted with this subject addressed a letter to me of which I will read a short extract to the House, and I beg the House to note that this letter is dated on the 12th of March, 1888, two days before I had made this statement in the House of Commons. This communication is as follows:—

SIR, RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

"In my almost daily communication with the farming community as inspector for a loan company here, on knowing something of the strain put upon the country at the present time, I have been led to study the situation seriously, and I am convinced that the country never was in a more plight, financially, than it is at present. Lands that could have been readily sold in Western Ontario five and six years ago at $30 to $80 per acre, cannot find a market now at $10 to $50, and in any township there are dozens of farms for sale and no buyers, and it is very difficult to say what the end of such a state of things will be, except we get relief from some quarter.

"No doubt you will have the report of the Ontario Bureau of Industries thrown in your face in contradiction of the statement as to depreciation in value of farm land and while I am free to admit that they are computed honestly, probably from the best data obtainable still as to the value of farm lands, they are terribly misleading. The number of acres sown in wheat, oats, barley, &c., price of cleared and wild per acre, &c., are probably returned complete, and from the average of this return the tables are computed. A farmer can tell exactly how many horses, cattle and sheep he has, also how many acres he has in wheat, oats or barley, but if he gives the price of his land he invariably puts it down at the highest price he has ever been offered, or bases his figures on some price generally that has been paid in his neighborhood adding for improvements he has made in the meantime at cost, hence the misleading character of that portion of the statistics. I have gone over these sheets carefully in townships where I knew the parties and the farms well, and found that it was generally the best, most independent and enterprising farmers who made returns and while they gave the other statistics correctly, they invariably place their land at a great deal more than it is worth and we find the same thing occur in applications for loans."

I shall not trouble the House with the remainder of this letter, which is in the same strain, as it is somewhat longer than I care to read through at the present moment. Now, here is a communication volunteered to me by a man whom I know to be exceedingly well acquainted with the value of land in Ontario. I, myself, have had large experience for many years in dealing with farm lands in various parts of this country, and I know for a positive fact that you cannot obtain to-day, in many parts of the country, within 20 or 25 per cent. of the price which was freely and readily paid for farms but a few years ago. But I have a challenge to give to the hon. gentlemen, if they dispute my assertion, if they think that the actual selling value of land has maintained itself. There is no use in appealing to statistics as to estimated values, but it would be in their power, as the Government of Canada, to apply to those men who are practically conversant with the selling value, to apply to the sheriffs, the registrars, the county attorneys and county judges, all of whom, in various ways, are continually made acquainted with the actual selling value of land. If they dare to dispute my assertion, let them apply to these authorities, and I venture to say that they will find that I am only too well justified in the statement I make, that there has been a large and formidable reduction in the selling value of land throughout a great part of the Province of Ontario. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen on many occasions have dared to talk to us about the egress of the population from Canada, they have dared imply that there was as great an exodus from Canada while Mr. Mackenzie controlled the affairs of this country, as under their régime. Sir, I have the same statistics before me to which they appealed, and I call the attention of the House to the absolute increase which took place in Ontario in two periods of seven years, one period from 1872 to 1879, covering the whole period during which Mr. Mackenzie held the reins of power; the other period from 1879 to 1886, covering seven years while hon. gentlemen were in power. Sir, we find that in Ontario the total population increased in seven years from 1872 to 1879 by 250,782 souls; in other words, the natural increase was maintained within a very small fraction. The rural population of Ontario increased from 1872 to 1873 by 80,958 souls. We turn to the period from 1879 to 1886, and we find that under hon. gentlemen opposite the total population of Ontario in a similar period increased just 145,000 souls as against 250,000 under the régime of my hon. friend Mr. Mackenzie. We also find that the rural population increased 15,631 souls from 1879 to 1886 as against 80,958 in Mr. Mackenzie's time. So, Sir, the actual increase of the Province of Ontario was very nearly double in the seven years for which Mr. Mackenzie was mainly responsible to what it was under hon. gentlemen opposite, and the increase of the rural population, the farming population, the true backbone and sinew of the country, was six times as great under Mr. Mackenzie as it was under the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite; and that, be it remembered, in spite of a very large immigration which came in during the latter seven years as against a very small immigration which came into this country in the first years to which I have alluded. As to the allegation that the poor pay no taxes I will say no more; I think I have dealt sufficiently with that particular misstatement. But I have this to say, that our position now is such that it requires the most serious consideration at our hands. What is it in brief? In brief it is this: We have contracted a huge debt, huge in proportion to our population and in proportion to our resources, a debt almost as great per head as that with which the Americans emerged from their civil war. For that debt we have nothing whatever to show except a set of assets so unprofitable that they involve an annual charge on the people of this country of not far short of one million dollars a year in order to make up the difference between the working expenses and the receipts we obtain from that source. We are on the eve of risking an enormous increase, as if our position was not already sufficiently serious. We have been, I say, most scandalously extravagant in every particular of our controllable expenditure. Why, I turn to the United States' accounts, which after all afford the best ground for comparison, because they have a federal constitution on which our own was very closely modeled; and I call attention again, as I have called attention before, to this very remarkable fact, that forty years ago, in 1845, the United States, having an army and navy to maintain, having considerable pensions to pay, were able with twenty millions of people to conduct their whole expenditure for $22,919,000 a year, while Canada with 4,500,000 or 4,600,000 souls requires, according to the statement of the Finance Minister, $37,000,000 to discharge the expenditures which the United States, with an army and navy to boot, discharged for $23,000,000 in 1845. I have pointed out that our controllable outlay is so great that to-day, for about the same services, we charge the people of Canada three times as much as the people of England or the people of the United States are charged. I have pointed out likewise that our system of taxation is most injurious to the workingman, that the thrifty workingman who denies himself for the sake of his family all luxuries, whether tobacco, spirits, beer or wine, is obliged to pay for the necessaries of life for himself and his family one thousand per cent more than a workingman in the same position in life has to pay in England. I have pointed out that this is aggravated by specific duties so constructed as to compel the poor man, who under our indirect system of taxation is already taxed out of all proportion to his means and income, to pay fifty per cent. while his rich fellow citizens pay twenty-two or twenty-three per cent. I have pointed out that taxes appear to be so designed and levied as to be specially injurious to the farming population above all other portions of our population, and that has been aggravated in a high degree by these identical iron duties, for the imposition of which the Finance Minister takes so much credit, and that they are specially calculated to impede the settlement of the North-West and Manitoba, on the rapid progress of which so much of the future of this country depends. One thing must be admitted. If the design of hon. gentlemen was to keep back the farmers and impede settlement they have been remarkably successful for they seem to have succeeded, according to the statistics I have quoted, in bringing the rural population of Ontario to a perfect and complete standstill, and in the case of Manitoba where we ought to have had to-day four hundred thousand or five hundred thousand people, they have been so successful in impeding settlement that in the same period of time during which Dakota has acquired three hundred thousand or four hundred thousand people, composed largely of Canadians, we have only added thirty thousand people to the population of Manitoba. I think it is desirable we should put our views on record. I think that there is good reason we should do so, because it appears to me that the danger is always looming nearer. It appears to me that my hon. friends would do well in future discussions to emphasise the fact that a very great change is imminent in the United States and that great change is likely to affect the people of Canada very seriously. The hon. gentleman cannot be ignorant of the very remarkable ground taken by President Cleveland in his recent Message to Congress. He knows what that foreshadows, that the great party in the United States have inscribed "reduction of taxation" on their banners, and that there is every reason to believe that those banners will lead them to victory at the next Presidential election, and I would call the hon. gentleman's attention and the attention of the House to the language in which the highest authority in the United States spoke of that system of protection to which the hon. gentleman would have us believe the people of the United States are fondly wed. Says President Cleveland:

"But our present tariff laws, the vicious, inequitable and illogical source of unnecessary taxation, ought to be at once revised and amended. These laws, as their primary and plain effect, raise the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties. Thus the amount of the duty measures the tax paid by those who purchased for use those imported articles. Many of these things, however, are raised or manufactured in our own country, and the duties now levied upon foreign goods and products are called protection to these home manufactures, because they render it possible for those of our people who are manufacturers to make these taxed articles and sell them for a price equal to that demanded for the imported goods that have paid duty."

The Finance Minister will note that President Cleveland agrees precisely with the doctrine which I have laid down, and which has been constantly laid down by this side of the House, as to the effect of those vicious, inequitable and illogical tariff laws. President Cleveland goes on to say:

"So it happens that while comparatively a few use the imported articles, millions of our people who never use and never saw any of the foreign products, purchase and use things of the same kind made in this country, and pay therefore nearly or quite the same enhanced price which the duty adds to the imported articles. Those who buy imports pay the duty charged thereon in the public treasury, but the great majority of our citizens who buy domestic articles of the same class pay a sum at least approximately equal to this duty to the home manufacturer. This reference to the operation of our tariff laws is not made by way of instruction, but in order that we may be constantly reminded of the manner in which they impose a burden upon those who consume domestic products as well as those who consume imported articles, and thus create a tax upon all our people. Nor can the workers in manufactures fail to understand that while a high tariff is claimed to be necessary to allow the payment of remunerative wages, it certainly results in a very large increase in the prices of nearly all sorts of manufactures which in almost countless forms he needs for the use of himself and family. He receives at the desk of his employer his wages, and, perhaps, before he reaches home, is obliged, in a purchase for family use, of an article which embraces his own labor, to return in the payment of the increase in price, which the tariff permits, the hard earned compensation of many days of toil."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

And he goes on to point out at great length and with great force how unfavorable this vicious and inequitable taxation hampers the farmer and prevents him competing on fair terms with the inhabitants of every country in the world, and how greatly for the interest of the American farmer it is that those taxes should be swept away. So the Ways and Means Committee, have likewise pointed out at very considerable length to their fellow-countrymen, what is the assured and inevitable result of that vaunted home competition of which we have heard so much and which was said to be so certain and so likely to produce cheapness and to reduce prices to the people of this country if they would only consent to go on for a little raising their tariff higher and higher and excluding foreign goods from importation. Here, Sir, is the report of the Ways and Means Committee which I commend to the special attention of that hon. gentleman:

"There is a persistent pressure by manufacturers for the specific duty, because it conceals from the people the amount of taxes they are compelled to pay to the manufacturer. The specific duty always discriminates in favor of the costly article and against the cheaper one, and therefore it imposes a heavier burden as it goes down from the highest priced articles to the lowest. This discrimination is peculiarly oppressive in woolen and cotton goods, which are necessities of life to all classes of people."

Then it proceeds to point out that the inevitable result of excluding foreign goods, first of all, to produce an intense home competition, and next, and very speedily, to bring together "combines" and "trusts" all the manufacturers of a particular article who will make rules to close as many manufactories as are necessary to keep the highest price of the goods they produce up to the highest possible figure. President Cleveland's message, and the statements of the Committee on Ways and Means, and the Bill which has been recently brought into the United States are undoubtedly glad tidings for all honest toilers in the United States. But they are also this: They are a warning for the people of Canada and to the Government of Canada, to set their house in order, and the hon. the Minister of Finance is too able and capable a man not to know what the consequences are likely to be to us if we refuse to accept that warning. The hon. gentleman knows right well that if the American taxes are largely reduced, as most probably they will be, that we may prepare ourselves for a most intense competition with American producers in all walks of life, and that that competition will assail not merely our farmers but our manufacturers in every possible shape and way, and that, Sir, if our position is further injured with further heavy taxes of the sort which he has been imposing, we may also look to see a redoubled exodus of our people, of far greater proportions than we have already had to deplore in this country. Now, Sir, I shall not dwell further on that unpleasant theme. I will say this, that one thing is certain: Every million of fresh debt which we add to the encumbrances of this country, every dollar of yearly expenditure which we incur, every new liability we assume, are all and each of them a fresh nail in the coffin of the commercial and political independence of Canada. Every one and all of them mean, Sir, an additional millstone around our necks, an additional fetter on our hands and a fresh disadvantage in coming to fair and full trade relations with the people of the United States, in which, as I have said, the best and truest safety of the people of this country lies. Within the last 20 years it appears to me that there have been two possible policies, either of which might have resulted in great advantage to the people of this country. One of those policies was the policy developed by my hon. friend Mr. Mackenzie in his time. That was a policy of prudence, a policy of economy, a policy which meant to solidify the ground as we went on. That hon. gentleman, with his native sagacity, saw that there was great danger to us if we persisted in heaping up debt and taxes in the reckless way which had been done for some years before he succeeded to power. He saw the danger, and his policy would have gone far to prevent it if it had been adhered to. I think my hon. friends will do well to note, and to call the attention of their constituents, and the people of Canada, to the results which most assuredly would have followed if Mr. Mackenzie's policy had been adhered to. First of all, there would have been a vastly reduced taxation. In the next place, there is no doubt whatever the people would not have been driven out of Manitoba and the North-West. We would have to-day something of the same state of things as on the other side of the line in Dakota. We would have had a population of 500,000 at least of the best settlers in the world, and we would have had an extra volume of trade backwards and forwards of $100,000,000 to-day. We would have had a taxation of $20,000,000, instead of a nominal taxation of $30,000,000, or a real taxation of $40,000,000 or $45,000,000. Our position with respect to the United States would have been infinitely better than our position is to-day. We would have been in 10,000 times a better position to make a good bargain than that which we can possibly hope to make under the present condition of things; and, Sir, in every way it would have been to the great advantage of Canada, if they persevered in that policy which had been inaugurated under unusual disadvantages by my hon. friend Mr. Mackenzie. There is a second policy which might lead to equally good results and that was the policy which was lately propounded from this side of the House; a policy which recognised the altered situation, a policy which proposed an effective remedy for all those evils which I have pointed out, and which not one of the Ministers nor any of their colleagues have been able to contradict. The hon. gentlemen may rest assured of this one thing; they may rest assured that the Liberal party is not drifting without a policy or without a rudder either. They may rest assured that we will fight it out on the lines we have commenced, they may rest assured that our policy will be fought out on every hustings, in every farm yard, by every fireside from one end of the Dominion to the other. It is a very false theory to suppose that we are going to quail before any adverse vote, or a hundred adverse votes such as those that were recorded here the other evening. It is an error of our form of representative institutions to suppose that a nominal majority in this House should by any chance represent the real strength of parties in the country, and that applies, no doubt, to hon. gentlemen opposite whilst they were in Opposition as well as to our position when we are in Opposition. But, Sir, least of all does it apply to a question like this, which has not been brought before the people at the last general election. I will give the House a very few figures which may convince some of those hon. gentlemen—if anything can convince them—of the sort of majority on which they are depending as evidence that the people of Canada are determined to maintain their present policy and maintain that in the future. I find that at the last general election there were cast in this Dominion 659,452 votes. Of these there were cast for the Government candidates 332,485; there were cast for the Opposition, 326,967. The difference in favor of hon. gentlemen was about 5,500, and that, too, it will be remembered, in Ontario, at least, by gerrymander, which had the practical effect of disfranchising at least 4,000 or 5,000 Reform votes. In Ontario the Government carried 173,821 votes against 170,150 cast for Opposition candidates. And, Sir, in my own riding, in the riding of my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) and in the riding of my hon. friend from North Brant (Mr. Somerville), there were Reform majorities left unpolled, because we did not want them, which would have wiped out that majority in Ontario altogether, obtained by fraud; aye, by fraud, by villainous fraud, the people of Canada, or at any rate the people of Ontario, were deprived of the right of electing those men whom they would have elected. The fact is that a change of one-third of one per cent would have placed my hon. friend on that side of the House, and those hon. gentlemen on this side in as great a minority as they are in a majority to-day; and I tell hon. gentlemen this. They talk of the will of the people being shown by the majority of the Government in this House. I say there are other assemblies which represent the will of the people fully as much as this House does which are nearer to the people, which are elected under a much honester system, under a system in which there are no returning officers or deputy returning officers to frustrate the will of the people; and to-day I have reason to believe that resolutions in favor of unrestricted reciprocity would be carried in every legislative assembly from one end of this Dominion to the other by just as large majorities as that cast against us here the other night. Now, Sir, I warn the Government of this. I cannot hope to influence the hon. Minister of Finance, because I understand that he is not going to give us the light of his countenance much longer, which for certain good reasons I regret. But I warn the Government that it is in their power to obstruct and delay for a short time what they well know is the true current of the proper will on this subject; but if they do that, they do it at their peril. You may dam it up, you may divert it and delay it; but the consequence will be that the pent-up waters will rise higher and higher until they sweep away you and perhaps much else that you would not like to be swept away. Now, I think it well that our views on this matter should be put on formal record, and therefore in amendment to the motion that you leave the Chair, I move that all the words after the word "That" be left out, in order to add the following:—

"The net debt of the Dominion of Canada was $140,362,069 on the 30th June, 1878;

"That the net debt of the said Dominion was $228,235,786 on the 31st March, 1888;

"That the total annual expenditure of the Dominion was $23,503,158 for the year ending 30th June, 1878, and $35,658,161 for the year ending 30th June, 1887;

"That the estimated expenditure for the year ending the 30th June, 1889, is $35,421,440, wholly apart from divers known unprovided expenditures which will raise the total amount likely to be expended to at least $37,000,000, being an increase of the net debt to the amount of $88,000,000, and of the total annual expenditure of $13,500,000, in the space of 11 years;

"That the said debt and expenditure have increased in a ratio very far in excess of the increase of the wealth and population of the country during the said interval;

"That the said expenditure is provided for by a system of taxation so adjusted as to press with extreme and unjust severity upon the thrifty and industrious producer, and especially upon all farmers, day laborers, mechanics, artisans, and factory operatives, who are at present subject to a Customs taxation on articles necessary to life and comfort amounting to nearly one thousand per cent. more than that levied upon members of the corresponding classes in Great Britain and Ireland;

"That the mischiefs caused by the present system are further aggravated by the very general substitution of specific for ad valorem duties whereby the injustice of the existing mode of taxation and the unfair preference shown to rich consumers over the less wealthy is at one and the same time increased and concealed, and that it is expedient that the said injustice should be remedied and that the wealthy classes should be compelled to bear their fair proportionate share of the burden of taxation;

"That this House views with alarm the extremely rapid increase of the debt and taxation of the Dominion, especially in view of the fact that there has been contemporaneously a very great reduction in the debt and amount required for necessary taxation by the United States, and that this House is of opinion that any considerable addition to the debt or taxation of the people of Canada will work very great hardship to the great bulk of the population and will tend powerfully to place them in a position of great disadvantage as regards the people of the United States, besides seriously prejudicing their chances of securing improved commercial relations with the people of that country."

Mr. McLELAN. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate. The resolution which the hon. gentleman has offered is so long that it is impossible for us to grasp the different points at once, and the House is so thin that I think the debate had better be adjourned.

Motion agreed to; and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have listened with so much attention to the speeches made on both sides to-night that I think we shall require a little time to digest them. Therefore, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Printed by McLEAN, ROGER & Co., Parliamentary Printers, Wellington Street, Ottawa.

House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Monday, April 30, 1888.

No. 44.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 30th April, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose, with the consent of the House, to make a motion without notice. We are getting on very late in the Session, and, as the House knows, to the general regret of the Parliament of Canada, His Excellency the Governor General will leave here at the end of May. It will, I am quite sure, be a matter of great gratification to him to be enabled to wind up his administration by proroguing the present Parliament, and I would invite the assistance of the House, in the purpose of expediting business so that that object might be accomplished. I am quite sure that the moment I mention this it will receive the general assent of the House if the public interest and the state of public business will allow it; of course, not otherwise. On looking over public Bills and Orders, I do not see that there are very many matters of such paramount importance that we could not facilitate business by giving more time to the measures in the hands of the Government; and if the House will permit, I will move that after answering questions, Government measures should, on Wednesdays, as well as on the other days which are now appropriated to Government measures, take precedence.

Mr. LAURIER. I am quite sure that on this side of the House we will do everything in our power to assist the hon. gentleman in bringing the business of the Session to a close, consistent with public exigencies. I do not think we would have any objection on this side to allow the Government to take next Wednesday and the other Wednesdays following, but I would suggest that the two Bills on the Temperance Act be first on the Orders of the Day for next Wednesday and take Government business afterwards.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not the Prohibition Bill.

Mr. LAURIER. No, only the Bills to amend the Scott Act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that is a very good arrangement.

Mr. CHARLTON. Would it not be considered a little invidious to other members who have charge of Bills, not to allow the whole of Wednesday for public Bills and Orders, instead of giving preference to these two Temperance Bills?

44-1888-1

I do not think it would make much difference if the whole of next Wednesday were given to public Bills and Orders.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is just the next Wednesday that will make it of importance.

Mr. LAURIER. I made the suggestion because the hon. gentleman some time ago said full opportunity would be given to have those Bills expedited.

Mr. LANDRY. I do not wish to say a word in objection to the motion proposed; but in justice to a Bill I introduced, seven or eight days after the opening of the Session, and which is of considerable importance to the district I have the honor to represent, I must say a word in its behalf. I introduced this Bill at an early day in order that I might have an opportunity of testing the feeling of the House on its second reading, and I have watched it ever since, but it has not been reached, and it is evident, if this suggestion be agreed to, that it will not reach its second reading this Session. It does appear to me that if in the early part of the Session the hon. gentleman would not propose the adjournments at the early hours he generally does, private members would have a better opportunity of having their Bills put through.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The time for members not connected with the Government to press their measures is early in the Session. If an hon. member is in charge of a measure and desires to carry it through, he must see that it is translated, printed in French and English, and put on the paper early. Then he can best ensure its being taken up by the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It would be well for the Government to do the same thing.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the early portion of the Session, there seems to be a general reluctance on the part of the members to put through their measures.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Especially the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is giving us a confession so far as his Government was concerned. We will not confess the same thing. The only chance private members have, in our short Sessions, is to have their measures printed and put on the paper early.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not propose to make any objection to the arrangement arrived with regard to the Temperance Bill, but the hon. the First Minister had better understand that the discussion on the Bill in the hands of the hon. member for Lanark will certainly exhaust Wednesday. He need not expect to have any of Wednesday if that Bill is to remain first in the order. The second order, an Act in relation to railway employees, gets the go by according to this arrangement, unless the hon. the Minister of Finance will say that the Government propose to go on with their railway legislation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They do.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then that Bill can be dealt with at the same time.

Mr. LANDRY. I would not want the observations of the leader of the House to go to my constituents, and to be interpreted by them in such a way as to imply that I had neglected to proceed with my Bill. What I said was that I presumed these Bills were printed and translated in their regular order, and that was the way in which I understood the proceedings of the House. I do not think there was any neglect on my part in reference to this Bill, and when the leader of the House proposes the adjournment of the House at an early part of the Session, it is difficult for a private member to oppose it. At this stage of the Session, I do not suppose there is any possibility of reaching the Bill, but I certainly wish that the Government should state at the early part of the Session that there will be no possibility of reaching a Bill instead of reserving the statement till a time when it is too late to proceed with it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If I am here next Session, I shall do so.

Mr. CHARLTON. I suppose the leader of the Government intends to leave Monday to private members?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. Monday is a day on which notices of motion come first, and the hon. gentleman is taking the only day on which Public Bills can be reached. Several of the Notices of Motion are of very much less importance than some of the Public Bills; and I would suggest that, instead of taking Wednesday, the hon. gentleman should take Monday. That will give him the same number of days, and will leave the half of a day for Public Bills and Orders.

Mr. McQARTHY. Or take Wednesday's business for Monday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to that, but, in the first place, I may say that some of the Notices of Motion are really more important than the Public Bills. The list of Public Bills and Orders is not very important, as a rule. Then, on Monday, for whatever reason it may be, there is always a thin House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then the Government can get on faster.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We are so confident in the merit of our measures that we like to have the House full in order to have the meed of approbation which we receive from hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think it would be only reasonable, if only one day is left to private members, that it should be a day on which all kinds of business introduced by private members might have a chance of being taken up.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection that for the rest of the Session the routine for Monday shall be that laid down for Wednesday. In giving that, we will take the whole of the Wednesday, as we may take the Temperance Bills on Monday.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not think there is any reason to believe that we cannot reach Public Bills and Orders to-day. Unless there is a debate which we cannot foresee upon some Notice of Motion, we may reach Public Bills to-day. At any rate, we make a sacrifice at the end of every Session, and in every Session a number of Bills must be slaughtered at the end.

Mr. CHARLTON. There was no proposition made to interfere with the proceedings to-day, but simply to take Wednesdays after to-day for the Government and to allow the proceedings of Wednesdays to be applied to Mondays after to-day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would like very much to take the whole of next Wednesday, with the view of expediting business, and we will give next Monday the same routine as Wednesday would have. We are certain in that way to get these two Bills upon Monday, and it will not throw them back at all.
Mr. LANDRY.

Mr. LAURIER. Very well.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentlemen intend to proceed with the Bill which was promised in relation to the North-West, or has that been abandoned?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It stands for the second reading. It has been kept back by the difficulty of settling the boundaries of the constituencies, and I think we have that settled now, and the Bill is in the hands of the printers.

Mr. LAURIER. That leaves two heavy Bills.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, this is not a heavy Bill. It is only to allow them to elect an Assembly, according to the Bill of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), with as few alterations as possible, leaving the new body, altogether elected, to lay their views as to the future before Parliament at our next Session.

Mr. LAURIER. If the hon. gentleman follows the suggestions of my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Mills), I am sure it will be a good Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is it intended that they should have an executive or an administrative body?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How is the Governor to get on?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have copied the Bill of the hon. gentleman verbatim et literatim, so that he can easily show how this system will go on without an executive.

Motion agreed to, as follows:—

That Government measures have precedence on Wednesday for the remainder of the Session after Questions to be put by Members, and that the order of business for Mondays hereafter be the order of business for Wednesday, under Rule 19.

FRATERNAL AND BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES.

Mr. DICKINSON, moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 115) respecting Fraternal and Benevolent Societies. He said: It is well known to members of this House that societies of a fraternal and benevolent nature exist throughout this Dominion, and the membership of such societies is already large. I am informed that they number over 200,000 throughout the Dominion, and this Act is intended to protect the beneficiary in such societies, but it applies more especially to societies which grant privileges of pecuniary benefit to their members or to those who partake of the nature of insurance, as well as other societies which grant those benefits. The Bill provides for a Government inspection and audit of such societies, and also that such societies shall have the privilege of depositing with the Government such sums as may be made necessary by the regulations of the Treasury Board. The Act will not apply to societies doing business within the bounds of only one Province; it only applies to societies doing business in more than one Province, or throughout the Dominion. The Act is promoted more especially by the Independent Order of Foresters, which has been in existence some six years, and has now a membership of nearly 9,000, with a surplus on hand of over $90,000.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENTS.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 116) to amend the Civil Service Act, chap. 17 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. He said: In presenting this measure, I may say that it deals only with matters of detail of minor importance, with the exception, perhaps, of one provision made in order to prevent the personating of candidates at examination, and copying and procuring copies of answers, or procuring papers for examination. There is also a provision that the entrance, promotion and qualifying examinations shall be held at only one sitting. The other details of the Bill will be more fully explained on the second reading.

— Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT AMENDMENTS.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 117) to amend the Electoral Franchise Act, chap. 5 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. He said: I may state, in introducing this measure, that it is limited to three dispositions, though the length of the Bill might suggest that it contains more important provisions than it really does. The three provisions are these: First, transferring from the Election Act the penalty imposed on a person disqualified for bribery or other corrupt practices; second, to provide means for printing all the electoral lists at the Government printing office, thus reducing the cost of printing by a very large figure; third, to provide that no revision of the lists should be made this year. It has been found impossible to make a revision this year, as it is desired that the lists should be printed at the Government printing offices, which are not yet ready. A saving will be effected in the printing, as will be seen in the report of the Secretary of State, for the first revision, of the difference between $180,000 and $7,000 or $8,000.

Mr. LAURIER. I may say at once that my hon. friend's provision for having the printing so far from the different electoral districts, will, I fear, involve endless confusion. As to the last provision of the Bill, suspending the Act once more, if it were coupled with a provision to have the electoral franchise in the meantime carried out in the different Provinces, I would approve of it.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. We shall save that amount this year, and I hope to be able to satisfy my hon. friend in respect to the other provisions of the Bill when it comes up for its second reading. I know the prejudices and the wrong impressions that have been created in the public mind, but I hope that all these will vanish when explanations are given to the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman made just as confident a promise as did his leader when the Franchise Bill was under consideration. We predicted, on this side of the House, that it would cost at least a quarter of a million dollars to prepare the voters' lists. Our estimate was largely exceeded, and $410,000 is the charge against the Treasury for preparing the voters' lists for a single year. Now we have in the Province of Ontario a voters' list prepared, a non-political list, made by representatives of the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I want to know whether county councils are not non-political bodies? I want to know whether the people have not the same opportunity of electing their party friends on county or township councils as they have in electing members of this House? I want to know whether, in the preparation of these voters' lists, municipal bodies do not act fairly as between the respective parties, and whether the county judges, who are appointments of the Government here, are not the ultimate arbitrators in deciding whether these lists are not properly prepared? Now we can use those lists without their costing us anything, and without requiring personal supervision, because they are prepared by those who live on the spot, who know the parties. I want to know whether the Government are not prepared now to adopt the lists prepared by the municipal bodies? The hon. gentleman can amend his Bill without difficulty; he can relieve the country of this extraordinary burden that has been imposed upon it; he can restore to the people the representation which has in many cases been taken away from them. The hon. gentlemen dared not put his Bill in operation last year, he dare not put his Bill in operation this year. An hon. friend informs me that he can name a county in which there are more than a thousand electors left off, who, if an election was to occur to-morrow, would be disfranchised. Yet hon. gentlemen persist in imposing this extraordinary and unnecessary burden upon the people in order that the voters' lists may be manipulated by them and their friends.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think that Canada, in respect to this Franchise Act, occupies a unique position among the Angle-Saxon commonwealths of the world. We have upon the Statute-book an Act which is confessedly, in a measure, unworkable, and too expensive to be put into operation every year—confessedly so from the fact that the Government have twice suspended the operation of that Act. Now, the practical knowledge we have derived from the carrying out of that Act fairly bears out the observations made by the Opposition when the Bill was under discussion in this House. It was asserted that its operation would be very expensive; and the expense of its operation has proved to be fully as great as was asserted by the Opposition. It was asserted that the operation of the Act would entail very great public inconvenience, and that proved to be the case upon the division taking place when the voters' list was revised for the only time under that Act. It was asserted that the fact that there would exist in each Province two separate sets of voters' lists would create great difficulty and contention; and that has proved to be the case. In the preparation of our voters' list we follow a course different from that pursued in any British community. In England the voters' lists are prepared by the overseers of the poor, and those gentlemen are municipal officers elected by the people. The division of the voters' list in England is a judicial act, performed by a revising barrister, who is appointed, not by the Government, but by the courts. In British colonies, so far as my investigation goes, the voters' lists are formed in the same manner—it is a municipal Act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Every colony has a separate law.

Mr. CHARLTON. But there is no British colony where the Government assumes this power. It is conceded to be a popular right for the people to exercise in all the colonies, except in this country. If we look to the United States we find that in every one of the thirty-eight States of the Union the preparation of the voters' lists is a municipal act, and the revision is a municipal act in every State except in Oregon, where the list is revised by county court judges. We have a cumbersome, unworkable, tyrannical Act in existence, which has been shown to be such by the experience of the people. Experience bears out every charge made against the Act when it was under discussion in this House, and the Government could not do better than return to the old common sense principle of adopting the Provincial franchise in each Province. That principle was adopted in the American Union when the constitution was adopted. After full discussion, and after four different plans had been thoroughly discussed, the members of the constitutional convention of the United States deliberately adopted the plan of having the qualification of a voter in every State the qualification that would be required for voting for a member of the most numerous branch of the Legislature in each State. That system has worked well for more than a hundred years, and no one would dream of the possibility of adopting such an absurd regulation as to give Congress control of the voters' lists, and have two sets of voters' lists, one for state and another for national purposes. We shall be obliged to abandon the present system, and the sooner we abandon it the better. The sooner hon. gentlemen opposite accept the inevitable in this matter the better it will be for their credit, and for the interests of this country. The common sense principle is to decide that the qualification for a voter for a member of the Dominion House shall be the qualification required in each Province for a voter for a member of the Legislature of that Province. It is a simple, inexpensive, common sense system, which would work no injury, and would enable us to dispense with all the costly machinery connected with the present system, together with the inconvenience caused to the public, and with the confusion which results from having two lists, by which one-half of the voters do not know whether they are on one list or the other, or whether they have a vote at all. I counsel the hon. gentlemen opposite to amend the Bill by adopting the Provincial franchise and return to a common sense system again.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). Any one who has a practical acquaintance with the printing of the lists will know that the scheme proposed by the Secretary of State will never work. When the lists are printed in the various places there are always a great many errors, both in the christian and sur-names and also in the post office addresses. The county court judge being on the spot goes over them and revises them, after which they are reprinted and accuracy as far as possible is secured. If the work is done here I can see no system by which these errors will be corrected, but the evil existing in the present system will be intensified. I wish the leader of the Government would once for all adopt the proposal made on this side of the House sometime ago and simplify this matter. He has provided a large number of franchises, being driven onward by the force behind him. In this democratic country where wealth is, perhaps, more general than in other countries and where the people, man for man, are better educated politically than in other countries, there is only one logical course to pursue, and that is to provide residential manhood suffrage. That is a proposition which would meet with great favor throughout the country. It is a proposition which we urged some years ago, it is a proposition which the logic of events will compel the Government to accept, and it would be a graceful act on the part of the Government if they were to repeal all the other clauses of the Bill and enact one clause giving residential manhood suffrage.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The Secretary of State thinks that when he made this explanation it would be a perfectly satisfactory one to this side of the House. The hon. gentleman must have been very much mistaken indeed if he thought he could satisfy this House or members on this side of the House with the Bill in its present shape. He has a very easy way of stating, not only to this side of the House, but to his own side of the House and the country as well, that the Bill would be a satisfactory one, at the same time forgetting that the Government have not ventured to carry out this Act for the last two years. They have suspended the operation of their Act for one of two reasons; either, because they were afraid of the outlay involved, especially in view of the statement the Minister of Finance expressed the other day that the Government sought to exercise prudence and economy; or it was because the Act is as distasteful to their own supporters as it is to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Look at what is going on in the country to-day. We have had elections going on almost every week since the House met, and yet to-day in different counties—for example, in Russell where there is an election now going on—there must be a large number of electors who possess ample qualifications but are unable to vote. It is an arbitrary and a cowardly act, to take away from the people the right to express their opinions at the polls. In Russell, Kent, or in any county where an election is in progress, there are many people who are in a position to be voters, but who, at the will of the Government, are disfranchised. This is an arbitrary Act, and it shows clearly that the Government do not carry out the provisions of the measure both on account of the expense involved and because they know that it is just as distasteful to their own people as it is to hon. members on this side of the House. Does the hon. Secretary of State propose to carry on that Act from year to year until the general election? The hon. gentleman shakes his head. Why not put the Act in force to-day? Why not bring in an amendment that it shall be revised in cases where elections are to be held? If the hon. gentleman will bring in an amendment to his proposal that revision will take place wherever an election is to be held before the House meets next year, it would not be so objectionable, but to defer this from year to year and to disfranchise a large number of voters—not voters, I will correct myself again, but people who are qualified to vote and who would be voters if they had the opportunity—is a very bad principle, and the hon. gentleman brings in a Bill here to-day to prevent their being put on the list. I repeat, Sir, that it is an arbitrary Act and it will be viewed, I believe, by hon. members on both sides and by the country generally, as an attempt to interfere with the liberty of the people in the proper choice and election of members to represent them in this House.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) is in a warlike mood to-day. He opened the sitting of this House by defending in a soldierly manner those premises against some invasion. He now appears to defend the country against any injury which does not exist.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Yes, it does.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is true it is well to say "Never say die." The gentlemen on the opposite side were very badly defeated when the principle of this Bill which I desire to amend was before the House, but not being satisfied with the defeat they met there, they went to the polls, and they spoke of our predictions that the principle of the Bill would not cost much to carry out. Nobody on this side of the House made such a statement. We all knew it would cost a great deal of money, and that the introduction of a completely new system necessarily involved a large sum of money. But what was the result of the predictions on the other side? My friends, when the discussion comes up, will be astonished to read or to hear how unfounded were their predictions. They told us that it would cost not less than three-quarters of a million of dollars.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is so, and I will prove to my hon. friends that they made that prediction. I have made a little collection of those terrible predictions that have gone into smoke, as most of their predictions have.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It costs too much anyway.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I agree with my hon. friend, it costs too much, but the Government are anxious now that it should cost very little. I will satisfy my hon. friend here, if it is possible to satisfy him, as well as the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, perhaps not all but I have the majority of them at least on this point, which is the main part of this Bill, that we will reduce the expenditure to its minimum. It is useless to go on with the discussion now on the introduction of the Bill. It is always better to speak in time, and it is always a great deal of saving of words and of valuable time when we speak only when the time comes. My hon. friends have now been fighting a Bill which is not yet before the House, and of which they do not know one of the provisions at the present moment. It has been said to us that we have protracted the introduction of this measure for two Sessions. I will give a reason for that at once. The first reason was that we could not introduce the amendments and the modifications which we proposed in this Bill before the House passed the Printing Bill. Last year after the Printing Bill was introduced we thought we could print those voters' lists at the Government Bureau, but it may startle members of this House to know that forty printers working all the working hours of the day would take ten months to print the 6,150 pages of those lists. Those lists will be ready in due time and they will all be prepared for next revision. We have not been able to do it this year because it was physically impossible to do it. My hon. friend has made a complaint that we have not made a provision for any election imposed on the House by the death of members. Death has been busy amongst us this Session, but I hope we will be spared from any further calamities. We have death enough amongst us and I hope we will not have any more new elections from such a cause. It is not right to prevent a county from being represented in Parliament because of delaying the revision of the lists, when revision would take three or four months and when members of the House ask that a writ should be issued immediately. It is but right that those who have run the race on the political ground of their county and when the court has decided the race was not fair, that they should begin on the same ground again.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I understand the objection. My friends say that new-comers should have a right to ask that their vote should be put on the new list, but I do not see that there is any harm done to one side or the other, if the new election takes place with the same list. It may be that a few electors would ask for the privilege of voting when a new election comes around, but that is not a very great loss to the country if they do not vote. In the olden times, lists have been left for three, four and five years without any revision at all in many constituencies. It was not perhaps right, but it was not sufficient to place the interests of the country in danger. I think I will be able to show my friends, when moving for the introduction of the Bill, that the provisions will be acceptable to them, and that it will reduce the expenditure to such a degree that they will find the system quite workable and not very expensive.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The argument of the hon. the Secretary of State shows how important it is that the revision should take place. He admits that the cost has been too much, and that was the point which this side of the House made in our arguments against the Franchise Act. The amounts may have varied but there is one thing clear, as the hon. gentleman admits, that the expenses are too great.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I said that for the first time it was too large.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The reason given by my hon. friend for not printing the list implies that the expense for the second time would be nearly as great except that he hopes to reduce it in the manner that he points out. The members on this side of the House stated that it would be a great expense to the country, and that prediction has been verified. The Secretary of State is endeavoring to reduce that expense by printing all the lists throughout this Dominion, from Prince Edward Island to British Columbia, at Ottawa. Those lists have got to be divided, and it seems to me that so far as this plan is concerned if it does not increase the expense, it will increase the inefficiency of the list to a very large extent. It was bad enough as it stood on the first revision, but it will probably be worse now, and where any difficulty took place on the first revision it was supposed that the inaccuracy might have been corrected in the second revision. It is my experience, and I think it is the experience of every member of this House that names were left off the list of elector, who had a right to be put on. It might not have been any harm, as the Secretary of State says, but if one man is deprived of his rights of franchise it is a wrong done to them and through him to the entire people. I know a gentleman in the county represented by my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), a gentleman who is the local member for that constituency, and a gentleman of wealth, and to-day he is not entitled to vote for a member for the Dominion Parliament.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Was it because of a mistake of the printer?

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Whether in the printing or not his name has been left out. I can give several instances of this kind where names have been omitted last year and where the people thought the mistake would be rectified this year. By this delay now proposed, the people will be again deprived of their franchise. It seems to me that we had better go back to the original principle. So far as the Province from which I come is concerned we have a cheap mode of registering the voters which commends itself to the people, and which is controlled by the people through their revisers—revisers appointed by the municipal authorities and not responsible to the Local Government. It is a cheap and inexpensive mode, and every man who has a right to the franchise can have his vote.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). I quite sympathise with the member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) in the instance he has given to the House. He refers to Mr. Killam as not being on the list, and I sympathise very strongly with Mr. Killam, because he left the county of Westmoreland where he would have voted against my hon. friend who represents that county, and who could afford to have one adverse vote, and came to Albert to vote against me there.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to point out that the remarks made by the hon. the Secretary of State were the most powerful arguments that have been adduced against the operation of this measure. The hon. Secretary of State tells us that in the preparation and printing of these lists at Ottawa the time of thirty or forty men will be employed for at least ten months. Now, Sir, contrast that with the fact that the lists under the Provincial franchises are prepared without expense and speedily, and when prepared, are more suitable for the purposes for which they are designed than the lists my hon. friend is to expend ten months in preparing here. This fact illustrates more forcibly than almost anything that has been said in this discussion, the cumbersome and unreliable character of this huge, inoperative piece of mechanism.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend has rather trespassed on the rules of the House in making a second speech on the introduction of a Bill, and before we have the Bill before us. The discussion has almost entirely gone off on the question of whether the Franchise Act which was passed some two years ago should be repealed or not. Well, that is a fair question for discussion. But that was a reform Bill, which was deliberately adopted by Parliament; it is the law of the land, and like any other reform of a constitutional nature, it is a portion of the constitution of the country, and if it is to be altered it should be altered with due consideration, and after full discussion of the merits of the Bill itself. But this measure of my hon. friend has nothing to do with that Franchise Bill. It simply relates to the printing of the voters' lists; you ought not to mix the two subjects together. One is a reform Bill. If we should adopt the suggestions of hon. gentlemen opposite, and return to the old system of adopting the franchises as they exist in the different Provinces, we should have to have a new election. But hon. gentlemen opposite are not quite agreed as to what the reform is to be. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says, let us return to the old system, and let the voters' lists as prepared in each Province be the governing franchise. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), says we must come to manhood suffrage.

Mr. DAVIES. I say that is the alternative if you do not take the Provincial lists.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is quite a different proposition. One says, let us have manhood suffrage; the other says, no, we will let each Province state what the franchise is to be.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). So your constitution provided.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We would fall between two stools if we took the contrary advice of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MACKENZIE. We would be satisfied no matter what way you fell.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If hon. gentlemen state what they want, we will consider it.

Mr. LAURIER. You heard for six weeks, three years ago.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hon. gentlemen did not agree then. They discussed the franchise for six months, I think, but they did not agree.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We did agree.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And if they had brought the force of their united intellects and power to bear upon the question, perhaps the Government would have been forced to succumb. But we escaped defeat. On the contrary, we gained a great victory, so far as numbers constitute a victory, in the carrying of that measure. Now, we are not proposing such a measure as we discussed then; this little Bill of my hon. friend is simply a measure, as he says—and when hon. gentlemen opposite see it they will probably agree with him—which will greatly economise the expense of preparing the voters' lists. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says it is a unique system, which exists in no country in the world, that the Government should regulate the voters' list. The Government do not pretend to regulate or interfere with the voters' lists.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Oh, yes, you do.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are prepared under the Act by a revising officer in each county, who is in most cases a judge.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, in most cases a judge; and I have not heard any statement that these revising officers have behaved partially. The Government have nothing to do with the preparation of the voters' lists, but, when the voters' lists are made up by the revising officers, the simple proposition of the Government is that they shall be printed in an economical manner; and to that proposition we expect to get the assent of both sides of the House when they see the measure.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the hon. gentleman let me ask him a question? I understood the hon. Secretary of State to say that it would take ten months to print these lists. The hon. gentleman knows that, as the law now stands, the printing goes on simultaneously all over the country in each electoral district. Now, under this proposition ten months will be occupied in the printing of the lists, and twelve months will pass by before a list can be revised—at all events before some of them can be—so that lists will be in operation in some counties a year before they are in others. Will the hon. gentleman tell us how he proposes to get over that difficulty? because he must see that it is a serious one. Our experience shows that ten per cent. of the old voters go off, and ten per cent. of new voters come on every year.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Not five per cent.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). A good deal more than ten per cent. in some cases.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I am speaking of the average.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am speaking of the average too. I would ask the hon. gentleman how he proposes to overcome that difficulty?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The system is understood. The lists are settled by the revising officers. The printing of the lists will take considerable time, no doubt. I rather think my hon. friend has exaggerated the time.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I said it would take about thirty men ten months to do the work, but it will be done in a shorter time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You can easily get the necessary number of men to print the lists. When they are once printed they are stereotyped, so that when a list has to be revised, the names to be taken off are picked out, and the names to be added are put in the form; and that will take hardly any time. An enormous saving will be effected by having the lists stereotyped, and having them altered from year to year when the revising officers make their returns.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I may perhaps be allowed to make a suggestion, which if accepted may greatly shorten the debate on this Bill when it comes to be considered. I would invite those hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, who would wish to see practically the simple manner in which these lists are going to be printed, as well as the cheapness and regularity of the system, to go to the printing office, where the Superintendent of Printing told me he would be ready not only to give explanations of the system, but to show hon. members, especially those connected with printing establishments, its practical operation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says it will take thirty or forty men ten months to prepare the lists, so that at any rate one-half of the voters' lists used in a general election would be those of a prior year, and all the Government would have to do to carry an election would be to find whether a particular list was favorable, or unfavorable, and to get the lists changed in the order to suit them.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friend does not understand one thing. When the lists are all prepared, let us say that there is about ten per cent. to be added in the revision. That would be ten per cent. of ten months; and it would take one month when ready, as they will be in three or four months from now to make the corrections. At every revision, not more than one month would be required to make the corrections. My hon. friend will say it is not right to have that delay, but as every district will not be prepared at the same time, the Superintendent of Printing stakes his reputation that not a single constituency will have to wait a single day for its lists, unless the revising officers delay them on purpose.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman said it would take ten months to make 215 lists.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Those are the lists we are now making, but when printed the type will remain standing. Motion agreed to.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 69) to confirm a mortgage given by the Central Railway Company to the Central Trust Company of New York, to secure an issue of debentures.—(Mr. Weldon, St. John.)

Bill (No. 84) respecting the Thousand Islands Railway Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 96) to incorporate the Belleville and Lake Nipissing Railway Company (from the Senate).—(Mr. Corby.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 107) respecting the York Farmers' Colonisation Company.—(Mr. McCulla.)

Bill (No. 114) To amend the several Acts relating to the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto.—(Mr. Small.)

RIMOUSKI CUSTOMS COLLECTOR.

Mr. Fiset asked, Whether it is to the knowledge of the Government that Mr. J. A. Martin, Collector of Customs at the port of Rimouski, is a trader, carrying on business at the present time? If so, whether it intends to take any action in the matter?

Mr. BOWELL. The Government has lately been informed that Mr. Martin, the Collector of Customs at the port of Rimouski has been carrying on a trading business. That will be investigated, and if it is correct, he will be called upon to give up business or to resign his position.

CAPE BRETON RAILWAY CONTRACTORS.

Mr. CAMERON asked, Whether the Government intends to adopt means to compel the sureties of Sims & Slater, contractors on the Eastern Section of the Cape Breton Railway, to pay laborers and others who were employed by the said Sims & Slater on the construction of that section of railway?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Any legal means the Government may have to get these matters settled, of course the Government will take.

TRAVAUX PUBLICS DANS LE COMTÉ DE RIMOUSKI.

M. Fiset: Le gouvernement a-t-il dépensé dans le cours de l'été dernier, les montants votés à la dernière session et mentionnés à la page 55 du budget pour l'année finissant le 30 juin 1888, savoir: Matane—achèvement du brise-lame, $500,00; jetée du Bic—achèvement, $780,00; Rivière-Blanche—réparations, $2,000,00; Rivière-Rimouski, $1,000,00? Si non, quelles sont les raisons qui ont empêché le gouvernement d'employer les montants ainsi votés pour les réparations et améliorations ci-dessus énoncées?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN: L'honorable député a fait erreur dans la colonne des items qui ont été votés pour l'année 1888. S'il réfère de nouveau aux estimés de l'an dernier, il verra que les items qu'il mentionne ont été votés pour l'année précédente, et qu'ils ont été dépensés durant l'année précédente.

QUAI DE MATANE ET DE LA RIVIÈRE BLANCHE.

M. Fiset: Le gouvernement se propose-t-il de mettre dans les estimations supplémentaires les montants nécessaires pour la réparation du quai de Matane et de la rivière Blanche, de même que pour l'achèvement de la jetée du Bic et l'amélioration de la rivière Rimouski?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN: Je ne suis pas capable de répondre à l'honorable député dans le moment. Les estimés supplémentaires, aussitôt qu'ils seront devant la Chambre lui donneront la réponse à cette question.

CONTRACT OF MESSRS. ISBESTER AND REID.

Mr. CAMERON asked, Whether the Government have reasonable ground to believe that Messrs. Isbester & Reid will have their contract finished before the expiration of the time limited by their contract?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. All I can say to the hon. gentleman is that we hope these contractors will finish their work before the time fixed by their contract.

PILOTAGE AT NORTH SYDNEY.

Mr. DAVIES asked, Have the pilotage authorities for the port of North Sydney, Cape Breton, made the yearly returns required of them by the Pilotage Act of 1873? Has the Government taken any, and what steps, to ascertain if the superannuation fund has been, and is now being properly administered by the said pilotage authorities? Has any security been taken from such pilotage authorities, or any of their officials, for the proper distribution of such fund?

Mr. FOSTER. There is no pilotage authority for North Sydney. That is included in the general pilotage authority of Sydney. I do not know that any superannuation fund has been established, but I think there is a fund for the widows of pilots, as I find some items in the accounts for that purpose. No security has been taken for the distribution of such fund; it does not appear to be required. I will further look into the matter.

OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. LANGEVIER (Quebec Centre) moved for:

Copies of all notices calling for tenders, and of all tenders received, for an improved postal service across the Atlantic; and, also, for copies of all correspondence or documents respecting the said service.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I must ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw this motion, because it would not be in the interest of the public service that these papers should be laid before the House at present.

Mr. LANGEVIER (Quebec Centre). Am I to understand that the Government propose to take some action in the matter during the coming summer, or is it proposed to leave the service as it is? The object of my motion was to obtain some information in which the public at large and people of Quebec in particular, are greatly interested, that is to say, when we can expect to get an improved postal service on the Atlantic. Sometime ago rumors were published in the newspapers that the Government were to enter into a contract with a certain company for an improved mail service; while not more than a week or two ago, the papers published rumors that the Government did not intend to do anything this year, that they intended to leave matters as they are. This matter has been pending for a long time; it is within the recollection of those who have been members of this House since 1885, that there has ever since been a question of having such improved mail service. The Government proposed to give a new contract to the Allan Steamship Company. The members on this side of the House opposed the renewal of the contract. We all agreed that it would be better to pay a little more, and get an additional service than to pay even a comparatively small sum and get no service at all. This is a very pressing matter indeed, and a deputation came from Quebec to Ottawa to interview the Government regarding it a short time before the Session. At the present time we are paying for a mail service to Europe, and our own people do not avail themselves of the mail steamers which are subsidised by the Government. I consider that it is an injustice to other steamship lines which ply between Quebec or Montreal and Europe, that one particular company should be singled out and favored by getting a subsidy for doing a service which is considered so inferior to the lines plying between New York and Europe, that even our own merchants scarcely use the line from Quebec at all. Every winter I see our merchants leaving Quebec to go to New York, and taking the Inman or Cunard steamers, or even the French steamers, to go to Europe. This is very much to be regretted, and I consider it is a waste of money to this country to be subsidising any line unless it is sufficiently well equipped to take our own people to Europe, and even people from the United States. I regret very much that the Government do not intend to give this information to the House, not even to say when they will be able to give that service. I do think there could be no objection to laying before the House the tenders that have been sent in. I understand there are only two or three; some of these tenders seem to be what we call in French a secret de polichinelle, that is a secret that every one knows. It is known that one or two tenders have been sent in, and also, almost the exact amount, and the terms of each tender, are known generally by those who are engaged in that business. It is very desirable that the Government should be in a position to give us more precise information on the subject, a subject of the greatest interest to the public at large. In the meantime, while we do not get that improved service, we are going on wasting money that is being paid to an insufficient service, to the detriment of other lines which get no subsidy.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I stated just now why we could not bring these papers before the House. I will ask the hon. gentleman to be kind enough to renew his question and his remarks when the Supplementary Estimates are discussed, on the item relative to mail service on the Atlantic. That will give him an opportunity of bringing up the subject again, and then the Minister who has special charge of that matter will be here, and will be able to give him all the information that the House can desire.

CUSTOMS SEIZURES AT QUEBEC.

Mr. LANGEVIER (Quebec Centre) moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, Orders in Council, reports, papers and documents touching the seizure made on F. O. Vallerand, at Quebec.

He said: I should like these papers to be brought down as soon as possible. I know the facts regarding the case of Mr. Vallerand very well, but I desire to know the facts relating to the seizure connected with Mr. Levi, which was a more important one. In the one case that of Mr. Levi, the goods seized were returned; in the other case, that of Mr. Vallerand, they were not returned. The case of Mr. Vallerand was that of goods seized on account of an error committed by a clerk and done in good faith. In the case of Mr. Levi it was a seizure of diamonds and precious stones. After some time the goods were returned, and I do not know whether he was compelled to pay a fine. I should like to see the papers in these cases, not only for myself, but for the information of a great many people of Quebec, especially in order to see what particular ground existed for returning the goods in the case of Mr. Levi, and not returning them in the case of Mr. Vallerand. Mr. Vallerand is a most respectable merchant in the city of Quebec, and I understand the whole trouble arose owing to a mistake, and a very inexcusable mistake, made by a clerk. On the other hand, Mr. Levi was a stranger who came into the country having a large quantity of precious stones, I am told, of the value of $10,000 or $12,000, in his trunk. They were seized, but were returned after a short time. Why they were returned, it is impossible to judge, but I should like to see the papers in order to see the reasons assigned.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no objection to the papers in connection with both seizures being laid before the House. In the case of Mr. Vallerand the seizure arose from the fact of there having been an enclosure in a package not mentioned in the invoice, and if the hon. gentleman will refer to the law he will find that in such a case the goods are absolutely forfeited and there is no discretion left to the department. Mr. Vallerand was treated in precisely the same manner as all other importers, quite as respectable as he is, are treated. I have no doubt as to the respectability of that gentleman; but in all cases of that kind where the law is positive the importers are treated alike. As to the seizure of diamonds from Mr. Levi, I think, when the papers are laid before the House, the hon. gentleman will see that where the Minister of the department has some discretion in dealing with the case, the decision was of an equitable character. He not only had to pay the duty, but penalties were imposed in addition. I do not desire to go into the facts, because the hon. gentleman will be much better satisfied when he reads all the papers and the decision of the department which contains the reasons for the conclusion arrived at.

Mr. LANGEVIER (Quebec Centre). I do not dispute that the law is as stated by the Minister of Customs; but, if the law is such, it is a very bad law and should be amended as soon as possible. Here we have the cases of two men; in one a seizure occurred from a package, and a very unimportant package, being enclosed in another package and omitted from an invoice, all of which was done in good faith; in the other case it was that of a man who had no invoice, but who concealed goods in his trunk, which goods proved to be of very large value, I am informed not less than $10,000 or $12,000 at least. Those precious stones were seized but returned. He was a stranger, and visited Quebec with those stones in his trunk evidently for the purpose of selling them to the trade. I repeat that I do not say the interpretation of the laws laid down by the Minister is incorrect, but I say that it is evidently a very bad law and should be altered.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not admit that the clause is a bad one. It is more moderate now than it was when the hon. gentleman's friends were in power, and when they consolidated the law. I did modify it once. I do not think, in the interests of trade, it should be modified again; but it would have been just as well if the hon. gentleman had waited until he had obtained the papers before he expressed the opinion he has given in regard to the diamonds, because one would be led to the conclusion from his remarks that the two cases were analagous. The diamonds were not brought in as the hon. gentleman has said. I will not discuss the question, but will simply say that the information he has received is not strictly accurate.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE RELATIONS BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND THE COLONIES.

Mr. MARSHALL moved:

That the establishment of mutually favorable trade relations between Great Britain and her colonies would benefit the agricultural, mining, lumbering and other industries of the latter and would strengthen the Empire by building up its dependencies, and that the Government should ask the other Colonial Governments to join in approaching the Imperial Government with a view to obtaining such an agreement.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, in moving a resolution for the first time in this House, and having taken part in none of the debates or proceedings heretofore, I do not intend to occupy your time for more than a few minutes on this occasion, as I should like to hear hon. members on both sides of this House express their views on this, what I consider a very important question. My object in moving this resolution at this Session is, because I think the time has come when the attention of this House should be drawn to the advisability of extending our trade relations between Great Britain and Canada, whereby the natural products of our country should have the preference in the British market to that of foreign nations or other countries other than her colonies. During the recent debate on unrestricted reciprocity between Canada and the United States in this House, it was admitted on all sides that we should seek the British market for our natural products, and that fact has already been established, because there has not been an hon. member on the opposite side of the House, or on this side either, who has not forcibly laid that principle before the House, and spoken in support of it. They have all admitted that the British market is the market which rules the prices of our surplus products not only of our own country but also of the United States, and all the world. Sir, I have been asked by hon. members since making this notice of motion when I intended bringing my Imperial Federation resolution forward. Now, Sir, I want to say for the information of hon. members that I do not belong to the Imperial Federation League myself, nor neither does my resolution. This subject has been prominently in my mind for some time past, long before I had the honor of occupying a seat in this House, and perhaps more naturally so because being intimately and practically connected with the class of people who would be more directly benefited by such resolutions than any other class of people in Canada, and upon whom I consider, and I think this House considers, by the voices in the past, that upon them depends the welfare and prosperity of this country of ours, and that is the farming and agricultural classes, and it is in their interests that I have been prompted to move in the matter, for when they are benefitted or prosperous the country naturally must be also. But, Sir, as a Canadian, I do not propose to go to the mother country hat-in-hand, as the saying is, to ask a favor off her specially for Canada. I hope while in this House or out of it I will always in my humble way uphold the dignity of Canada. I do not propose to ask England to do anything that would be an injury to herself or her people. What I ask for is a policy of trade relations by which mutual advantages would be secured in the exchange of our natural and manufactured products, as I do not propose, of course, to seek any advantages from England without giving her something in return. The object of the resolution is that we shall have more extended trade relations between Canada and Great Britain, whereby some mutual agreement may be arrived at beneficial to both countries, and extended trade relations with our sister colonies. When I propose that Great Britain and Canada, as well as all the colonies, should be more closely connected, I do not expect that Great Britain will concede specially favorably to us, nor do I ask it. But I do think that if the mother country makes a concession on behalf of the colonies that they will give her something in return, when we remember that such a policy in the Empire will give our people a market with a population of over 320,000,000 instead of having a market of 60,000,000, as proposed by unrestricted reciprocity with the United States—the people with whom we have to principally compete in the British market. It may be said in answer to this proposition that it is all very well to make a suggestion of this kind, but that England, after adopting her free trade policy for the benefit of her people, will not go back to her old barbarism, or as some people say, of protection, or adopt a protective policy in favor of her colonies. That may be the case, but England's relations with her colonies have been very much changed since free trade was first agitated and adopted as the policy of Great Britain. The free trade policy was first agitated in 1838, or about fifty years ago, and let me ask hon. gentlemen what the position of the North American colonies at that time was and what it is now? Take, for instance, our own country. At that time it was almost unknown to England except as a country of forest and snow, and we are in a position to-day that if our great wheat fields of the North-West and Manitoba were under cultivation they would supply the British markets with wheat by themselves. I should like very much that the Government of the country should take whatever steps may be necessary to bring about such a trade policy, as I do not intend to let this matter rest until some such result has been arrived at.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, before you declare the motion carried I desire to say a few words in support of it. The motion is very similar in purpose to the one I had the honor of placing upon the Order paper and which I am afraid there will be no opportunity of moving during the present Session. I have given notice that I would move:

"That it would be in the best interests of the Dominion that such changes should be sought for in the trade relations between the United Kingdom and Canada as would give to Canada advantages in the markets of the Mother Country not allowed to Foreign States, Canada being willing for such privileges to discriminate in her markets in favor of Great Britain and Ireland, due regard being had to the policy adopted in 1879 for the purpose of fostering the various interests and industries of the Dominion, and to the financial necessities of the Dominion."

The motion which my hon. friend has just proposed is one upon somewhat the same lines. At all events it cannot be said that the motion which I have just read is not germane to the general purpose of that resolution. I undertook, Sir, at a public meeting that was held in the city of Toronto, to bring this subject before the House this Session, and I am very glad that I have this opportunity of doing so. Not that I at all assume that the House is prepared to come to any decision on it this Session, but it is proper, I think, that the matter should be considered, and the arguments—as I believe, the irresistible arguments—in favor of this policy should be known, should be weighed, should be considered. I do not—I may as well disclaim at the outset—I do not at all admit that what we know as the National Policy has been a failure. I do not at all desire to join the band—which is sufficiently large in my view, and perhaps a little too large, on the other side—of those who are always proclaiming, and seem to take a delight in doing so, that the people of this country are in a worse condition than the people of other lands. On the contrary, Sir, I believe that on investigation, the condition of our people will compare favorably with that of any other people who are known to us, or any other people we are brought in contact with; and I think, Sir, it will be found that the policy which we adopted here, and which the country has twice since ratified by a very large vote, has been on the whole beneficial, and that whatever we may be now said to be laboring under is not at all attributable to the policy of protection, or the policy known as the National Policy, but to causes over which we in this Parliament have no more control than the people of Great Britain or the people of the United States.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Flies on the wheel.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman reminds us of remark of the financial critic of the Opposition. I do not know that it is particularly apposite to the point I am making, but, at all events, it is always well to remember that that was the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. Whether they have forgotten or would like to forget that policy, and adopt more active measures for the promotion of the interests of the country, it is for them and not for me to say. Now, let me deal with one large class of people in this country—the largest class—the farmers and the farming community. We hear a good deal about the manufacturing industries of the country, and I think we do not, perhaps, think any more of them than the great importance of those industries demands. I think we all, or the most of us, at all events, are of opinion that if Canada is ever to attain to that position in the councils of the world that we believe she is entitled to, it cannot be by the promotion and fostering of one industry alone, but that the best results are to be obtained by the promotion and fostering of various industries, and the affording of opportunities to the sons of toil and the people in different branches of life. Therefore I do not at all desire to say that the manufacturing industries of this country, and those engaged in them, are not entitled to every consideration. But we cannot and ought not to lose sight of the fact that the largest proportion of the laboring classes and the toiling millions in this country are engaged in tilling the soil; and those people are entitled to have at the hands of this Parliament full consideration of their wants and aspirations, and all that this Parliament can do to afford them the best market for their produce. It is because I think, Sir, that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is exactly in the wrong direction—because I believe the policy which has been announced here on the other side of the House, and so persistently fought for during a large portion of the Session, would not be giving to the farmers of this country that which they demand, a better market, that I ventured to put the notice on the paper to which I have referred, and that I venture here to make some observations in support of that notice. When we are asked to throw open the market of sixty or sixty-five millions of people, and when we are told in general terms that that would be a great boon to the four or five million people in this country, we ought naturally to enquire—and we should be unworthy of our position here if we did not carry our investigation at least that far—what is the market for our farmers which is sought to be obtained by that policy? Why, Sir, we are competitors in the great market of the world. Our surplus products go to the English market, as do the surplus products, to a very much larger extent, of the people on the other side of the line. They are producers of corn as we are producers of corn; they are producers of cattle as we are; and if we look to the trade returns, of which we have ample store, and which are opened to us all, we shall find that the great market for both countries, as for the whole of this continent, is the British market; and if by any means we can obtain in the British market a more favorable return for our products than is permitted to other countries, that certainly would be a wiser policy than, as has several times been said, to send our coals to Newcastle, to send our products to mix with the mass of the products of the United States, where we could not expect to get a better price. Now, let us see whether these few observations, which are merely introductory to what I intend further on to draw the attention of the House to, are not borne out by the statistics which are open to us. Is the Canadian farmer, according to the knowledge we have—and unfortunately that knowledge is confined mainly, if not entirely, to the statistics in the Province of Ontario—any better off to-day than the farmer of the United States? Whether you look at the quantity he produces or at the price he realises, I venture to say that no hon. gentleman can consult the statistics of the United States without being perfectly and clearly satisfied that the farmer of Ontario at all events—and I do not know why the same remark should not apply to other parts of the Dominion—is better off, both as to the quantity he produces and the price he realises, than is the farmer in the United States. Now, Sir, I desire to prove—and I have the statistics here which I think will enable me to prove to the satisfaction of all who desire to realise the true position—that that is the position of the farmers of Canada at this moment. Whether you take, Sir, wheat, or barley, or oats, or rye, or corn even, or hay, or potatoes—taking each and all of these articles, I find that the following may be said to be the net results: In the great article of production in the Province from which I come, an article which in the near future we all hope is to be produced in the great North-West in still greater and ever increasing quantities, it will be found that the average production per acre, as well as the price realised, are in favor of the Ontario farmer, and I believe to the same extent in favor of the farmers in those portions of the Dominion in which those cereals are grown. Now, I have taken the returns of fall wheat for two years; but an examination for a series of years will lead to the same result and perhaps one more favorable to the Canadian farmer. Take fall wheat for the years 1885 and 1886, and I find the net result has been as follows: The average price has been 77½ cents per bushel in the Province of Ontario, and the average product has been 22¼ bushels per acre. During the same period in the United States, the average price was 72 instead of 77 cents, and the product 11¼ as compared with 22¼. The net return, therefore, so far as that part of that product is concerned, shows that the yield per acre in the Province of Ontario has been 9¼ in favor of the Canadian as compared with the American farmer. That result alone, if it is borne out by reference to the other figures which I propose to give, ought not to dishearten us, but ought to rather encourage us, and to show that we are not, as my hon. friends opposite so often preach we are going to ruin. Take barley, the price of barley during these two years in Ontario averaged—hon. gentlemen will understand that the average includes the barley not quite sufficiently good for export or for use by our brewers and also that which is fit for export and fit for use by our domestic manufacturers—53 2 cents and the average product 27¼. On the other side of the line the average price was 56 cents, but the average product was only 22; and the difference, again in favor of the Ontario farmer, is $2.11 per acre. So in oats, the difference is $3.70 per acre, the quantity grown in Ontario being an average of 36 bushels per acre compared with 26 bushels on the other side of the line, and the price in Ontario being 31¼ as against 29¼ on the other side of the line. Therefore, both in quantity and in price, the average is in favor of the home farmer. In rye, the product is not very large in either country; but such as it is, the quantity with us is 16¼ bushels per acre as compared with 12 on the other side, or 25 per cent. more in our favor, and the price with us is 53 cents while that on the other side is but 52 cents, showing upon the whole a result favorable to us to the extent of $1.20 per acre compared with the other side. I cannot make any comparison with regard to peas, because they do not appear to be grown to any considerable extent on the other side. I do not find them in the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, but the result appears to be reasonably satisfactory, so far as our farmers are concerned, $28.20 per acre. Take in corn, of course our product is not very large. It is confined, so far as I know, to that part of Ontario which is in the neighborhood of the Detroit river, but our product is 26½ bushels per acre to 24 on the other side, and the price 27 cents on our side against 24 on the other side, the result being favorable to our farmers to the extent of $10 per acre. Now, hay is grown on both sides; and although the Americans import hay from us and pay the duty, their importation is but for local purposes. Taking the general result, I find that the price during these two years in Ontario averaged $9.77 a ton and on the other side averaged $8.11 a ton, showing a difference in favor of the Canadians of $1.66 per ton; and the product was $1.39 in Canada compared with $1.22 on the other side, the net result being $3.13 in favor of the Canadian side. Take potatoes, this is the original home of the potatoes.

Mr. MCCARTHY.

Mr. CASEY. No, that is in Ireland.

Mr. McCARTHY. No, that is a mistake of my hon. friend. The home of the potato is here, and it shows this result: The price during the two years was 43 cents in Ontario, and on the other side, 44.7 per bushel. And the average product here 123 bushels to the acre compared with 77 bushels on the other side, the difference in value in our favor being the enormous sum per acre of $24.40. So, whatever article you take that we grow and compare it with a similar article on the other side of the line, the conclusion is inevitable that a value of the farmer of his labor is greater on this side than it is on the other. It may well be said that I am comparing one particular province, perhaps the richest part of the Dominion, with the whole of the United States, and that the comparison in that respect is not fair. I understand perfectly well that my argument is open to that objection, and the objection is so obvious that it has occurred to my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Casey) as well as the others. Surely those hon. gentlemen will not say it is an unfair comparison to compare Ontario with Michigan or with the State of New York. I invite a comparison between these two neighboring States and Ontario, and I maintain it will be found, although not so largely in our favor as the total result by the figures I have already given would indicate, that the result is in favor of the Canadian farmer. Take, for instance, wheat, the value in Ontario as I have already said per acre is $20. In Michigan it is $16.17, and in the State of New York $14.76. Rye, $8.96 in Ontario, $6.67 in Michigan, $7.37 in New York. Oats $11.27 in Ontario, $7.71 in Michigan, $10.05 in New York. Barley $15.27 in Ontario, $13.98 in Michigan, $15.00 in New York. Potatoes $54.27 in Ontario, $29.58 in Michigan, $25.00 in New York. Hay $14.12 in Ontario, $12.85 in Michigan, $13.39 in New York. Corn $17.86 in Ontario, $11.00 in Michigan, $17.00 in New York. In fact, there is not a single article for the year 1885, of which the value to the farmer was not greater in the Province of Ontario than it was in the neighboring States, according to the returns of Michigan and New York. I think that this is a satisfactory reason why I should not stand here representing an agricultural constituency, and pretend to think or to urge that our farmers are going to ruin as compared with those who occupy the same position on the other side of the line. I think it is also a reason why I should not accept the policy which has been enunciated on the other side of the House, and in regard to which we are told that they have nailed their colors to the mast, which they are prepared to stand and fall by; and that affords an argument why I shall be found voting, as I trust I ever shall be found voting, against that policy. But I admit, while that is so, that if this House by any policy can improve the condition of the farmer, it is the bounden duty of this House to do so. I think, therefore, that, while I am not opposed in any sense or form to the policy that I have hitherto supported, while I am prepared to accept that policy with all its consequences, at the same time if it can be shown to us that we have yet another means which is quite consistent with that policy which we have adopted, and consistent with the protection which we have given to our infant manufactures, by which we can benefit our farmers, we are bound to adopt that means; we owe everything to the great producing people of this country, and we are bound to give effect to such a policy. Therefore it is that I have ventured to propound the policy which I have mentioned, and which is expounded very largely, if not more widely, in the resolution which is now before the Chair. Undoubtedly, while the comparison, so far, is in favor of the Canadian farmer with the American farmer, while it is still more largely in his favor as compared with the English farmer, who, according to statistics, is on the high road to ruin, still we cannot forget or ignore the fact that the price of the cereals, which are suitable articles of export from this country, has been for some years past, and appears still to be, getting lower and lower, so that the farmer does not get now for his product, although he gets more than his neighbor, as much as he did obtain some years ago, and particularly in the product of wheat. On the contrary, that article has been falling in the market so enormously that I will just mention one set of figures as showing the result of that falling off, which must strike us as being of great signification. The export from the United States of wheat and wheat flour alone in 1887, as compared with what it was five years before, has increased to an enormous extent, I think to the extent of over £15,000,000. The cost to the English consumer is no less than £5,000,000 sterling more than it was five years ago. They have purchased from the American farmer wheat and wheat flour to the extent of £15,000,000 more than they did at the period which I have mentioned. Nothing can more illustrate the down grade which this great article of production on this continent has been taken in late years than that. Therefore it behoves us to take into consideration the question whether we might not restore to the farmer the market he has lost in consequence of the enormous competition on the other side of the line.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. McCARTHY. Before entering on the next branch of the subject, I desire to disclaim all hostility to the great American Republic. The motion which I have mentioned, and the views I propose to state, are not grounded at all upon any desire to create feelings of hostility between this country and the neighboring Republic; but I believe that we ought to do here what they appear always to have done there, to make our trade relations with reference to our interests and the interests of the people we represent, without regard to the interests of that neighboring nation. I think we will best fulfil our duty if we endeavor, no matter what the subject may be in connection with trade, to put it in the best possible shape for the people of Canada, without having too much regard to the Acts, the policy, the possibilities, the expectations which we may have from a conciliatory policy on the part of the people on the other side of the line. Perhaps in the past we have all been looking too much to Washington. Certainly we have been expecting more than we have ever obtained from them, and I think we are strong enough and able enough, and I think we will do better, to deal with that great trade question solely in regard to the wishes and wants of our own people, without regard to the policy which is pursued on the other side of the line. Now, we cannot, of course, discuss this question without making some reference to the alternative proposition which has been made this session, and although I have no right, and I do not propose at all to transgress the rule, to make any reference in particular to the discussion which took place on that subject, nevertheless, the two policies are virtually antagonistic. Unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, which it is admitted, involves the rearrangement of our tariff, not to suit our own wants, not to suit our own interest, but in order to prevent goods being imported through Canada, and thereby reaching the neighboring Republic. That seems to be practically and honestly conceded. Then it appears to me that after all, call it what you will, unrestricted reciprocity is but commercial union thinly veiled; because, whether we are to make, by a joint arrangement, our tariff, which, in point of fact, would be having our tariff made for us by the people on the other side; or whether we are to make our tariff according to their wishes, and to bind ourselves to retain that tariff for a certain definite number of years, as in the reciprocity treaty; whether we are to collate our revenue into one bulk and distribute it per capita, or in any other way that may be agreed upon, or to collect the revenue coming into this country and to allow them to collect their revenue—all these, in the long run, amount to one and the same thing; and, as I say, I believe it is commercial union thinly veiled. Now that involves, Sir, as an immediate consequence, the disruption of the trade relations which exist between this and the mother country. It would cause us to say to the people of Great Britain: True it is, you have given us an open market; we have for years sent you our goods on free and equal terms, but the country to the south of us, which has denied us an open market, which has imposed a high rate of tariff upon our goods, which has done all that tariff regulations could do in order to impede our trade and to build themselves up at our expense,—because of that very policy, we are now prepared to take them to our bosom and to turn our backs upon the old mother land. Now, not merely is that so, but it is a fact that cannot be denied, that the great bulk of our trade has been, and is, and is still more largely likely to be with Great Britain, than with the United States,—I speak more particularly of that portion of our products which the farmers have to export, the export of agriculture in the broadest sense of that term. Let me just go over, very briefly, a few figures upon that subject. For the last five years I find that our exports to Great Britain—I do not take five years because it brings out any special result; I believe the same result will be found for any other period that may be selected—but I will take the five years from 1883 to 1887, and I find the amount of our agricultural products exported to the mother country amounted to $114,000,000 odd, or an average of nearly $23,000,000 for the five years. During the same period our exports of the same products to the United States amounted to the sum of $28,000,000 or an average of something over $15,500,000. I do not wish to trouble the House with the exact figures; the general result is quite sufficient for the purpose of my argument. Now, then, the total of these exports of agricultural products for that period came to the large sum of $192,000,000; or in the ratio of 23 to Great Britain, and 15½ to the United States. When we examine, for that period, the proportions we must be more convinced that our trade is growing with one country while it is falling off with the other—if not falling off, it is certainly not increasing. In 1883, the ratio was 22½ to 1½; in 1884, 20 to 18½; in 1885, 24 to 15; in 1886, 22½ to 15½; in the last year of which we have returns, 27·7 to 15·2, the largest export of any year, and the largest proportion to Great Britain. Now, it would be a policy of madness, as it appears to me, if we, at this stage, should say to the people of Great Britain, who are the great purchasers of our goods, we propose to increase our tariff in such a way that not only can goods come in here intended for the United States, but that the large imports which we are now taking from you, must be very greatly diminished, because the result of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, would be that, to a large extent, these goods would be purchased from the neighboring Republic. That course, I say, is not unattended with danger in a commercial sense; that course would be followed, I believe, very promptly, by scheduling Canada, and preventing us from doing that which we have hitherto done, when we have been enabled to export cattle alive to the mother country. No greater blow could be struck at the prosperity of the farmer, in my humble judgment, if that growing industry—because it is a growing industry, one which has attained enormous proportions within recent years—nothing could give us so fatal a stab as that the English people should place Canada upon the schedule, and put us in the same position, in that regard, as the United States. We all know the trouble that our High Commissioner, the present Minister of Finance, had in England not many years ago, to prevent that untoward result. We all know the jealousy of the hard-run English and Irish farmer against importations of cattle from a colony like Canada, that does not give any advantages whatever to Britain in our markets; but if we were to raise our tariff, no one can pretend with any show of reason that the English people would not be perfectly justified in scheduling us, and treating us, in that sense, as a hostile people, so far as tariff relations were concerned. Not only would that be so, but if we do not deal with them, if we do not purchase from them, we cannot ship our goods to them with advantage. The very ships that now go there to carry our wheat, come back laden with their goods. But destroy our trade with them, and we would see repeated the complaint made in respect to Maritime Province vessels that go to Boston without any return cargo. That itself would tend to drive our grain and our produce away from the ports of Montreal and Halifax, where we have been spending money and doing all we can, with the highest patriotic efforts, in order to build up those ports and these sea-ways, for it would be driving our goods away towards the ports of the United States. So, whatever way it is looked at, it appears to me it is a policy that must be attended with the greatest disadvantages to this country. Now, what is our position in the English market? It is said we have got all we can possibly get there; we have got absolute free trade, right to take our goods in there. We get that just as all other countries in the world get it, not because we are a colony, not because we are a British possession, but because it is the policy of that country to receive goods on those terms from all parts of the world, so that they may buy in the cheapest market, even although they may be compelled, possibly, to sell in the dearest, and if that is true, if that be the unalterable policy of that country, then there might be some justification for the argument used on the other side of the House; although, Sir, it does appear to me that if nations are to deal in the same way that people deal with one another, it is a strange way of showing our gratitude for all that has been done for this country in the past, by the open market that has been given to us, to take the first opportunity of building up a country to the south of us which has denied us that market in every possible way. Why, Sir, to me it is most astonishing that the free traders in this House, those who have preached free trade so long in this country, should have this as the culmination of their policy, that the country which has denied us free trade, which has built itself up by protection, is to reap a reward from this country, which my hon. friends opposite have all along contended should have adopted free trade. I fancy that gentlemen on the other side of the line, the great statesmen who inaugurated the policy of protection, would if they lived to see this day have reason indeed to be proud of their policy and of its results. They would be able to say: Here is part of the British Empire, a part of that great country which has nailed its colors to the mast so far as free trade is concerned, and we are a country which has adopted the opposite policy of protection. That policy of protection of building up our own manufactures, making and creating a market for our home industry, has been attended with such marvellous results that Canada is knocking at our door, desirous of obtaining the great advantages of the protective country, and is willing to give equal terms to the United States that she gives to Great Britain. I do not think it is possible in any event that so disastrous a policy as that is likely to prevail. But I am prepared to establish that we have a market in England for everything we produce, that no matter what may happen that market is open to us, and I think I shall be able to satisfy this House that there is good ground to believe and strong ground to hope that there is a party in England which favors the giving of advantages in the English market to the colonies, and that this opinion will before very long prevail. Hon. gentlemen may say that it is an impossibility. Hon. gentlemen may say: What evidence have you of such a result? In the first place, let me point out what the result would be. I have given the figures of our exports of farm produce to England for the past five years. I ask this House, is there any member in it prepared to vote against the proposition that will give to us a preference in the English market of 10 per cent. or any other percentage, no matter how small, upon the agricultural products of this country? Is any person prepared to say that that would not be a policy advantageous to the people of Canada? I see my hon. friend who is distinguished of course as a free trader, Mr. Mills (Bothwell) laughs at the very notion that the English people would do such a suicidal act, in his judgment; but, if he will pardon me, I will come back to that point afterwards, and I will simply say now that there is a strong probability, I will venture to say there is more than a strong probability, that as regards bread-stuffs Great Britain will be obliged to come to that point. I am at present dealing with the question whether it would be advantageous for us, if there is such a party there, if there is a party in England prepared to offer to the colonies, and this is England's greatest colony, advantages in her market which they would not afford to foreigners, a percentage obtained by placing a duty against foreign products, thereby giving a substantial advantage in her markets to Canada as well as to other parts of the Empire. I want to know if there is any person prepared to say that that policy would not be an advantage to the people of this country? Why, take these very $25,000,000. Ten per cent. on that would be an advantage to our farmers of $2,500,000 more in addition to $25,000,000 already received. It would mean a very considerable sum per bushel to every farmer who produces any portion of the produce exported from this country; and whatever may be said about the other part of the question, I do not think any hon. gentleman will deny that that at all events would be an advantage which we ought to be prepared to accept.

Mr. McCARTHY.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) What about the manufacturers?

Mr. McCARTHY. I will give an answer to the hon. gentleman, although I propose to deal with that branch of the question a little later. I admit, and my resolution suggests it, and it is a point that has not been lost sight of by gentlemen who favor the policy, that manufacturers must be to a certain extent protected, and to a certain extent they must surrender in favor of the great farming population the extreme protection they possess at this moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. I will deal with that point in a few moments when I come to discuss that branch of the subject. We need not doubt that there is a market in England for all our products. When I say so I am aware that hon. members know perfectly well that England to-day is importing from the United States 60 per cent. of her bread-stuffs, 15 per cent. coming from India and but a very small proportion indeed from the remaining part of the Empire. There is no question but that there is an ample field for all we can raise or hope to raise in this country for the next thirty years in the English market. The same remark applies to horned cattle, to cheese, to everything we have to export, even to barley, which we send to the other side of the line; there is not an article that our farmers have to export and which the country has to dispose of for which there is not an ample market in England, and that market can be obtained by excluding, in the differential manner I have mentioned, the exports of foreign countries. Who is in favor of this policy on the other side? I have been at some pains to follow the discussion and the thought in this particular and most interesting branch of politics to Canadians, because whatever else may be said of it I think we all must agree that if there is any large party in England willing to adopt that policy we should stretch out the right hand of fellowship to that party and do all that is possible to support and strengthen it. In 1879 the subject of fair trade, as it was known, was first broached, and the first discussion took place in the press and on platforms, and in 1881 an organisation was formed. I will read the principles, or what we would call the platform of that organisation, showing as it does that from the earliest time the fair traders were in favor of giving advantages to Canada and the other colonies of the Empire in the markets of Great Britain. The first article of the platform was with respect to the formation of commercial treaties. It was suggested and urged at that time, and perhaps not improperly so, that some of the commercial treaties Great Britain had made would prevent her giving terms to her own dependencies than she was prepared to give to other countries with which she had made commercial treaties. The first article of the platform was in opposition to that policy, and for the discontinuance of it in the future. The second article of the platform was this:

"Imports of raw materials for home industries free from every quarter in order that we may compete successfully in the sales of our manufactures."

The third article was that import duties should be placed upon the manufacturers of foreign states refusing to receive our manufactures into their markets free or on a fair exchange, and article four, the one with which we were more immediately concerned, was as follows:—

"A moderate duty to be levied on articles of food from foreign countries, the same being admitted free from all parts of our Empire, in order:

"1. To develop the resources of our own Empire, and to determine the flow of British capital, skill, and industry, henceforth into our own dominions, instead of into protective foreign states where it becomes a force commercially hostile to us.

"2. Thus to transfer the great fruit growing industries which we employ from protective foreign nations where tariff restrictions contract our export trade and diminish its value, to our own colonies and dependencies; where, even now, without such preferential treatment, our labor products are in increasing demand, and are taken per head of the populations, in far greater proportion than those foreign states to which our food custom is now chiefly given."

That was the policy laid down by an organisation known as the Fair Trade League. That league is still in existence, and before I am done I shall be able to show hon. gentlemen that the principles of the league have been adopted by the party that now rules in Great Britain. But there are some words to which, with the consent of the House, I venture to draw attention, written by one of the distinguished members of that league—a gentleman who occupied so high a position that he was afterwards appointed one of the Royal Commission on the depression of trade—Mr. Farrar Ecroyd of Bradford. He wrote on this subject and his letters were afterwards circulated in pamphlet form and to those letters I appeal for a full statement of the case. So full and so convincing is the statement that I venture to say no man can read them without feeling satisfied that the day of the triumph of the policy which he is in favor cannot be very long delayed. He divided the position of England into three periods and he said:

"1. A period of almost unbounded prosperity, during which the nations from whom we purchased our supplies of food and raw materials, not having the means as yet of manufacturing for themselves, must, of necessity, take our productions in exchange. During this period, any protective duties they might levy would not affect us, and would only enhance the cost for themselves.

"2. Transition. During which these nations, gradually increasing their own manufactures under the shelter of protective duties, should become more and more independent of ours; yet during which the increased prosperity of our home trade and the growth of markets in semi-civilised lands should suffice to maintain our prosperity.

"3. A period of contradiction and difficulty, when—being obliged to import half the food of a dense and delicately organised population—we should find the nations excluding by hostile tariffs those products of our industry which are all we have to offer in exchange in the long run."

Now, look at the trade returns, and see if this gentleman's statement of the position is not accurate? How has the course of trade been in England? Why, Sir, the imports from 1871 to 1885 from foreign countries, mainly although not altogether protective countries, have increased from £135,000,000 to £171,000,000. The exports from England to the United States, notwithstanding the enormous increase of the population of that great country, have decreased from £34,000,000 in 1871 to £21,000,000, or nearly £22,000,000 in 1885. The exports to Germany during the same period have decreased from £27,000,000 to £16,000,000. The writer pointedly asks, and the argument is irresistible and I venture to say it is unanswerable: If such is the result of protection in those countries, and I could have added France to the number, that we cannot trade with them, that they built up by their protective policy industries in their own land, so that they ceased to buy from us, what will happen in England if Japan, China, Turkey and other countries, where there is no protective policy should adopt the same system and establish the same industries in their midst? That is the view that is presented by this gentleman, who is not merely a free trader but who is also a manufacturer. It is impossible to have regard for what we know is going on in the world without seeing that the United States with its 65,000,000 of people is now practically doing nearly all its own manufacturing.

Mr. MULOCK. How much did they export last year from Great Britain?

Mr. McCARTHY. I did not give last year, but in 1885 it was twenty odd millions.

Mr. MULOCK. Pounds sterling?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes. Compare that with £34,000,000 in 1871 and compare the population in 1871 with the population in 1885 and see how enormous the decrease per capita has been. Now that is not all. That is not the only force that is at work. The agricultural industry in England is absolutely in a state of bankruptcy, and I do not think that language is too strong to describe it; I do not think it is too much to say that, when I point out the enormous loss the agriculturists have been sustaining, and I take the authority of Sir James Caird. In that gentleman's evidence before the Commission on the depression of Trade, he puts the annual loss of the farming community at no less than the enormous sum of forty-two millions and odd pounds sterling. Then look at the enormous quantity of land in England that yearly passes out of cultivation. Take grain growing as an illustration of that, and let me give you the figures. From 1870 to 1886, in 16 years, the difference in the quantity of land in Great Britain which formerly was used for the cultivation of grain had fallen from 11,803,000 acres to 9,51,000 acres, or nearly 2,000,000 acres and a decrease of 16 per cent. It is shown by statistics also that although the population is largely increasing the number of people engaged in agricultural pursuits—somewhere in the neighborhood of 3,000,000—is very largely diminishing. Those people either emigrate or go to the towns and what is the result? Let us take the manufacturer. He is denied his home market to the farmer, who was his largest customer, and the former purchaser who is in beggary instead of being in affluence can buy no more. The agricultural laborers are driven from the country to compete with the artisan and the mechanic in the town and so the manufacturer and artisan and the mechanic have this two-fold reason for supporting the policy which I am speaking of. First, the increase of his home and local market, and secondly, a desire that the competition from the countryman should be withdrawn to his more natural pursuits of agriculture. Those economic forces appear to me, must before very long prevail. But I am not driven merely to rely upon that argument, although I think very large importance is to be attached to it. Whatever politicians may hold, we know they pass away, but the arguments and reasons which induced great changes of public opinion remain, and I say these causes inevitably tend to England doing something in order to get a market for herself, instead of importing enormously from protective countries which every year take less and less from England in exchange. Now, let me draw attention to the report—the minority report it is true, but still a report of very able men; upon this subject on the Commission of enquiry into the depression of trade, and the reasons they give and the remedies they propose for it. The gentlemen whose minority report I propose to read an extract or two from, are Lord Dunraven, Mr. Farrar Eeroyd, Mr. P. Albert Mintz and Mr. Neville Hubbock, men of distinction in the various walks of life. Let us see what they recommend. They say:

Mr. McCARTHY.

"For though we may be unable to alter the protectionist policy of other nations, we can do much to free ourselves from its injurious effects. The more we can draw our supplies of imported food from countries which will largely and under moderate tariff rates, accept the products of our industries in exchange, the fuller and the steadier will be the employment of our population.

"Our command of the fiscal arrangements of India has saved the industry of Lancashire from the calamity which must have overwhelmed it, had the great empire come under the control of a commercial policy like that of Russia and the United States. And the growth of our colonies, with their very large consumption per head of British manufactures, has helped on our industries to endure with less suffering the stifling pressure of foreign tariffs.

"But these aids, though welcome, are insufficient. It is a striking fact that during the past twenty years 67 per cent. of our emigrants have gone to the United States and only 27½ per cent. to our own colonies. The more extreme protectionist policy of the United States, so far from repelling the emigrants has operated as an effectual bribe to both capital and labor, by holding out the inducements of higher prices and higher wages.

"It would be an act of suicidal folly on our part to attempt to counterwork these influences by a like system of enormous import duties, designed to raise the price of commodities for the advantage of home producers. We have a far better and more effectual remedy at command. A slightly preferential treatment of the food products of India and the colonies over these of foreign nations, would if adopted as a permanent system, gradually but certainly direct the flow of food-growing capital and labor more towards our own dependencies and less towards the United States than heretofore."

Mr. CASEY. What is the book you are reading from?

Mr. McCARTHY. The report of the Commission on the depression of trade.

"When it is noted that in the year 1884 the Australian colonies, with only 3,100,000 inhabitants, purchased £23,895,858 worth of our manufactures, whilst the United States with about 55,000,000 inhabitants, purchased only £24,424,638 worth, it will be apparent how great would be the effect of a policy which should lead to the more rapid peopling of the Australian colonies in giving fuller employment to our working classes at home, and thus increasing the healthful activity of the home trade, as well as the import of raw materials for our various industries to operate upon.

"We believe that specific duties, equal to about 10 per cent. on a low range of values, imposed upon the import from foreign countries of those articles of food which India and the colonies are well able to produce, would sufficiently effect this purpose. Their adoption would, of course, involve the abolition of the heavy duties on tea, coffee, cocoa and dried fruits which are now levied on Indian and colonial equally with foreign produce. It would widen the basis of our revenue, and render us less dependent upon the sustained productiveness of the income tax and the duties upon intoxicating liquors. And, what is even more important, it could not fail to draw closer all portions of the Empire in the bond of mutual interests, and thus pave the way towards a more effective union for great common objects."

Here in this formal document is the proposition to put 10 per cent. duty on all breadstuffs imported from foreign countries; and, Sir, it is the recognised policy, the clear and well-understood policy of the party of which these gentlemen were the representatives that that duty or some equivalent duty should be placed on breadstuffs in order to attain the ends which they seek to accomplish, and of the means they themselves propose. Now, Sir, let us understand what that would be to us. Let us take it in a simple form and work it out.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman say what party has declared that as its policy?

Mr. McCARTHY. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will tell him before I take my seat, but I thought the hon. gentleman having such a wide knowledge of financial matters would not require to come to me for information on that subject.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because I know that it has been disavowed by the leaders of both parties in England.

Mr. McCARTHY. However, I will give the hon. gentleman the information, and add to his stock of knowledge. Let us see what the effect of that policy would be on the consumer, because I am reasoning the question from his standpoint. It needs no argument to show that it would be of advantage to us; what I want to show is, that it is a policy which must recommend itself in the near future to the English people, and what I want this House to do, if not to-night, at some near day, is to let the party who are advocating it know that we are in accord with them, and ready to do whatever we can to induce the Canadian people to join hands with them. Now, I have worked out, as an illustration, the effect of this policy on the food supply of England, which is, perhaps, after all the most unpopular way in which it can be presented to a British audience. Much has been heard there in days gone by of the large loaf and the small loaf; but when we know that during the years of England's greatest prosperity the price of wheat was 50s. a quarter, and that to-day—or on February 8, by the last returns I could obtain—it was 30s. 4d. a quarter, I think hon. gentlemen must see that a small specific or ad valorem duty on wheat would not press heavily on the resources of the working classes of Great Britain. If they could prosper with wheat at 50s. a quarter, I fail to know in what way their circumstances have changed so as to prevent them paying 36s. or 38s., which, perhaps, a small duty on wheat would compel them to pay, but would be more than returned to them in the increased prosperity of their own farmers, the revival of their industries, and the enlarged commerce of their colonies. England's consumption of breadstuffs amounts to 231,000,000 bushels of wheat and flour. Of that quantity Great Britain herself produced something in the neighborhood of 79,000,000 bushels, while from the British possessions 36,000,000 bushels were imported; in other words, Great Britain and her colonies produce about 50 per cent. of her food supply. Now, put upon that, if you please, a specific duty of a shilling a bushel, and what is the immediate result? That would bring in a revenue from foreign wheat of nearly £1,000,000. The revenue obtained from foreign wheat would supply the place of the revenue now obtained from the duties on tea, coffee chicory and the like, and dried fruits. They would be merely receiving that revenue from one article of food that largely enters into the consumption of the people, while they could relieve the people of the duty on the article of tea, which I suppose also enters very largely into general consumption. But, Sir, that is not all that it would do. It would raise the price for us of the wheat we send, and would also raise the price to the English farmer of the wheat he grows. How much it would do that is not perhaps a matter on which we shall be able to agree; but I put it—and I do not suppose it will be deemed too much—at 9d. a bushel, three-fourths of the duty. Suppose it would be a shilling, my argument would still be sound; but call it 9d., and what is the result? The result is that you would have an increased cost to the consumer altogether of £3,000,000, which would be the difference in the price of wheat between 30s. 4d. and 36s. 4d. a quarter, which would be still much lower than was the price in the best days of England's prosperity. To us it would mean a difference of 25 cents a bushel; to the English farmer a difference of a shilling or at least 9d. a bushel, as the case may be; to the British consumer it would mean half of that spread over the whole of the breadstuffs, because he would be relieved of the tax on tea, which he could afford to apply on the increased cost of his grain. Now, I was pleased to find that this illustration was backed up by a gentleman to whom I have already referred, Mr. Farrar Ecroyd, who puts it in this way:

"To effect our purpose it would, I think, be needful to impose specific duties on foreign food products, equal to about 10 per cent. on a low range of values, and to maintain them steadfastly until our own dependencies should be able to supply our wants; save only, that in the event of a bad harvest and high prices, the duty on corn, not being maintained for revenue purposes, could easily be suspended for a year. I will not encumber my letter with a long array of figures, but after a careful study of our average imports of food products from foreign countries, I find that a duty of 10 per cent. on them would amount to about £12,500,000. From this must be deducted £4,000,000 which would be remitted by reducing to 10 per cent. the existing duties on foreign tea, coffee, cocoa, dried fruits, &c., and by admitting these articles duty free from English dependencies. To the balance of £8,000,000, I add £1,600,000, to cover the charges and profits of distributors on the increased cost; this brings the sum to £9,600,000. We have next to consider the effect of the duties in raising the price of some of these articles which are also grown at home; this is a complicated question, because it is not easy to estimate the proportion of loss which would fall upon the foreign grower, just as Bradford mill owners and workmen too well know that they now endure a portion of the burden of these foreign tariffs which press upon their goods and render their toil and trade so unprofitable. I take the amount, however, at £7,500,000 after much research,—thus bringing the total up to £17,100,000; of which sum it is evident that £8,000,000 being new revenue, would at once enable to lighten the existing burden of taxation to an equal amount. This would leave £9,700,000 as the net additional cost to consumers; of which £7,500,000 would go to relieve our depressed and harassed agriculturists of the remaining £1,600,000 to increase the interests and profits of wholesale and retail distributors, should competition permit them to charge it to us. Now our present population is about 35,000,000, or 7,000,000 families at 5 persons each, amongst whom to divide the added cost of £9,700,000. This would give 26s. per annum, or 6d. per week as the charge on each family; surely a very moderate price to pay for benefits so great and enduring as those which have been described."

I think I have shown so far that this matter is gaining ground in England; and now I will answer the question and point out the party that has adopted, as a party, to-day the fair trade policy, which was laid down in 1881 and has been fought for ever since, and which was adopted by a large minority of the report on the depression of trade. We find at the meeting of the great Conservative party in Oxford last November, attended by representatives from all parts of England, that a resolution in favor of fair trade was adopted by the enormous figures of 1,000 to 11. The great party of England, because it is the great party of England to-day—leaving Ireland out of the question—the Conservative party, has a majority of about 90 representatives, so far as Great Britain alone is concerned. It is the great party of England, and upon this question of protection, I venture to say the Irish representatives would not be found opposed to the majority of English representatives. There is no country in the world where protection to the farming industry is more required than it is in the Green Isle; and on that policy, when the day comes for a new party, when the day comes for a new policy and for new issues, I venture to say that the Irish representatives will be found at the back of the majority of English representatives on this great question. Here is the resolution which I beg to read for the information more especially of the hon. member for South Oxford.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As I have read it a dozen times and know it is disallowed by Lord Salisbury, it is no use to read it again.

Mr. McCARTHY. I will deal with Lord Salisbury's position presently.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No doubt you will.

Mr. McCARTHY. The resolution is as follows :

"Resolved that the continued depression in trade and agriculture renders speedy reform in the policy of the United Kingdom as regards foreign imports and the influx of indigent foreigners a matter of vital necessity to the people of Great Britain and Ireland."

That platform, only last November, was, at what we would call a convention, a convention of the whole party of England, adopted by the enormous majority of 1,000 to 11; and that policy is now the accepted policy of the Conservative party of England. I want to know whether that is not encouragement for us to adopt a corresponding resolution in this House. I want to know whether any representative here of any agricultural constituency can go back to his constituents and say: The great party in Great Britain offers to us differential terms in our market, and that party has accepted this policy as their platform, but we have refused in the Canadian House of Commons to take advantage of the offer they have made. I do not think there is one member from an agricultural constituency or from any other constituency in this House who can refuse to, at all events, hear what the results of that offer may be. Now, as to Lord Salisbury, he came down to Oxford. He was not present at the meeting, but he was received by that convention and addressed them; and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is perfectly right in saying that Lord Salisbury did not, by word, say anything in favor of this resolution. On the contrary, Lord Salisbury, with a good deal of circumlocution, gave it the go-by. He intimated that in times past his party and the Liberal Unionists had held different views. He intimated that these two parties were now united for a specific object, and that their purpose gained, their interests could again differ; but for the present—and a practical statesman was concerned for the present,—he, the leader of the Government, composed not merely of Conservatives but of Conservatives and Liberal Unionists—a government formed for the express purpose of preventing the policy of separation, as propounded by Mr. Gladstone, being adopted—had, as his first duty to his party and policy, to see that no disturbing influence or question should be allowed to interfere with that union until the great end and aim of the union between the Conservatives and the Liberal Unionists was attained. Well, I can understand that. I can understand that it would have been suicidal on the part of the leader of the present Government to have introduced a bone of contention into his present policy. Remember that he has the support of Mr. John Bright in his present policy. Remember that Mr. Bright always has been a great free trader and will remain a free trader to the end of his term. Remember that Mr. Bright could not support a government, even perhaps to prevent the separation or division of the Empire, contrary to his opinion on free trade. But the men of this generation, the men who compose the party, the men who wield the strength of the party, because, after all, even the hon. gentleman, a kind of sub-leader on the other side, I venture to say, does not direct all the policy of his party, for the great body of gentlemen who sit behind him have something to say in the formation of that party and so—I believe have we—the men I say who formed the body of the great Conservative party of England have something to say in the formation of its policy, and when these men, when the great Conservative party of England have adopted as their policy this policy of fair trade, it must in the near future prevail.

Mr. McCARTHY.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They had a vote on that in the House of Commons.

Mr. McCARTHY. No doubt, but that party were just as much bound to sustain the Government in their present policy as is Lord Salisbury. But the policy of fair trade has been announced and I am merely giving the course of events which have led to that conclusion and which is convincing that the policy must be successful. Either England, as a great productive country, must fall from her great estate, either England, as a great manufacturing country, must cease to hold her own in competition with foreign countries or she must adopt some policy of the kind I have intimated, of drawing her supplies of breadstuffs from her own people and creating an interprovincial trade, so to speak, by gathering in all her colonies and dependencies, just as we have gathered in all the colonies and dependencies from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Is there anything to fear from the adoption of this policy? I dare say there are amongst us gentlemen who may feel that, if we adopt any such policy as this, we will raise feelings of hostility, that is to say, that we will be embarrassed in our trade relations with the United States. For my part, I utterly disbelieve in the possibility of the United States doing more than the United States has already done to injure us in trade matters, or, in other words, to advance her own interests. Her policy has been consistent. It has been said, perhaps not correctly, that it was Mr. Seward's policy, after the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty, to drive us into annexation, to compel us by hostile tariffs to sue for annexation. If any such idea entered into the mind of any United States statesman, I think the results since that date must have shown the difficulties with which they had to deal. Take our products which they import. Take for instance our barley. There is a duty of 10 cents a bushel on that. If they were to make it 15 cents, does anyone suppose that we would send one bushel less to the United States?

Mr. MULOCK. Who pays the duty?

Mr. McCARTHY. The American brewer buys our barley because he must have it, because, great as that country is as an agricultural country, it cannot produce the barley which he requires in order to make his beer, and the American brewer, as he bought our barley in times gone by, so he buys it now, and pays that duty in order to obtain our barley. I throw out a hint to some of the moneyed men on the other side of the House. They could make a corner in barley if they were to buy up all our barley, and they could make the American brewer pay whatever they like to ask for it. England is a great importer of barley. She imports a large quantity of barley from Russia. Why should she not import from Canada? Will anyone say that our barley is not as good as the barley from Russia? I may be told that the barley which is produced in England is better for the production of their heavy beer than any barley which we produce here. That may be so, but does anyone suppose that the barley which they obtain from Russia is better than ours?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). She gets it cheaper.

Mr. McCARTHY. Not so cheap. Look at the trade returns, and you will see that the declared value of Russian wheat in England is 77 cents per bushel. Of course that includes freight, that is the price delivered in England, but that is not so remarkably cheap. I say that, if we had a preferential market there, if 10 per cent. were to be put on Russian barley, we would have a market there for Canadian barley. I think I may say that the reason why we have not a market in England for our barley is that the Americans are always prepared to go one better than the English go; and, of course, when they go one better, it is to our interest to send our barley there; and everyone who knows anything about brewing knows that whether the price is 10 cents or 15 cents different is only a small matter. Then I will come to another article, that of horses. They tax our horses pretty heavily. The tax I know has been lowered, but has it been lowered to suit Canada or to protect the American farmer? What is our position? Out of $37,000,000 of exports to the United States, about $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 went in free of duty. If the present propositions are carried out, it is expected that another $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 will go into the United States free of duty. But we are not getting that reduction because we asked for it, or because it is to please us. All parties in the United States find that they have a larger revenue, that they are absorbing a larger revenue from the country into their exchequer, than they know what to do with, and it has to be reduced; and, while one party proposes to lighten the taxes on the necessities of life, the other party proposes to reduce the taxes on whiskey and tobacco, so as to keep up the tariff wall against all the world; but, with all the care they exercise, with all their devotion to their own country and its interests, they have never suggested what, in madness, has been suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite, to take off the protection which is given to the farmers. They may take the duty off lumber, but not off horses.

Mr. CHARLTON. What about wool?

Mr. McCARTHY. Wool is an exception. They do not take the duty off barley or cattle. They keep up this protection for the farmer, and the farmer much needs it, because there is no certainty that this tariff of theirs would introduce reciprocal relations with this side of the line, and the farmers need what protection they have, as I demonstrated by the figures which I quoted this afternoon. I do not think that any portion of the Canadian people will agree to allow any man to say that they fear that the adoption of any policy which is wise and beneficial will be hostile to the United States. They have dealt with us as they saw fit, they have raised and lowered their tariff, as they saw fit, and I do not think anyone will say that the Canadian people are not able to alter the own tariff and make advantageous relations with any country in the world without consulting the American Senate or the people of the United States. Then there is the other consideration which has been held open to us, that we would find ourselves by-and-by left out in the cold. If it is a possibility, and I am not putting it further than that—I look upon it as a certainty and not only a possibility—if it is a possibility that a Fair Trade party should come into power in England, how would they treat Canada with this tariff which we have to-day, or how would they treat us if the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite propose to force upon the House and the country were adopted? Can we expect that, if they adopted Fair Trade they would treat us in the same way as if we had always been ready to open our markets to them and to deal with them, or would they not naturally deal with us in a manner which would under the circumstances be perfectly proper and right. I cannot put this better than in the words of the president of the Federation League, Mr. Cunliffe Lister, who says:

"In conclusion, let me point out that it is this commercial federation of the Empire which furnishes the key note of the present position, compared with the protection of old days which looked to the United Kingdom being self-contained, self-subsisting and self-supporting. This latter position is so absolutely impossible to-day that we are bound to extend our borders and to treat the Empire as one; and if it be urged that some of our possessions cannot for revenue purposes, and will not, dispense with import duties, even against British products, our reply is simple. In such case, our hands are free to establish the differential system in lieu of absolutely free imports. In such case, our Empire would be still united in commercial bonds, and there is probably no British colony in existence that would not, in return for a preferential market on our shores only too gladly give us a preferential market on theirs. Should there be any so blind as not to be willing to do so, then such colony or possession should become ipso facto for tariff purposes a foreign state."

Now, there we have the alternative presented to us. On the one hand the advantages are to give us free trade with the United States, and to build up a tariff against England. You see its advantages, you know its dangers. On the other hand, we know, by that means, that not the slightest benefit can be obtained, so far as advancing the price of our agricultural products is concerned. We know, on the other hand, that there is a possibility—and I hope yet to live to see the day when my statement will be corroborated—of getting advantages in the great market of the world, where all our goods ultimately have to go. If they go to the States, we will displace there goods that go to England; if American goods are allowed into this country they merely displace so much more for the ultimate destination of all. We make the market ourselves. An invitation is offered to us, not by the Government, it is true, but by a party which is now, I venture to say, the large party. I want also to point out how much Ireland is interested in a policy of this kind. We all know, who have paid any attention to this subject, that from Ireland a large number of cattle is sold yearly to the English market; and I was surprised to learn that in the year 1886, from Ireland, were shipped to England, Scotland and Wales no less than 717,389 cattle, 734,213 sheep, and 421,285 swine. Now, compare that with our export, which we know is large. I have not the values, only the numbers. Our export of cattle was 91,000 as against 717,000; our export of sheep was 359,000 as against 734,000; we do not appear to have exported swine at all to the British market. Now, what country is more interested than Ireland? What argument compelled the Government last year to pass a measure in relief of the tenant? It was an argument demonstrated by the Commission that sat in Ireland, namely, that owing to the competition from this side of the Atlantic, the value to the Irish farmer of all that he raised, all that he had to sell, had enormously depreciated. What country, therefore, is more interested in this policy than Ireland? What country, therefore, should this fair trade policy look to for support more than from Ireland. Now, when the question is settled, the question which, no doubt, will be settled during this Parliament, which appears to be in a fair way of settlement even now, when the question is settled as to what the Irish are to have in the nature of Home Rule, or County Government, or whatever it may be, then the new issue must be this all important question, important to every man in Great Britain and Ireland, the all important question as to the position of the farmer, and not merely the farmer but the manufacturer of that country. Sir, I will close my observations by reading an extract from Mr. Chamberlain's speech. Mr. Chamberlain, of the great free trade of Birmingham, Mr. Chamberlain, of a younger generation than Cobden and Bright, and still hitherto believed to be impregnated to the fullest extent with free trade doctrine; speaking the other night—where, Sir? in the Devonshire Club, a Liberal club; in the chair, Lord Granville, a Gladstonian Liberal, surrounded by members of the Liberal party, he held out his hands in terms of kindness, in terms which one would not have expected from Mr. Chamberlain. Dealing with this question of commercial union, he said:

"The difficulty in the case of the commercial union is, no doubt, much greater. It is no use to expect that our colonies will abandon their customs duties as their chief and principle source of revenue. It is hardly to be hoped that the protected interests fostered by their system will willingly surrender the privileges which they now enjoy. All they can do is to wait until proposals are made to us to consider those proposals when they come with fairness and impartiality and to accept them if they do not involve the sacrifice of any important principle or interest vital to our population.

Coming from Mr. Chamberlain, under the auspices of Lord Granville, in the Devonshire Club, I say these are words that speak, perhaps, louder than the report of the commission with regard to the depreciation of trade, which speak, perhaps, as loudly as the voice of the great Conservative party in their meeting last November, in Oxford; and they warn us not to turn our backs, not to despise the policy which is offered to us by so great a statesman, so eminent a public man, and by so large a party in the country where our chief market must always be. Therefore it is that I have risen with great pleasure to make these observations in support of the resolution which my friend from East Middlesex (Mr. Marshall) has moved, and also to some extent, and perhaps more particularly, in support of the propositions contained in my own. I would close by saying this with regard to the manufacturer: The manufacturer, as he stands to-day, has, to a great extent, successfully built up the industries of this country. I believe for my part that our manufacturers can well say that if we are to be protected against foreigners, if we are to have that market, we can well afford that England should have certain differential preferences in our market. We cannot expect that all the advantages are to be on one side; we cannot expect to discriminate against her in our market, to place England, as it were, upon the ground floor, and at the same time deny to the English manufacturer all that the English manufacturer wants, that is, the sale of his articles in our country so as to pay for the food he gets from us. We cannot refuse to say to England: We now import from the United States $45,000,000 worth, we will do what we can to give that 45,000,000 to the English manufacturer; we will do what we can in that way, and I do not believe, Sir, that with a reduction of 5 or 7 per cent. even, upon our manufactures, upon our protection as it stands to-day, he would be not able to hold his own if the American manufacturer was excluded from his market. Therefore I say that the policy which I advocate is a fair policy. We ask, on the one hand, for preferences in the English market, and we say we are prepared to give them certain preferences in ours, we are willing to enter into commercial union. This matter has been foreseen. With many countries, their terms would be better than ours; with a country such as Australia, they would probably be entitled to all the advantages with us. As I read a moment ago from Mr. Lister's observations, there will be, perhaps, such a bargain as, under the circumstances, would not be unreasonable. That however is a matter of detail, which I need not dwell upon now. I am obliged, Sir, to the House for the patient hearing they have given to my somewhat lengthy remarks. The subject, in my humble judgment, is of the greatest importance, or else I would not have been found occupying the time of the House to this extent. I believe it is fraught with great importance to this country, and believing that, I feel it is my duty to say what I have said on this subject.

Mr. CASEY. I am glad that my hon. friend from Middlesex (Mr. Marshall) has brought this question to the attention of the House. I know that he has done so from a real desire to benefit the interest of that class to which he belongs, and to which I also claim to belong, the farmers of Canada. I have been long aware that the hon. gentleman had some such plan to bring before the House, and I am glad that he has now put it in shape, and brought up a discussion upon it. I cannot say that I stand before you as a supporter, in the fullest extent, of everything that has been advanced by himself, and especially by his seconder, in discussing this matter, but I am sufficiently of a free trader, sufficiently in favor of reciprocity with whoever is willing to be reciprocal with us, to entertain favorably any reasonable proposition for reciprocity with any country, and more especially with that country from which we claim political descent. I have voted already this Session in favor of reciprocity with the United States. I do not think that is inconsistent with the position of being willing to enter into reciprocal trade relations with Great Britain as well. I do not accept this proposition instead of the other; in fact, I wish to be understood distinctly as saying that if it must be a choice between the two I believe Canadian interests will be most promoted by having free trade with the United States rather than any arrangement that is likely to be obtained with Great Britain.

Mr. McCARTHY.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CASEY. Hon. gentlemen may say "no." If they can show us any reasonable possibility of obtaining fair arrangements with England, arrangements quite as favorable as those we can reasonably expect to obtain from the United States, then they may say "no." However, I am not contrasting the two propositions or rejecting the one in favor of the other; I see no reason why we should not discuss with the Imperial Government the question of improved trade relations between Great Britain and the colonies generally. The resolution merely suggests that such arrangements would be beneficial to all interested in Canada and would strengthen the Empire by building up her colonies, and that we should discuss that question with the Home Government. So far there is very little objection to be taken to the motion, and I am glad he has brought it before the House with a view to eliciting opinion by way of discussion. I do not suppose it is intended to press the motion to a division, at least I hope not, for I do not think a vote should be taken on such an important question the first time it comes up in the House for discussion. I do not think ten members have considered the matter sufficiently to be able to vote intelligently upon it and place themselves on record. I am glad, however, that an opportunity is afforded to discuss it. This question should be discussed in a purely non-partisan spirit, I do not see why any question of party is connected with it, and for that reason I was rather sorry, not so much at any actual words used but at the general tone of the speech of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). The earlier part of his speech was evidently prepared for delivery on a former occasion, when perhaps the hon. gentleman had not an opportunity of delivering it, it was a speech intended for the reciprocity debate, and I do not think it has improved by keeping. Some things do not improve by age, and speeches are among the number. The earlier part of the speech was devoted not to advocating reciprocity with England but to showing that reciprocity with the United States was not advantageous, and it is to that part of his speech I desire to make special reference. The hon. member, no doubt, spoke some sound and stirring truths. He said that most of the people of Canada were farmers and that their interests should be considered, and that they should have the best market available, and he went on later to state that the manufacturers must give up to the farmers some of the extreme protection they now enjoy. It is because I believe that the manufacturers should give up some of the extreme protection they now enjoy that I voted in favor of reciprocity with the United States and am now willing to consider the question of reciprocity with England. For the same ostensible reason for which the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) claims we should have reciprocity with England, I claim we should have reciprocity with the United States because the farming interests should prevail. We have had class legislation since 1879, nearly all favoring that portion of the population which comes under the generic name of manufacturers; but in legislating in favor of the farmers who constitute a majority of the people I hold that they should be considered more than any other class. It is their turn now, and I hope that the farmers have a sufficient bond of union, sufficient esprit de corps, sufficient self-restraint, a knowledge of their own interests to see that their interests are protected. We should not have a class war, but if one class pushes their interest at the expense of the preponderating and overwhelming class, the farmers, they must expect ultimately to go to the wall. It would be unfortunate if such a war should occur, it would not be the fault of the farmers of our party, but would have been brought about by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, and unless some one of these propositions is adopted and reciprocity is had with a convenient market such a result may occur, and the manufacturers must look out for themselves. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) referred to the policy of the United States in protecting the farmers and said that neither party in the States would be so mad as to talk of giving up protection to the farmers, and he went on to show that a similar condition prevailed in Canada. Did the hon. gentleman forget that his leader, the representative of Canada at Washington, clothed with all the authority of a plenipotentiary and backed by the Canadian Government, asked the American commissioners to agree to remove the duties on agricultural and natural products on both sides of the line? I do not think such a proposition was improper, but I also think it should not be confined to that line of products alone. I believe in reciprocity all around. I think the farmer has a right not only to enter the American markets with his produce, but that he should be able to buy his manufactured articles in the American market if he can obtain them cheaper. Reciprocity all round is the only motto that can be adopted. The hon. gentleman continued, with his thorough knowledge of agricultural questions to discuss the comparative profits of American and Canadian farmers, and he declared that the United States market was no use to us because they produced the same articles we did. This is an old argument used during the reciprocity debate, but it requires perhaps an answer afresh. Although the United States export a great many products, we are able to sell them many agricultural products. The hon. gentleman has proved to his own satisfaction, as a lawyer, that our farmers cannot obtain in the United States as high prices for their products as they can at home; but the fact remains that, notwithstanding the protection, our farmers send produce across the line. In New York and its vicinity there are over two millions of people forming one of the largest centres of population in the world. There is, there a large market for choice cattle, choice sheep, choice horses, and everything that is good; a market almost, if not quite as high in price, as the market of England, and a market infinitely more convenient for Canadian farmers to send their stock to. I have been myself told by traders and buyers of cattle in my own neighborhood that they would much rather deal in New York market even at a smaller price, than with the Liverpool market, for the reason that they can know from day to day how the market stood. They can buy a carload of cattle and ship them across the line, knowing about the price that they will get for them, whereas if they send them to England, there is a long delay, there is a great uncertainty whether they will get there, and a tremendous uncertainty as to what the price will be if they do get there. For that reason alone the United States markets would be a great convenience to the Ontario farmers. I say "United States" because I have an objection to using the word "American" and I shall say United States whenever I have an occasion to refer to that people, because I believe that we have the bigger if not throughout the better part of America ourselves. The hon. gentleman went on to refer to the prices of products in the States and here. He said that the price of wheat was higher in Canada than in the United States and that the farmer was more prosperous because he not only raised more bushels per acre but he obtained a higher price. I have no doubt of the correctness of one of those statements, that on an average the Ontario farmers do produce more bushels per acre than the average farmer in the United States; but I must also point out the utter unfairness of any comparison between Ontario, the best Province of old Canada—and the most fertile part of Canada too, except the very favored portions of the prairie in the North-West—being compared with the average of the United States, including the worn out lands of New England, including other lands which may not perhaps be worn out but which never were good, and including the rocky farms of the State of New York, for even in New York there are a great many rocky farms. It is absurd, utterly misleading, and unfair in discussing a question of this kind on the motion made by the hon. gentleman who seems to show such a knowledge of agricultural matters and I would almost say it was lawyer-like to make such a comparison. If he wishes to make a comparison between Canada and the United States he should have secured the statistics for all Canada, and if they are not available it is simply impossible to make any comparison between Canada and the States. He referred to the comparison between Ontario and New York, but he did not give us a comparative statement of bushels and prices as between Ontario and the State of New York or the State of Michigan.

Mr. HESSON. Yes, he did.

Mr. CASEY. No, he did not. I was here, and the hon. gentleman simply said that the total returns per acre were so much in Ontario, so much in Michigan, and so much in New York. He did not tell us how it was arrived at, and he did not tell us that 20 bushels per acre were worth considerably more in the State of New York than in the Province of Ontario. He did not tell us that they were worth more in Michigan than in the western part of Ontario. Of course I have not given so much time and attention to the matter as the hon. gentleman, nor have I gone so fully into the records. I just picked up this afternoon, since I came into the House, a copy of the Empire, and it gives the contrast between the prices of wheat in Ontario and the State of New York and in Michigan. I find the result to be as follows:—I find that in Toronto on Saturday, as reported in the Empire to day, "Red Winter" wheat of the very best kind was worth 90 cents a bushel; "No. 2 Fall," 86 cents a bushel, and the prices in the Toronto market ran all the way down to 76 cents. Let us compare that with the price in the State of New York. Let us take the price in Buffalo, which is just about as far from tide-water by way of New York as Toronto is by way of Montreal. In Buffalo "No. 1 Red Winter" was the same price as in Toronto; "No. 1 Hard" was 96½ cents a bushel, and there was no price quoted in Toronto for "No. 1 Hard," and there did not seem to be a market for it. "No. 2 Red Michigan," corresponding to "No. 2 Fall Wheat," sold in Toronto at 86 cents, was sold in Buffalo at 94½.

Mr. TAYLOR. Let the hon. gentleman look and he will find that "No. 1 Hard" is quoted in the Toronto market in to-day's Empire at 93½ and 94.

Mr. CASEY. It is possible I overlooked that. It was 96 cents in Buffalo, that is three cents more than in Toronto and all the other grades run about the same way. "No. 2 Fall" wheat was 8 cents higher in Buffalo than in Toronto and "No. 1 Hard" on the word of my hon. friend was 3 cents higher in Buffalo, and "No. 1 White" was 3 or 4 cents higher in Buffalo than in Toronto. In London on the same day the highest quotation for wheat was 84 cents a bushel. Detroit is the nearest corresponding point to London, and in Detroit on Friday the highest quotation was 88½ cents. The highest quotation in Detroit, which is 100 miles west of London, was 4½ cents higher than the highest quotation in London. I take the quotation from the London Free Press. I do not know exactly what kind the wheat was but that is the highest quotation that I can find for wheat in the London market. Now let us take barley. The highest price for barley in Toronto was 68 cents a bushel, and in Oswego across the lake it was 80 cents for the best Canadian barley. The same grade of barley as was selling at a low rate in Toronto was sold at 12 cents a bushel more in Oswego that is the difference between the two sides of the lake, and yet the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) says it would not pay us to go into that market. If prices are lower in the States than in Canada, as they would wish to make us believe, how is it that the people of the United States do not send their wheat in here. It is perfectly absurd and nonsensical to make such a statement as that to an audience of farmers. The hon. gentleman would not say it in a country school house, because he would know that everyone who heard him was aware of the fact that grain is dearer on the other side of the line than it is here. He would not presume to make that statement to farmers, but he thinks possibly so many members of this House are not farmers that it will go down here. He will find he is greatly mistaken. Such a statement will go down neither here nor in the country, because it is absurd on the face of it. If grain was cheaper in the States than it is here they would overrun our market with grain.

Mr. TAYLOR. Quote oats.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) will have his opportunity afterwards and I shall have to make this speech myself I think. The hon. member from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) dwelt a great deal on average prices. That was another misleading portion of his speech. I should like to know what he means by average prices. He says he quoted the average prices in Ontario from the report of Mr. Blue, the Deputy Minister of Agriculture. I do not know how Mr. Blue arrived at an average price for a whole Province—at how many points he took the market rates; but even if you took the rates on a particular day at every market town in Ontario, you could not arrive at an average market price unless you knew the quantity of wheat sold at each of these places. As a matter of fact, the great bulk of the fall wheat of Ontario, at all events, is sold at markets west of Toronto, where the price of wheat is low, and runs, as it does at London at the present time, at from 80 to 84 cents a bushel. If you took this price and averaged it with the prices in Eastern Ontario, you would get an unfair result, because the bulk of the wheat sold in Ontario is sold at the low rates instead of at the high rates, and you must know the quantity sold at all places in the Province before you can get the average price. I do not know whether Mr. Blue made up the average price, or whether the hon. gentleman took Mr. Blue's figures and made up the average price himself; but I know that no average price can be anything but misleading. The same is true of his figures of the average price in the United States, which he says was 85 cents. We find in to-day's paper that on Saturday last wheat sold in Buffalo at 90 cents, and in Detroit at 88 cents. I do not know how the average price in the States is made up unless the prices at Chicago, Minneapolis, and other western points, where wheat is still lower in price, are taken into account. The hon. member gave us a great many statistics of our trade with Great Britain to show how important and great it was as compared with our trade with the United States. I should be as glad as the hon. gentleman to see our trade with Great Britain increase; I should be more so, I think, because the hon. gentleman has been supporting a policy which led to a decrease in our trade with Great Britain. He tried to draw on our credulity by urging that if we entered into reciprocity with the United States, it would lead to the scheduling of Canadian cattle, so that they would have to be killed on landing at Liverpool as are American cattle. I admit that if we entered into reciprocity in live animals, it might possibly have that effect, not from revenge against Canada, but because our cattle would be exposed to the same risks as the American cattle. But that might be avoided by quarantine or in some other way. But suppose our cattle were scheduled, the Americans seem to make a good deal from selling their cattle in England as things are, and if we had both the English market and the American market, I do not think we should care much whether our cattle were scheduled or not. But what pleased me very much in the hon. gentleman's speech was the way in which he dilated on England's prosperity under free trade. The statistics he quoted were such as to convince almost everybody that free trade has been a good thing for England. I shall leave it to the hon. member himself to draw the conclusion which is applicable to Canada. After that, he went on to prove to his own satisfaction that although free trade had been such a success to England, the largest party in England, the Conservative party, were at the present time committed to the policy of what he calls fair trade—discrimination in favor of the colonies—because a certain Conservative meeting at Oxford had adopted that policy. The hon. member knew, and admitted that he knew that Lord Salisbury, the leader of the Conservative party and the leader of the Government, had utterly repudiated that policy, and had said that it was impossible to carry it out. I should not object to see England adopt that policy, as I think it would benefit us in this country; but it is not fair to lead us to believe that the Conservative party are in favor of that policy, when the leader of that party has repudiated it. It may come in the future, but no party in England is at present committed to it. Now, I regret, although the House will probably not regret, that the condition of my throat is such that I do not propose to continue this discussion any further. I shall conclude by repeating that I am glad that this question has been brought up by the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Marshall), and that the prospects are that there will be a very full and free discussion of the question. I hope some good will come out of it, by informing either the people of Canada or the people of England on this important question.

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. FISHER. Before this motion is carried, I should like to say a few words on it. Like my hon. friend who has just sat down, I am very glad that this question has been brought before this House. For some time back we have had discussions of this question in various parts of the country—discussions, however, of a more or less informal character, and carried on by those not having the full responsibility which attends a member of Parliament on the floor of this House. I am glad indeed that my hon. friend from East Middlesex (Mr. Marshall) has brought it before us to-night, so that some illusions which have been thrown around it may be cleared away, and that the people of this country may have something on which they can go in their examination into the subject. When the hon. member from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was addressing the House a little while ago, in a somewhat lengthy, but not at all too lengthy speech, considering the importance of the subject and the prominent position he holds in this House and the country, I was a little surprised at some of the words he gave utterance to, and some of the ideas he put forth. In that speech the hon. gentleman announced some very good doctrines indeed, good free trade doctrine, I may call it; which I was surprised to hear coming from that hon. gentleman. Sir, we do not often hear such principles coming from the lips of leading gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. Pity it is that that hon. gentleman did not years ago, in the party to which he belongs, utter the words he has uttered to-night. Pity it is that when that party in 1878 appealed to the people of Canada on the question of protection and free trade, he did not give forth the truths which he has given forth to-night. The hon. gentleman spoke of Great Britain as our mother country, and said we would be much more right if we followed the example of that country and drew ourselves closer to her instead of trying to form a connection with the United States. But, Sir, in 1878, when the party to which that hon. gentleman belongs appealed to the people of this country, did they hold up the mother country as an example to be followed by Canada? Did they point to her policy as one that we should adopt? Nothing of the kind. They then pointed to the country to the south of us, and appealed to the people of Canada to follow the example of the United States, because we lived under the same conditions, and to adopt a protective policy as the true policy for this country. At that time, Canada made a great mistake, and threw away the chance she will never be able to regain. Had Canada then pronounced in favor of a revenue tariff, and distinctly and clearly against a protective policy, we would have to-day a prosperous condition of affairs, which words fail me to depict, instead of the deplorable condition of affairs that now exist. At that time, our neighbors to the south, by means of the injudicious policy they were pursuing in regard to their commerce on the sea, had practically destroyed their carrying trade and their shipping. If we had gone exactly in the opposite direction, instead of following their example, at a very respectful distance, as we have only been able to do; if we had announced that we would make Canada a cheap country to live in, by following on this, the best portion of the continent, the free trade policy of England, we would have attracted to our country the enormous immigration that has gone to the United States. If, at that time, instead of following the United States and doing our best to destroy our commercial marine, we had made it easy to the people of this country to build ships and to navigate those ships, we would not have gone backwards as we have, since the inauguration of the National Policy, and our commercial marine would not only be doing our own carrying trade, but be doing the whole carrying trade of this continent, and be a strong competitor with the commercial marine of the mother country in the carrying trade of the world. If instead of a high tariff we had adopted a low revenue tariff, capital would have been invited to our shores and found investment here in enterprises which it would not be necessary to foster by increased protection year after year. That capital would have been invested in manufacturing industries able to stand on their own bottom, and not continually requiring increased protection, and we would not be witnesses of that antagonism which to-day exists between those manufacturing industries and the other industries of the country. We would not have the antagonism that now exists between those who are producers of natural products and consumers of manufactured products, and our manufacturing industries. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), spoke at length this afternoon on the question of reciprocity between us and the United States, and in that connection made most contradictory and extraordinary statements. I will not detain the House by going over those statements in detail, but there are one or two points which have not been touched by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) and to which I think attention should be drawn. In the first place the hon. gentleman spoke of the United States as being our competitors in natural products instead of having our market for those products. It is true that in two or three leading articles they are our rivals. They rival us in the production of beef and cheese and butter. Nevertheless it is true and perfectly reasonable to say that in the United States our farmers have a very large market for their products. The eastern portion of the United States has to bring its food from a very great distance within the United States, and that food it could more easily import from Canada were the duties removed. Having made an investigation into this subject, and coming as I do from a locality where this Atlantic seaboard of the United States is especially valuable, I can say that the duty which the farmers of the Province of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces have to pay on their products shipped to the United States, just counterbalance the freight which the eastern portions of the United States have to pay on the products they import from the west. If we send hay, horses, cattle, or oats, or potatoes from the Province of Quebec or the Maritime Provinces to New England, to New York, and Philadelphia, we not only have to compete with the portions of the United States which are equally distant from those markets, but we also have to compete with the whole area whose freight rates are greater than ours, but whose freight rates are less than ours and the duties combined. The result is that in the instances I have mentioned, especially horses and hay, we have to compete with the whole area of the United States all the way to the Pacific seaboard. Take a cargo of horses, the freight rate from the Province of Quebec to Boston or New York is very small indeed, but the duty is so high that, combined with the freight, it enables the Americans to purchase horses on the Pacific coast which will compete with ours. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), speaking of the product of hay, acknowledged that local causes enabled our people to pay the duty and ship their hay to the New England markets. He thus refuted himself out of his own mouth. More than that, the hon. gentleman knows right well that we do to-day export an enormous amount of natural products to the United States. Now, if, as is contended by the hon. gentleman, our farmers get higher prices here for their products than do the farmers of the United States there, how is it that we are able to send our food products over to the United States, pay the duty, and compete with the American farmer? It would be manifestly absurd to say that we could do this, if the facts were as described by the hon. member for North Simcoe. I suppose some hon. gentlemen will say that they do not pay the duty. Well, I will refer them to the speech of the Finance Minister himself, who said that we did pay the duty. It is true that the result of that was to draw forth a vigorous protest from the Government organ in Montreal, the Montreal Gazette, which, while stating that the hon. gentleman had made a splendid speech in regard to every other matter, said he had made a serious mistake in saying that we paid the duty on anything that we sent into the United States. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) also said that the United States Government would not dare to take off the protection which their farmers have as against Canadian farmers in regard to food production. At the same time, he alluded to the fact that we got a higher price here for our food products than they do. What an absurd juxtaposition that is! If they can produce food more cheaply and get a less price, why do they need protection against us? He also said a few words in reference to barley, and he said that England got barley from Russia cheaper than we could send it to England. Why is that? Simply because our producers find that they can get a better price in the United States than they can get anywhere else. The other day I heard a statement on this question from a man who is an authority, a man who, I believe, is the largest dealer in barley in the Province of Ontario, and he stated that he could not afford to send barley to England because the English barley was so much cheaper than our barley could be sent over there for. The reason for all this is that the United States people are willing to pay a larger price than any English maltsters would. The hon. gentleman referred to the fact that the Russians sold their barley in England at a cheaper rate, but the reason for that is that the Russian people have no other market for their barley than England, they have to send it there, and they are obliged to take the price which the English maltsters would give; but in regard to our barley, we have a market at our own door. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) alluded also to what is known as the Mills Tariff in the United States, and he said that, when that was adopted, no doubt we would be enabled to send a large number of our productions into the United States free of duty or nearly so, but he brought into close juxtaposition with that the proposition to discriminate against the United States in favor of Great Britain. I think that our experience in regard to the United States of late has been that, if we were to discriminate against them in favor of any one, the mother country or anyone else, the result would be retaliatory legislation, not only against us, but probably against the British Empire altogether. I will only allude to one other fact, which is perhaps a piece of bye-play—that is, that the hon. gentleman referred to our most important export, and spoke of cereals in that connection, and said our breadstuffs were the greatest exports of Canada and the foundation of our prosperity. I think he cannot have consulted the Trade and Navigation Returns or cannot be familiar with the actual condition of affairs, or he would know that, in Ontario itself, breadstuffs play a secondary part in exports to the export of animals and their products. We, in Canada, occupy a prominent position in the world in regard to our exports of animals and their products, and I believe we have the very best means for the production of animals, and that we have shown that, especially in Ontario. We have the best appliances, and we have the best means in the world to produce the best cheese. We have been able to produce a larger proportion, in regard to our population, than any country in the world, and we stand at the head in regard to the production of animals and their products, sent from this continent to England. In this connection also, the hon. gentleman spoke of what he called our proposition to allow American animals to come into this country free, and suggested that our animals would run the great danger of being scheduled in England because of that free interchange. I was surprised that that hon. gentleman, who is known as a great legal light, should have made such a statement as that. I remember when some other hon. gentleman who, perhaps, was more rash in his statements than the hon. gentleman, made an allusion to this matter in the same sense, but I was surprised to find the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) forget, apparently, that there is a statutory offer on the Statute-book of this country, an offer which has been there for a long time, an offer which hon. gentlemen opposite have boasted of, and have thrown into our teeth for years back, an offer which the leader of these hon. gentlemen proposed to withdraw; but, in his proposition to withdraw it, does he propose to take out of that list animals and their products? On the contrary, in the very first line of the resolution which the Finance Minister proposes, for which I have no doubt the hon. member for North Simcoe will vote next week, and all those hon. gentlemen will vote who have been talking about the danger that we may have our animals scheduled in England, he says:

“That section 9 of the said Act be repealed—”

That is the section which says that the Governor General in Council may by Order in Council allow these articles to come in free from the United States.

“and the following substituted therefor: Any or all of the following things, that is to say, animals of all kinds.”

That is the very first thing you come to, and yet the hon. gentleman says that we have introduced a danger to the export trade of cattle to England, when he knew that the Government of which he is a supporter, ever since 1879, have made the same proposition to the United States, and that to-day when they are proposing to reconstruct their offer and to make changes in reference to that proposition, they still offer what, according to the hon. gentleman amounts to ruining the Canadian export trade in cattle. This is of a piece with the other arguments of the hon. gentleman, with the changes and the difficulties which those hon. gentlemen find themselves in, when, as usual, they try to trim, to hunt with the hounds and to run with the hare. I have something more to say in regard to this question, which is perhaps more germane to the proposition before the House, because reciprocity with the United States has been dealt with, and voted upon, and the hon. gentlemen who voted against it took their lives in their hands, and many of them, when they go before the people, will find that they will have to retire into private life. There is, however, another question, and that is the question of an extension of our commercial relations with the Empire. The hon. member in introducing this resolution, —and I congratulate him on the manner in which, as a young member, he did it—stated that he did not wish England to give us a preference without giving her something in return. He did not very definitely say what he was prepared to give in return; but the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was a little more clear, although not as specific as I would like him to have been; but to a certain extent he did tell us what he was prepared to give in return. He indicated what he was willing to give by quoting from English sources, from certain people in England called Fair Traders to show what they expected us to give them in return. Now, I was a little surprised to hear the hon. member for Simcoe so completely give himself and his friends away—to use a slang expression—when he announced that the farming community in this country needed to have their condition improved, and that it ought to be improved by some means which would be consistent with the manufacturing interests. That is all right. That part of his speech was quite consistent with the action which he and his friends have hitherto taken, and quite consistent with the amendment which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries moved to the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford the other day. The hon. member for Simcoe went on a little while afterwards to say that the farming community of this country was the largest in number, that they were practically the toiling masses of this country and that they must be considered. Brave words, Mr. Speaker, and I will be glad if the hon. gentleman opposite and his friends would act upon them, and in framing legislation would remember that, as a matter of fact, the farming class are not only the foundation and basis of our community, but in numbers they are actually four-fifths of the whole population, and the capital invested in agriculture is seven and a-half or eight times as great as is the capital invested in the manufacturing industries of this country. But, Sir, he said that the manufacturer probably would have to suffer a little. I understood him to mean that the farmers would have to be carefully considered, even though it should be necessary for the manufacturers to suffer a little. Sir, that is very disloyal. These hon. gentlemen, a few weeks ago, were telling us, when we made such a proposition, that we were disloyal to the best interests of our country, that we were proposing to destroy this country, to interfere with the vested rights, as they called them, of the manufacturers, which had been built up by our protective tariff. But to-day, according to the hon. member for Simcoe, they are ready to hurt the manufacturers a little for the sake of the farmers. Sir, I am a little surprised to hear that from the hon. member for Simcoe and his friends, because a little while ago they were declaring most emphatically that not one jot of our protective tariff, so far as it relates to manufacturers, must be disturbed, and they declared then, and they declare now, they are quite ready to take away from the farming community of this country their protection, and to sacrifice the interests of the farming classes, in so far as the abandonment of protection will sacrifice them. I do not believe it will. Sir, I am quite prepared to believe that the farming community can exist without protection. As a matter of fact, the protection which was extended to the farming community since 1878, has been an entire delusion. Surely if the principle which hon. gentlemen opposite denounce that protection must be upheld in the interests of a class, then they ought to uphold the principle of protection to the farmers just as much as to manufacturers and other interests. But, no, they are quite ready to sacrifice all the protection they have given to farmers. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Simcoe went on to quote from English sources, to describe the great progress that the fair trade movement in England has been making. I quite agree with the hon. member that there are in England to-day a goodly number of fair traders. There are always in England a large number of individuals who are always ready to take up anything new and discuss it, hold conventions on it, form leagues and associations for the advancement of any ideas they have. We can name, perhaps, a hundred leagues which are to-day in existence for the promulgation of one principle or another. It is true, Sir, that attempts have been made by the Conservative party in England to make this a party question, but as was acknowledged by the hon. member himself, they have not so far succeeded; and the leaders of the Conservative party have again and again refused point blank to take up this question and make it a plank in their platform. Sir, they are wise in their day and generation, for they know perfectly well that those principles of free trade which Bright and Cobden taught in England some years ago, those principles upon which the great free trade campaign was conducted to a successful issue, are so well established in England that there is no possibility whatever of the electors of England being brought to reject them. The hon. member quoted some words from several fair traders, and I have here some quotations of perhaps later authorities than some he has given. Last November a great fair trade meeting was held in England, and at that meeting the platform and principles of the league were fairly announced. The great English dailies the next day had editorials on it and accepted the meeting as the exponent of the principles of the fair traders in England, and alluded to them as the official announcement of what the fair traders wanted to do. At that meeting Mr. Cunliffe Lister, who was mentioned by the hon. member for Simcoe, and whom I believe to be one of the leading lights in this fair trade movement, and whose dictum upon the question is accepted as authority, said upon that occasion:

Mr. FISHER,

"Fair traders advocate to-day, as they did six years ago and as they have done ever since, duties on foreign manufactures, combined with duties on all foreign imports of food, but stipulating always for the free import of raw materials needed for home industry."

Now, the Times newspaper is generally considered to be the most perfect exponent of public opinion in England; it is a newspaper which, in all circumstances, desires to express what it believes to be the prevailing sentiments of the English people. And what does the Times say?

"So far as words are concerned this is clear enough. When we come to things it becomes somewhat obscure and what is more the policy, such as it is propounded by Mr. C. Lister, was expressly repudiated by one of the speakers at the conference. Mr. Dixon Hartland declared he could not be a party to taxing corn. There is thus still a rift within the lute. Fair traders are not entirely agreed as to whether they will advocate a duty on corn or not."

And here comes, I think, the most pithy statement of the question in England which I have ever heard:

"The manufacturers would like to put a duty on manufactures, but the agriculturist will not let him. The agriculturist would like to put a duty on corn, but the manufacturer will not let him. When these two parties are agreed we shall begin to believe in the strength of the Fair Trade League."

I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the time has come for the two parties to be agreed. This was the result of that great meeting. There is a little addendum to this in an editorial in the Times, which the hon. gentleman might take to heart, and which expresses pretty clearly the opinion the majority of the people of England have on this movement:

"We are now told that Fair Traders are Protectionists pure and simple, with a sort of platonic predilection for what they are pleased to call 'Commercial Federation of the Empire.' 'They would' as Mr. C. Lister said yesterday, 'put a duty on everything foreign except raw material, placing, however our colonies and dependencies in the position of having free entry here if they gave us free entry in return.'"

Are hon. gentlemen ready to give English manufacturers free entry here in return?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FISHER. Hon. gentlemen say "no." If hon. gentlemen are willing to discriminate against England then they may be quite sure that England will discriminate against the colonies. So long as we impose duties on British manufactures, British manufacturers will not allow us to impose a duty on the food of their laborers. Moreover, it does not follow that if we allow British manufactures to come in free, England would admit our products free and discriminate against those of other nations. I attended the British Association meetings in Montreal, which were attended by a large number of the best intellects of Britain. I attended the economic section, and a discussion arose relating to the commercial relations of the Empire, when the question of Canadian intercourse with England came up a gentleman proposed Imperial Federation or Imperial free trade, with discriminating duties against foreign countries. There were present a large number of representatives of British manufacturers, and there was one universal chorus of horror at the idea that they could be tempted under any circumstances or conditions to impose a duty on corn coming into England. The figures quoted by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) show that the importations of foreign corn were enormous, and to-day the British colonies do not produce or at all events ship anything like to meet the surplus required by England from foreign markets. The hon. gentleman said that the duty to be imposed on foreign corn would be sufficient to give a very large return in the English markets. If so, what benefit would it be to us? It would not displace foreign corn, we would still have to compete with it. One of the two things would happen: either it would not increase our corn production and consequently would not displace foreign corn, or if it did so displace it, the duty would not give the income expected to be obtained from the duty on foreign corn. Mr. Cunliffe Lister says:

"Let us have free trade within the Empire, or as near it as may be possible, and no longer should we be dependent on the foreigner who refuses to deal with us."

The Times says:

"By all means we reply, but how are we to get free trade within the empire? It is not true to say the foreigner refuses to deal with us, and certainly if any foreigner does refuse to deal with us, we cannot be in any way dependent on him. But so far as it is true that foreigners refuse to deal with us, it is equally true that many of our own colonies refuse to deal with us. If fair traders really can tell us how we can better persuade the colonies to adopt free trade than by showing that we ourselves believe in free trade, they have certainly so far succeeded in keeping a very important piece of information to themselves."

Therefore, although the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is advocating commercial Imperial confederation or free trade in the Empire, it must be remembered that if there is an obstacle to free trade in the Empire it has been brought about more by hon. gentlemen opposite than by any other individuals in the Empire, because Canada in this respect has gone beyond any other of the colonies and placed a stumbling block which it is impossible to overcome to any movement for free trade within the Empire. I will read another short extract to show what is the opinion of England on this question, and it is not going too far to say that this is a fair representation of that opinion. After discussing the old question of free trade or protection, the writer goes on to say:

"As for the other branch of their policy—namely, the commercial federation of the Empire—it seems to us to be a proposition applicable rather to Jupiter or Saturn than to the actual world in which we live."

This is a deliberate statement taken from the first editorial article in the London Times dealing with the question and after the full exposition of it by the leader of the fair trade movement at the meeting to which I have alluded. The same article goes on to say:

"It might be possible, if the colonies were at one with each other and with the mother country, to establish a customs union which would secure free commercial interchange between the different parts of the Empire combined with hostile tariffs against foreign nations. Whether it would be expedient or not is another question, into which at present it is quite unnecessary to enter. But the colonies are not at one with each other, nor with the mother country. Victoria and New South Wales cannot agree with each other. Canada seems at present to be moving rather in the direction of commercial union with the United States than in that of commercial union with the United Kingdom."

There is another part of the hon. gentleman's speech to which I cannot refrain from alluding very briefly. He gave a very lugubrious account of the present depression in England. I was certainly surprised that the hon. gentleman, who is rather an important person and whose words carry weight, should have followed the policy which he has so roundly condemned in hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Hon. gentlemen opposite have taunted us with decrying our country and have accused us of being unpatriotic, because we have said that Canada was not so prosperous as she should be; but the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was quite ready to rise and state that the mother country is to-day suffering from commercial depression and is practically on the highway to ruin. I am not going to accuse the hon. gentleman of want of patriotism. If those are the facts relating to England we should know them, just as we should know the exact state of affairs respecting our own country. I do not attack a man's patriotism if he points out the remedy for a deplorable state of affairs, if such should exist. But if the hon. gentleman's accusation in regard to hon. members on this side of the House is true, then I must say he is as unpatriotic as we are. What are the facts? He says England to-day is depressed. I came across a report in a paper which the hon. gentleman will acknowledge to be a good protectionist organ, the Montreal Star, and that organ says in alluding, not to anything of its own but to a report which the hon. gentlemen will be content to accept as authority. Here is what the Montreal Star said about Mr. Giffen's report to the British Board of Trade. Mr. Giffen is well known all over the British Empire as a gentleman who is in no sense a partisan but who is essentially and before everything else a statistician, a man who deals with figures, examines those figures and gives the result:

"Mr. Giffen's report to the British Board of Trade shows that Great Britain maintains its relative superiority with regard to foreign trade. In the open markets of the world the old country still distances all competitors. To some countries, such as India and Australia, it sends by far the greater part of what they import from foreign countries. Great Britain sends to Egypt 47 per cent. of all that it imports, France and Germany send 14 per cent. each, and the United States 1 per cent. To the Argentine Republic, Uruguay and Chili, it sends from 28 to 39 per cent. of all they import, France sends 17 per cent., Germany from 8 to 19 per cent., and the United States 7 per cent. As much as 28 per cent. of all that China imports is sent by Great Britain, while Germany and France send next to nothing and the United States only 4 per cent. The Japanese get 43 per cent. of all their foreign goods from Great Britain, 9 per cent. from the United States, 7 per cent. from Germany and 5 per cent. from France. The preponderance of Great Britain is conspicuous in every country except Canada."

Mr. FISHER.

And mind you, Sir, that is after ten years of the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite which was intended to foster a trade between us and Great Britain and to discriminate in favor of Great Britain.

"There the contiguity of the United States gives it an immense advantage. But as regards European countries, what Canada imports from the whole of them does not amount to much more than one-sixth of what she imports from the mother country alone. Germany, about who rivalry in foreign trade with Great Britain so much has been said does not, according Mr. Giffen, send to British North America more than 1.7 of its imports. Mr. Giffen's general conclusion is that 'Germany has not been gaining in common markets of late years at the expense of English trade. Its gains have been in special directions. Our predominance in the great common markets remains substantially what it was ten years ago.'"

This is only one evidence. I have here another quotation which is taken from the Times of last November, and in allusion to that same meeting which the Fair Trade League had held in London:

"The whole basis of their argument is the allegation that our trade is declining. The allegation is not true. 'In point of fact,' says our correspondent, 'English manufacturers and English industry in general whatever may be the case with one or two branches only are now developed to a greater degree than ever they were before, and our exports to foreign countries are also greater than they ever were before.'"

This does not look as if England were going back in the commercial race of the world. As a matter of fact to a certain extent it has apparently been slightly retrograding in consequence of the lower values of goods, but if you take the amount of goods exported, England has held her prominent position more than she ever did before. To-day she does most of the carrying trade of the world, and has a greater command of the markets open to competition, than she ever had in any period of her history before. Those things show pretty clearly that England does not need to take up this policy which is proposed to her. Her old free trade doctrine is carrying her to prosperity and keeping her in a sound condition. It shows more than that, that the efforts which have been made to deprecate this free trade success, and the efforts which have been made to point out what is called the depression in consequence of free trade are clearly inaccurate and misleading in fact. It is also a warning to us in this country. At one time it would have been better for us if we had taken the example of the mother country, and if we had followed the good advice given by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), instead of, as was unfortunately the case in 1878, following the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government, who for the purpose of carrying the country at that time, chose to take the example of his neighbors to the south and chose to take that example which his followers have told him he was wrong to have done. We would have been in a far more prosperous position to-day, and we would not have been obliged to consider either the United States or the British Empire in our internal economy or our internal legislation if we had followed the policy laid down by Mr. Mackenzie. The great reason why it is necessary for Canada to regulate her commercial policy by the commercial policy of England and the States, is because our progress has been baulked in consequence of the policy of protection which the hon. gentlemen opposite have insisted on this country adopting. I do not see how it is possible that this proposition can be practically carried into effect. I read with great interest some words of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in Toronto a little while ago and those words I fully endorse. I thought that when the hon. gentleman uttered those words he was going to come to a different conclusion from what he did, for certainly his first conclusion does not appear to me to agree with his support of this motion. The hon. gentleman said:

"He did not think the practical Canadian people were prepared to endorse any scheme which did not hold out any hope, any prospect of being adopted on practical lines and being capable of practical solution."

He was then advocating a policy which he has not yet shown in the slightest degree, to be practical. He comes before us and he supports the motion of the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Marshall) but he has not shown us the practical solution of these difficulties which he has acknowledged were to be found in the discussions at the Free Trade League meeting in England. Instead of trying to forward a policy which would be practical he has attempted what I believe to be a dream, and a dream which never can be realised. It is a fact that the Empire to-day is composed of very widely scattered portions; it is a fact that they are building up new states in far distant portions of the Empire, and I believe if there is going to be any possibility of holding that Empire together it will be by giving each portion of it the fullest latitude and jurisdiction to deal with its own affairs as it thinks best for its own welfare. Thus and thus only will you be able to keep the Empire together. If we try, by any paper plan, to bring the bonds closer and try to draw the string more tight between the outlying portions of the Empire the result will be, as it has been unfortunately in this Dominion, a rather straining of relations between the different portions of the Empire a tendency to arouse irritation between the different portions and eventually to break up the Empire into a large number of possibly antagonistic states. The efforts of the leader of this House to centralise in this Dominion have been unfortunate. His efforts to make a legislative union, though he cannot adopt a legislative union in theory, are very unfortunate. We, as Canadians, can give a warning to the whole Empire that they shall not carry out the same mistake as we did and that they shall not be lauded in the same difficulties as we have been. It is not from any lack of patriotism that I thus prefer that this resolution should not pass, or that this question be dealt with on the lines laid down by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I yield to no one in my patriotism. I hold, as everyone in this country holds, that the Queen is the head of our country and our Government, just as much as she is of the English people, the Irish people and the Australian people. But, Sir, I do not acknowledge any allegiance whatever to the Parliament of England. We in this country are a portion of the British Empire, having free institutions, ruling ourselves in a Parliament that is supreme in this country; and we believe that the more that is done and acknowledged and insisted upon, the better chance there is that we shall remain good friends with the rest of the British Empire and with the mother country herself. I trust that it will be a long time before we in this country have any other head to our Government than the Queen of England; I trust that we shall long remain a portion of the British Empire; but, Sir, I do not believe that, to occupy that ground, it is necessary that we should be subject to the Parliament of Great Britain or be ruled except by our own people, and in accordance with the views of our own people as expressed on this floor. Sir, the patriotism I glory in is the patriotism which leads me to do what I consider best in the interests of the people of Canada, and I believe I shall be doing that by favoring such measures as will tend to extend and increase the trade of our people. The hon. member for Simcoe gave utterance to some good and sound advice on this question. He said he believed we must discuss it purely from a Canadian standpoint, and I have been trying to do so; but we know that hon. gentlemen opposite, in discussing the question of reciprocity with the United States, prominently brought forward what they call the interests of the Empire. I have heard and seen in the press utterances of some hon. gentlemen from which I would be led to believe that they did not care at all for the interests of Canada, but were sent here especially to look after the interests of the Empire. It will be well for men who come here from the mother country to think of those interests; but I have to look back through many generations to consider any interests but those of the country in which I have been born and brought up, that is Canada. In taking that position we follow the example of the mother country. In England, have we heard one word of what would be for the advantage of Canada from Imperial federation? Not one. Have we known any man there to call on the English people to accept that doctrine for the benefit of the colonies? Not one. It has been urged on the English people by its advocates because they said it would be for the benefit of the manufacturing and agricultural classes of England; and one reason why England has been governed so well is that her statesmen have always been true to the English principle that it was their duty to look after the interests of the English people and nothing else. In the Associated Chambers of Commerce in London, in February last, a question similar to this was brought up, and I will just read to you this description in the Daily News of what occurred on that occasion:

"A motion in favor of such changes in the fiscal arrangements existing between Great Britain, her colonies and dependencies as would increase the trade of the British Empire, was opposed by Mr. Mundella, M.P.—"

Hon. gentlemen are all familiar enough with his name to know that he is a pretty high authority on commercial questions in England; and what did he say?

"He pointed out that the colonies could not supply us with all our needs. The United States were at the present moment the greatest market for our manufactures; and was it not possible that if we acted in the way suggested by the resolution, the United States would subject us to differential treatment? What would become of us then? We imported silks and tea from China, and were we going to put an increased duty on those articles? It would be cutting our own throats. The suggestion was especially ill-timed, when the United States were in the middle of a controversy regarding free trade. President Cleveland had undoubtedly taken a step in the direction of free trade, and if, or when, it was adopted, and America was made one of the cheapest instead of one of the dearest countries in the world, great advantage would accrue, not only to herself but to the English colonies."

What was the result of that discussion in that purely commercial body, which is representative of the whole United Kingdom? "The motion was lost by an overwhelming majority." No, Sir; the people in the mother land look on this question purely and simply from their own standpoint considering whether it is going to benefit them, and not in any sense whether it is going to benefit us. Then the question of differential duties was mooted there, Mr. Mundella did not look to Canada; he looked to the United States, and his fear was that the United States might put on retaliatory duties, and injure English trade. Hon. gentlemen know that although we are a portion of the British Empire, and although our flag is the flag of the British Empire, our trade is intimately connected with that of the United States. Sir, by looking after the true interests of Canada, we shall, I believe, best conserve our relations with England and the most outlying portions of the British Empire. I must hope that this motion be not persisted in, or at all events that it be not carried.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). As the hour is late, and we have listened to several speeches this evening on this very interesting subject, which has been so ably brought before the House, I do not propose to occupy the attention of hon. gentlemen at any great length. Indeed, the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have rendered it unnecessary at this stage of the debate, for those who are in favor of the principle of the motion, and the resolution on the motion paper to which the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) referred, to elaborate the case. The hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, who have successively taken their seat, one apparently from an avowed sympathy with the motion, and the other for reasons best known to himself, have avoided the main question before the House. The hon. gentleman who last spoke took up considerable time in discussing the question of trade relations with the United States, and alluded at considerable length to the question of Imperial federation. Neither of these questions is before the House on the present occasion. The question before the House has nothing to do with the question of Imperial federation. It is true, many of the leagues in Canada, and Canada alone, have favored some question of this kind; but neither the league in Canada nor the league in England has subscribed to the principles in this resolution. Therefore I do not understand why, when this question is important enough, broad enough, and big enough to engage our consideration, such questions as Imperial federation and other questions which have been discussed outside of the House and are in no way connected with this important trade question should be brought before the House. I was somewhat sorry, in listening to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, who poses in this House as a temperance man, and who lectures his brethren some times as to what they should do on that subject, dwell so long on the growth and export of barley in Canada. The main use for barley is for malting purposes, and surely my hon. friend has not receded from the strong position on the temperance question which he has so long occupied. My hon. friend discussed one other point only, and perhaps not the most important point, mentioned by the hon. member for North Simcoe, and that was the practicability of this resolution or of the scheme embodied in it. He took issue on that point with the hon. gentleman, who was sanguine that the day was coming when it would be practicable to go to the English Government with such a policy as this, and to endeavor to make trade arrangements for the Empire—not between Canada and the mother country, but between the mother country and all the different colonies of the Empire. I did not understand either the mover of the resolution or the hon. member for North Simcoe or the resolution itself to go so far as to ask that this Government should at once approach the Government of the mother country with this policy. I understood the hon. member for North Simcoe to take an entirely different position in the debate. I understood him to forcibly allude to the different facts occurring every day in England, in order to show that the current of public opinion there was in favor of a trade policy for the British Empire, as distinct from the policy of England with the rest of the world. In support of that position, the hon. gentleman was able to show strong reasons. He was able to point to the unmistakable utterances of a powerful party in England to-day—he was able to point to the utterances of the leaders of that party and the body of men who constitute it, when they met in solemn conclave at Oxford, in favor of that view. But the trade returns and the consular reports appertaining to the British Empire furnish far wider reasons in support of the position taken by the advocates of this resolution. These reports and returns show unmistakably that, so far from the policy of free trade in the mother country carrying out the views and the opinions of the framers of that policy, who have stood by it for so many years—so far from these gentlemen being able to convince the world that free trade is the proper policy, steadily, day by day, all the nations of the world, all the countries that are the commercial rivals of Great Britain, are going more and more to the other extreme.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. TUPPER. These gentlemen have found the colonies of the Empire forced to adopt a protective policy, and they have found that the foothold of England, once unchallenged, in the different markets of the world, foreign as well as colonial, is steadily becoming weaker.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. TUPPER. In a moment I will give the hon. gentleman my authority for making the statement. The statistics to which I have alluded, and to which the House will permit me briefly to refer, fully bear it out. Comparing the position which England holds in the foreign markets to-day with that she held formerly, we find that to the colonies, in 1872, England exported $320,500,000 worth of goods, while in 1886 she exported to them $350,000,000 worth, showing a steady increase; and if you take her returns of exports to foreign countries, which formerly were her monopoly, you will find the proportion has decreased. In the last fifty years the imports by Great Britain from the colonies increased from $75,000,000 to $405,000,000, and her exports to the colonies increased to about the same extent, from $75,000,000 to $375,000,000. Those are important figures, and hon. gentlemen will see their force. They will see by them that this colonial question never entered the minds of English statesmen at the time they adopted their free trade policy, the value of the colonial trade then being as nothing compared with the value of the other trade. No one will seriously controvert that position, and it furnishes an important and powerful reason for the change that is coming over English public opinion. We find, for instance, Sir Robert Stout, the premier of New Zealand, in a very interesting article in the Nineteenth Century, written last year, citing as evidence in support of the position I took a short time ago and which hon. gentlemen opposite challenged, the important fact that in New South Wales, American contractors were able to obtain the contract for building the largest iron bridge ever built there, at a figure $135,000 below the lowest tender from Great Britain herself. Hon. gentlemen will see from this one sample, that in her own colony and in that iron industry which, with the coal industry, at one time gave England the monopoly of the markets of the world, England can be outbid by a foreign competitor. In face of this evidence, hon. gentlemen ought to hesitate before contradicting the assertion that Great Britain has not in the foreign markets to-day the position she hitherto held. Why do hon. gentlemen opposite try to minimise the undoubtedly grand results that would follow from increased trade between the mother country and her colonies. No man from the Maritime Provinces, I venture to say, would for a moment declare that he would be in favor of frustrating a movement which has in view the increase in commerce not only between the mother country and the Maritime Provinces but between the different colonies of the British Empire and the Maritime Provinces. We have expended without demur in times past large sums of public money in the endeavor to create a trade between the West Indies and Canada, and hon. gentlemen opposite have always held that the money spent in this view was well spent, and that to open up new channels of trade was an object that should be encouraged. We find these potent facts, that, in the West Indies to-day, our competitor is not merely the mother country, but we find there, as in the English markets themselves, that the American States are our competitors. They actually buy from us about 700,000 lbs. of dried fish to send to the West Indies. Their trade relations are so complete with that portion of the British Empire that they do not only their own trade but a part of ours with them. Of course, you can encourage that trade by subsidising steamers, but it, nevertheless, is true that you can encourage and foster it in the way proposed by the resolution now before the House. Not only do the United States send our productions there, but they also send them to Africa, to the extent of $5,000,000 annually; to Australasia, to the extent of $10,500,000 annually; and to Great Britain and Ireland, where they meet us as gigantic competitors, they send $447,000,000 worth of goods annually. The last gentleman who addressed the House, as a practical farmer, as one who is familiar with the trade between the mother country and the Dominion of Canada, mentioned en passant three articles in which we had a large trade with the mother country, cheese, butter, and I did not catch the other article which he mentioned. Even under present circumstances, I find competing with us in the markets of the old world that country to the south of us which Mr. Gladstone referred to recently as making progress by leaps and bounds, and he predicted that it was possible that it would disturb even Great Britain in the near future. We find that, in regard to cheese, we send more to Great Britain than the United States do. But there are a host of things in regard to which they interfere with us. Looking at the trade Returns, I find—though I have not had time to look the question up as I would wish to do—and taking the consular reports of the United States and the official documents published in Washington in 1885, the following results:—

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou.)

| | Great Britain Imported. | From United States. | From Canada. |
|---------------------|----------------------------|------------------------|-----------------|
| Cattle..... | $16,661,210 | $17,686,815 | $4,650,595 |
| Sheep and lambs.... | 12,591,091 | 157,775 | 919,495 |
| Bacon and hams.... | 50,181,630 | 39,502,605 | 746,178 |
| Beef..... | 14,471,985 | 13,371,490 | 4,391 |
| Butter, &c..... | 58,869,685 | 2,811,580 | 1,423,016 |
| Cheese..... | 24,452,000 | 13,478,520 | 7,777,675 |
| Fish..... | 11,509,830 | 2,826,540 | 1,500,000 |
| Wood and timber... | 83,876,419 | { (about) } | 13,142,663 |
| | | 6,000,000 } | |

Mr. FISHER. The hon. gentleman is simply confirming what I said, that our chief export to England was animals and their products, and that we exported a larger amount in proportion to our population than the United States did.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). If I misunderstood the hon. gentleman, that is another thing, but I do not think he mentioned the article of fish or the article of lumber. At any rate, if the hon. gentleman will look through the trade returns, and I hesitate to weary the House by giving the proof of this at this hour, he will see that we send a considerable number of other articles in the same way. We are sending an appreciable quantity of manufactures, we are sending something of nearly every article, and the whole point is that you cannot judge of the trade which we could do by that which we do at present. Large as our trade has been in the past, you are not to judge what it may be in the future, or to test the merits of this resolution simply by what it has been in the past; but, if we have been able to do something, in spite of the strong and powerful competitors we have on the south, what can we do if we receive the preference in the different colonial markets? No one will dare to say that our advantages will not be great in that regard. I will not refer to the matter of canned goods and fruit which we export, which are becoming large items of our trade, and which, under any circumstances, we hope to increase year by year. But, in reference to all these matters, the slightest change in the tariff, the smallest amount that could be obtained from the British Government under an arrangement with the different colonies, would start all these industries in the most extraordinary and beneficial manner to Canada. The hon. gentleman spoke of the English merchants having no reason to fear competition in foreign markets, and said that our whole supposition was fallacious, without a careful consideration of the action which England would be sure to take in this matter. If you look over the blue-books published in England as well as those published in the United States, you will see that not only are the manufacturers of the neighboring Republic meeting the English manufacturers in colonial markets, but also the German manufacturers to an alarming extent. I could quote from the reports of English and German as well as American consuls, to show that the Germans and Americans are driving the English from the position they once held; but I may summarise these reports by one small quotation from Sir Thomas Brassey's work on "Foreign work and English wages" in which he says:

"Excluded from the principal manufacturing countries by a protectionist policy, it is to the colonies and to the half civilised countries that we must look for new openings for the expansion of our trade."

When English public opinion is looking towards the growing commercial trade, it is wise for us not to formulate any policy here, the time has not come for that, and to make any definite expression of our views now would be unwise, but we should, by an expression of the opinion of Parliament in an unmistakeable manner, show public men in the old country who may help this matter, what our sympathies are and that we hope the day will come when this will be carried out. I hope that some day the representative men of the Australasian confederation will go to London and meet the representatives of the other colonies and arrange a system which will be beneficial to all the colonies, as well as to the mother country itself. In this, there is no attack upon self-government or upon commercial autonomy. It is not necessary to invoke any sentiment in regard to this matter, but there is simply a trade proposition before the House; and I understood the mover of the resolution and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to give no uncertain voice on this question, that this is no time for action, but that it is desirable to tell the distinguished men in Great Britain, men like Mr. Chamberlain who has given the benefit of his great ability to this subject, that we are ready to meet them, and that there is nothing in the National Policy antagonistic to this matter or to the benefit of the farmers of that country. It is not proposed, as I understand it, and if it is proposed I am against it tooth and nail, to interfere with the vested interests of the country. It is proposed, on the other hand, to give them far more protection than they now have. Whatever other hon. gentlemen have to say upon the question, I for one, would not go for lowering the duties which are necessary for a fair protection of the manufacturing industries of this country, to the extent of one single farthing. But I think an arrangement can be made; I think we can raise the duties on other goods when the time comes. But certainly if there is an unanimous desire throughout the colonies and Great Britain—I mean by unanimous desire such a one as will induce political action—I am satisfied that when the time comes, an arrangement can be easily and willingly made by this country to carry out the objects which the mover of this resolution has in view. I promised the House not to deal with the position of the hon. member for Brome, as far as the question of reciprocity is concerned. It was quite natural that the hon. member for North Simcoe should explain his views as far as they affected the question of commercial union; and I quite admit that my hon. friends opposite who, a year or two ago, might consistently have joined hands with us, as the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) wished to do to-night, in legislating as far as we could towards a consummation of such a policy, are, to a large extent, debarred from it. They wish to throw in their fortunes with the United States, our competitors in nearly all the articles of trade between Great Britain and ourselves. We, on the other hand, who support the substance of the resolution, and the proposition of the hon. member for North Simcoe, desire closer trade relations with the mother country and the colonies which constitute the British Empire.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It does seem to me rather extraordinary that a motion of such importance as this should have been discussed the whole evening without any member of the Government giving to the House the slightest indication of what the views of the Government are upon this question. We are told by the seconder of this motion that it is one of paramount importance, that it is one effecting not merely the future well-being of Canada, but one of the utmost consequence to the whole Empire; and yet, after such declaration as that, made by a gentleman who occupies a very prominent place on the front benches of the Ministerial side, not a member of Government, up to this moment, has given to the House the slightest indication of what their views may be upon the subject. Sir, there can be no doubt whatever that this measure is one, if it were adopted, of a revolutionary character. If we are to believe what hon. gentlemen opposite contended on another important proposition that was under the consideration of the House at an earlier period of the Session, we should come to the conclusion that the proposition now before the House would lead to the absolute destruction of everything like self-government in this country. Sir, those hon. gentlemen informed us again and again that anything like absolute free trade between Canada and the United States must ultimately lead to the wiping out of our political institutions, and there can be no doubt whatever that if they were to abandon the policy upon which the Government entered some years ago, and adopt the views expressed in this resolution, an equally great calamity would befall this country. We would have our autonomy wiped out, and we would be absorbed into the government of the United Kingdom. Sir, if there is danger on the one hand, there would be still greater danger on the other; and if hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches entertain those views which the exponents of the Government put forward upon another proposition, we can come to but one conclusion with regard to their views as to what would be the political effect of this proposition. Now, an hon. gentleman has made a proposition which would lead to a complete change in the fiscal policy of this country. Are the Government prepared to recommend to this House that change? The Government asked us again and again, what were we to do if we wiped the $7\frac{1}{2}$ millions that we now derive from the imposition of taxes upon our trade with the United States? I ask them this question: What, under this proposition, are they to do if they wipe out 10 or 12 millions of customs duties which they receive by taxes upon our trade with the United Kingdom? There can be no doubt whatever that if the proposition of the hon. gentleman who moved this motion is carried out—I lay aside the commentary that was read upon the proposition by the hon. gentleman who seconded it—there must be an abandonment of those taxes which the Government have imposed on articles produced in the United Kingdom which have hitherto been consumed in this country. Why, Sir, hon. gentlemen do not suppose for one moment that the people of the United Kingdom would, if they were making such an arrangement as is proposed, permit the articles of Canada to come in absolutely free of taxes into the market of the United Kingdom, while those of the United Kingdom coming into Canada would be subject to a very heavy taxation. What do the Government propose, then? We find this proposition moved by one supporter of the Government, seconded by another, and supported in a speech by another gentleman who we are told, is looking with longing eyes, and not without hope to the Treasury benches. Sir, I think it is rather extraordinary, under these circumstances, that the Government should have, up to this moment, failed to indicate to the House what their views are upon the question. Are they in favor of abandoning their National Policy, and of accepting a policy of the federation of the Empire, for that is precisely what this proposition means. The hon. gentleman who seconded the motion told us that this was not quite so explicit as the proposition which he had submitted but that it was really a proposition with the same object and aim in view. And so the hon. gentleman has submitted to the House a proposition which we are led to believe has the support of the Government, proposing to wipe \$10,000,000 or \$12,000,000 of customs duty, and establish absolute free trade between Canada and the United Kingdom. Now, the First Minister is in his place, and I put to him the question: Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.)

If he could not see his way to carry on the Government of this country in abandoning the $7,000,000 of taxes that we get upon trade with the United States, how is he prepared to carry on the Government of the country and to abandon the $12,000,000 of taxes that we receive from trade with the United Kingdom? Does the First Minister propose to accept this proposition? Does he attach to it the importance that is attached to it by hon. gentlemen on that side of the House who have spoken? Does he subscribe to the doctrine that fair trade is in the air, and that the policy of fair trade at this moment constitutes the policy of the Conservative party in the United Kingdom, that Lord Salisbury is a supporter of that policy in disguise, without the courage of his convictions, and that all those who support him entertain the same views? I think, Mr. Speaker, that the people of the United Kingdom, their representatives, at all events, have rather a strange way of exhibiting their devotion to this principle. If I remember rightly, but a few weeks ago a vote was taken in the House of Commons upon the subject, and there were 4 supporters to 304 opponents. That, I think, was the way the vote stood. Those hon. gentlemen are proposing to us a proposition that, however favorably it may be received by hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches and those behind them, certainly has not been very favorably received by the representatives of the people of the United Kingdom. We are dealing here with questions of practical politics, and I suppose the Government are not prepared to abandon what they call the National Policy unless they see some hope of this new policy being adopted, and the action of the Parliament of the United Kingdom on the question does not indicate a very great disposition to carry it out at a very early day. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in discussing this question not long since in Toronto told us that the theory of a Federal Government was propounded by Lord Durham in 1837, and it was not until 1864 that serious steps were taken with a view to consummating the policy of union which Lord Durham in his report had indicated. And so, the hon. gentleman says, we should not be discouraged. But it is rather an extraordinary proposition to submit to this Parliament, that we should at this moment disregard our present interests and present necessities and should look to the condition of things thirty or forty years hence, and undertake to exercise a policy of self-denial and act upon lines that are only to lead to conclusion long after we have not only ceased to be members of this House but inhabitants of the world. There is a great deal of force in the observations addressed some years ago to the people by the Rev. Sydney Smith. He said: Gentlemen, so long as you are members of the congregation and occupants of the pews you have the right to decide what shall be done in the parish church, but after you have become occupants of the graveyard, after you have ceased to be here and others have taken your places, you ought to leave them the same privilege of judging what is best in their own interests as you claim for yourself when living. So long as you are masters of the ship you may say that the ship shall sail east or west, but when you have resigned your position and it is placed in charge of other persons, it is for them to say in what direction it shall sail and upon what voyage it shall enter. And so I say that those who occupy the places we now occupy thirty or forty years hence will be the best judges as to what policy shall be adopted in their day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of what ought to be adopted now.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not the hon. gentleman's proposition. The hon. gentleman pointed out that Lord Durham in 1837 decided in favor of a union and it was not until 1864 that serious steps were taken to carry it out; but now we have a speech in favor of the principle of federation of the Empire at some period in the remote future, and that some one will then be in favor of giving effect to the policy at this time enunciated. I am not in favor of any such policy. I believe any step in that direction would diminish our power of self-government, it would increase our responsibilities, it would impose serious burdens from which at the present time we are relieved, and I am not disposed to sacrifice our present opportunity for practical improvement and our present lines of public policy that are in the interests of the people, in favor of some fancied scheme upon which it is necessary to consult another party which has a paramount interest in the question, especially when there is not the slightest indication of any disposition on their part to adopt the policy we are now marking out for them. The people of the United Kingdom number 37,000,000, and the hon. gentleman proposes that we shall mark out here a policy for those 37,000,000 and tell them what is the best course to adopt at this moment in order that we may convert them to our views and at some period induce them to accept what he and some other hon. gentlemen believe to be an excellent policy. The hon. gentleman also told the House that the people of Ontario were more prosperous than are the people of the United States to-day. That was a very extraordinary announcement for the hon. gentleman to make. One would suppose it was a statement of which he had been ignorant. It seems to be new to the hon. gentleman, quite as new as the calculation of an eclipse would be to an Indian. But this statement was as true ten years ago as it is to-day. There was a greater difference in 1877 between the relative prosperity of the people of the United States as a whole than to-day; and yet the hon. gentleman did not hesitate to declare that the whole country was going to ruin at that time. The present First Minister moved a resolution declaring that the people of this country were falling back, that people could not get employment and that if he was returned to power all this would come to an end. It did not come to an end. The people are leaving the country in greater numbers than before.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I say "Oh, yes," and statistics show it to be true.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is no doubt whatever of the fact.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, every doubt of it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There are at least four times as many people leaving the country every year as there were in 1878. What did the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) tell us to night? The hon. gentleman said that the country is depressed, that trade is depressed, that the condition of the farmers, although better than the condition of the farmers in the United States, was far from satisfactory.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, he did say so, I took down his words.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, he did not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I say he did, and the question will be decided by Hansard when the speech of the gentleman appears. The First Minister knows that the hon. gentleman went on and said what the price of wheat is to day, that it was 77½ cents a bushel. Now, the First Minister promised the people that it would never be less than a dollar. He further promised the people that the price of barley should never be less than it was in the United States.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They have had better prices.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. member for Simcoe, to-night has said that the farming population was in a depressed condition, but that it was brought about by matters over which the Government could exercise no control. I say the National Policy was intended to prevent that state of things. We were called flies on the wheel. Why did hon. gentlemen call us by that name? Hon. gentlemen when in Opposition promised to stop the emigration of the people and secure for every man good wages for a fair day's work and constant employment, and at the same time fair prices for our agricultural products. Yet what is the statement of the resolution to-night? It is that such is not the condition of things, that the agricultural population are in a depressed condition, in an unsatisfactory condition and that it is necessary to bring about a better state of things than exists. How does the hon. gentleman propose to do it? He says: Let us enter into commercial relations with the United Kingdom and other British colonies; let us enter into a compact by which there shall be absolute free trade between the various portions of the British Empire and high tariff against all the rest of the world. That is the proposition of the mover. But does the supporter of that resolution take the same ground? Oh, no; he tells us a different story. He says: That is too high a price to pay for such an arrangement as this, we would not like to have absolute free trade, we have got to consider the condition of the manufacturers to some extent, and the manufacturers have got to make concessions to the farmers. Now, take it at the present time that the manufacturer gets 60 per cent, and he must be content with 53, for the hon. gentleman says: Let us take off 6 or 7 per cent, so as to give the English manufacturer a little advantage in the Canadian market, and giving him that little advantage they will give us absolute free trade and exclude the rest of the world from trading with them. Hon. gentlemen know that this is an absurd proposition. If the English Government and the people of England can be persuaded to act on the principle of free trade, and to tax the rest of the world and establish free trade between England and Canada and the colonies, it can only be on the principle of absolute free trade between the different portions of the Empire as exists between the different Provinces of this Dominion. But the hon. gentleman will not support such a proposition, and the hon. gentleman who seconded this proposition dare not express his approval of such a proposition as that. The hon. gentleman is in favor of the federation of the Empire under which our autonomy would be sacrificed, he is in favor of a federation of the Empire that would compel us to fight the battles of England and Russia and Central Asia.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentlemen think this is nonsense. I believe that such a view is nonsense, but nevertheless, it is held by quite a number of his supporters. Here is a gallant general who sits on this side of the House, who assured the people of this city the other evening that Canada absolutely was spoiling for war, in which she would feel all the consequences and mischiefs of war, and under which she would feel the necessity of relying upon the right arm of England for her support, and then from the feelings of gratitude that would be so far carried on that she would be compelled to fight the Zulus in Africa and the Russians in Afghanistan. I notice that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) did not quite fairly state the commercial relations and the trade of England with the United States. He represented the trade of England as declining, that her manufacturers were losing the markets of the world, and that all this was being brought about because other countries had adopted a protective policy. He referred to the fact that the trade of England with the United States was declining. Where is the evidence of that? The hon. gentleman took a year that happened to favor his comparison, but let him take another year. The exports of England to the United States in 1878 were £14,500,000 and in 1886 £26,824,000 sterling; nearly double what they were in 1878. Why did not the hon. gentleman take some other year in which the comparison would not be quite so favorable to his argument?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He took 1885.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And I take 1886 when the trade is nearly £6,000,000 more than in 1885. Why did the hon. gentleman take 1885 and not 1886, for I apprehend he had the statistics before him? Then, when he comes to tell us about the report of the Commission of Enquiry into the depressed state of trade in England why did he read the report of the minority? The hon. gentleman did that, and he did not tell the House that it was a report of the minority.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, he did.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I accept that statement. I did not hear him say so. At all events the whole drift of his speech was simply a selection of evidence that suited the line of argument which he had adopted, and carefully ignoring whatever might tend to establish a different proposition. Then, Sir, if the hon. gentleman had thought as he does that free trade with England, with protection against all the rest of the world is such an advantage, why did he support the statutory offer? The hon. gentleman who leads the Government did not take the same view. The hon. gentleman proposes to establish free trade with the United States upon certain conditions. He never made such a proposition to England and in fact he declared in 1878 that we wanted a policy of retaliation to bring the United States to terms—that we wanted freer trade relations. What did the hon. gentleman do when he succeeded to power? Did he confine his increased taxation to the punishment of the people of the United States? Why, Sir, he applied the punishment to England as well. Does the hon. gentleman think it was a great advantage to this country to buy cheaply as well as to sell dearly? Why is it that he has adopted towards England which puts no tax on our exports the same policy that he does toward the United States where he said retaliation was necessary? The hon. gentleman has not taken the same view as to the importance of free trade with England that he has with regard to free trade with the United States, and yet the hon. gentleman's supporters here to-night state that they are prepared to adopt the other policy. Is the hon. gentleman who leads the Government prepared to adopt this policy? I am satisfied that the right hon. gentleman will not venture to ask the House to support this proposition. I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman will not ask the House to agree to reciprocal trade between England and Canada. I am rather inclined to think—unless the hon. gentleman's views have undergone another revolution—that he will hardly be found here to support the views of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) on the subject of Imperial Federation. I think that the hon. gentleman has both in England and in this country declared himself against such a proposition; and unless he has had new light—and I have not heard that he has announced views different from those he formerly expressed—I fancy he will not support the proposition of the hon. member who moved this motion or of the hon. member who seconded it. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) told us that the English are driven out of the market of the world by the German competitors. If the hon. gentleman would undertake to read the reports of English consuls, and they are quite accessible, he will find that that is not the case, and so far as it is the case in certain localities it is due to other and different causes. The reports of the English consuls at Rio Janiero, La Plata and other parts of South America, show that the Germans have sent into the various republics of South America commercial travellers who are thoroughly conversant with the Spanish and Portuguese languages and he tells the English manufacturers that unless they send out men who are good linguists they cannot expect to sell goods with the same facilities that the Germans do. What is the reason that commercial men in England are saying just now: We must establish schools and colleges for men intending to engage in commercial pursuits in all parts of the world, where the modern languages will be taught to them? What is the report of the English consul from the capital of Japan? It is that the French and German commercial men there are thoroughly acquainted with the Japanese language. And they have sent their commercial agents all over Japan, while the English have sent men there who can scarcely speak a word of Japanese, and who have to confine themselves to the capital, and he says that unless they adopt the aggressive policy of the Germans and the French they cannot make the same progress in establishing a market for their goods in that country. He says their goods are better and cheaper—there is no doubt about that; but they have not men so well qualified to act on the part of those manufacturing and commercial houses as the French and German houses have. There is not one of the English consuls—and I believe I have read the reports of every one of them throughout the world—who assigns as a reason that the English are inferior as manufacturers and are failing in the race. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman told us that our barley was a necessity to the people of the United States, and that as long as we chose to grow the article, the Americans will have it, no matter what the duty is. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. In 1875, the Americans raised but a very few million bushels of barley. To-day they raise more than five times the quantity they raised ten years ago; and as every one acquainted with agricultural populations knows, the people in large districts become habituated to run in a certain routine; they grow certain products, and unless something occurs to induce them to change the order of rotation of crops, and to introduce some new crop, no change will take place; but when the people of the United States began largely to consume malt liquors, and a demand arose for barley, the article began to command a high price, and the Americans began to grow it largely. So that neither on the American side of the line nor on the Canadian side does barley bring as high a price as it did ten years ago, and the Government have found themselves wholly unable to seriously affect the price of that article. Now, I am not going to delay the House by entering into a discussion of this question at any length, because the Government has no more serious idea than we have of accepting the principle laid down in the gentleman's motion. They know better than to accept any such proposition, and that being the case I do not think it is necessary to discuss the subject further.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Gen. LAURIE. I desire to make a personal explanation. If I were an older member of this House, I might have been prepared for the way in which this matter was referred to by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). It appears to me that he rather took the line of drawing a red herring across the track, to carry this discussion to Imperial federation. I do not think Imperial federation is concerned. But with reference to the remark that I am stated to have made, that the people of Canada were spoiling for a war, and that they should be taken to fight the battles of England in Central Asia among the Afghans, or in Africa among the Zulus, I think that is exactly the opposite of what I stated. What I stated was that it was giving a false impression of Imperial federation to say that that was the view of its promoters; but I stated at the same time—and I am satisfied that in this I shall carry the House with me—that there was a strong feeling in Canada in favor of taking part in England's wars when she was in danger. But I certainly pointed out to the meeting I was addressing that it was not a true idea of Imperial federation that our people should be taken against their will to fight the battles of the Empire abroad.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not stand between the House for any length of time and any hon. gentleman who may wish to address it on this subject, but I wish to make a few remarks upon it. Before doing so, however, you will permit me to correct the history of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). He declared that the party of the right hon. gentleman characterised himself and his friends as flies on the wheel. Why, Sir, they never did anything of the kind. That phrase originated with the hon. member for South Oxford.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; there is the original proprietor of it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. DAVIN. I am perfectly correct, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for South Oxford was explaining political economy, and he declared that statesmen were only flies on the wheel.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman is wholly wrong; I did nothing of the kind.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He is quite right.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was first used by the First Minister at Halifax. He rightly compared himself to a fly on a wheel.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He used it at Halifax in 1864.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, the flies are not of so much importance; but I distinctly remember the hon. member for South Oxford making a speech, in which he did not credit the Prime Minister or anyone else with making the statement, but declared that statesmen had as much influence in promoting prosperity as flies on the wheel.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Withdraw.

Mr. DAVIN. I cannot withdraw, because I remember it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, all I can say is that it is a very vinous and after-dinner memory. I have told you distinctly that you are wrong.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I do not think it is at all unparliamentary to say that my memory of a matter like that is one that can be relied on; and my memory, after dinner or before dinner, is probably about as good as that of the hon. member for South Oxford. But, of course, if he is deeply hurt at the suggestion that he could describe himself and his friends as flies on the wheel, I will, out of consideration for himself and the flies, withdraw the statement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no hesitation in saying that the hon. member for South Oxford said so, and I heard him say so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I have no hesitation in saying that the statement just made is utterly without foundation, and if I knew any stronger expression that would not be unparliamentary, I would use it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is quite ready to use strong unparliamentary language, but he did state so, and if he says he did not, he says what is not true.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not, and the hon. gentleman in saying that I did knows that he is stating a falsehood.

Mr. DAVIN. I will not refer to that, but I will say that I never in all my life felt confident in my memory, and found that I had cause to repent relying on it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But you have withdrawn.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not withdraw. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) is, I see, trying the new rôle of a humorist; he generally appears in a different rôle. I will not pay any attention to the hon. gentleman in this rôle, but will proceed to discuss the question before the House. It is greatly to be regretted that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) should have introduced Imperial federation into this question. This has nothing to do with Imperial federation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Oh yes, it has.

Mr. DAVIN. This is the proposal that the Government shall make certain propositions to England; and I venture to say there is not a man on either side of the House who will dare to controvert the statement that if we can get England to discriminate in our favor, it will be of the greatest advantage to us. It does not follow that we need in any way interfere with the protection we have given our manufacturers; it does not follow that our infant industries should, in any way, be imperilled, but we can make proposals to England that will be at once advantageous to England and to us, without in any imperilling the existence of these industries.

At hon. MEMBER. What are they?

Mr. DAVIN. It is of great value to have introduced this subject here and to have introduced it in England, because England has had very little interest in her colonies and in Canada up to a very recent period. It is exceedingly difficult to bring home to a large population, such as that of England, the affairs and the claims of a country separated from her by the "great floods and barriers of creation," to use the language of Edmund Burke. I can see here an illustration of how difficult it is to do that, in the difficulty we have of bringing home to members from the east the exact condition of affairs in the North-West, which is nearer to us than we are to England. But as surely as it is of the greatest importance to Canada that our eastern members and politicians should thoroughly understand the North-West, it is of the greatest importance to England and to the Empire that the people of England should thoroughly understand the claim of her colonies and the advantages that the colonies hold out to her. The other day I was reading the speech of an eminent naval man, who pointed out that England could not, apart from her colonies, defend her mercantile marine. He pointed out that, under the new conditions of naval warfare, England, deprived of her colonies, could not protect her mercantile marine; therefore, apart from any such consideration as that referred to by the hon. member for Bothwell, namely that we might have to be involved in wars and fight battles, which is a mere attempt to discredit a question on which it has no practical bearing, because nobody who takes a sensible view of this question proposes anything of the kind.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Ask the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill)?

Mr. DAVIN. If we can show the English Government that her colonies are of the greatest advantage to her, then, from our point of view, when we come to what the hon. member for Simcoe, in his closely reasoned and most instructive speech, called the great market of the world, we see what an advantage is presented by that market to Canada. The hon. member for Bothwell talked as if this proposal was for free trade with England, and the hon. member for Elgin made a similar supposition, and said, let us have reciprocity all round. We would then have to go in for direct taxation and free trade with all the world, and the result would be that our manufacturers would despair, and the exodus, which weighs so heavily on the hearts of hon. gentlemen opposite, would be swollen to an enormous extent. There is no proposition here for free trade with England.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is it?

Mr. DAVIN. There is the proposition that England shall give us an advantage in consideration of our giving her an advantage, as compared with other countries.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is it?

Mr. DAVIN. Can we not discriminate? Can we not put up a discriminating duty against other countries in favor of England. Is not that possible? Mr. Gladstone was accustomed to say there are three customs. We may remain as we are, or we may for the benighted policy which hon. gentlemen opposite advocate, or we may support the suggestion of the mover of this motion and try whether we shall not get advantages in the English market, by discriminating on some articles, say on breadstuffs, in favor of Canada, while we would put a duty on manufactured articles coming from other countries to the extent of 5 per cent. or 10 per cent. over those imposed on the imports of foreign countries.

Mr. LISTER. That is a "dandy" policy.

Mr. DAVIN. I have never studied slang, and I do not know the meaning of "dandy." The only idea I have of "dandy" is as applied to the individual, and I dare say the hon. gentleman fulfils that part well.

Mr. LISTER. No, you are the man.

Mr. DAVIN. This question has been most properly brought before the House to-night, but some of the hon. gentlemen opposite have sought to raise issues that should not have been raised. The hon. member for Bothwell complained that no member of the Government had spoken on this question. If this motion should be carried, no one can doubt that the Government shall make proposal to the other colonies and to England, and that a step will be taken towards an understanding of what may be done in this direction. At this late hour I do not propose to say anything further except this, that any one who visits England—and I visited England eight or nine months ago—will find the greatest possible change in the sentiments of the people there; he will find they have made the greatest progress in understanding the colonies and that the fetish of free trade no longer holds dominion over their minds; he will find they are beginning to understand the advantage of taking a different course from that which they took under the inspiration of Manchester and under a complete misconception of the teaching of Adam Smith. I will also give the hon. gentleman a fact that came to my knowledge when I was travelling on the continent. I found that large quantities of ready-made clothes were being sent over to England from Belgium, sent to England where men are supposed to have such an advantage in manufacturing wearing apparel. Can anyone doubt that it would be an advantage to England to preserve that market for her own sons? Then, Sir, I know Coventry. I remember, when I was a boy, driving over to Coventry, before Mr. Gladstone's policy ruined their manufactures, and it was a thriving and a thickly populated town. After I left the university I visited it again, and I found it like a city of the dead, the manufactories closed, and the industries destroyed. By adopting a wiser policy, by adopting fair trade, as my hon. and learned friend has said to-day, and as is set forth in this resolution, England would benefit her own trade, would keep her own markets for her own sons, would practically promote her industries which are now dormant or dead, and would obtain advantages for herself and extend advantages to us.

Mr. McNEILL. As this is a very important question, a question the magnitude and importance of which can scarcely be exaggerated, and as hon. gentlemen opposite have not discussed it at all, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. LAURIER. It is perhaps just as well to adopt the motion of my hon. friend, as unfortunately the Government do not appear to be prepared to give an opinion on this important question this evening, and, when it comes up again, if it does come up again this Session, we may expect to have the benefit of their views on the subject.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Orders in Council, &c., connected with the resignation of Antoine Audette, Esquire, Postmaster of North Stukely, and with the appointment of his successor.—(Mr. Langelier, Quebec Centre.)

Correspondence between the Corporation of the City of Quebec, or any of its officers, and the Department of Militia, or any of the officers of the same, respecting the supplying, from the waterworks of the said city, of water to the cartridge factory and the drill hall.—(Mr. Langelier, Quebec Centre.)

Copies of all correspondence, Orders in Council, papers and documents respecting the seizure of diamonds and other precious stones effected at Quebec on one David Levi, and the cancelling of the said seizure.—(Mr. Langelier, Quebec Centre.)

Copies of all correspondence between the Department of Railways and Messrs. A. Pion & Co., of Quebec, in relation to a claim for goods damaged on the Intercolonial Railway.—(Mr. Langelier, Quebec Centre.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12:10 a.m. (Tuesday).

Printed by McLEAN, ROGER & Co., Parliamentary Printers, Wellington Street, Ottawa.

House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Tuesday, May 1, 1888.

No. 45

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 1st May, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 118) to amend the Weights and Measures Act, as respects the contents of packages of salt. He said: I propose to amend the present Act by providing that every barrel of salt sold or offered for sale in Canada shall weigh 280 lbs.; the weight to be marked on the barrel. When imported in barrels such barrels should have the name of the importer marked thereon, and when packed in Canada the name of the packer shall be on the barrel. It is not proposed to interfere with salt imported in bulk or in sacks, but when small bags of salt are packed in barrels, such barrels shall have the gross weight marked on them.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I wish to call the attention of the House to a gross breach of its privilege. Last night, it will be in the recollection of the House that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) made a speech in which he used this phrase: "You said we were flies on the wheel." I happened to speak later on, and I said that I should like to correct the history of the hon. member for Bothwell. I said that the phrase "Flies on the wheel" was not flung across the House at those hon. gentlemen. I said that the phrase "Flies on the wheel" was —

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I must say that he cannot make a question of privilege of what passed last night in another debate in which he took part. If he wishes to make a personal explanation, and will keep himself within the limits I have on a previous occasion indicated to the House, that is another thing.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I will put the question. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt that motion?

Mr. DAVIN. I said that the phrase "Flies on the wheel" had been used by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Thereupon the hon. member, with that courtesy which distinguishes him, said it was not so.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is still breaking one of the rules of the House. He is referring to a past debate of this Session.

Mr. HAGGART. If I understand rightly, the hon. member is bringing this up as a breach of privilege, the charge which was flung across the House to him last night, and I think he is perfectly in order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

Mr. HAGGART. It was stated that the hon. member had not made a true statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. This incident could have been brought up last night as a question of order, when the veracity of the hon. member was called into question, but it cannot be taken up as a question of privilege.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If Mr. Speaker would so far kindly consent, it would please me exceedingly that the hon. gentleman should make his statement on the condition that I should have the right of reply.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it would be much better to have this dealt with when the debate is resumed, and I do not think it would further the business of the House to refer to that debate again.

Mr. DAVIN. In Manley's case, reported in the Commons Journals on the 10th November, 1620, the conduct of Manley was brought up as a matter of privilege, as I bring this matter up, and in Sheppard's case it was also brought up and was also a case of using language which it was not proper to use.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What year was that?

Mr. DAVIN. I think that was in 1622. Sheppard, for using language not nearly as strong as that of the hon. gentleman, was brought to the bar of the House on his knees. However, if you decide that I should not go on now, I will not go on at present, but I can give notice, because, in the case of Sir Robert Peel, and of Sir Edward Watkin, that course was adopted, so I will give notice in the regular way, and will bring the matter up.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. DAVIN. The Speaker rules that I cannot go on.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Speak to the motion for adjournment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Motion for adjournment withdrawn.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper: "That Mr. Speaker leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means," and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. McLELAN. Mr. Speaker, in offering a few remarks to the House, I shall not follow the example of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) the other day; I shall not preface my remarks by stating that the observations that he made to the House were intolerable rubbish. The speech which he delivered on that occasion is before the House and before the country, and the House and the country will judge of that speech as they have judged of all the speeches which the hon. gentleman has delivered in this House before, speeches which have never yet found a response in the hearts of the people of this country, to sustain him and approve of them. Sir, he excited our sympathies for the people of this country by telling us that he had addressed a hundred thousand of the electors of Ontario. Sir, the infliction of those speeches upon the people of Ontario does excite our warmest sympathies, except in one respect, that they have resulted in giving to the Government a majority from that Province. He went down to speak to the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, in 1878, and his speeches there resulted in a majority against him and the Government of which he was a member. He has spoken, he says, to one hundred thousand people. One can fancy that speech redelivered and redelivered. I was reminded, Sir, of an American statesman, Mr. Stevenson, who made a humorous speech complaining that President Hayes had not appointed him collector of New Orleans; for, he said, on behalf of the Republican party, he had made 127 speeches, or rather he had delivered one speech 127 times. So, Sir, I presume that the hon. member for South Oxford has repeated the same speech to a hundred thousand voters of Ontario. There is a similarity in all his speeches upon public questions and in all his resolutions every year. They seem to grow a little every year, but as a repetition of what we had last year, and a little added. It reminds me of the old legend of "the House that Jack built," the revelations increasing in length a little from every repetition. He has discussed almost every possible question throughout the country. Sometimes we find him dealing with a protective tariff, and the robberies committed by protection; sometimes we find him discussing political parties. In 1884 we found him at Toronto advocating the independence of Canada, and in 1887 we find him here on the floor of Parliament, and on the hustings, advocating annexation to the United States. It is true, Sir, that the hon. gentleman, in all the speeches he has made in this House, does not openly use the word annexation; but yet the arguments he has used, the assertions that he is making, are in advocacy of annexation to the United States. He startled the House this Session by informing us that he had been reading his Bible, that he had learned from Solomon that it was "In vain to spread the net in the sight of the bird." And so, Mr. Speaker, he covers up the net of annexation, and he talks about reciprocity, but the net is there all the same. He tells us that sentiment follows interest, and he declared that ever since the Loyalists settled in Canada, there has been no year in which it was not the interest of the people of this country to associate themselves and to unite themselves with the people of the United States. He tells us that we owe no debt to England except the debt of forgiveness for the wrongs she has committed against us. And so, Sir, under the guise of unrestricted reciprocity, he throws in sentences and expressions every little while to affect the minds of the people in favor of annexation, which is more dangerous than open discussion of the question, and an open declaration of his views and intentions upon the subject. Sir, he has learned from Solomon that it is in vain to spread the net in the sight of the bird, and he covers it up. The deadliest snakes are those that twine amongst the flowers, mingling and blending their coloring with the varied blossoms; their fierce eyes glittering like a sparkling dewdrop, in all so like that which nature has most harmless and sportive, that the innocence that dreads no danger is poisoned unawares. And so the serpent twines among the flowers and blends its coloring with the blossoms, but it is there all the time. And so, Sir, he has been good enough to define his position for our benefit. He took special care to define his position for the benefit of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. He declares that his position upon trade questions is to discriminate against England, to turn his back upon the mother country in all commercial transactions, and to favor the United States; and he tells the hon. Finance Minister that if the people of the United States knew that we were determined to discriminate against England, they would hold up both hands for unrestricted reciprocity with us. That he defines as his position, that is his fixed policy, the policy of himself and his party, which he is prepared, he says, to fight out upon every hustings, and in every farm yard in the country. Sir, the hon. gentleman called attention to the fact that my hon. friend the Finance Minister was unable to discover a way to provide for the ordinary wants of the administration of the country. He, however, professed to have all the knowledge necessary, that it was simply a matter of commerce, that he had that political ability, that patriotism, and that wisdom which were necessary in order to solve that great problem. Mr. Speaker, it was amusing to see the way in which he directed the attention of his party and the members around him, to note the fact, and he called upon the press of the country to note the fact, that my hon. friend was unable to grapple with this problem, but that he, the hon. member for South Oxford, had the wisdom, the statesmanship and the patriotism requisite to grapple with that question. Let me read what he said:

"I call on my hon. friends to take special note of it, I call on the people of Canada to take special note of it, that the hon. gentleman, by his own words, admits that he and his party are unable to solve or grapple with this problem. I well believe it. There is no doubt whatever that to grapple successfully with the great enterprise to which we have set our hands, requires the greatest prudence and the greatest economy. There is no doubt it requires a knowledge of the first principles on which honest taxation should be based, it requires the greatest wisdom for the welfare of Canada, not for retaining place by grants to combines and trusts and monopolies; it requires the greatest statesmanship and patriotism."

And then he says: I, the member for South Oxford, possess all this wisdom and statesmanship, but I am going to button it up in my pocket and will not let the Finance Minister know anything about it for fear he will steal some of the plums. The wisdom comes to him late and it comes to him suddenly. Why, not only did he announce to us that he had been studying Solomon, but he made a pious ejaculation and wished to heaven we could go back to 1874. With this new-found statesmanship and this new wisdom that has come to him I suppose he wanted to go back to 1874, and from that date to 1879, in order to remedy the errors he had committed and to wipe from our public records the blot which he had placed upon those records by his administration of public affairs during those years. I am not surprised that he should want to go back, that he should pray to heaven that he might be permitted to go back to 1874 and exercise that wisdom and statesmanship for the want of which every industry in this country languished and died, for the want of which he declared himself, as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) was about to prove, to have been unable to grapple with public affairs and was but a "fly on the wheel." I understood the hon. gentleman last night denied the paternity of the fly.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

Mr. McLELAN. The leader of the Government said it was a wasp. We have had proof that there have been a good many bees in the hon. gentleman's bonnet, and this Session there has been a bee of enormous growth that wants to fly unrestricted. Now, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman denies that, permit me to take the figure of a ship used by the Minister of Finance and to say that during that period the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) never touched the tiller, that he allowed the ship to drift helpless upon the tide wherever she might go, that during five years, for the want of that statesmanship, that wisdom and that sagacity which he now claims, he never touched a helm, he never trimmed a sail to catch a favoring breeze, but he left the ship of state drifting helpless, aimless and uncertain as the poet's ship,

"Asleep in an ocean fog."

Now, however, the hon. gentleman desires to go back to 1874 in order that he may exercise wisdom and statesmanship, that he may make a better record for his party and for his country than there remains for his administration. He claims now that he has all the statesmanship and wisdom necessary to grapple with this problem which was presented by the Minister of Finance, namely: How are you to govern the country without direct taxation? The Minister of Finance referred the hon. gentleman to his statements in 1874 during the time he was Finance Minister, to the declaration that he then made that he was unable to raise any more revenue without imposing direct taxation. The hon. gentleman then denied that he ever made such a statement. We have here his speeches for two separate years; they are nicely got up, gilt edge, but the speeches did not turn out to be of that character. What did the hon. gentleman say when he was Finance Minister, although he now denies it. He said:

"An increase of duty is inevitable, and arises from circumstances over which this Government has no control. I do not think that any greater increase of the tariff than we now suggest would be wise. I think we have gone to the limit beyond which it would be impossible to pass without resorting to direct taxation. It may be that those very expenditures may indirectly help our revenue; but I desire to say to the House that, although I think the country can bear the entire burden we have imposed upon it without any great inconvenience, I do not think that much more taxation could be safely resorted to; nor do I think we should be called upon to consider the question of raising any great amount by direct taxation."

Now the hon. member puts aside the question of direct taxation and stands before this House and declares that he is quite able to solve the problem of sweeping away the entire revenues we derive from our imports from the United States, and nearly all those from our imports from Great Britain, and carry on the administration of the country and provide a revenue without direct taxation. I should like to refer the hon. gentleman to some observations made by his late leader, the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) at Malvern, when the question of the reduction of revenue was under discussion. What did his leader say?

"Now, what are our sources of taxation? Direct taxation is at this time out of the question. The reasons I need not discuss. The advantages and disadvantages I need not balance. We are dealing with practical conditions, and no one suggests direct taxation as practicable. There remain in the existing sources, the duties of customs and excise. From the liquor duties we cannot expect further relief. By common consent these are kept as high as the danger of illicit invasion will allow; some think higher. The progress of the Temperance movement will, we all hope, diminish this source of revenue, and when the advocates of total prohibition succeeds those duties will disappear; at any rate the excise will then be 'all smoke.' There remain the duties of customs on other commodities, and the conditions demonstrate the impossibility of diminishing to any large extent this fund. We have no longer a surplus to dispose of; we have a deficit to overcome; and, that done, we have a tremendous yearly charge to overtake. 'Oh, but,' say some Tories, 'you can yet do this and make a free trade or non-political tariff.' The statement is dishonest and absurd."

I want to call the hon. gentleman's special attention to this:

"The statement is dishonest and absurd."

I should like to know whether, if the hon. member for West Durham had been present, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), knowing that that hon. gentleman made the statement that it would be dishonest and absurd, would have risen in the House and said he was quite able to solve this problem and quite able to provide revenues for the country without restoring to direct taxation. One word more upon this point. I have referred to a speech delivered last year by the hon. gentleman, and I find he took a little different course at that time to that which he is taking this Session, for he said that the charges on the revenue are so great that you must always raise a large sum from customs and excise in order to meet them. He goes over the different items: for interest and charges of management, $10,000,000; sinking fund, at $60,000,000; subsidies, $1,182,000; and if you include the Indians, $25,278,000. Now, Sir, he admits that here are the fixed charges which must be met. Allowing that from excise, or miscellaneous sources, we receive enough to meet those expenses of the country, let me tell the hon. gentleman that our entire revenue, exclusive of Great Britain and the United States, from customs, was $5,851,000. Having free intercourse and no duty from the United States, this would without doubt drop $5,000,000. The hon. member has told us in a previous discussion that although we had entire free trade with the United States, we ought to purchase from England as largely in proportion to our population as the United States does. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) put the amount at $150,000,000 of purchases from Great Britain. I do not believe that we would purchase anything near so large an amount, but assuming that we did, that would be $12,500,000 worth purchased from Great Britain, and at a percentage it would give us a revenue of two and a half million dollars, or a total of seven and a half million dollars from those sources to meet the $25,000,000 that the hon. gentleman says are a fixed charge upon us. This would leave a large difference between our revenue and the fixed charges to be otherwise provided for. Allowing that from excise and from the general revenue of the country there would be $2,700,000, there would still be $17,000,000 that would have to be met, and the hon. gentleman would have a difficult task before him to make this up. I know that the hon. gentleman, if he takes time to consider this subject will come to a different conclusion, and if he gives weight to the assertion made by his late leader, that it is dishonest to say otherwise, he will admit that we must raise $15,000,000 by direct taxation from the people of this country, if the hon. gentleman's proposed scheme is carried into operation. I have been referring to the assertion which was made by his late leader, that any attempt to convince the people of this country that it was impossible to reduce the duties of the country without direct taxation, was dishonest and absurd. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), when reference was made to Mr. Blake, challenged us, or rather he referred to the contrast of the way in which we treated the member for West Durham and the member for East York now, to what we did in old times. Sir, when those hon. gentlemen were here in health, there were always men on this side to measure swords with them. But when, Sir, they became unfit, or rather when they retired from the conflict, we observed all the decencies of life, and all the decencies which should prevail between one member of this House and another, and retired from the contest with them. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) does not follow the example that we set him, and he is not careful of the good name of his late leader. Why, Sir, when the Finance Minister referred to what Mr. Blake had said at Malvern Hill, and that that hon. gentleman stated he had accepted the National Policy—when the Minister of Finance stated that Mr. Blake had given the manufacturers of this country and the farmers of this country to believe, that there would be no disturbance in the policy of protection except upon the single article of corn meal for the lower Provinces, the hon.

member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said that he knew when Mr. Blake was making this speech what Mr. Blake meant,—insinuating that Mr. Blake was deceiving the people of the country on that occasion, deceiving his hearers, deceiving the manufacturers and deceiving the people at large. It ill comes from the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to reflect upon the good name of the hon. the late leader of the Opposition; an hon. gentleman to whom he owes everything, an hon. gentleman who has done more for him than any other man in this country, and to whom he owes his seat in this House. When the hon. gentleman was unable to find a constituency, after he was defeated in Wellington, his late leader found him a place in Huron, and when the period had elapsed, and when the people of Huron were giving him intimation that he would have to move on, as a policeman would give an intimation to a loiterer on a street corner that he has to move on, then, Sir, Mr. Blake had to assist him, and he implored the party, and supplicated the party, and begged of the party to provide him a safe seat, and to give one of the "hives" to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I do not know, Sir, whether there is to be another intimation to the hon. member for South Oxford to move on, or whether this is a finally, final safe seat for him. Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to one or two of the assertions made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). That which deserves most attention just now is a charge made against my hon. friend of having cooked the Public Accounts, and a charge that, in the statement which he delivered to this House, he had shown a surplus for the year 1887. The hon. gentleman charged, as a crime against the Minister of Finance, that he had transferred to revenue account the receipts from Dominion lands, whereas, previously, they had been credited to capital account. Why, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows that, under his own administration, he always credited those receipts to revenue account.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And charged likewise.

Mr. McLELAN. And charged likewise; and so do we credit and charge likewise. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Public Accounts, and study them, he will see that whereas he charged only $80,000 or $90,000 of receipts from Dominion lands, we have this year charged $180,000 odd. But he knows that he always took credit for the receipts from Dominion lands, small as they were, and that they were always so treated down to 1881, both by himself and by Sir Leonard Tilley; and after 1881, when we had got this policy in full swing, Sir Leonard Tilley had such large surpluses, amounting to two, three, four, five, six and seven millions a year, that it was unimportant whether these charges were made to the credit of income or capital account. Now, Sir, in 1886, when I had the honor of standing before the House as Finance Minister, dealing with the Public Accounts, I said:

"It will be noticed that I have included in that amount, the receipts from Dominion lands. During the five years that hon. gentlemen opposite held the Government, all the receipts from Dominion lands were taken and counted as part of the revenue, and my hon. friend and predecessor, Sir Leonard Tilley, followed the same course up to 1881, placing these as part of the receipts from consolidated revenue account. From 1881 to 1885, Sir Leonard seems to have placed them to capital account. I suppose the reason will be found in the fact that he had a large surplus each year during that period, and it was immaterial whether they should be placed to capital or to revenue account. But, Sir, I think the House will agree with me that as we have made large expenditures in the North-West in opening up the country by railway, and incurred a large debt for that purpose, as we have made a large expenditure in surveys, in the North-West Mounted Police, in the Indian treaties, incurring large liabilities, it is but right that whatever revenue or return we should have from the lands in the North-West, should be placed to revenue account to meet the interest that we are paying on the expenditures and the sinking fund that we are providing in order to pay off that indebtedness. I think the House will agree with me that we should do that instead of increasing the taxation of the country. Should we receive from the lands in the North-West a larger sum in any one year than would meet the sinking fund we have to provide towards the payment of our indebtedness there, and the interest upon our indebtedness for that expenditure; then it might very well be placed to capital account, but until that point is reached, I think we are justified in placing it as hon. gentlemen opposite did, and as Sir Leonard Tilley did till 1881, to revenue account, and I have therefore proposed for the present and future to deal with it in that manner, calling it and using it as so much revenue, instead of increasing the taxation in order to meet our wants."

Mr. McLELAN.

That was the proposition that I made to the House and that was agreed to by the House; and although the hon. gentleman was present, and although he knows the custom that had been pursued by himself and Sir Leonard Tilley, yet he now comes down and says that because these are charged to the surplus, there has been a cooking of the accounts. Sir, I will tell the hon. gentleman what would be a cooking of the accounts. If Parliament makes a particular grant to be charged to capital or income, and that is sanctioned by Parliament, it would be a cooking of the account to transfer it, contrary to the orders of Parliament, to some other direction; and the House will remember that when the hon. gentleman came into office in 1874, and a large sum had been passed by the preceding Parliament to capital account for the purpose, I think, of changing the gauge of the railway, the hon. gentleman, in order to diminish the surplus that Sir Leonard Tilley left behind him, charged this amount, which Parliament had declared should be charged to capital, to income, in order to reduce the amount. That, Sir, is what may be called cooking the accounts, doing that which Parliament declared should not be done. Now, the hon. gentleman two or three times in his speech, and in all the speeches he has delivered to this House this Session, and I may say in almost any speech of any length which he delivered to this House in any Session, makes the charge against the Government that they have driven many people out of this country. Why, Sir, one is almost amazed at the assertion of the hon. gentleman, when we look back to the period during which he administered the Government of this country and at the condition of the country during those five years, and when he has under his hand the proof that the people of this country went out during that period of depression by hundreds of thousands, and sought homes, and made a permanent settlement in the adjoining country. I have only to refer the hon. gentleman for an answer to all his assertions that we have driven people out of this country, to the statement made by his late leader in this House, on March 24, 1884. Mr. Blake, speaking of the loss that the Province of Quebec had incurred, said:

"The immigration of French Canadians to the Eastern States has, no doubt, assumed alarming proportions, in two respects—first, in the extent of the departure, and secondly, in the character of the exodus. It is proved by the very thorough examination that took place in the year 1882, under the instruction of the Legislature of Massachusetts into the question, that it has only been within the last ten or fifteen years that this immigration has assumed such large proportions in that part of the country. It was only within a much shorter period, five or six years before 1882, that it began to assume the character of a permanent settlement in the country to which these people went."

And if the hon. gentleman will take five or six years from 1882, he will get back to 1876 and 1877, when the hon. gentleman administered the affairs of this country without the remarkable wisdom and statesmanship which he now claims to possess. Now, the hon. gentleman spoke of the meeting of French Canadians in the United States at Lowell. One of the resolutions passed at that gathering of French Canadians recites as follows:

"Whereas, since the French Canadians have come to this section, they have reached a population of 400,000 in New England, and whereas a large number have become proprietors, paying large taxes, and whereas for the most part the young men propose to make their homes here; Resolved, that we protest against that portion of the report which says that we are a horde of industrial invaders. And whereas we have to live five years in the country before we can become citizens of this glorious Republic, and the French Canadians have been here in large numbers but five or six years."

That would bring them to 1836-7, when they reached a population of 400,000, and determined to become permanent residents of the United States, having been driven out of Canada by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. There is other evidence before that Commission of the Legislature to show that the French Canadians went to the States for employment, and that finding employment there, and having no hope of ever being employed in their own country, while hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, they determined to remain in their adopted home. The hon. gentleman has said that we are losing our very best men, the men that statesmen desire to retain in a country. Well, the hon. gentleman has here the proof that 460,000 went out in 1876 and 1877, under his administration, seeking labor in the United States, which his policy denied him at home. I find by the United States census that there were in the United States in 1880, including all these that the hon. gentleman drove out, 36,385 operatives in the cotton mills, 6,096 blacksmiths, 7,581 shoemakers, 3,447 brick and tile makers, 15,036 carpenters and joiners, 5,000 railway employees, 50,000 laborers not specified, 22,000 domestic servants, 21,000 laborers, 2,000 harness and saddle makers. So that the hon. gentleman, by his policy, drove out these men and women to work in the workshops of the United States. Following these there went out 1,379 traders, 1,520 doctors, besides lawyers and clergymen; and in addition to all these, there went out 50,000 farmers to supply the wants of those who were driven from this country to the United States. We have changed that policy. We are seeking to furnish employment to our own people in our own country; we are seeking to keep our own operatives and artisans and agriculturists at home. The hon. gentleman, before declaiming so loudly against the present Government for having helped the exodus, should consider that under his own policy he drove out of the country from 400,000 to 500,000 people, and gave a permanent character to the exodus to the United States. The hon. gentleman complains we are now in a bad position because there has been a grant given to Prince Edward Island last year, and he complained that we had taken in British Columbia, which he urges was entirely premature. I would have thought that, backed up as he is by the little Province of Prince Edward Island, the hon. gentleman would have had a good word to say on behalf of that Province, whatever maledictions he might use against the Province of British Columbia. Then he said that there were great demands upon the Government for bridges across our great rivers and for harbor improvements, &c. Well, the hon. gentleman has given this House to understand that, under any policy he might adopt, there shall be no aid given to public works, either railway bridges or any other public work in the country, should he again assume the reins of power. The hon. gentleman has referred to the controllable expenditure of the country, and has compared, I regret to say, not fairly, the controllable expenditure of Canada with that of Great Britain and the United States. The hon. gentleman seems to take on all occasions a special delight in contrasting our condition with that of the United States, always endeavoring to make the contrast appear to our disadvantage. We have had speeches from the hon. gentleman in which he desires connection with the United States, and represents Canada in such a destitute condition that it would be the greatest exercise of charity on the part of the United States, if they would take into their Union such an impoverished country as he represents us to be. But he goes on to make this comparison between the controllable expenditure of this country and that of the United States, and he says:

"You will recollect, Mr. Speaker, that we were told that no economy could be practised; no substantial economy could be practised in the affairs of Canada."

Then he refers to his own record from 1874 to 1879, how he cut down the expenses in that period, but he did not tell us how far he came from meeting expenditure with revenue, and what was the deficit. In this comparison he cuts down the controllable expenditure of the United States from $75,000,000 to $54,000,000, and builds up the expenditure of Canada in all possible ways. For the purpose of comparison, he puts in our expenditure on Indians, $1,200,000, and on mounted police, $800,000, or $2,000,000 together, as a controllable expenditure which could be reduced. The hon. gentleman knows something of the history of the Indians on the other side. He knows that there is always a special grant, a very large sum provided for the maintenance and care of the Indians, and for guarding against the inroads of the Indians there, and he knows something of the enormous cost to that country of the Indian wars that from time to time have been waged there. There was a return called for in the United States on the 24th January, 1882, showing the cost of the Indian wars for the ten years from 1873 to 1882, and it foots up an amount of $223,891,264 that the people of the United States have had to pay for Indian wars during the period of ten years. Now that we have provided a large sum for the maintenance of the Indians, and have provided $800,000 for the maintenance of the mounted police to keep them in check and in good behavior, $2,000,000 in all, the hon. gentleman puts that in the column of controllable expenditures which he says should be reduced. Then he puts in lighthouses, $600,000. I suppose, under his wise and economical statesmanship, he would put out the lights of every lighthouse, and save that expenditure. Then there is the protection of the fisheries, $400,000. My hon. friend near me says that the hon. gentleman would make all things dark. He has been blackening the picture from the time he first entered Parliament until the last speech he has made; he has always been making the blackest possible picture of this country. You may go over this list which the hon. gentleman would compare with the expenditure of the United States and of Great Britain, and he says that we are expending an enormous proportion greater than the expenditure of Great Britain and the United States in matters which are controllable, and therefore, he says we are enormously extravagant, because that expenditure is $12,950,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You are getting mixed. That is for Canada.

Mr. McLELAN. I find that he says:

"I find in England, excluding services of education and similar services, and their legal expenditure, I find their civil list amounts to £1,000,000 sterling, their public works, £1,708,000, their civil departments, £2,468,000, with which we have nothing to compare."

He takes that out.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are some reporter's errors in one or two lines there, and the hon. gentleman may be deluded by that; but I will tell him, if he likes, what I did say.

Mr. McLELAN. I am glad to find that the hon. gentleman has been mis-reported, and that there is no necessity for me to refer him to the speech of the Hon. Edward Blake, and especially to that line which is printed in large capital letters, "dishonest and absurd."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman want to know what I did say as to the expenditure? I will tell him, if he likes, as he seems to be very much mixed as to what I did say. He is quoting an erroneous report of my speech.

Mr. McLELAN. I accept the statement that that report is erroneous, and therefore there is no necessity to pursue that further, but I say that, if you make a proper comparison with the United States and Great Britain, considering the extent of the country over which we administer the Government, the comparison is not unfavorable to our country. But the hon. gentleman complained that the Finance Minister had not said anything about the Canadian Pacific Railway and the obligations which he says will be thrown upon the country in consequence of that arrangement. The hon. gentleman should have waited until that question was before the House before he made his complaint, and should have heard the explanation which the hon. gentleman will be able to give, the satisfactory explanation that he will give, that there is really no responsibility entailed upon the revenues of the country by the arrangement we have made. Why, the press of the hon. gentleman himself, when the terms were first made public, declared that the arrangement was as favorable as could be expected, and there was really no obligation thrown upon the country. The hon. gentleman comes back to the question of the taxation of the poor man, and he has been there so often and has been striving so long to excite our sympathy on behalf of the farmer and the laboring man, that one would think he was weary of the task he has undertaken. He wants to know what is free and what is untaxed in this country. I tell the hon. gentleman that, in regard to the necessities of life for the laboring man and the farmer, there are more articles untaxed or more lightly taxed than there were under his administration. The hon. gentleman says that we can get old masters free and rough diamonds free, and then he goes on to say, what about sugar? The hon. gentleman makes an enquiry about sugar. I should like to ask him, what about sugar? I am glad that the hon. gentleman is seeking for information. I hardly expected, after the declaration that he had made that he was able to grapple with this great problem of the taxation of the country, that he would come down to this House and confess his ignorance upon the sugar question. Still, there is no man in this country that should more earnestly seek for information upon the sugar question than the hon. gentleman opposite. That hon. gentleman had a teacher at one time; he had an old master at one time. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) undertook to give him some instruction at one time on the sugar question, and I supposed that, having that hon. gentleman behind him, he would not have found it necessary to appeal to this side of the House for information on the sugar question. In 1877, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), then supporting the hon. member, delivered himself thus on the Tariff debate:

"There was another point to which attention had been directed, and that was the sugar duties. He ventured to say it was a question regarding which the people might have expected legislation at the hands of the Government. An article of that importance, from which a large amount of revenue was collected, ought to have been more prominently referred to, considering the opportunity the Government had had for collecting information in regard to it."

You will see how the hon. member for Halifax berates the hon. gentleman for not having collected information on the sugar question during recess.

"He was aware that the Government might say they did not feel in a position to try an experiment in the present condition of the revenue."

The hon. gentleman now is ready to try an experiment, to the sacrifice of three-fourths of our customs duties; but in 1876, in his own budget speech, he says: "It is no time to try experiments;" and the hon. member for Halifax, sitting beside him, says perhaps that was the reason he did not operate. But he says:

"They might have proposed it if they had taken the trouble to consider the information submitted to them."

It seems to me that the senior member for Halifax had been endeavoring to furnish him, and had furnished him, Mr. McLELAN.

information which he did not even take the trouble to consider upon that question.

"He thought the sugar interest had not been fairly treated in that respect. Every hon. member in business knew that the Government had laid down a rule that certain articles purchased in the United States could not be introduced in this country."

I will not trouble the House by reading the whole of this speech, but he says:

"If the Government had applied that same principle to sugar, he would not have complained; but the principle applied to the manufacturers had been refused to the sugar refiners. The sugar interest demanded some consideration, because, if some legislation did not speedily take place, he was afraid we were going to lose a large trade with the West Indies. That trade, in the Maritime Provinces, at the present moment, involved from three to four million dollars a year, but the inevitable result of the present policy would be to drive the whole trade to the United States. We sent our vessels with outward cargoes, which were sold in the West Indies, and they were obliged to take the sugar to the United States to have it refined. Cargoes of sugar pass through the Boston refineries, and in twenty-four to thirty-six hours were exported into Canada again, under a bounty of 50 per cent. Such a system could not continue very long. In a short time when the Americans found out that they had destroyed our trade, they would dictate their own terms, and then it would be seen how disastrous the present policy was."

Then he goes on to quote Lord Derby's views upon the same question. So the senior member for Halifax, in 1877, recognised the ignorance of the hon. gentleman upon the sugar question, and sought, as one of the old masters, to give him instructions upon it; but he seems not to have been successful. The hon. gentleman comes down now and says: What about sugar? Well, Sir, I will tell the hon. gentleman, first, that we are not taxing sugar now nearly so high as he taxed it from 1874 to 1879.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Oh!

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman says 'Oh.' I have given him some information. It seems that more than one hon. gentleman on that side of the House desires to receive information on the sugar question. In 1878, we imported 109,000,000 lbs. of sugar, and upon that there was paid in duty $2,783,605. In 1887, we imported 2,466,000 lbs of sugar, and the duty upon that, nearly double what it was in 1878, was $3,245,347.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How much did the refiners get?

Mr. McLELAN. Well, you go down and ask the poor man, ask every man how much he paid for his sugar from 1874 to 1879, and how much he paid during the year 1887, and he will tell you that there is a very perceptible difference in favor of the present period. Now, Sir, if we had imported at the same rate of duty last year that we did in 1878, the duty would have amounted to $5,003,476, or an increase of $1,758,127. Therefore, if we had the same rate of duty upon sugar last year that we did in 1878, we would have received $1,750,000 more of duty. Then there is the article of tea. If we had taxed it as the hon. gentleman taxed it, there would have been another million of revenue. But, Sir, I am sure he amused the House and he amused the country with the calculation he made as to the amount of taxation upon the poor man's family in consequence of this iniquitous tariff. He commences with the sugar question, and he tells us that the mechanic, the laboring man, who only earns $400 a year, consumes 182 lbs. of sugar in a year, or for a family of five, 900 lbs. of sugar, or nearly half a ton.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You had better read what I said, then you will not fall into such a blunder.

Mr. McLELAN. I will read what he said:

"I have made a sort of rough average of the amount of taxation paid in Canada by an ordinary mechanic receiving that income, and having a wife and three or four children. I find that such a family will consume 2 lbs. of sugar a day."

Two lbs. of sugar a day, 365 days in a year, for a family of four, half a pound a day to each one, 180 lbs. of sugar.

Why, Sir, the average consumption of sugar in the Dominion of Canada for a family, on the average, rich or poor, is only about 40 lbs., and the hon. gentleman would, in his kindness, give to this poor man 180 lbs. of sugar, in order to swell up that $48 a year of taxation upon the poor man. But this is not the limit of his generosity to the poor man. He says that down in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, after he had imposed $48 duty upon the poor man for sugar, on dried fruits, and all these other luxuries, he says that in St. John, and I suppose in all the Maritime Provinces, they pay $8 or $10 a head more for their flour. Why, Sir, $10 a head would give the poor man twenty barrels of flour. His late leader, Mr. Blake, went down to the Maritime Provinces, where he carried the poor man's shirt, containing nine yards, and the hon. gentleman goes down to the Maritime Provinces with 180 lbs. of sugar for the poor man, and 20 barrels of flour for a family. Why, Sir, that is four barrels apiece. We are about a million people in the Maritime Provinces, and according to the hon. gentleman the Province of Ontario supplies us with about 4,000,000 barrels of flour. Good for the Province of Ontario. But, Mr. Speaker, the reality is, so far as I can make the calculation, that there are only about a million barrels of flour going down from the Province of Ontario to the three lower Provinces. What is the use of following these calculations any further? $48 and $50 a head for every head of a family, represents $50,000,000 of revenue collected on these articles. I suppose my hon. friend the Finance Minister will be very glad to get so much revenue in order to wipe out the deficits which the hon. gentleman incurred from 1874 to 1879. Then he goes to the west. He is not so generous there because he tells them they are taxed on iron, and he puts it as if the iron duty enters the soul of every poor man in the North-West. He says that a man in Manitoba who builds a house requires two tons of iron. He says he requires $86 worth, which would be equal to two tons and a quarter. The hon. gentlemen's mind must have been running over to Dakota, to that country of cyclones and tornadoes, where the people have to secure their houses. I remember, when I was down in Nova Scotia, meeting the wife of one of my constituents who had gone to Dakota. She was visiting there, and in reply to questions she said she liked the country pretty well, except the tornadoes. She was asked what they did when tornadoes came. She replied that they built a cellar in which to go. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) evidently thought that the houses had to be iron fastened to meet tornadoes such as they had in Dakota. Then there was a ton and a half of iron for the barn, and so on. I am afraid, if I had not made a promise not to describe the hon. gentleman's speech as intolerable rubbish, I would now feel compelled to say that it was intolerable rubbish to talk to intelligent farmers, mechanics and laborers as to the taxes imposed on a family consuming 180 lbs. of sugar and 20 barrels of flour and requiring two tons of iron to secure the house and one and a-half tons of iron to secure the barn, and so on. But the hon. gentleman said that this tariff would destroy the export trade, and he says that his friend Mr. Paterson had time and again referred to it. His friend Mr. Paterson had a little story that we have never disturbed. In 1878 the Norwegians had a craze for buying old ships, and they came to Canada and bought $1,250,000 worth of old ships, and that was placed in the returns as exports, by which the returns for 1878 were increased, so that Mr. Paterson has been able to make a favorable comparison with 1886 and 1887; and I suppose in a short time we shall have the same Norwegian ships trotted out again to do duty on this occasion. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) also stated there had been a great reduction in the volume of trade. On every point to which the hon. gentleman refers his own record stands as condemnation of the words he utters, and it is no wonder he wishes to go back to 1874 to wipe out the record for that period. Let me trouble the House with a reference to our trade, and I will only refer to that with the United States. I go back as far as 1854, and I had some papers prepared some time ago by the statistical officer of the Customs Department of the values of the imports from the United States of articles enumerated in the Reciprocity Treaty, from 1855 to 1886 inclusive. The total value in those twelve years was $520,278,650. In the next twelve years, from 1867 to 1878 inclusive, the value had run up, not decreased, as has been stated time and time again by hon. gentlemen opposite, to $337,589,194. If you take the next twelve years, allowing for the three years at the same rate as the nine years that have passed, the value of trade with the United States will reach $1,000,000,000. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite have been all the time declaring that our trade had dropped away to almost nothing, and that we should obtain unrestricted reciprocity with the United States in order that it might increase by leaps and bounds. We should be pretty well content with our trade, considering we are supplying so largely our own people, as is evidenced by the importation of raw material for manufactures. We ought to be content, moreover, with our trade, especially when we contrast it with that of the great country which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) wishes us to join, in order to increase our trade. In 1887 the total value of imports to the United States was $752,000,000, exports $725,000,000, total $1,472,000,000, which, for 60,000,000 of people, gave $21.63 per head. The value of Canadian imports was $112,000,000, exports $89,000,000, total $201,000,000, giving $40.48 per head. While the per capita trade of the United States was $24.63, that of Canada last year was $40.48. If the hon. gentleman will reduce the number of our inhabitants from 4,800,000, as he wishes to do, and place it at 4,600,000, that will give a total value of $44 per head; so I think we should be content with the progress we are making, and the manner in which we are progressing. The hon. member for South Oxford says that all we have to do is to obtain unrestricted reciprocity with the United States and our export trade will go forward by leaps and bounds. The hon. gentleman has not pointed out the articles that we can export to the United States in order to build up that great trade, unless there are included exports of articles through the United States to the old country that now go by the St. Lawrence and are shipped from our own ports. The hon. gentlemen has told us that we have two customers, the United States and Great Britain. As was shown by the Finance Minister, and by almost every hon. gentleman who spoke on this side of the House, the articles of which we have a large surplus for export are the very articles of which the United States has a large surplus to export. I have before used an illustration of this, and it has been used elsewhere, but I may perhaps be permitted to give it on this occasion. The measure of the United States in the staple articles, of animals and their products, and of grain of all kinds is full and overflowing. Our cup is also full and overflowing; and is it common sense that, their cup being full and overflowing, we should, as the best outlet for our overflow, put our surplus into that cup already overflowing? No, we should pursue that course we have followed in the past, of facilitating exports direct to the mother country, the land that requires them. We should by all possible means cheapen the cost of transportation to the sea in order to benefit our agriculturists. But the hon. gentleman says: There are the great cities of the United States, New York, Chicago and Boston, all of which are ready to take the products of our farmers. The hon. gentleman did not tell us there were American farmers all around those cities, in closer proximity than are our people. He tells us that it is unwise to build up our own cities, and that we are building up Toronto, Montreal, Halifax and Quebec at the expense of the rural population. The hon. gentleman would strike down every industry in this country and tell the farmers that they may send their products to the United States. He ought to have told them, however, that one city within their reach does more to increase the value of their lands than a hundred cities many miles distant from them. There is an article in Scribner's Statistical Record which I want to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to. It is respecting the value of farms; and he said a good deal here about the value of lands, and tried to make out apparently that the value of lands in Ontario had decreased. I do not think it is worth while to discuss the question as to whether Mr. Blue or the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is the more accurate in his figures, but the fact remains that in the North-West during the period which he refers to there have been sales of $20,000,000 worth of land, a large portion of which has been paid in cash either to the Government or the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The following is the quotation which I wish to refer to:

"The gross value of farms is greatest in Ohio; New York follows, then Illinois, and Pennsylvania. The value per acre ranges highest in the densely populated States of the North Atlantic group, gradually decreasing westward throughout the Northern Central group. Southward, the value decreases greatly, the lands of the cotton States barely averaging five dollars per acre with the improvements.

"The highest value per acre accompanies the densest population, and the greatest relative importance of manufactures and other industries. In other words, the greater the proportional number of inhabitants dependent upon other industries than agriculture, the greater the value of agricultural property consequent, of course, upon the higher prices resulting from the greater demand for farm products, and their more complete utilization. Much that is waste in a sparsely settled agricultural region, has a commercial value in cities and towns. Straw, burned as of no value in one place, sells readily where population is denser."

The hon. gentleman will see, and the country will see, that by his striking down the manufacturing industries of the Dominion; by his being willing to sweep them out entirely with one blow, he would do more to depreciate the value of lands in this country, by driving away all the artisans, and mechanics, and laborers, and those who purchase the farmers' products, than has ever been done by any policy previously enunciated. The hon. gentleman perhaps will deny that he wants to give over the manufacturers. We have been told in this House this Session, that it is useless to have upon the Statute-book an offer of reciprocity in natural products in the present state of the country. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says: You have not the right bait on your hook; and another hon. member says: It is only playing with the question to make this offer. But, Sir, they are going to bribe the Americans by giving over to them all the manufacturing industries of this country, and as the bait is not sufficient the hon. member for Norfolk says: We will bait the hook with the manufacturer, we will give you free access to our markets; and if the Americans cannot see that they will take the entire manufacturing industries of the country there would be no inducement for them to accept his challenge. The hon. member for South Oxford wanted to shut down all the manufacturing industries of the country, but he made one exception. If you turn to that resolution of the hon. gentleman you will find this one exception, and that is that all the manufacturing industries of the country were to be swept away except the distilleries. He accepts the excise duties; he protects the manufacturer and distiller of ardent spirits and beer, in the country. The man who spins cotton, the man who smelts iron, and the man who digs coal and performs all the other duties of life necessary for the production of articles may be sacrificed, but the man who distills ardent spirits and makes whiskey and beer must be protected. Why, Sir, a short time previously, when the Dominion Alliance was in session here, the hon. gentleman advocated that we ought to amend the

Mr. McLELAN,

Temperance Act in order to have prohibition, but now he comes forward with this resolution which would protect the distillers of whiskey and the manufacturers of beer; and those are the only manufacturers that he proposes to protect in the whole land. Mr. Speaker, I have only one or two more points to refer to. The hon. gentleman was good enough to quote, in answer to the Minister of Finance, some remarks from President Cleveland, and in those remarks President Cleveland is advocating free trade. He is advocating a reduction of duties in order to reduce the price of goods. The hon. gentleman wants free trade with the United States. He wants our articles admitted free, our lumber, our barley, and so forth, and at the same time he furnishes a proof to the House that that freedom will reduce the price. Now, Mr. Speaker, he has given in evidence that in those articles that they require the people of the United States pay the duty on the articles which they receive from Canada. The hon. gentleman concludes by referring to the debt, and he says the debt has grown to enormous proportions and that we have nothing to show for it, except assets so unprofitable that they cost about a million of dollars to take care of. Well, Sir, I have not looked over the list of assets lately, but I dare say there are some assets there for which the hon. gentleman is responsible, and there are some of our assets that I do not think we expend much money for taking care of. I do not see anything in the Public Accounts for taking care of the locks at Fort Francis, and I do not see anything charged for taking care of the Neebing Hotel and a great many other things that the hon. gentleman is responsible for. When the hon. gentleman talks of the increase of the public indebtedness of this country and of our having no assets for it, I suppose he refers to his own deficits from 1875 to 1879-80, amounting in all to about $7,900,000, for which he is responsible. I suppose he includes in all indebtedness for which we have no assets, the four and a half millions discounts, which he lost upon the bonds which he sold in Great Britain. I did expect, Sir, that an ex-Finance Minister, standing up here and representing a Government that had increased the public indebtedness at the rate of about $8,000,000 a year for five years, and had comparatively nothing to show for it, would have been a little more careful in speaking of the public indebtedness. Why, Sir this Government is able to show good assets for all its expenses. It may be that some of our public works, such as our canals and our railroads, on which we have expended large sums of money, are not worked at such rates as to yield large profits, as is the case in some other countries. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the Australian colonies—and he has sometimes referred to them to show that some of their public works are productive—he will find that the railroad charges there are equal to a tax of about $10 a head on the people of the country. If we worked our railroads and canals at similar high rates of charges, we should have a large income from them; but the policy we have been pursuing is to cheapen the rates of transportation to the seaboard to the farmers of the west, in order that they may compete with the farmers of the United States in the markets of the world. Now, Sir, without detaining the House at greater length, I may just say that if the rules of this House permitted me to move an amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford, I should be very glad to do it, and I would do it, Sir, something in this form:

That during five years, from 1874 to 1879, the present member for South Oxford, Sir Richard Cartwright, was, as Finance Minister, mainly responsible for the fiscal policy and administration of Canada. That previous to this, and from the date of Confederation, the Public Accounts show, each and every year, a surplus amounting in all to $11,075,063.39.

That the condition of the country when handed over to the member for South Oxford, as Finance Minister in the Reform Administration, was such that in the first year and before the effects of the change were fully felt there was a further surplus of $935,644, making the total surpluses $12,010,707.

That thereafter and for every year for which he arranged the tariff and expenditure, there was, notwithstanding he materially increased the taxation on general goods and levied duties on tea and coffee, a deficit, as also in the following year (the country not having recovered from the effects of his policy) amounting to $7,970,181.27.

That when the effects of the National Policy were felt upon the business of the country, the Public Accounts again show a surplus, continuous down to the latest, 1887, except in the years affected by the North-West troubles, making a grand total surplus of $30,375,382.

That the net debt of Canada, on the 30th June, 1887, was, as shown by the Public Accounts. $227,313,911
From which, if we deduct the amount allowed to the Provinces to cover their indebtedness and to provide revenue..... 106,472,034

There remain..... $120,841,877

As the net debt incurred by the Federal Government for Dominion purposes, accounted for as follows:—

Intercolonial Railway and extension..... $33,335,971
Canadian Pacific Railway..... 61,760,785
Purchase of Canadian Pacific Railway lands..... 10,198,520
Deficits occurring from the policy of Sir Richard Cartwright..... 7,970,181
Losses on his several loans..... 4,500,000
Purchase from Hudson Bay Company of North-West, and organisation of territory..... 2,920,000

Thus making a total of..... $120,685,457

That it appears that the total indebtedness incurred by the Dominion for federal purposes is covered by the purchase of the North-West, the construction of the great national highway from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific, and the deficits arising from the policy of the member for South Oxford, and the losses or discounts on the loans he negotiated; whilst under the administration of the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, for fifteen years, the ordinary revenues have met the general wants of the country, and permitted a large expenditure on public buildings, harbor improvements and aid to railways, as well as to meet expenses of the troubles in the North-West.

That in this latter period as well as in the former, under Sir John A. Macdonald, the country has made great advances, as shown by a comparison of some of the returns of 1873-79, with those of 1887:—

BANK AND DOMINION NOTES IN CIRCULATION.

1879..... $23,881,324
1887..... 45,502,987

An increase in 8 years of..... $16,621,663

1879

Deposits in chartered banks..... $63,635,932
" savings and loan companies..... 9,426,148
" Government savings banks..... 14,702,715

$87,764,795

1887.

Deposits in chartered banks..... $107,154,483
" savings and loan companies..... 17,712,885
" Government savings banks..... 50,944,785

$175,812,153

An increase in 8 years of..... $88,047,358

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. It appears to me that the hon. Minister is adopting an indirect mode of reading a speech.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot see that the rule would apply in this instance.

Mr. McLELAN—

That the money order system of the post office has grown from $6,788,723 in 1879, to $10,328,934 in 1887, an increase of $3,540,261; whilst the correspondence through the post office (the best possible test of commercial activity) in the same period, has risen from 50,840,000 letters and post cards in 1879, to 90,650,000 in 1887.

That the agriculturists have benefited in having the supply of an increased home market, as shown by the fact that the value of grain imported has fallen, in the period already referred to (1879-1887) from $9,882,315, to $3,630,247, a considerable portion of the latter amount representing Indian corn for distillation; whilst the importations of all articles of food and drink which

In 1879 amounted to..... $26,610,728
In 1887 amounted only to..... 13,107,286

Showing a reduction of..... $13,533,442 and a corresponding increase of expenditure among our farmers.

That our agriculturists have not only supplied this largely increased home market, but have also maintained a large export trade in grains, and, in addition, increased the exports of animals and their products from $14,100,604 in 1879, to $24,246,937 in 1887.

45-1888-2

That the miles of railway in operation in 1887, and the movement in freight and passengers thereby, are nearly double what they were in 1879, whilst the traffic by water has also largely increased.

That the enormous increase of business as shown by the foregoing comparisons, has been conducted on a more healthy basis than that of the period from 1874 to 1879, during which the business failures were, in each and every year, greater in amount than the entire revenues of the country, averaging $28,627,000, whilst in the subsequent period the average has been $11,572,330.

That notwithstanding the expenditure in the completion of a great interprovincial highway from ocean to ocean, and numerous other works, all tending to develop the country by promoting internal trade and intercourse, and cheapening transport of agricultural products to the seaboard, the taxation levied on the country in the last fiscal year, in which every obligation was met, has only averaged an increase of three quarters of one per cent. per year a head in customs and excise over 1875, under the taxation imposed by Sir Richard Cartwright in customs, excise and stamps.

That whilst the credit of Canada has never suffered as did that of the United States for a period of years—the value of $100 currency being, at one time (July, 1864) only $38 00 in gold—nor as did that of Great Britain during the closing years of the last and the opening ones of the present century, yet it suffered so much in the hands of the member for South Oxford that the unguaranteed bonds sold by him in 1874 and 1876, amounting to $31,633,333, netted him only $28,064,770, while, under a changed policy and the improved condition of our credit thence resulting, these same bonds now command a premium of from 13 to 15 per cent., or, in round numbers, $8,000,000 more than the member for South Oxford sold them at.

That eminent statistical authorities—such as Sir John Gorst, Under Secretary for India—after elaborate investigation have declared that amongst the countries of the world, Canada stands third in respect to her ability to secure investors in her funds, only paying six pence per cent. more than the United States and £1 1s. 3d. per cent. less than France; whilst the London Economist, in an elaborate presentation of British investments in the colonies shows that the external burdens per head of Australia were 3½ times those of Canada.

That, with this high standing, maintained until the maturity of our outstanding bonds, there will be a difficulty in placing upon the market other loans for their redemption at such a reduced rate of interest as will be practically equivalent to an extinction of at least $50,000,000 of the country's indebtedness."

That this House views with just pride and gratification this high position which the Dominion of Canada has attained, as well as the extremely rapid progress it has made since the adoption of the policy of protection to home industries, and would impress upon the Government the duty it owes to the country, to all farmers, day-laborers, mechanics, artisans and factory operatives, to guard that policy from the machinations of those who are seeking, under the name of unrestricted reciprocity, to give over to the Americans the entire manufacturing industries of Canada, except that of intoxicants, and to impose a burdensome and relentless system of direct taxation upon the people.

That is the amendment to the amendment which I would desire to place before the House, if the rules of the House permitted. But I would not desire to do so because of any need on the part of the Government to receive instructions as to the performance of their duty of protecting the industries of the people. The Government received the mandate of the people, in 1878, to protect our home industries. The voice of 1882 repeated that mandate, and the people's command given in 1887 was that we should continue our policy of protection. This Government will discharge the high duty imposed on it by the people of this country, by doing what lies in our power to protect our industries, to give employment to our people, and to develop the great resources with which this country is blessed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I rise for the purpose of suggesting to the House that, at this late period of the Session, we should reach the question at as early a moment as possible. The hon. member for South Oxford gave a very elaborate review of the financial statement which I considered it my duty to lay before the House. My hon. friend the Postmaster General has replied to that speech, and thus the views of both sides are, I consider, very fairly and fully before the country. I hope, therefore, that at this late period of the Session the House will be disposed to allow the debate to rest there, and that we will at once be enabled to reach a division that will show the views of every hon. gentleman in this House, and then proceed with the business of the Session.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. the Finance Minister, has certainly paid a very great compliment to my

hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), by the request he has just made. The hon. gentleman, having an army of clerks at his disposal, knowing precisely the line of argument he had to take, and the tables he required, and having every facility at his disposal for the preparation of these tables, gave to the House an elaborate speech on the Budget. My hon. friend from South Oxford had to rise in reply as soon as the hon. gentleman took his seat; and he was of course at the disadvantage of having to answer to a line of argument which he could not have been aware beforehand would be taken, and to tables which were new to him and to the House. My hon. friend has been followed to-day by the late Finance Minister (Mr. McLelan) in a speech of about two hours in length—a speech in reply to my hon. friend, which he had four days to prepare—and after the delivery of that speech, the hon., the Finance Minister (Sir Charles Tupper) has risen in his place, and by the request he has made has declared to the House that he considers the speech delivered by the hon. member for South Oxford a speech equal in weight and importance to the combined efforts of his colleague, the ex-Finance Minister and himself. I have every confidence in the correctness of the position the hon. gentleman has taken, and I therefore do not intend troubling the House at any great length. I had some intention, considering that the hon. the First Minister the other night was kind enough to adjourn the House at a very early hour at the request of the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. McLelan) who desired to have from Friday night last until to-day to prepare a statement, or procure some one to prepare it, in reply to the speech of my hon. friend—I had some slight intention of asking the hon. the First Minister whether he should not grant me a similar favor and adjourn the House now, in order that I might have time to consider the amendment of the hon. the Postmaster General, which is ten times as long as that of my hon. friend from South Oxford. But the First Minister will no doubt agree with me that while the Postmaster General's amendment exceeds ten times the length of that of the hon. member for South Oxford, it contains only one-tenth of the sense of the latter, and, therefore, will not require so much time on my part to prepare a reply to it. The hon. the Postmaster General is of a poetic and a visionary turn of mind. He gave us to-day to understand, as he did in a celebrated financial speech of two years ago, that he has seen visions and dreamt dreams. To-day, however, his reasons have taken the shape of snakes and blossoms, and he has seen snakes hidden in the blossoms. The last time he addressed us he saw blossoms without snakes; he saw blossoms, and wedding parties, and cradles, and babies, that would come up and pay the taxes. We are delighted always to hear of the visions which the hon. gentleman sees, and when he is in dreamland he is certainly much more interesting than when he undertakes to descend to the plain world of facts and figures. Then he is apt to be confused, but he is to be forgiven, because it would require a man of much larger mental calibre than the hon. gentleman to do that which he undertakes to do; but, if he does undertake that task, he ought to show a little modesty, and then he would not render himself a subject for the remarks, a little severe or a little sarcastic, of those who may happen to follow him. What did the hon. gentleman tell us when he was alluding to the speech of my hon. friend? He alluded to a remark which was interjected when the Finance Minister was referring to the time during which my hon. friend occupied the position of Minister of Finance, and said that he would like to go back to 1874, and he said he supposed he would like to go back there to rectify the errors he had made, which I suppose meant to wipe out the deficit which occurred during that period. Was it not a piece of assurance on the part of the hon. gentleman to refer to the state of the finances at that time? If he remembers the state of the finances under his own administration, is it not a piece of assurance for him to talk about deficits? Can he venture to refer to deficits under the administration of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) with a tariff of 17½ per cent., and compare that with his tariff, ranging on an average to 22½ per cent., when he himself as Finance Minister had to come down to the House and confess to a deficit of two and a quarter millions in one year, and afterwards to a deficit which he expected would turn out, and which did as a matter of fact turn out, to be one of $6,000,000; that is, that he had in one year a deficit amounting to more than the deficits of the combined years of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). But he found it necessary to bring that question before the House and to suggest that my hon. friend would like to go back to 1874 in order to remedy the errors which he made when he administered the finances of this country. I think the less they say about deficits the better. Then the hon. gentleman tells us, and he seemed to think it was a very weighty argument, and he attempted to be very funny and to be very sarcastic in reference to my hon. friend from South Oxford, in pointing to the fact that he had represented different constituencies at different times. I do not know that that is any discredit to that hon. gentleman, but, on the contrary, I think it shows that he is appreciated in every part of this country. I have never thought it necessary to find fault with the change of constituencies on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. If it was found necessary in the case of the hon. the First Minister to change his constituency, and that is no reflection upon him, but rather a compliment paid to the worth in which he is held in the different Provinces of the Dominion, when it was found that a seat could be obtained for him on the Pacific coast. Any of us may lose his seat, and I know that, under the pressure which hon. gentlemen have been good enough to put me to I have had enough work to hold mine. Of course, I do not think that my position or my attainments would warrant another seat being found for me, as it was for the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright); but, when I find that seats can be provided for prominent politicians, I think it is rather a testimony given by the people of the country that they recognise that there is great worth in the gentlemen for whom they make place, that it is recognised on all hands, and that it is not simply in the interest of any particular riding, but in the interest of this great Dominion of ours, that certain individuals should have a seat in the House. But I will ask the hon. gentleman who took his seat just now, who attempts in a side way to cast ridicule on my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), because he has represented different constituencies, if he thinks the adoption of such means as the late election trial in Colchester showed were adopted there, would not secure election in almost any county. I do not think that the record in that case is of such a nature that it need be referred to very much, or that the hon. gentleman need speak of the permanence of seats of hon. members on either side of this House. Then the hon. gentleman referred to the statement made by my hon. friend as to the extraordinary exodus of our citizens to the neighboring Republic. He admitted the fact of the exodus, but he attempted to show how it came about, and he was not aware that he proved that it was only after the introduction of the National Policy, these States of the Union obtained such an influx of Canadians. That exodus has increased, as his statement showed, and has been intensified, as has been demonstrated on the floor of Parliament, Session after Session, and never refuted successfully by hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not wish to thresh that subject out again, but I will remind the hon. gentleman that the figures which have been used by the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) are based on reliable data supplied by the officers of the Government themselves. That is the case also in regard to the lamentable failure of the Government's policy in the North-West, and the hon. gentleman may remember that the First Minister himself expected that we would have had this year 400,000 or 500,000 souls there, whereas we had scarcely 108,000. In the Province of Manitoba, according to the calculation of the First Minister, we should have had last year 45,000 or 50,000 people going into that Province, but the records show that we only added to the population about 7,000. With these records before us, and with the census which was taken in 1885 and 1886, I think it is well for those hon. gentlemen to leave that part of the speech of my hon. friend alone, because it is unrefuted unless they can change the statements which have been given to the country. Then, the hon. gentleman referred to the question of taxation, and he waxed very witty, or thought he waxed very witty, as to the amount of sugar consumed by the people of this country. He referred to the statement in the Hansard, and my hon. friend asked him to read the context. He professed to do so, and members on the other side cheered him. The member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is correctly reported in the official debates with one exception. It is stated that the amount of sugar consumed per head of a family is 2 lbs. a day, and that the taxation is $5 per annum. If the hon. gentleman had any knowledge at all of finance, or if he were willing to bring that knowledge to bear on this point, he would know that, when the hon. member for South Oxford had stated that the amount of taxation that would come from each head of a family on the article of sugar would be $5 per annum, the amount of 2 lbs. per day must be wrong, that it must be an error either on the part of the Hansard reporter or in the printing office. What the hon. member for South Oxford said was not that the amount consumed was two lbs. per day for each family, but 200 lbs of sugar per annum, and that upon that the taxes would be $5. If the hon. gentleman understood figures, if he could grasp the simplest arithmetical problem, he would see that there must have been a mistake in the calculation of the amount of sugar consumed. Where is the laughter of hon. gentlemen now? They laughed at an error made by the Hansard reporter or in the printing office; they laughed at the fact that the taxes on that amount of 2 lbs. a day for each family would be $5 per annum, but I challenge that hon. gentleman or any hon. gentleman to show that a family of four or five persons do not pay that amount of taxes on their sugar in the course of the year. It is estimated that each person consumes 40 lbs. of sugar per annum. That, with five in a family, would be 200 lbs. The hon. gentleman knows that 2½ cents a pound, at least, is taken out of the people for every pound of sugar that is consumed. Why do not hon. gentlemen laugh now? The question was not the amount of sugar which was consumed, but the amount of taxes which was paid, and that was stated by my hon. friend to be $5 per annum, and was so reported in the Hansard. I challenge the hon. gentleman to show that it was any less. I need not follow him through his further statement, when he attempted to be funny again in reference to the cost of houses and barns. He ridicules the idea. Perhaps so, to hear these hon. gentlemen opposite talk as they often do talk, about the poor man not paying any taxes. This is the way they talk, and they go on to legislate in order that the poor man may escape taxes, they make him live the life of a pauper. If he settles in the North-West they do not allow him the conveniences that a settler ought to have. Sir, the figures are there, and let them worry over them as they see fit.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He thinks they use wooden pegs.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I suppose he would not have them use iron eave spouts on their houses, but nail a couple of boards together and in that way run the water off. That would be good enough for settlers in the North-West. Of course, what are settlers in the North-West for, except to pay taxes, any way, and build up the Canadian Pacific Railway? Then he goes on and he calls me by name, asking to be excused for having done so. I readily grant it. He says I have stated in the House that our export trade of manufactures had diminished. He says his answer to that is to be found in this fact that when Norwegians came over to Nova Scotia they used to buy the old ships and enter these in the Trade and Navigation Returns and now they do not do that, and so that accounted for the decrease of exports. The hon. member for Halifax tells me that he is not cognisant of any Norwegians having bought any old ships about Nova Scotia, but of course that is a matter that the hon. gentleman may know themselves. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that if he means to say that that wholly explains all the decrease in the exports of manufactured goods, I think he will find that he is entirely mistaken. Let him look through the list and see the manufactured articles, the export of which is being killed off by the National Policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. I know that. I live in a city where a large export trade had been done in a certain line, whereas they are driven out to-day under the taxation of hon. gentlemen opposite, and under the drawback that they pledged themselves, as a Government, to give that trade, and it is now about destroyed. And, Sir, that firm to-day are the most ardent advocates of a policy of unrestricted reciprocity that will give them access to the markets of the United States, not only where they may have a chance to sell, but where they can buy the raw material entering into their manufactures as cheaply as the American manufacturers can buy, with whom they have to fight in Brazil, in Australia, in Hungary, Chili, and other countries I could mention. Then he thought he was making one point against my hon. friend, because he said the resolution he had offered was a proposition to wipe out the manufacturers of this country, and it was to save the distillers. Very well, that might do for a little clap trap upon the public hustings, with a not too intelligent audience before you, but one would rather wonder to see a gentleman who has occupied the position of Finance Minister, and who may, for aught I know, be called upon to fill that position again, indulging in that kind of thing, in the Canadian House of Commons, in the presence of the people's representatives. Why, Sir, can he not comprehend that resolution? To save the distillers! Why, the very reason he has asked that they be left out is not for the purpose of taxing them that they are left out, not for the purpose of protecting them at all; it is that they may be taxed, not that they may be protected, not that they may be saved—and we protect the people through them. Well, now, I think I have gone all over the points except those that are recited in his amendment—I cannot remember all that was in it. I cannot be expected, of course, to take up all those points and allude to them, as it would be impossible to remember all that the hon. gentleman said. But I think he had some reference to his deficit, and some boasting with reference to the surpluses that they had had. It is true they had a surplus, but that surplus was just so much more money taken out of the pockets of the people of this country, that ought to have been left in them. It was just so much money taken from them in order to encourage a reckless Government and an extravagant Government in going on to more recklessness and more extravagance. I do not see the reason for boasting, it sounds bad now, inasmuch as the hon. member for South Oxford showed, that unless there had been a peculiar arrangement of accounts, differing from the arrangement of accounts during some years past, the hon. gentleman would have had to confess to a deficit this year, which he has, by the process described by my hon. friend, converted into a nominal surplus, as he calls it. He stands with it now staring him in the face, and I think he was almost honest enough to admit that in the years 1887-89, he would probably be called upon, even with the enormous rate of taxation now burdening this country, to face a deficit of a million dollars. Now, I am reminded that the hon. member touched on the price of sugar. Well, Sir, that was remarkable—the statement of the hon. gentleman with reference to the duties, that the people are not taxed so much now because less duty is paid on sugar than was paid under the old tariff. The hon. gentleman knows that under the arrangement of his tariff, sugar comes into this country in a raw state at a very low figure, while before, it came in refined, a large portion paying this duty, and of course, the price being higher, there was a larger revenue from it. But hon. gentlemen opposite cannot claim that the people of Canada are getting their sugar as cheap now, under the tariff as arranged by the hon. gentlemen opposite, as they could get sugar under a tariff arranged similarly to that in force when my hon. friend from South Oxford was Finance Minister. Sir, I make bold to say, after due consideration on this subject, that I believe the sugar duties could be so arranged as to leave a protection to the refiners, and give to the people of this country their sugar at as low a figure as they get it now, and next year put a million dollars extra into the treasury to wipe out their expected deficit; and if they will go on the lines followed by the hon. member for South Oxford,—I do not say follow them absolutely, but base an arrangement on those lines,—I will venture to say that they will accomplish that result. And they will accomplish more than that. They will do away with the necessity of that commission that is sitting to ascertain the operation of this sugar combine and trust that the wholesale men, and other men engaged in the sugar trade, have entered into; they will find a remedy for this in a moment, and avoid the necessity of spending $6,000 or $7,000 in order to find out a remedy for the evil. If we, as manufacturers, are taking advantage of the tariff, to take more out of the people than we ought to—I say we, because I am a manufacturer myself—if that be true it is the bounden duty of the Government to reduce the taxation and take away our power of doing so. That sugar duty could be arranged by one stroke of a Finance Minister's pen so as to deal successfully with this difficulty, and at once put an end to this combine, and we would do no injury to the wholesale merchants scattered throughout the country. Sir, I believe they have gone into this combine in order to help themselves, yet I will venture to say that to-day they would rather have the privilege they had during the time my hon. friend was in office, of going to markets of the world and buying their sugar and standing their chance of making their profits on it—they would rather do that than to risk the profits they are now after they have entered into their combines, tied down, as they are, to the demands of the refiners, that can be made arbitrarily, and from which they cannot release themselves. Sir, I give that to the hon. gentleman with reference to this sugar duty.

Mr. GUILLET. Is not the hon. gentleman himself a member of combines?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am a member of an association, if the hon. gentleman wants to know, and, Sir, I do not feel that I am doing any wrong to the country. I hold this, that if I am in an association that is taking any advantage of the public, by means of this tariff, hon. gentlemen opposite are recreant to their duty if they do not wipe out the protection under which we are enabled to do it. That is the hon. gentleman's answer. He will find me frank in stating the position that I am in, and, Sir, I do not claim that I am wrong. I only state this as a personal explanation. I suppose the hon. gentleman can find out all about it, if he likes to, and he is welcome to it. If there is anything wrong in the position I am in, I would like to know it and I would like to get out of it. But if the hon. gentleman thinks that I am taking an advantage of the tariff, it is his bounden duty to urge upon the Government that which will cure the evil. Wipe out your protection, and open the markets of the world to the people, and you will manage it very successfully. With respect to the manufacture in which I am engaged the difference between the cost of the raw material and the price of the manufactured article does not give any great amount of protection, and the manufacturers are met with the competition of the world, as I hold should be the case in regard to sugar and all other articles consumed by the people, and in regard to which they are taxed to an exorbitant amount. I proceed to notice a few statements made by the Finance Minister in his Budget speech. I notice that the tables he gave seem to be pretty fairly prepared, and for them I presume he assumes responsibility; I do not desire to criticise them, as they have already been criticised by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and I wish to leave them in that position. I simply wish to re-enforce the statements made by that hon. gentleman that the rate of taxation imposed upon the people is excessive, that the hon. gentleman has added enormously last year to that taxation in the form of iron duties, that he has also changed the duties on sugar so that the treasury received something like three-quarters of a million extra in taxes from the people. The Finance Minister was honest enough to admit that with all the increased taxation there is in Canada to-day depression in trade, that the progress of the country has been checked, and to that checking of progress and dulness of trade he attributed the loss of revenue that has taken place and the probability of a deficit. I was a little amused at the hon. gentleman. He is of a happy turn of mind, he is of a cheerful spirit when on the Treasury benches, but when in Opposition he has a long face and deplores and grumbles about the position of the country. When seated on the Treasury benches, however, he feels that everything is all right. He took a glance through the country and saw, what we all very much regret, a failure of crops in Ontario, which is a very serious matter for the whole country; yet he extracted consolation even out of that thought. He said that after all the short crop in Ontario was a blessing in disguise because it would prevent over importation. The short crop in Ontario is a blessing because the people are too poor to buy the goods they bought before. I have sometimes wondered how a large and kind hearted gentleman such as he is could heap burdens upon the country without having twinges of conscience; but the explanation is here. What the short crop did by impoverishing the people and making them less able to buy goods, which was in the hon. gentleman's opinion a blessing in disguise, the Finance Minister accomplished by making them poor through excessive taxation, thereby conferring a blessing in disguise on the people without their knowing it. That is the explanation of the hon. gentleman's conduct, and we can now understand that he is not so hard-hearted as we otherwise might think he is. I pass on to notice the increase in the national debt. It must be alarming to the people of the Dominion to contemplate a net debt of $228,000,000. I am told, although I have not seen the notice myself, that the Finance Minister has given notice of a resolution asking power to effect a further loan of $25,000,000. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) pointed out very clearly the large expenditures we shall have to meet in the near future, the great augmentation of the net debt that is taking place, and that the time has arrived when if we cannot reach the ears of the Government, we should reach the ears of the people and lead them to put a stop to the further accumulation of debt in the interests of the well-being of this country. The Finance Minister while admitting that there was somewhat of a depression to-day, went on to point out that there were some directions in which there was light, and that our trade was increasing in some quarters. While there was a poor crop in Ontario he said there was a good crop in Manitoba and the North-West, and I very much rejoice in that fact. The hon. gentleman also said there was a great increase in the West India trade, and in order to prove that statement he gave the House some statistics. I wish to call attention to those figures, because I am unable to reconcile them with those I find in the public documents. The hon. gentleman said, at page 1085 of Hansard :

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

"I find that in 1878 the total value of the imports entered for consumption from all the West Indies was $1,181,728; and in 1886 it had increased to $3,249,642."

He gave those figures as showing a gratifying increase in the West India trade, a trade which the Government prided themselves on developing. The figures quoted by the hon. gentleman show an increase in the years mentioned of $2,067,914. But I desire to ask the Minister of Finance why he gave statistics for the year 1886 and not those for 1887. Surely when we take statistics of either private or public business we want them for the present year and not for last year. The hon. gentleman should have made his speech last year—he is a year late. I will give the figures for 1887 instead of 1886, which in all fairness the hon. gentleman was bound to have done, if he wished the people to thoroughly understand the question. I find by the Trade and Navigation Returns for 1887 that the value of imports entered for home consumption from the West Indies in 1878 was $1,033,849; 1887, $1,942,182, so that the increase in the West Indies import trade, during those nine years, was only $908,333, but the Finance Minister, by selecting 1886, led the country to understand that the trade had increased by over $2,000,000. The hon. gentleman further said :

"As regards the whole trade, both imports and exports, I find that in 1878 the total value of these amounted to $4,689,473, in 1886 to $5,553,892."

The Finance Minister thus gave the House to understand that the total trade, exports and imports, had increased by the value of $864,419. What are the facts? If he had dealt frankly with the House and had given us, as he was bound to give us, the figures for 1887, in reference to this matter, as disclosed by Table No. 4, of the Trade and Navigation Returns, show that the total value of the imports to the West Indies in 1878 amounted to $4,397,996, and in 1887, $4,017,593. Thus, Sir, instead of there being an increase in the total trade with the West Indies, as would appear by the figures given us by the Minister of Finance, there was a positive decrease in the total trade with the West Indies of $380,403. I think I am justified in bringing that fact before the notice of the Finance Minister, and in asking him to explain how it was that in making his financial statement to this House and pretending to show the progress we in Canada were making that he should have gone back to 1886 and overlooked the figures for 1887 which must have been before him? The hon. the Finance Minister was pleased to say that in addition to developing our West India trade we were also developing our interprovincial trade, and he gave us figures to show the increase of traffic over the Intercolonial Railway, and pointed to that as an evidence of increased provincial trade. I say here, as I said not long ago from my seat in this House, that the hon. gentleman would not delight more than I would delight if it were possible for us, in a business way, to increase our interprovincial trade. I said on a previous occasion, and I do not hesitate to say it now, that I believe the Minister of Finance is the founder of the National Policy, and has the honor of being its founder, if there be any honor in it. I believe that one of the objects of the National Policy, was as had been told us, if possible to develop an interprovincial trade. He saw the necessity, if we could not develop a foreign trade, to promote a trade between ourselves. I would rejoice with him if his figures could be taken as indicating that between Springhill, Cape Breton and Pictou, there could be a legitimate interprovincial trade, but I felt constrained to interject a question to the Finance Minister, which he was kind enough to answer at the time. I did not wish to disconcert him during the progress of his speech, but I asked him if he had a comparative statement of the expenditure and receipts during this period on the Intercolonial Railway. He said he had not, but that he considered it was a matter of very small importance—I think those were his words—in consideration of the vast benefits that would flow to this country from the encouragement of an interprovincial trade. Still, Sir, I can scarcely agree with him on that point. I ask the Finance Minister this question: Can you not develop an interprovincial trade to a much greater extent than at the present time, provided you run your Intercolonial Railway for nothing; provided you carry and lay down in the Maritime Provinces flour for nothing. Then our friends from the Maritime Provinces would buy all their flour from us, and they would not import any American flour and pay taxes upon it as they do to-day. If you bring the Springhill mines and the Pictou and Cap Breton mines and lay their products down in my city, free of cost to me, then I will purchase those products, or let you bring them over your railway, as far as it comes, free of cost, and then, Sir, I might be found using them, and that may develop the trade. But where would be the saving to the country? Why, Sir, you would be paying out of the pockets of the people of the country the expenses to run your road. We can only rejoice in a development of trade and commerce when that commerce is brought about legitimately, and when it is not brought at the expense of taxes that are taken out of the pockets of the people to pay for losses incurred in other directions.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to have been able to conclude my remarks before the House rose at six o'clock, but I found there were a few points I desired to touch upon, having reference more particularly to some of the statements that were made by the Minister of Finance in the speech he delivered to this House. I have discussed what I conceive to be the effect of the sugar duties, and of our trade in that direction, and I would propose now for a short time to consider the effect of the iron duties that were proposed by the Finance Minister last Session and from which he predicted such grand results would flow. The question of the great blessings to be derived in this country from the imposition of duties upon iron has been often pictured to us. As long ago as 1882 it was brought positively before our minds and the hon. Minister of Finance, Sir Leonard Tilley, told us that the reason that Parliament was prematurely dissolved was to give the people an opportunity of pronouncing whether the National Policy was the settled policy of the people of this country or not. He told us that he was in a position to say that if the people would endorse that policy in 1882, that he knew of millions of capital that was waiting ready to be invested in the manufacture of iron in this country. The Finance Minister, in speeches delivered throughout the country in various places, notably in the city of Toronto in 1882, during the general election, stated that to his own knowledge such was the case. I will not trouble you with long quotations but I will just read you in a few sentences what he said upon one occasion :

"I tell you—and this is not a matter of supposition but of certainty and knowledge on my part—that there are millions of dollars waiting to be invested in Canada ; millions in England and large sums in the United States waiting to come to Canada, waiting to be invested in every kind of industry, in mines and in manufactures of every kind, but the capitalists say: Your Opposition say that your policy is only the result of a temporary madness on the part of the people in Canada in 1878 because times were bad then and that it will be reversed at the next election."

He pointed out, Sir, in continuing, what the result would be if the people supported his Government and said that those millions of dollars were waiting to develop our iron industry if they did so. Nearly six years have elapsed since then, and I would ask those gentlemen, who spoke of their own knowledge, of their own certainty, not on supposition at all as they declared; whether those millions of dollars have been invested? The Government was sustained in that election, the Government have been sustained in an election since then, and I ask where are those millions of dollars that were to have been invested? But last Session the hon. the Finance Minister told us that they had found out that this blessed policy of theirs that was to build up—that was so complete, and perfect, and harmonious in all its parts, and that was working such wonders in this land, had one serious fault. They had discovered that the iron duties were arranged on a wrong basis and that this was the serious trouble in this much belauded National Policy, that was the model of perfection itself. He applied the remedy; he asked Parliament to give an increase of taxes on iron and that this would remedy the trouble. We had him prophesying what would be the effect of this change. He said: Allow the imposition of those duties on iron and you will find blast furnaces springing up in those places immediately. I am no prophet, he said, and no son of a prophet, but I venture to say that there will be found very great prosperity in this country as a result of that policy. May I ask the hon. Finance Minister to-night, a year after the imposition of those duties, when we should have some promise of the fulfilment of his prophecies, whether he can point to any instances that prove that he was a true prophet on that occasion? Although he disclaimed to be a prophet or the son of a prophet, he was a prophet, Sir, but of a certain kind. Now, the Book from which he took that quotation tells us about a class of prophets who existed in other times and in another nation. They were prophets of a people who were steeped in iniquity, who wished to continue in their perverse ways, who did not wish to be disturbed, and who said: "Prophecy unto us smooth things, and they prophesied them." I think the hon. gentleman might be classed among those prophets. I would not like to apply to him the term applied to them, that of being false prophets; but he seemed to be ready to do what they did, and to prophesy unto us smooth things. Let the public debt be heaped up, said they; let the taxes be increased on the people, let there be a shrinkage in our trade, let us draw closer the lines and restrict our commercial intercourse with other nations, let us cripple our industries and our resources; we are at ease in our beds; do not talk about the accumulation of the debt; do not talk about bad times; do not talk about men being out of work or about people leaving the country; do not disturb us in our slumbers; they said: Prophecy unto us smooth things; and the hon. gentleman did so. Now, I would ask the hon. gentleman to-night to point out some of the proofs of his prophecies. Where are the blast furnaces which he said were to be brought into existence? I should like to know if there has been one brought into existence. I would like to ask my hon.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

friend from Carleton County (Mr. Dickinson) whether that blast furnace in his county whose fires were damped some years ago, has had them relighted. I would like to ask, where are the blast furnaces at Cobourg, at Weller's Bay, at Kingston, and at other places where the hon. Finance Minister said they were going to spring up? He said, there is only one thing in addition to these iron duties that we require in order to have blast furnaces established at all these points, and that is, to have the duty taken off anthracite coal. A year ago that was done and yet there are no blast furnaces at Cobourg, at Weller's Bay, or at Kingston. I have looked around the country, and I have failed to discover that any great stimulus has been given to the industry, while the iron duties imposed at that time have borne down heavily on the agricultural classes. The hon. Finance Minister told us that certain factories had increased their output. I will not challenge all the statements he made, but I will refer to a sample of them. I am not blaming the Finance Minister, who I believe was misled, but I blame the gentlemen who gave him the information. He told us that a wood screw factory was being erected in Hamilton that was not employing, but—the language was very guarded—to be capable of employing 400 hands. I think I am correct in what I am about to say, but I shall be very happy to be corrected if I am wrong. He told us that that was a new industry; but my impression is that that wood screw factory, that was to be capable of employing 400 hands as the effect of these iron duties, is the same factory that was located in the town of Dundas, five miles distant from Hamilton, for years and years, and was only removed to Hamilton.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. For twenty years.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Long before the National Policy was thought of, that factory was in existence in Dundas, and as a matter of convenience, as a better shipping point I suppose, it was removed to Hamilton. I think I am correct in that statement; if I am not, the hon. Finance Minister will correct me.

Mr. BROWN. I should like to correct the hon. gentleman, if I am in order. The hon. gentleman is correct to some extent, that the screw factory, a small concern, had been in existence in Dundas for some time, and did remove its machinery to Hamilton. But this establishment which has been organised in Hamilton is eight or ten times the size of the one that was in Dundas, and its creation is entirely a result of the tariff that was adopted at the last Session; and had that tariff not been adopted that large factory would not have been erected in the city of Hamilton or anywhere else. It is entirely due to the tariff adopted last Session that that large establishment is now in successful operation, giving employment to some 400 or 500 hands.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). Perhaps I may be permitted to a word of explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for South Brant has the floor.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). As these hon. gentlemen live in the town of Dundas, and are conversant with all the circumstances, I am quite willing that they should state the facts, because I would be glad to know whether this is a new industry or not, and to what extent it has benefited by the iron duties.

Mr. SPEAKER. It will lead to four or five explanations of the same kind, and I think it would be better, and expedite business, if the hon. member proceeded with his speech.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. May I call your attention to the fact that the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) chose to intervene and interrupt my hon.

friend, and thereby induced this reply. Now, he ought not to have been allowed to speak, or else I think the hon. member for Wentworth should be allowed to speak.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would have stopped him at once, but the hon. member for Brant seemed to be willing to have that interference.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He is willing that the hon. member for Wentworth should speak.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, but if we go on in that way, we shall have four or five speaking on the same subject.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The reason I was willing to give way was that the hon. member for Wentworth represents Dundas. I do not represent it, but I know all the facts, and I would just say—

Mr. SPEAKER. I would interrupt the hon. gentleman. These statements will very well come after the hon. member for South Brant has concluded his speech.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Well, I think the House is pretty well seized of the fact. At any rate, the hon. Finance Minister has been misled as to this being a new industry, started under the stimulating influence of the tariff, and it is possible that the gentleman who gave the explanation is the same one who gave the information to the hon. Finance Minister, and it would be natural that he should wish to make the best of the case. These cases which are given of manufacturers sending in their own statements about their output being so much greater than before, and all that kind of thing, really do not prove anything. We are capable of using business arguments, and determining for ourselves as business men what the effect would be; and to speak of an increased number of hands in my factory or your factory or anybody else's, proves nothing in an argument of this kind. It is quite possible that there might be, in these cases, something such as there is in the city of Toronto. If you consider the manufacturing industries located there, and say, in such a year, only a few years ago, there were only so many factories in existence, but to-day there are so many, hon. gentlemen would say they are the effect of the National Policy. Some of the factories are not the effect of the National Policy, but were in existence years before the imposition of the National Policy, and were simply transferred from one city to another. Cases of that kind continually offer themselves; and they were thus transferred, not under the stimulating influence of his National Policy but of the bonuses offered by rival towns. For instance, I need refer, as an illustration of this statement, to the offer made lately of a bonus of $30,000 by the town of St. Mary's to a factory in Paris, to induce the proprietors of that factory to remove their establishment to St. Mary's; and should that offer be accepted, no doubt some hon. gentleman opposite will claim the establishment of that enterprise in the latter town as due solely to the National Policy.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but I would like to ask him whether the National Policy and the bonuses had not something to do with each other? Does he think the bonuses would have been given but for the National Policy?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I will answer the hon. gentleman. I believe that in that particular case, the effect of his tariff has not been to stimulate that industry to that extent, as I was able to show when the reciprocity debate was before the House; I gave the testimony of the manufacturers in that line given before the committee of this House in 1886, in which they declared that the increase in the tariff would be injurious instead of beneficial to them. But the National Policy has had this effect, that manufactures have been transferred, by means of the bonuses, from one place to another; and I tell the hon. gentleman further, that one other effect of the National Policy has been this:

Whether that effect has been good or bad I will not stop now to argue, but one effect has been to concentrate numerous small establishments into a few large ones. Take, for instance, the large boot and shoe manufacturers. You will find that they employ a large number of hands, but how does that come about? Is it that there are so many more men employed making boots and shoes than formerly? I think you will agree with me that there are not, but you will find that where formerly boot and shoe makers were widely distributed and employed men in their own shops—each boot and shoe maker employing in his own shop, in his own town or village, several apprentices—to-day the large factories have absorbed these smaller institutions, and the men who were formerly employed in smaller shops now have to turn to something else or to go into the large factories. You cannot say, therefore, that these factories are the effect of the National Policy, but you must trace them directly to the combining of the small shops into large factories. I have always made these statements with the reservation that I am willing to be corrected if wrong, and I make them to-day under the same reservation. But I have asked, time and again, hon. gentlemen to point to me a single manufacturing industry now in existence in this country, that was not in existence years before the National Policy came into effect at all.

Mr. HESSON. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must allow the hon. member for North Brant to proceed with his speech.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. member for Wentworth was not allowed to interrupt, and, as a matter of course, the hon. member for North Perth must not object to the same rule being applied to him.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would have been quite willing to allow the hon. gentleman to interrupt, but as I do not intend to occupy the time of the House long, he will have the perfect right to rise after I have finished, and enumerate the numerous industries which have been started after the National Policy, that he knows of. I have denied that there are any, but, if hon. gentlemen opposite say there are any, I have asked them frequently to name them. That there are more factories to-day in existence, more woollen mills, more cotton mills, and more factories of that kind, I do not deny.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But can it be expected that the country is to go on increasing in population, and hon. gentlemen opposite will surely not urge that we have not increased somewhat, though at a slower pace than we should have increased—and that there should not, in the natural order of progress, be also an increase in these different kinds of manufactories? But in order that hon. gentlemen opposite may establish the claim they urge on behalf of the National Policy, they must prove that industries are to-day in existence in Canada which were not in existence before the National Policy was adopted. Sir, the great manufacturing industries of this country were in existence years before these hon. gentlemen attained the Treasury benches the second time. Years before that, the manufactures of Canada were exhibited at the Centennial Exhibition of Philadelphia and challenged there the admiration of the world; and as the result of the display our Canadian manufacturers there made and which attracted the attention of the people of Australia and Europe, a foreign trade sprung up in those industries which still continues, and I believe a larger trade would have been promoted between Canada and the outside world had not these manufacturers been restricted and burdened by the imposition of the National Policy. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to point to a new industry which has been brought into existence by the National Policy. Take the census of 1871, take the census of 1881, or take any tables you may know of, of a later date, and point to me any new industry started since the National Policy. I will not deny that you may find some, but I venture to say that the lines will be very few and very difficult to name. I was told once by a gentleman, when I put this question on the public platform, that there was a pin factory started in Galt and that such a factory was unknown in Canada before the adoption of the National Policy. I accepted his statement, but I was corrected afterwards by a gentleman who stated that years before the National Policy came into force there was a pin factory in existence somewhere else in Canada. Another gentleman stated that the electro-plate business was brought into existence in Hamilton by the National Policy. I was not able to point to contradict that statement, but my impression is that there was one established in Canada before the adoption of our protective tariff. Therefore, these glorious prophecies, those grand, proud swelling words, which are uttered by Ministers and their supporters, are mere sound and fury, and carry no argument, unless those gentlemen are able to point to the case of any new industries which have been started into existence by our National Policy. Let these hon. gentlemen look over our census of 1871, and they will find that all these various industries about which we now hear so much, were in existence in this country then and prospering. I wish just to refer briefly to a statement that was made by the Finance Minister, and which afforded me some pleasure. I was pleased to hear him state that while he imposed an additional duty of $2.44 per ton on pig iron the price had only increased $1.25 per ton and he argued from that that the manufacturer in Canada had not availed himself of the full amount of duty, but that the foreign manufacturer in order to get his goods in Canada had to lower his prices. I think the facts hardly bear out that statement. I have not got access to the papers from which the hon. gentleman quoted. He selected the months of December and February, but I thought it would be as good a test as any, and I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me in this to take the figures from the London Economist. These figures are pretty reliable as a rule, and taking their quotations on pig iron for the month of March, 1888, and the corresponding month of March, 1887, they show the following exports from Great Britain to British North America:—In March, 1887, the export was 1,252 tons of pig iron, valued at $3,492; in 1888 the export was 1,877 tons, or a larger import in 1888 after the imposition of the high duties, and the value of that was $4,639. I call the attention of the Finance Minister to this fact, that in 1887, that iron averaged per ton, as quoted in the London Economist, £2 15s. 9½d., while the quotations of March, 1888, are £2 9s. 5d.; so there you find a reduction in the price in the old country, in Britain, of something like $1.52 on iron, and if you add to that the $1.25 that the Finance Minister admits it has to pay here, you have an increase of $2.77, provided the price of iron had not fallen in the old country market. I have not got the same months the Finance Minister had; I have not any access to them, but I have taken March, 1888, and compared that with the corresponding week in 1887, which I think is just as fair a comparison. Now having spoken with reference to the question of iron, and the duty on iron, and what it has failed to do in its effect on manufactures, notwithstanding the grand promises we had held out to us, I wish to ask the attention of the House for a few moments to another point on which the Minister congratulated the House, as being part of his policy, and that was when, in his round, swelling tones, he declared that the policy of this Government was to protect the labor interests of the country, to protect the artisan, the mechanic, the workingman, that their interests had been taken under the fatherly care of this Government. Well, Sir, I charge that that is just what this Government have not done. They have protected the manufacturers, or they have sought to protect the manufacturers, but I deny most emphatically that they have given any protection to labor at all. I think I can demonstrate that, instead of granting any protection to labor, they have discriminated against labor, they have oppressed labor, they have brought unjust competition to bear against labor in this country. Why, the very tables the Finance Minister gave us to show the increase in the output of the Londonderry works as the result of his tariff, if I understand his tables aright, though his figures are rather confused, demonstrate, if you go into the calculation, that while there are more hands employed in those Londonderry iron works, the rate of wages per hand is less than it was before. What does the workingman feel in reference to this matter? Is it any benefit to a mechanic to know that the shop in which he works is somewhat enlarged, and that other mechanics are found by his side, brought as it may be from Germany, from England or from the United States, to work at the same wages, or to lower the wages which he has received? What the mechanic and the laboring man want is not work for more mechanics. The country as a whole may benefit by the importation of more mechanics, but the interest of the laboring man and the mechanic of Canada is that his condition shall be improved and his wages raised, and he does not consider that he is benefited by a policy which brings in other artisans, so that he has to work for less wages, and I think it is proved by the tables of the hon. gentleman himself that this is what the Government have done. What have the Government done in reference to the protection of labor? They have, as my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has pointed out, taxed the workingman upon everything almost that he consumes. There is scarcely an article which he needs in his household, or for the use of his family, or for his own use, that is not heavily taxed; but, in regard to what he has to sell, his labor, have they protected his labor? No, but they have taken taxes out of the public treasury of this country, taxes that in part were paid by these hard-working, industrious mechanics, and have given them to mechanics in England and other countries to help to pay their passages to Canada to lower the wages of the mechanics who are working in our factories. That is the way in which those hon. gentlemen protect our labor. It is almost amusing that it did not raise a feeling of indignation to hear an hon. gentleman professing to speak of protecting labor, when all the effect of his policy is to burden the mechanic with fresh taxes and to open the market and compel the mechanic not only to contend against the labor market of the world, but also to take the taxes which he has contributed in part and apply them to the purpose of enabling other mechanics to come here and lower the wages which he was receiving before their advent into this country. The hon. gentleman spoke as to the condition of the manufacturers, and there has been a great deal of sympathy expressed on account of the manufacturers. What is the condition of the manufacturers in this country to-day? Of course there are manufacturers and manufacturers. Some of them, I suppose, are doing fairly well; some, I suppose, are doing very well; but some are doing very ill indeed. That will always be the case. Fortunate circumstances may perhaps attend one man's ventures which may be absent from another's, so that under any tariff some men will prosper in business while others may not; but take trade as a whole—and I call the attention of the Finance Minister to this, because he stated in his speech to us last year what I believe to be a truth, and I like to quote truth whenever it is stated by the Finance Minister, and he saw as a public man, and knew what he was giving utterance to a year ago, and that was that production in manufactured goods in this country had about overtaken consumption. He was within the mark that time. Sometimes he is charged with overshooting the mark, but he was within the mark that time. Production has not only overtaken consumption, it has done more, it has outrun consumption, and, as a result, you have found men who, in order to save their capital, in order to save their resources, have found themselves under the necessity, as they considered, to band themselves together in order to restrict production and to keep up the price, which of course means a hardship to the consumer. The hon. gentleman recognised that, and he suggested that it would be the duty of the Government, and of every Government under those circumstances, to look abroad and to use every energy they were possessed of to open up new and foreign markets which might take the surplus of our manufactures; and he told us that the Government had sent commissioners to various countries, to the Argentine Republic, and to Brazil, and to other countries, to open up additional trade. But no result has come from those efforts. I think a commissioner was sent to Australia, but I am afraid that nothing has resulted from that either. But, while the hon. gentleman admits the absolute necessity that our manufacturers should have larger fields in which to operate, he tells us that he is an avowed opponent of any scheme to open a market of 60,000,000 of people at our own doors or to give our manufacturers a chance to open that market. Why, instead of sending commissioners to these distant countries, does he not himself, with tenfold the ability of the men he has sent there, go to the neighboring Republic, to the capital of the United States, to which he was invited to go, where he was told that they were ready to treat on a basis of larger commercial relations with us, and see if he could open up the markets of that great consuming people of sixty millions? Our manufacturers may be timid. Capital is always timid. Our manufacturers may dread radical changes, but, as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright has pointed out, what the manufacturers of Canada have to be anxious about is this, that, as soon as the United States are able to reduce their duties on raw material, or to wipe them out altogether, as they soon will be able to do in view of their overflowing treasury, then the Canadian manufacturer will be subjected to a closer, a keener, a stronger competition than ever before. That, Sir, being the case with the American manufacturer, and that being the case with our manufacturer, under the policy of expenditure that has been followed by these hon. gentlemen, they will tell you that the maintenance of high taxes upon their raw material would place them at a disadvantage in their own country, to say nothing of the absolute disadvantage that they would be under competing with the Americans in other parts of the world. Now, Mr. Speaker, suppose we leave the subject of trade, and finance, and figures, which are dry, and discuss lofty and exalted principles. We had a little novelty of that kind the other day when the Finance Minister did so. The Finance Minister left off his discussion of trade and commerce in order to read hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House a lecture as to how they ought to behave themselves. He was kind enough to tell us that a party, in seeking to obtain power, should only seek power for the sake of the good they would be able to do when they got there, for the sake of giving effect to their principles; that if a party sought to attain power simply for the sake of holding and exercising power, it was a most unworthy, a most base thing. Sir, I agree with him. It was refreshing to hear sentiments so grand from the Finance Minister—not that I mean to say he is incapable of feeling them, but he has to deal so much in a hard, matter of fact region, that he does not often soar into the region of fixed principles. But I would like to ask him this question, agreeing with him in that: If it be proper for a party, in seeking to attain power, to do so with a single eye to carrying out their principles, and giving effect to them, whether he does not think it would be a good plan for a party, after they have attained power, to retain their principles while they remain in office. I think that would be well. Now, we can tell exactly what the hon. gentleman's principles were when he was struggling for power; but let me ask him, in all frankness, Has he held on to his fixed principles since he got in? It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there has been a departure from sound principle by one or other of the gentlemen opposite, when I see a Tupper and a McLelan sitting in the same Cabinet. I think there must be. I cannot conceive, myself, that one gentleman who denounced another as the high priest of corruption, who pictured him as robbing his fellow passengers with false arms in a stage coach—I cannot believe it possible that these two men were honest at that time, and can be found sitting in the same Cabinet together to-day, unless there has been a departure from principle on the part of one or the other. I will do the Finance Minister the credit of saying this, though, that he did not seek a seat in the Cabinet with the hon. member for Colchester, (Mr. McLelan), but the member for Colchester sought, and was willing to accept, a seat in the Cabinet side by side with this gentleman that he had thus described. I am afraid there has been a departure from principle somewhere. I would like the hon. gentleman, when lecturing this side of the House, to remember that while it is a high, and a lofty, and a proper thing to be actuated solely by a desire to maintain principles when striving for the Treasury benches, it is equally laudable to maintain these principles in all their purity when occupying this seat. I would remind him that it would be only a proper thing, in maintaining these fixed principles, if gentlemen, having that sense of honor of the way in which public business should be conducted, would be willing, in making an appeal to the electorate of this country for a renewal of their confidence, to go before that electorate and say: Gentlemen, these are our principles, this is our policy, these are our acts, this is what we have done; judge whether we have been faithful stewards of your affairs; in your hands we leave the decision of this case. We have empanelled you as a jury, and to your verdict we will bow. Sir, gentlemen of fixed principles, gentlemen who will trust to their principles and believe that they are right, would not hesitate for a moment to go to the country under such circumstances. But have these gentlemen opposite ever dared to go to the country on their principles? Have they ever dared to go to the country and fight their opponents in a fair field with no favor? No, Sir, the records of this country show not. Sir, gentlemen of fixed principles ought never to condescend to such acts as the Gerrymander Act, as the Franchise Act, as the Revising Barrister Act, as the Returning Officer Act, if they felt strong, and confident that they were virtuous in their principles. Sir, I am afraid there has been a departure from fixed principles on the part of members of the Cabinet—though undoubtedly their sole desire in seeking to attain that position was not to remain there a day, or a year, but simply to give effect to principles that they believed in. My hon. friend beside me says, and I believe that is true, that, perhaps, with them there is one grand, overshadowing principle, which outweighs all other considerations to which they may bow, and that it is their fundamental principle to cling to office, no matter by what means, or under what circumstances. But then my hon. friend the Finance Minister will say that that is a high and lofty principle. He will not stand on the pedestal that he did the other day when delivering a lecture to gentlemen on this side of the House. Well, now let us examine and see what are the fixed principles of the party opposite. What is their policy? I remember last year and the year before, gentlemen on this side of the House had a fixed policy on a particular question, that it was the duty of the Federal Government to allow the Provincial Governments to exercise their undoubted rights within their constitutional sphere; and, therefore, they moved a resolution censuring the disallowance of Manitoba railway charters by the gentlemen who are in power. Well, Sir, we were answered by hon. gentlemen opposite: We will not consent to the abandonment of the disallowance policy, we will not consent to allow Manitoba to charter railways that will tap the Canadian Pacific Railway and divert the trade of our great North-West into American channels. They pointed out to us that millions and tens of millions of dollars of the taxes of the people of the older Provinces had been expended in building that road, and it was not in the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it was not in the interest of the older Provinces, that disallowance should be abandoned, and they would not cease their rights, as they claim to have the right, to disallow the charters and thus prevent our trade from being diverted. Well, there was their policy, fixed and unalterable, a year ago. Where are they to-day? The very same gentlemen have now on the notice paper a resolution to be offered by the Finance Minister himself, by which he will ask the assent of this House, not only to permit Manitoba to charter railways to take the traffic of the North-West, to carry it into American channels, but that we shall guarantee the interest for 50 years on $15,000,000 to enable them to do so. This is the fixed principle of hon. gentlemen opposite. Why, they had a fixed principle in reference to this National Policy, to the industries of the country that were to be protected. Among them was to be protected the great tree, fruit growing and nursery interest, which, they claimed has sprung up in this country as one of the beneficent results of their National Policy. Well, Sir, what is the fact? We had one day the First Minister and the Minister of Justice rising and declaring that though the Americans had put these articles upon their free list, and though we had a statutory officer upon our books, saying if they did that we would do the same with their products, these hon. gentlemen said they would not do it, that they had the liberty to select what they saw fit, that they would not consent to do it, that it would be treasonable to the interests of the country to do it. Within one short week the hon. the Finance Minister came down and said that that was all wrong, that already an Order in Council had been issued placing those articles upon the free list, where they remain to-day. One of the fixed principles of hon. gentlemen opposite has been that Canada must not discriminate against the mother country. Yet in that very Order in Council they discriminated against the mother country by declaring that those articles might come in free from the United States but not free from the land against which they would on no account discriminate. They had also a fixed policy in regard to the manner in which they would deal with the liquor traffic. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the First Minister put their heads together and a Bill was introduced known as the McCarthy Act. What was the result? They abandoned that principle, I will not say voluntarily, but they had to abandon it after an appeal to the highest judicial tribunal of the Empire. Their fixed principle of dealing with the liquor traffic is a thing of the past and all that remains of it is in the shape of taxes to the extent of nearly a quarter of a million to pay for the blunder the Government committed at that time. Then they had until a short year ago a decided policy and principle in dealing with the Americans and our fisheries. They were not to be allowed the use of our fisheries on any consideration; the Treaty of 1818 was to be entirely carried out and we were to uphold our rights. Less than a year ago the Minister of Finance went to Washington and arranged a treaty by which under certain conditions the Americans would be permitted to enjoy every privilege that hon. gentlemen opposite declared Canada would never consent to accept. I am not finding fault with the fisheries treaty, it is not necessary for the purposes of my argument, but I am simply pointing out that one year the Government had a fixed policy and were determined to carry it out, and in fact did carry it out in such a manner that the Finance Minister has declared that it produced a feeling of irritation in the United States that led us to the borders of war, and yet now we find an abandonment of all those contentions, all done it is said for the sake of peace. The Finance Minister himself had a policy last year with respect to the United States, and he was not disturbed by the prospect of what was known as the Retaliation Bill being passed in the United States. Some fears were expressed in regard to the results that might follow from non-intercourse with our neighbors, and it was thought it would prove very injurious, but the hon. gentleman could even see in that Bill, as he saw in the poor crop in Ontario, a blessing in disguise. The whole outlook was not dark, there was a silver lining to the cloud, and he went on to picture the silver lining and it appeared to be not a silver lining but the bright cloud itself, and the non-intercourse would be in Canadian interests. What were the hon. gentleman's statements in regard to that non-intercourse Bill, as given to us last year? He said then:

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

"Non-intercourse would build up Montreal, Quebec, St. Andrews and St. John, &c., with a rapidity which the people of this country can scarcely understand."

That certainly would not be a bad result. Cities could not be built up except by providing employment for the people and giving a stimulus to trade generally. Hon. gentlemen opposite claimed it was part of their policy to build up great cities, and the effect of passing a non-intercourse Bill on the part of the United States would be that our cities would be built up with a rapidity we could scarcely understand. What more did the hon. gentleman say?

"Non-intercourse would lead England to put on differential duties on grain to such an extent as would vivify the industries of this country, especially the great farming industry of this country, to an extent which would make the most marvellous change in this Dominion."

If the result would be that it would advance our agricultural interests to such an extent as to produce a marvellous change in their favor non-intercourse would be of great benefit to us, and it would not be a cloud with a silver lining but a cloud white altogether with perhaps a dark rim. Yet this was the fixed principle which hon. gentlemen opposite declared a year ago, but within a year the Finance Minister comes to this House and declares that if the non-intercourse Bill had been put into effect it would have been the most disastrous thing that could have happened to Canada, and one of the great objects in surrendering what we did surrender to the United States of the fisheries was almost necessitated by the state of public opinion over there, owing to the policy we had pursued and to the danger that they might put into effect that very non-intercourse, which, according to the hon. gentleman's statement last year, would have been fraught with blessing to us. I think, therefore, we may fairly ask hon. gentlemen opposite when they read us lectures with regard to having fixed principles, to be themselves consistent not only in their utterances but also in their actions, because I would venture to propose this question: What principle is there that has been held by the party which occupies the Treasury benches which they are not ready to sacrifice if necessary in order to hold their present seats? There has been a changing and a vacillating course, their promises have been broken and violated, their pledges have not been kept, they have not succeeded in giving that prosperity to the country which they promised that the country should enjoy. They to-day sit there with all their predictions not only unfulfilled but with many of them looked upon in the light of events that have transpired as having been perfectly ridiculous in their nature and in their expression, if I might be permitted to use language as strong as that without giving offence to hon. gentlemen opposite. But it is not too strong language to use when we look at their prediction of immigration into the North-West, when we read the predictions of the First Minister endorsed by the Finance Minister, given five, six or eight years ago and look at the actual result to-day, and on comparing them the question will force itself upon all minds. Can those hon. gentlemen have ability sufficient to manage a great and prosperous people like the people of Canada when they are unable to gauge with greater accuracy the state and condition of this country and the results likely to follow from the course and policy they are initiating? I will touch for a few moments on that which the hon. the Finance Minister has been pleased to term a new principle and new policy that we were grasping at. Several hon. gentlemen have pleased to tell us this and in the same breath have quoted the speech of the late leader of the Opposition (Mr. Blake) in which he stated that one of the settled principles of the Liberal party was to secure reciprocal trade relations with our neighbors to the south. We are told it is an entirely new principle, and the Postmaster General was pleased to tell us that the resolution offered by the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was annexation in disguise. He sees, he tells us, a snake in the resolution, and he seems to imply that this is a party ready and anxious to promote annexation with the United States. I do not think there is any necessity for saying things that are offensive in their nature when it is not at all necessary. What right had he to charge any such sentiments or the holding of any such sentiments upon gentlemen on this side of the House? Did he produce a tittle of proof that the great Liberal party that were represented in that resolution by the mover, have ever advocated annexation to the United States? Why; no, Sir, he did not. He would have failed of proof, and I say that I am only tempted to mention this fact because the hon. gentleman has provoked it by seeking to fasten the charge upon the Liberal party of this country, that they desired a severance of the political relations that bind them to the mother land. I only allude to the fact that if he wants to find the annexation party he would find it in days gone by, not in the ranks of the Liberal party, but in the ranks of the party he himself belongs to to-day. He would have found men prominent in the party with which he is connected, in high places in the State and in high places in the mother land advocating annexation. Therefore, before he attempts to make an insinuation, or to make a statement of that kind, he should make himself aware of the history of this country, and know what the history of the political parties of this country has been. I hold in my hand what purports to be the annexation manifesto of 1849. It is said to be reprinted from the original pamphlet with the names of the signers. I have not time to read it, but I will read you the 6th article, and what does it say:

"Of all the remedies that have been suggested for the acknowledged and insufferable ills with which our country is afflicted, there remains but one to be considered. It propounds a sweeping and important change in our political and social condition, involving considerations which demand our most serious examination. This remedy consists in a friendly and peaceful separation from British connection and a union upon equitable terms with the Great North American confederacy of sovereign States."

I find, Sir, appended to that document such names as "J. J. C. Abbott," I find the name of "John Rose," I find the name "D. L. Macpherson." Will the hon. gentleman answer if he has ever known any persons bearing those names or any names having before them those initials? and if he has I would suggest that he would confer with them and ask them whether they are the individuals who signed their names to that document, the sixth article of which I have read to this House? If he finds they are the same gentlemen then I would ask him in very modesty, before he levels charges of treason and rebellion against this side of the House, that he should take care that his own skirts, and the skirts of his own party are clean in this matter. In the course of the debate which took place on unrestricted reciprocity, we were told by the hon. the Finance Minister in his speech the other night that there was a certain gentleman who came from the United States and sought to place himself at the head of the Liberal party, to carry out the principle of commercial union. He gave us the name of that individual. He said it was Mr. Wiman. He said Mr. Wiman was a gentleman of large means—and the Finance Minister seemed to speak feelingly and knowingly when he said it was a great advantage to a party to have a man of large means connected with it. My friend from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) said: "Like Sir Hugh Allan." What made him make that interjection? I will let him explain himself. But the Finance Minister understood the advantage of it. The hon. gentleman was pleased to say also that Mr. Wiman was a man of great ability and acknowledged power as well, and that he had come here to attempt to put himself at the head of the Liberal party and to lead the Liberal party to adopt commercial union. He told us also that the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) was too much for the gentleman from New York, and that he had got the better of Mr. Wiman, with all his wealth, and all his ability, and that he had rescued the Liberal party from Mr. Wiman's leadership, and had thus saved the ship of the Liberal party from being dashed into pieces on the rocks of commercial union, but only to be stranded on the shoals of unrestricted reciprocity. I know nothing of Mr. Wiman myself. I am a humble member of the Liberal party sometimes consulted with, sometimes knowing of what is going on within the ranks, and perhaps knowing as much of what goes on as the hon. the Finance Minister himself. Not that I claim to have any great intelligence or influence but simply from the fact that we would not consider him as trusted a member to admit to the caucuses even with all his ability, as I am myself. I am not aware that Mr. Wiman ever attempted to set himself up as the leader of the Liberal party in Canada, but I have the statement from the hon. gentleman himself that Mr. Wiman not only set himself up to be, but that he actually was the leader of the Finance Minister. Why, Sir, what glorifications we had over the consummation of the fishery treaty. What pæns of praise were sung by the High Commissioner to the plenipotentiaries who arranged this fishery treaty. Great praise was given to them, and the Finance Minister, in that self-sacrificing manner which so eminently characterises him, took nearly an hour and a half to describe the admirable qualities of those gentlemen who had been engaged in the superhuman task of defining the Treaty of 1818. But it all came back to the Finance Minister, because those plenipotentiaries were appointed, at his suggestion, because he made representations to Mr. Bayard and Mr. Bayard made representations to the United States Government and Sir Charles made representations to the British Government and those representations were carried out, and, as a matter of fact then the credit came back to Canada's High Commissioner, as being the one who conceived the project of settling this question and devising the means whereby it could be settled. In a moment of frankness the hon. the Finance Minister told us how all this came about. Shall the Canadian High Commissioner have the credit? If he was the first cause, yes; if he was not the first cause, no. Was he the first cause? He was not. He himself told us he was not. Why, he told us that the way he came to go to Washington, and the reason he took the initiatory step was, that our mutual friend, Mr. Wiman, told me that he had a conversation with Mr. Bayard, and if you go over there Mr. Bayard will talk to you about the trade relations between Canada and the United States. Here is an admission that he received his instructions from Mr. Wiman, and although Parliament was in session—may be there was a holiday at that time—the Finance Minister takes a trip across to Washington, sees Mr. Bayard, and then followed the result that we all know. The point I wish to get at is this: The Finance Minister, who charges us with having sought to put ourselves as a Liberal party under Mr. Wiman's leadership, and charges Mr. Wiman with having sought to obtain the leadership of this party, he himself has confessed that he was a follower of Mr. Wiman, and, as far as we know, the only follower that Mr. Wiman had in this country, and that he followed him in this direction with the results that followed from it. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite—I wish to ask the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. C. H. Tupper) if he is in his seat, what he thinks of the conduct of the Finance Minister of Canada who has himself declared that this Mr. Wiman was "our mutual friend," and the member for Pictou knows what he told us about Mr. Wiman. He told us that Mr. Wiman was the apostle of commercial union, the apostle of unrestricted reciprocity or anything else that would lead to annexation. That is the description that was given to us of Mr. Wiman by the member for Pictou (Mr. C. H. Tupper). The member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) described Mr. Wiman as a renegade Canadian. What do these gentlemen think of the Finance Minister acknowledging him "his mutual friend" and acting upon the suggestion of this annexationist, and this gentleman who is the apostle of anything that would tend to annexation? I think that the hon. the Minister of Finance need not have looked to the Liberal party as those likely to follow Mr. Wiman's lead or those likely to look for a new leader. It would rather bear the significance and we would be more justified in considering that the hon. gentleman himself was prepared to enter into a league with Mr. Wiman to bring about not unrestricted reciprocity, but commercial union with the United States, than he is to charge the Liberal party that they sought to effect it by means of Mr. Wiman himself. Sir, he has declared that he had communications with Mr. Wiman, that he had negotiations with him, that he had received suggestions from him, and that he had acted on those suggestions; and I think he will not find that the Liberal party have ever done that. Now, Sir, the Liberal party have adopted the principle of unrestricted reciprocity, that is, they desire to promote the trade and the varied industries of this country. The agricultural interest of this country is not benefited, as I think the hon. gentleman himself will now be almost prepared to admit, by his so-called National Policy. What they want is larger markets and freer markets. Much of their produce has to go to the neighboring states as almost their only market. It is met there by heavy duties. The like products in the United States are so large and great in comparison with the quantity that we send to them that our products do not regulate the price in that market, but their own greater products regulate the price; and under these circumstances, as the hon. Minister of Finance himself pointed out, the Canadian seller has to lose the duty. Therefore we propose by this policy of unrestricted reciprocity to secure an open market, in order that the great agricultural interests of this country may reap the benefits that would flow to them from wiping out the American duties, and giving them the amount of cash which those duties represent in addition to what they now receive from the sale of their products. But the hon. gentleman tells us that the Liberal ship is stranded upon the shoals of unrestricted reciprocity. Well, I ventured to say to the hon. Finance Minister, when he said that, that he was very near there himself. It was about the only time that I perceived a shade of irritation upon his countenance. He had taken one or two previous interruptions from me in good temper; but when I felt impelled to point out that he was very near unrestricted reciprocity himself, he turned upon me rather fiercely, and said he was at a loss to understand the mental organisation of a man who could not understand the difference between unrestricted reciprocity and an unrestricted offer of reciprocity. Well, I do not dwell on that. I was sorry for the hon. Minister of Finance when he said it. The mental organisation is not a peculiar one, I trust, in this country. It is a mental organisation that you will find among honorable men, I take it, in any country—the organisation that believes that when you make an offer to a man you make it in good faith, and that making it in good faith you will be honorable enough to carry it out if he accepts it. That is all that is peculiar in the mental organisation of some men, and I venture to say that that is all the hon. Finance Minister did. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), who spoke with power and authority—I know not whence he got it—told us that the offer made by the Finance Minister of Canada to the American commissioners in reference to trade relations was as broad and free as it was possible to make it. Sir, I cannot understand anything that could be plainer than that; I cannot understand a trade that could be more free and unrestricted if the offer had been accepted, than that involved in the proposition which the hon. gentleman himself made. When the hon. gentleman was asked by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), did you offer what you did not mean to grant? He answered, no, that would be a mean thing to do, and he would not do it. If he made an unrestricted offer, the broadest, freest possible offer, to settle this fishery question, and to give the Americans free access and all the rights to our fisheries that we enjoy ourselves, if he offered to give them unrestricted free trade upon the land as well as upon the sea, and if the United States had said, we will accept your offer, and the commercial barrier shall be removed from the sea as well as from the land, and commercially we shall be one people, I say from his own description of his offer, he would have been bound as a man of honor, and doubly bound as one of the trusted plenipotentiaries of the British Empire, to have consented to that arrangement with the United States. Sir, he asked, in replying to the question of the hon. member for East York, if I had made this offer, and if the American Government had said, well, we will accept so and so, and we will not accept so and so, would I not be at liberty then to say, no, I will not agree to that? Grant that there is some argument in that; grant that if they had made an offer of partial reciprocity, then he might say, this partial offer of reciprocity that you make has been well considered by you, and will work more in your interests than ours, and I cannot consent to it. But if they had accepted the unrestricted offer, and had said, we will adopt what you have suggested, perfect, unrestricted freedom of trade, then, Sir, I hold that the hon. gentleman would have been bound, and would have had no excuse for rejecting such an arrangement. Therefore, Sir, we were not so very far apart a short time ago. This hon. gentleman who lectured us on fixed principles, ought to have held to the fixed principles he had when he was negotiating with Mr. Bayard, and was making this offer to that gentleman. If he had remained true to that fixed principle, he would have been to-day found in accord with the Liberal party and seeking to give effect to that offer of unrestricted freedom of trade to the American Government on perfectly equal conditions. Sir, the Liberal ship is not stranded on the shoals of unrestricted reciprocity. I do not think it will be stranded there. The hon. Finance Minister himself, sailing in his ship of unrestricted reciprocity, a few months ago, anchored in the waters of unrestricted reciprocity bay. The command of the ship was for a time given to him by the captain, who wanted to sleep and take his ease; but some of his crew from the county of Welland, some from the county of Lincoln, and some from other counties, mutinied and said, if you put us to trade with these people, they will be smarter than we are, and we shall be beaten in the bargain; and they woke up the captain and called upon him to resume the command of the ship in place of the mate; so the anchor was lifted, and the ship was drifted to sea, and now they are drifting about, no one knows where, I suppose for some fixed principle to which they can tie their ship. No, Sir, the offer that was made by the Canadian people and adopted by the Liberal party is this. We propose, what I understood the hon. Minister of Finance proposed, to go to the United States and say, we are living on this same continent, we are speaking the same language, we are people descended from the same nationality, we are a people of the same blood,—let us reason together, let us talk this matter over, and see whether it will not be better for both of us to remove these artificial barriers that divide us. Let us see whether we cannot have access into each other's markets and trade together as a people in perfect amity, although differing in our political institutions, for Mr. Bayard was very careful to say that by no indentment whatever did he propose to alter the political status of either country, but simply that he desired we should commercially be one people, and thus thrive, prosper and progress. Let the hon. the Finance Minister tell me, realising as he does the vast importance of this interprovincial trade, and the great wealth that a great interprovincial trade flowing freely in natural channels must produce—let him tell me that he is insensible to the effect of the wave of prosperity that will sweep over Canada, should we be permitted to enjoy the benefits of that vast interstate commerce which has made the great American nation one of the greatest nations on the face of the earth to-day. Should that freedom of commercial intercourse be brought about between the two countries, which would have the best of the bargain? Which is the better, to have a market of 5,000,000 or a market of 60,000,000? Would we not be the gainers thereby? Yet hon. gentlemen opposite tell us to-day that our duty is to prevent our obtaining access to this great market by every possible means, because Canada's interests do not lie in that way. Why? Is it because it would not benefit our agricultural interests? Some hon. gentlemen opposite have ventured on that line of argument, but I venture to say that the hon. the Finance Minister will not. And I venture to say that hon. gentlemen opposite who have given utterance to this opinion will be glad to recede from that position. The great lumbering interests of this country must assuredly benefit by it. So must the mining industry, the fishing industry, and the shipping industry. There remains but one industry, so-called, the manufacturing industry, and what do hon. gentlemen opposite tell us with respect to that? They must all admit that free commerce between the two countries must be of great benefit, I will not say incalculable benefit, to the agricultural, the mining, the fishing, and the shipping industries of the country, to, in fact, nine-tenths of the people of Canada; and yet peradventure, because it might jeopardise the business standing and wealth of the remaining tenth who are engaged in the manufacturing industries, they oppose this policy. Is that the principle that prevails on the Treasury benches? Or do they hold to the old constitutional maxim of "the greatest good to the greatest number?" Hon. gentlemen who speak about fixed principles ought to take that as a fixed principle, and then let them tell me where the justice is in denying the right and the liberty to trade and increased prosperity to nine people in the country simply because of the danger, and I believe in many instances only a supposed danger, to the establishment of the other the tenth individual. They say that this policy will crush out our manufacturing industries. Why, the hon. the Finance Minister, in one part of his speech, declared—and I was glad to hear him declare it—that Canadians were the equals of any people on the face of the earth in a fair field and no favor. That was a sentiment I was glad to hear him utter, but I did not like to hear him say afterwards, with a singular want of logic in one who possesses a logical mind, that Canadians, who are the equals of any men on the face of the earth, could not hold their own with the people of the United States in manufacturing, in a perfectly fair field and with no favor, such as would be afforded were unrestricted free trade to exist between the United States and this country. As I have said on a previous occasion, that policy does not mean the Canadians bars down to the Canadian manufacturers, and the American bars up to the Canadian manufacturers, but it means all bars down and a fair field and no favor to both. Now, then, can the hon. the Minister of Finance go back on the statement he made, with apparent sincerity, that the Canadians would be able to hold their own under these circumstances? If the manufactures of this country would be destroyed under unrestricted free trade with the United States, how would their destruction be brought about? I would like the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), who is a manufacturer himself, to tell me. I think he must admit, as a manufacturer, that the only way they could be destroyed would be by the manufacturers on the other side of the line being able to sell their products at lower prices than can those of this country. That is the only way in which I can see our manufacturing industries would be killed by this policy. And if the American manufacturers, under unrestricted free trade, could sell their goods cheaper than could the Canadian manufacturers, it seems to me the Canadian consumer must be now paying more for his goods than he would be under unrestricted reciprocity, notwithstanding all the assertions to the contrary of hon. gentlemen opposite. Do they not see that they must take either one horn of the dilemma or the other? We can in a perfect free and open market hold our own; or if we cannot, it can only be because we are forced to charge higher prices than would the American manufacturers. I propose to take that horn of the dilemma should it be presented to me. I believe the Canadian manufacturer, under perfectly fair conditions, would be not only able to hold his share of his own Canadian market, but to secure his share of the trade of the United States as well. If this offer, which we made in the resolution that was voted down, had been instead endorsed by this House, and were accepted by the United States, it would produce some changes, and in these changes no doubt some men would suffer. That is an incident of everyday life. These changes and reverses are taking place continually, but I believe its great effect as a whole upon the country would be to give a stimulus to all our industries. I believe that it would promote immigration to our shores, develop and extend our North-West, and remove the feeling of irritation that exists in the Maritime Provinces by opening to them their natural markets. I believe that it would give to the people of Ontario their natural market, I believe it would weld our country together and solidify us as a Canadian nationality; I believe it would make us free commercially, and bind us together politically as a strong Canadian nationality, built up on the North American continent, a nationality that would do credit to the people from which we have sprung. I have been led into making these remarks in reference to this question, because I was disappointed in hearing the Finance Minister declare so emphatically against this policy, which, if I understood his offer to the United States aright, he proposed to them in good faith, not many months before. I do not desire to continue the debate any longer, I have made these remarks, as they occurred to me, in the endeavor to give expression to what I consider to be the principles of the Liberal party, and the hon. member for North Perth may now avail himself of the privilege of pointing out to us any new industries which have been brought into existence in this Canada of ours under the influence of the National Policy.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Mr. HESSON. I understood this debate was to be closed as soon as the hon. gentleman had completed his remarks, but as he has thrown out to me a challenge, I think it is but fair now that I should take that challenge up, by pointing out what has occurred in my known constituency with reference to establishment of new industries which did not exist there before the adoption of the National Policy. The hon. gentleman may refer, if he does not choose to accept my statement, to the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) who knows whereof I am about to speak. I refer especially to an industry which has been brought into Canada from the State of Michigan, where its headquarters existed, and which gave employment to some 500 men. Owing to the policy adopted by the Government, the proprietors of this industry found they could not go into Canada with their manufactured goods and sell to our Canadian millers, and, consequently, as they possessed a specialty of their own, which had a large sale, here, they came over to our side. They came to our city, and seeing that the premises there were lying idle which formerly belonged to the Thompson William's firm, but had been silent for a number of years, they made a proposition to open works there. The town gave them a small bonus of $3,000, and the result was that those gentlemen established a business there which has given employment to 120 or 140 skilled mechanics, and they are paying every year from $150,000 to $160,000 in wages. This is what is called the Smith Mills Purifying Company, and they manufacture a special article for mills. They brought many excellent hands with them from Michigan, including Mr. Hayward, the manager, with whom I engaged in conversation a short time ago. Speaking of the effects of commercial union, I asked him what the effect would be on that business. He said: "Mr. Hesson, I do not hesitate to say that the business would be closed up in four months if such legislation should take place in Canada. If we could get our goods into Canada we could manufacture them more cheaply in Michigan, in Jackson, than we can here, but, in order to keep the Canadian market, we find it better to manufacture here. If unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union were carried out, we would close our works in four months." My hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Trow) knows very well what that means as far as my own city is concerned. I leave other gentlemen to speak in regard to their own observations, but, as the hon. gentleman threw out a challenge that no industry had been established in Canada under the National Policy, and asked hon. gentlemen to say where any existed, I think it is only right that I should make this statement. That industry would not have come to Canada but for the protective policy of this Government. In future, I think my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) will not throw out that challenge when he knows now, if he did not before, that there are industries—and that is one of them,—that have been established in this country under the National Policy. I will not occupy the time of the House further, as I understand that there has been an arrangement to close this debate to-night.

Mr. TROW. I beg to correct the statement of the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson). I had no desire to rise on this occasion, but my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) stated that no new industry had been started under the National Policy, and my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Hesson) took up the challenge and said that a large industry had been started in the city of Stratford. I may state that that industry was started in the city of Toronto long prior to the time when it was brought to Stratford. It was started in Toronto under the name of Holland & Co.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

I had something to do, as my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Hesson) knows, with bringing it to Stratford. I had the honor and pleasure of taking down $8,000 to Toronto to bring the plant which was under way to that city long before it was brought into Stratford.

Mr. HESSON. It is quite correct, as my hon. friend has stated, that this industry was brought to Toronto. I believe the company had existed there for two years, but as they found they could do better with us than they could in Toronto, they removed to Stratford. My hon. friend is quite correct in stating that he took the $8,000 to Toronto, and, as he is aware, I was one of the guarantors of the fund until it was adopted by the corporation; but I may say that they would not have been in Stratford or in Canada if the National Policy was not in force.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the company in question commenced operations in Toronto, not by reason of the tariff laws at all, but by reason of the Patent Act. The company had a patent, and every hon. member knows that that Act requires that the articles which are patented must be manufactured in Canada within a certain time, I think within two years after the patent is issued. They desired to preserve their monopoly under the patent laws, and, therefore, they opened their factory in Canada instead of in the United States.

Mr. COOK. I have heard for the first time from the member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) that there was an arrangement made by which this debate was to be brought to a close. I am not aware of such an arrangement. I think every member has a right to speak at any time he thinks proper, and I do not think the member for North Perth, the Finance Minister, the leader of the Government, or any gentleman in this House, or any number of gentlemen have a right to make an arrangement to gag any hon. gentleman in this House. For my part, when I feel disposed to speak, I will speak, and I will not be dictated to by the leaders on either side of the House. I propose to offer a few remarks on this question, and I am going to do it as briefly as I can, if hon. gentlemen on that side will hold their peace for a time. If they do not, it will take me so much longer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. COOK. It does not make much difference to me when they cheer, as far as I am concerned. This is probably the proper time when any hon. member may discuss any question of importance in connection with the tariff rates of the country, and the members on both sides of the House, in this and in former debates have discussed the questions relating to the peculiar calling and also questions which they did not know so much about; but I was surprised to learn from a speech of an hon. gentleman who is interested in the lumber trade that the National Policy was a blessing to the lumber trade. I propose to deal with that matter for a time, but I do not propose to confine myself exclusively to the lumber trade. I think I know something about that trade, and I have the authority of a gentleman, who is perhaps the most intelligent of all the lumbermen of this country, and who is a supporter of the present Government but is opposed to the National Policy, that is Mr. Campbell of the Muskoka Lumber Co., who stated to me yesterday in Toronto that the National Policy has caused a loss to the lumbermen this year of not less than $2 a thousand. When you take into consideration the vast amount of lumber which is manufactured in the Dominion of Canada, you will see what an immense loss the lumbermen and the people of Canada have sustained. But I will go more minutely into the matter of the lumber trade. I will not deal with the lumber trade in the lower Provinces, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and the spruce trade in Quebec. I shall not allude to the trade in the North-West or British Columbia, but I shall confine my remarks almost exclusively to the pine trade in Ontario and Quebec. I think I will be able to show pretty clearly how that trade stands. I wish to show to the House the sales that have been made by the Province of Ontario since Confederation up to the present time. Before Confederation the hon. gentleman now leading the Government was in the habit of dealing out to his supporters, piece by piece, without any sale, or money, or reward, such limits as they felt inclined to take. He has adopted the same principle in the North-West Territories, giving to all his supporters timber limits in those territories that come within the jurisdiction of this House. In 1871, under the Sandfield Macdonald Administration, we had a sale in the Province of Ontario of 487 square miles, at an average price per acre of $241.62. In 1872, we had a sale on the north shore of Lake Superior, when Mr. Scott was Commissioner of Crown Lands, comprising an area of 5,031 square miles, the average price of which was $117.79. A great deal of that section of country was very poor, because a large amount of land had been put upon the market, and the price was low. But on the whole it was a very good sale. In 1877, there were 375 square miles sold, at an average of $201.97; in 1881, 1,397 square miles, at an average of $532.03; in 1885, there was a sale of 1,012 square miles, which averaged $304.87. Last year there was a sale of 459 square miles, at an average of $2,859 per mile. Now, hon. gentlemen will see how rapid of late the price of limits has increased. What is the cause of it? Well, it simply means that American capitalists are coming over here and acquiring our limits, competition is becoming greater, consequently the price is increased. I claim that what is now going on in reference to timber limits, will occur in all other businesses of the country. I claim that if our markets are thrown open, and we have the privilege of dealing with the Americans, American capital will come into this country, and what is now occurring in lumber, will take place in the mining interests, the agricultural interest and the manufacturing interest. Now, I will give some figures concerning the timber limits under license in Ontario. I give the figures for 1886; I do not take the figures for 1887, because a great many licenses have not been renewed in consequence of the depression in the lumber trade. The lumbermen are not very flush of money; and, therefore, have not yet renewed their limits. In 1886 we had under license in Ontario, 18,486 square miles, or 11,831,840 acres, estimated at $1,000 a mile, which would give a total value of $18,486,000. We have in the Province of Quebec—I take the figures for 1886 for the reason that we have not the Crown Lands report for 1887, which will not be brought down till the meeting of the Provincial Legislature. We have in Quebec, in 1886, 46,078 square miles of timber limits, or 29,489,920 acres, at an estimated value of $500 per square mile, which gives $23,039,000. The total value of timber limits in Ontario and Quebec is put down at $41,525,000. Now, we all know the timber resources of the Province of British Columbia, and of the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The timber of British Columbia differs from that of the Lower Provinces and of Quebec, because the spruce limits renew themselves every 8 or 16 years, according to the closeness with which they have been cut, and from the fact of the timber growing so thickly, the trees being so close together, the ground is sheltered, and there is a perpetual moisture, so that the fires do not destroy them, as a rule. Therefore the spruce limits in the Provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick will remain in perpetuity. Now, Sir, there was cut, in the Province of Ontario last year, 2,839,016 standard of logs, at 200 feet to a standard, making 567,803,200 feet; and at $10 per thousand, we have the total value of pine in the Province of Ontario for 1887, as $5,678,032. In Quebec, according to the report of 1886, they got out 2,187,098 standard of white pine, making 437,419,600 feet, which, at $10 a thousand, would give a value of $4,374,196. Therefore we have a total of pine timber in Ontario and Quebec for 1886 and 1887, of 1,005,222,800 feet. Now, according to Mr. Campbell's figures, the Canadian lumbermen are losers to the extent of $2 per thousand; but I take it at $1 per thousand, so that upon that vast amount of lumber, we are losing, according to that estimate, $100,522 a year. Then there is another great difficulty in that we have to compete with the American lumber in Michigan and Wisconsin. We have to cut our lumber considerably thicker than they do on the other side; as an average we cut it one-sixteenth of an inch thicker than the American lumber, so that upon every 16,000,000 feet of lumber that we manufacture, we lose yearly a million feet, which is a very serious loss. Then there is a difficulty in getting Americans to come in and purchase our lumber, in consequence of their customs duty being so great. The fact is that we have to send our lumber there and pay our transportation, and then when we get it into the American markets at Albany, Troy and other large cities, we have to compete with the Michigan lumber. Now the estimate is that we lose from this fact, upon the whole cut of our lumber from Ontario and Quebec, no less than 62,826,425 feet, which at $10 a thousand, would amount to $628,264 per year. We have a still greater difficulty to contend with. In consequence of the duties on our lumber we are unable to take inferior classes into the American market, but we are obliged to send the best and to do so we have to cut the finest trees and leave the poor ones to rot. Taking an average, I suppose probably one-quarter of the timber is left in the woods, but that could be marketed if we had unrestricted trade. We could send our coarse grades there and relieve our market in Canada, which would be a very great advantage because lumbermen are all aware that the coarser grades prevail. We sustain a still further loss, and it is a very important one. If we had unrestricted trade with the United States we would not be compelled to ship our lumber in the rough. There is a duty of 35 per cent. upon manufactured lumber, that is planed lumber or lumber put in shape for building purposes. That is a very serious matter. If the duty were removed we would manufacture lumber in Canada for the American market; we would be able to send lumber tongued and grooved and in proper condition for house building and other purposes, and this country would have the further advantage of having mills erected for the purpose and labor employed here to a very large extent. At the present time several of our lumber kings, such as Mr. McLaren and Mr. Bronson of Ottawa, have large planing mills at Burlington, Vermont. They send lumber there and it is manufactured and sent all through the United States. If we had unrestricted trade with the United States all that work could be done in this country by our own people. I have prepared an estimate of the number of men we would employ under such a state of things. I place the loss on freight alone at other $400,000. The loss on these three items is therefore $2,033,486 a year, or taking the nine years during which hon. gentlemen opposite have had the National Policy in force, that policy which was going to be a blessing to the lumberman, the manufacturer, the agriculturist, the miner and the laborer, the loss has been $18,301,374. I have made another estimate and I find that we employ about 24,000 men in the woods getting out logs and timber. The last census shows that there are employed at saw mills, shingle mills, door and sash factories, 47,352 men. Those figures give a total population of 356,760, taking five to a family. I remember that only last Session when the Minister of Finances was proposing to increase the duty on iron he declared that in a very short time we would obtain an increased population of 100,000 people on that account. I claim that by manufacturing lumber in Canada and being able to ship it free to the United States we would employ directly half a million people. What do we find in regard to all the manufacturing establishments of the country which hon. gentlemen opposite claim they have protected? In all the manufactures of this country there are only 206,583 persons employed, and I am sure not more than one-half of those manufactures are protected by the National Policy. I claim, therefore, that the lumbermen as a whole do not receive that fair consideration from the Government which they should obtain. I will not speak of the vast amount of money employed in plant required for the manufacture of lumber to place it in a state for shipment or speak further of the question of the increased value of the timber limits in this country; but we know that the Americans gave the increased value to our timber limits and that many of the citizens of Ottawa and those largely employed in the lumbering trade were at one time foreigners, and they have been the means of developing the lumber resources of the Ottawa Valley. At the last sale of timber limits Americans who have not heretofore been interested in Canadian limits, were the means of increasing the price of those limits to such an extent that the limits are now considered to be one of the main sources of revenue to the Province of Ontario. I will not detain the House by giving details of the lumber shipped to the United States last year, but I may just say that we shipped 508,304,000 feet, of the value of $5,209,023. I now refer to shipments to the United States and not to any other foreign country. There can be no doubt that the American market is the proper market for the lumber of this country. We have exported timber to Great Britain and in small quantities to other countries, but Great Britain will not take our better class, for they find they can obtain timber to suit their purposes cheaper from the Baltic. We find, moreover, that the Americans are more inclined to pay high prices for lumber than are the people of Great Britain, and, therefore, we must look to the United States for our market, and the sooner we make arrangements with that country to admit our lumber on good terms so much the better will it be for Canada. The United States will also be the gainers thereby, because at present they have to pay very high prices for coarse grades of lumber. If we were at liberty to ship the coarser grades of lumber the Americans would be benefited by that to a greater extent, and then our lumber coming into competition with theirs, the prices would be somewhat reduced. I happened to be in the House at the time we were discussing the probabilities of this tariff system—this blessed National Policy that hon. gentlemen opposite then proposed to inaugurate. After they came into power in 1878 I did not happen to be in Parliament when that system was inaugurated, for like many other hon. gentlemen I was swept out by the bugaboo cry of the National Policy. But just as soon as the electorate discovered that it was a sham and a snare they re-elected me and I have been here ever since. I expect to remain here as long as I like, notwithstanding the efforts of the hon. gentlemen opposite to defeat me, not alone in the election contest, but in the law courts. I had the pleasure the other night of telling the Finance Minister that now that the election had been decided and that there was no chance of another election, that he might appoint a collector of customs at Penetanguishene, a place he had kept open as a sop for his friends in the event of another election. I understood that the hon. gentleman stated something across the floor of the House to the effect that he had made the appointment, but I did not catch his words. I hope he has made the appointment, and I hope he has made a good one. We have heard a great deal about the balance of trade. We were told that unless the National Policy were adopted we would become poorer, and that the balance of trade would be against us. But what is the result? In the time of Mr. Mackenzie the balance of trade against us amounted to

Mr. Cook.

$11,876,910, and according to this year's reports the balance against us is $24,678,519, a difference of $12,801,609. I would like to ask the Finance Minister what has become of his promises which he made when his party were in Opposition, and when he was the financial critic on this side of the House? But it was said the poor miners at that time were in dire distress. Have they been benefited a great deal by this National Policy? The condition of the farmers at that time was one of the great cries. Sir John—if I may be permitted to use his name—who was leader of the Opposition, then said he would not touch the National Policy unless the farmers were to be protected. And one of his friends (I think it was Dr. Orton) moved a resolution that the farmers should share in the blessings of the National Policy. How have the farmers shared in that policy? We find that in agricultural products there is a falling off of $8,454,854. Hon. gentlemen opposite say: Oh, we consume it. Consume it, by whom? How many people more have you got to consume it now than you had then. You have only got 400,000 people more. The fact is the farmers have become disgusted with the whole matter and they are not raising the amount of cereals they raised at that time. The farmers have been disappointed and disgusted because they expected something great from the National Policy and they did not get it. Although I was defeated by the cry of the National Policy, I must do the farmers of my constituency the credit to say that in the county of Simcoe they were not hoodwinked by the National Policy cry, because in every polling booth where the farmers voted they increased my majority instead of decreasing it. It was only in the towns that my majority was decreased, and that was on account of the promises that the villages were to be built into towns and the towns into cities. They were to have more smokestacks in the towns, and the towns were to be crowded with artisans. I remember the hon. the leader of the Government when he was in Barrie, the chief town of the county, stated what he was going to do for that town, and that he was going to make it a city. It is a town still and has not progressed nearly as rapidly as some of the other places. He appears by his presence to have put a blight on the place, because immediately after the inauguration of the National Policy the increase was much slower than it had been for years before, and, Sir, that town has many years yet—unless they get such legislation in the Province of Ontario—before they will attain the position of being a city. It is said that during the last nine years the National Policy has been in force that a good deal has been done for the manufacturers in the country. We know that every other industry in the country, the farming, the lumbering and the mining have been bled to support the manufacturers, and yet we find that the manufacturers have only increased their export this year over that of 1878 by $1,635,804. The fisheries was another industry they were going to foster. How do they foster that? By a reduction of the export this year as compared with 1878 of $53,556. The hon. gentleman stated before he got into power that the Province of Ontario would become a pasture field and that we would grow nothing but cattle. It appears, however, that those gentlemen by the National Policy have made this country a pasture field and that they grow nothing very much more. Let us take the total export of lumber, and we find that we have exported $1,637,242 worth more this year than we did in 1878. I would like to know what the National Policy has done for that industry? The National Policy was the means of putting the hon. gentleman opposite in power and the means of defeating Mackenzie's Government, but Sir, the National Policy is not the means that has kept those gentlemen in power for the last two years. It is something else that has been done in the name of the National Policy, because the people are sick, and tired, and sore of that policy. They are kept in power by such means as the Minister of Finance stated when he said: It is well to have a Mr. Wiman in your ranks, a gentleman of means. They had some bloated manufacturers and we all know of the leader of the Government going to Toronto and calling those gentlemen together and asking them to put up the capital to keep him in power. We know where the means came from. When they resurrected the Neebing Hotel, the steel rails, and the Fort Frances locks, as the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McLelan) did to-day, I would refer them back to the Pacific scandal; and if the truth could only be known, we have had greater Pacific scandals than that of 1873, and many of those hon. gentlemen on that side of the House owe their seats to that Pacific scandal. Perhaps that member from British Columbia is one of them, with his fine white shirt front, or as a lumberman would say, his boiled shirt, who wishes to detract attention by calling names and making jibes, but perhaps he will not be successful in drawing me from my trail.

Mr. BAKER. Does the hon. gentleman address his remarks to me?

Mr. COOK. Of course. They were going to stop the exodus. They said the people were going out of the country too rapidly; the country was being depopulated; it would never do. But what classes have gone since? The flower of the country. Not the old men and the children, but the young men, twenty or twenty-five years old, who have just received their education, they are the men who go to swell the numbers in Uncle Sam's dominions. After we have been at the expense of educating them, and before they have become of any serious benefit or advantage to the country, they leave us and go to another country; and no wonder we are not growing the cereals that we did before. No wonder that our mines are being depleted; no wonder that the lumber trade is not in as flourishing a condition as it was in 1873, although one of the greatest depressions that was ever known swept over this country, and not only over this country, but over the United States and all other countries in the world, except little Switzerland, which was the most free trade country in the world. But those gentlemen on that side of the House did not hesitate in crying mad dog all along the line, or in declaring that we were not true to the country. They were the disloyal men at that time; they were the men who were crying stinking fish, and saying that the resources of the country were becoming depleted by the system adopted, a system that had been in vogue for years under the management of the leader of the Government. Sir, when he got to this side of the House, it was anything to return to the Treasury benches. He did not care how his friends decried the country, or what injury they did to the country, but when we on this side of the House state the plain facts of the case, we are disloyal. Well, Sir, I will have something to say about that loyalty question after a while. The hon. gentleman's chickens are coming home to roost. More than one hon. gentleman on this side of the House has spoken of the somersaults that have been taken by gentlemen on that side of the House during the last fortnight; most of them have been standing on their heads, if they have any heads. But if I were sitting behind a leader or a Government that would ask me to do as the hon. gentleman who leads them asked them to do within the last two or three weeks, I would soon tell them what I thought of them. The hon. Minister of Finance tells us in one breath that he made an offer of unrestricted reciprocity to the United States, and in the next breath I did not do it, or, at any rate, if I did, I did not mean it. Fine diplomatists they are to represent this country! Great High Commissioner! Wonderful man to deal with a nation like the United States! He says to them, we will offer you so and so, and then he comes home and tells us on the floor of Parliament, and the people of the United States too: We did not mean it; we only did it to draw them out; we only did it for a lark; we wanted to see how far they would go. Then he states that he did not meet a man in that country who was in favor of unrestricted reciprocity; he was in every class of society, from the highest to the lowest, and every man was against it. But he forgot to tell us what measures were being discussed in Congress at the present time. He forgot to tell us about the Mills' Bill that is going to reduce the taxes of the United States, by a vast amount. He forgot to tell us that President Cleveland, in his inaugural address, stated that he proposed making a reduction in the tariff. He forgot all these things, or probably he thought the people of this country do not read. Well, the hon. gentleman spoke of Mr. Wiman as the leader of the Liberal party to day, and the disciple of commercial union, and said we were going to be stranded on the rock of unrestricted reciprocity. Well, Sir, I am willing to be stranded on that rock; I would prefer to be stranded on it than on the rock of the National Policy, which has been a pretty hard one, not only on the branch of business with which I am connected, but on almost every other industry in the country. But the Finance Minister was a big man while he was there. He could consult with Mr. Wiman on that occasion. Mr. Wiman was not above his notice before he went there; and does he think that we have forgotten that Mr. Bayard recommended the hon. gentleman to the position of plenipotentiary? Does he forget that Mr. Wiman told Mr. Bayard that he thought Mr. Tupper would be a good man for that position? Was it Mr. Wiman that recommended him to Mr. Bayard? Was it Mr. Bayard that recommended him to the Home Government? And was he the spontaneous choice of the Home Government? We have some light thrown on the diplomatic arrangements that have been going on between the two countries; but, Sir, it is an exhibition that I hope I will never again witness the like of. Something has been said by hon. gentlemen on the other side, in reference to the question, how are we going to manage affairs so as to meet our expenses, suppose we obtain unrestricted reciprocity with the United States? How are we going to raise the revenue? Well, the hon. member for South Oxford has stated pretty plainly how it is to be done. We know from the past history of the country that these gentlemen opposite, through their extravagance, have increased our expenses during these last years from $23,000,000 to $35,000,000, and increased our national debt to a very large amount, about $100,000,000, or thereabouts. Then they raise the cry of direct taxation, should the policy we advocate be adopted. That is their great bugaboo. All over the country their supporters are crying themselves hoarse with declaring that the Grits propose to have direct taxation. I am not in favor of direct taxation. I do not believe it would be practicable in Dominion politics and I have come to the conclusion that perhaps it would not do to have it. But we have, as it is, a large direct taxation in this country, and the people do not find fault with that. We have a direct taxation in Ontario for municipal purposes, which, in 1873, amounted to $5,605,779 or $15.54 per head. In 1879 it amounted to $7,157,366, or $16.27 per head, and in 1885 to $8,323,370 or $17.20 per head. But the people have the opportunity of turning out the men who transact their business in the municipal councils, and if those gentlemen do not manage their affairs properly, the people soon get rid of them. Such would be the case here if we had direct taxation, and the hon. gentlemen opposite would not long remain on the Treasury benches. If every man who went into a store paid the price of the goods without taxation, and then was met by the custom house officer on going out and forced to pay the duty in cash separate from the price of the goods, he would soon find out what he has to pay under the present extravagant administration of the Government. But as it is, the people now pay taxes without knowing what they pay. On every $100 of revenue that is collected the people have to pay $54. Now hon. gentlemen opposite say a good deal about the deposits in the post office savings bank, and point to them as a source of wealth to the country. Well, the people put their money there because the Government give 4 per cent. and because there is no risk of loss. People who are afraid to invest their money in business put their money in the post office savings bank because they believe they are the safest institutions. You remember, Sir (Mr. White, Renfrew) because you were in the House at that time and took a lively interest in the debate, how you and your friends spoke of the faults of the system then in existence, and glorified in the system that was to be put in vogue when you succeeded in attaining office. I regret, Sir, that you did not succeed in reaching the Treasury benches, because I think you would be much more capable than some hon. gentlemen who got there. But now, when there are vacancies occurring in the Cabinet, it would give unbounded satisfaction to us on this side, so long as a Tory Government must be in power, to see you occupy one of the Treasury benches. I do not say this to boom you because you do not require it, and your leader must know you by this time, as you have been a long time in Parliament and have materially assisted your party throughout the country in their elections. To judge from the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, you would think it was all sunshine throughout the country, and that there was not such a thing known as destitution at all. These hon. gentlemen ought to visit some of the quarters in our cities, and they would soon discover that the contrary is the case. Only a short time ago, sermons were preached in every pulpit, throughout the length and breadth of the country, on depression and on the dire distress of the people. Only the other day, the Rev. Mr. McDonell, of St. Andrews Church, in Toronto, preached a sermon on that question, in which he stated that if he were to attend to all the cases of poverty brought under his notice, his usefulness as a minister would be gone, because he would have to give the whole of his attention to looking after the poor of Toronto. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about soup kitchens. There are worse than soup kitchens now, and there are soup kitchens are all over the country. The people whenever they get the opportunity are going to visit the sins of this Government upon the Administration, and I hope that opportunity will not be long in coming. Hon. gentlemen opposite pretend that on this question of unrestricted reciprocity the people are heartily with them. But let them only dissolve Parliament and go to the country and they will soon find out that the reverse is the case. Hon. gentlemen opposite take credit for the National Policy. Well, in my constituency, at every meeting held, both in the towns and in country places, my opponents on the platform, whoever they might be, took this National Policy as their stock in trade, and yet every time they attempted to talk on that question they were hooted. Now, if hon. gentlemen opposite are in office, it is due solely to the Gerrymander Act. Why, if the representation of Ontario in this House were based on a fair numerical adjustment of the population, instead of the Government having a majority of sixteen from that Province, they would have a majority of only one. I would like to ask, therefore, if that Gerrymander Act was an honest fair Act. I think the hon. gentleman should follow the principles laid down in England, whereby the counties are not laid out by the Government of the day, but by the judiciary. I wish he would do that, and further, that he would change the constitution so that the Provinces would raise their own revenue, so that we would not have the Province of Quebec or the Province of Manitoba, or the Province of Prince Edward Island, or the Province of Ontario coming to the Government on their knees, rapping at the doors of the Government, and asking for subsidies. The Provinces are the masters of the situation. The Provinces existed long before the Dominion was known, and to-day the Provinces ought not to be hampered in that way. They should be as free as the water which flows over into the Niagara River. It would make the Provinces more economical to do this, because, if they had to depend upon their own resources, they would be very careful with their funds, but now they say, we will expend our money, we will make our people happy and contented, and then we will go to the Dominion Government, and we will give Sir John a wink as to what we are going to do in the next election, and we will get what we want. As far as the National Policy is concerned, I think these gentlemen have come to the end of their tether. I was amused to hear the Finance Minister declare that he was to have a surplus of $97,000, when in reality he has a deficit of $350,000. How did he do that? By changing his accounts, by a sort of hocus pocus. If I had a book-keeper, or if any man in business in this country had a book-keeper who would so fix the accounts, he would dismiss him at once. The fact is that the hon. gentleman forces a trial balance, and he should be amenable to the law, and he would be amenable to the law if he were in the employment of any private firm. He is in a humiliating position to-day, by making these changes in his books, I suppose by giving instructions to his clerks to make the changes which have been made. How much more manly, and upright, and just it would have been if the hon. gentleman had come forward and said honestly: We have a deficit of $350,000; how much more would we have thought of him; but, when he changed that deficit into a surplus of $97,000, what will the hon. gentleman's friends think of him when they learn the fact? But, perhaps, he does not care about it. Perhaps he is going to leave us, he is going to London, where he can live comfortably and can hobnob with the nobility of the land, where he can keep in the midst of his wine tumblers and that sort of thing, and no doubt he will be better there than Croesus was when he was surrounded with the greatest amount of gold that any man ever had. I give the hon. gentleman this credit that he is very obliging, very respectable, and I will not say very intelligent, because everyone knows that he is intelligent and obliging and respectable, but I think in his capacity in London he deals fairly and honestly and liberally with every class of the community that comes from Canada, and I give him credit for that. There is one question I have rather overlooked, that is, the mineral resources of the country. My hon. friend the Finance Minister last year attempted to do something for the mineral resources by increasing the taxes, but that is not the way to increase a national industry. I say the taxes should be removed altogether, that it should be as free as the air that blows, and that, under those circumstances alone, will we be able to succeed in this country, particularly with the small population which we have. If we were a great country, like the United States, with 60,000,000 of people, we would be in a different position. If we had that barrier taken down, the manufacturers of this country would succeed better than they do now. The market has been glutted to a large extent. We have not the consuming population those hon. gentlemen promised us, and, except in regard to taxation, they have signally failed in the promises they made as to the results of the National Policy. What have we done in the way of minerals? It is well known that this country is possessed of great mineral resources, gold, copper, iron, silver, lead and other minerals. Last year, we only exported of all our minerals $3,805,959 worth, and in the last six years we only exported of silver, iron and copper, $318,660 worth from the whole Dominion. Now, what do we find on the other side? We find that in Michigan alone they produced in the last census year 45,830,000 lbs. of ingot copper, valued at $7,979,000, while in the same year the iron mines of that State produced 1,838,712 tons of ore, valued at $6,034,000. The copper companies of the State paid, in four years, from 1882 to 1885, dividends aggregating $10,352,000. We have as good copper mines in this country if they were developed, as they have, but we will never develop this country until we can induce people to come into it to help us to do it. If we would take down the barriers on both sides, American capital would flow in here. Perhaps some manufacturers would succumb, and some of them should, because if they could not live with a market of 65,000,000 or 70,000,000 of people, while they can exist on a population of 5,000,000, they should go to the wall. We have no right to pamper them. There is no reason why the people of this country should be taxed to keep them up. Then, salt was another of the great industries that the Government were going to protect. They did protect it and what was the result? The first return we had from the Geological report was in 1880, and that shows that the export of salt was 472,000 barrels, while in 1887 it was only 106,643 bushels, valued at $9,463. In Michigan, in 1860, when they were just developing their salt industries in the Saginaw Valley, they produced 4,000 barrels; in 1870, they produced 621,352 barrels; in 1880, they produced 2,635,538 barrels, and in 1886, they produced 3,677,257 barrels. So they steadily increased during those years, and we did not increase, though our salt is, I am told, as good as any which is produced in the Saginaw Valley. But the difference is this, the salt manufacturers of Michigan have 60,000,000 of people to sell to, and our salt manufacturers in Canada have only a few people to sell to, and, therefore, they could not succeed. Now, I want to make a few comparisons in order to show this House that although we have the finest country on the face of the earth—I believe there is no better in America, at all events, for growing cereals—our farmers are not progressing. Why, Sir, the farms of this country are not nearly so valuable as they are on the other side. Farm property in the State of Michigan, or Indiana, or New York, is almost double the value of land in Ontario, and the best part of Ontario, too. Now, I will give you a comparison between the city of Rochester and the city of Toronto; the emporium of Ontario, one of the finest cities, probably, in Canada, not to make any invidious comparisons. We all know that Rochester is a slow-going place compared with other cities of the United States. Therefore I am prepared to make a comparison between Rochester and one of the most prosperous cities of Canada. Land for business purposes, in the heart of the city of Toronto, is worth $1,500 a foot, in the city of Rochester, in the same business part of the city, it is worth over $3,000 a foot. So much for the value of land. If we had unrestricted reciprocity our farming lands would be worth as much as they are on the other side of the lines. Now, Sir, I will give you a comparison in wheat. In the State of New York they grow 14·3 bushels per acre; Pennsylvania, 12·6; Ohio, 13·3; Michigan, 16·4; Indiana, 13; Illinois, 12·9; Missouri, 10·9; California, 12; Kansas, 15; in Ontario we grow 21 bushels per acre, four or five bushels more than the best wheat-growing States in the Union. Now, how does this compare with the statement made by the Minister of Finance with reference to wheat growing in the North-west—60 bushels per acre? Sir, the farmers sitting on this side of the House—and I know something about growing wheat myself; I have done a little in that line—all shook their heads and laughed. Every farmer, I don't care who he may be, who has ever grown a bushel of wheat in this country, well knows the exaggerated statement made by the Minister of Finance. He made a similar statement a few years ago about the enormous yield in the North-West, and he reiterated it the other night, that they grow 60 bushels to the acre. Why, Sir, the farmers would laugh at him. He cannot go and hold a meeting among the farmers of this country, anywhere, and make such a statement as that. If he does, they will say that if his other statements are as correct as that, they would know just how much confidence to place in him. Then there is the question of spring wheat. In Nebraska they grow 12·7 bushels per acre; in Minnesota, 13·2; Wisconsin, 12·7; Dakota, 13·1; Iowa, 11·4; in Ontario we grow 16·1 bushels per acre, over three bushels per acre more than they do in the best States of the Union. Then we come to oats, and that brings me back to the canvass of 1878, when the leader of the Government went holding forth with his Neebing Hotel under one arm, and his steel rails under the other, and I don't know but that he had a model of the St. Frances locks. But he depicted them to the people. These were the three great cries he had against the Government. $10,000 in the Neebing Hotel. And the Minister of Finance and the Postmaster General had the hardihood to repeat these things. The Postmaster General might have let them die, but he felt inclined not to. But at present I am speaking of oats. The hon. gentleman spoke of myself as a lumber king, and he said the lumber king buys all his oats in Chicago, all American oats. I wrote the hon. gentleman a letter contradicting the statement. I do not know whether he received the letter, but he reiterated the statement, and I then had a statement put in the papers. I think he is a pretty close observer of the papers, although he may have overlooked that small item. I had a statement inserted in one of the papers that the statement he had made was entirely unfounded. Up to the present time I have never bought an oat from the State of Michigan or any other State. If I can buy them cheaper there, I will go there to buy them. Hon. gentlemen do it themselves. They go to the other side to buy everything that they require, that they can get here just as well. They are such sticklers for their country, and their National Policy, and the manufacturers of this country. Why, Sir, we know that hon. gentlemen even go to London to buy their clothes. They have the measures taken, even for their clothes, in a shop on Bond street, in the city of London, and the clothes are sent out here. Whether they fit them or not, I do not know, but the poor tailors of this country have discovered that a great many men who are loud-mouthed in their cry for protecting that class of industries, do not get their clothes made here, after all. Well, Sir, in the State of New York they grow 29·6 bushels of oats per acre; in Michigan, 32·9; Wisconsin, 31·1; Missouri, 26·2; Pennsylvania, 28·1; Indiana, 28·8; Minnesota, 34·6; Kansas, 31·9; Ohio, 32; Illinois, 34·5; Iowa, 34; Nebraska, 32. In Ontario, we grow 37·1 bushels per acre, so that we grow, of all these cereals, more bushels per acre than do the most favored States of the United States. Now, after looking at these figures, I want to know how it is that the farmers of this country have not raised more grain than they did in 1878? Why should there be such a falling off? Then there is the great question of barley. Barley is one of the most profitable crops our farmers raise. We exported last year over 5,000,000 bushels to the Americans. They will always take our barley, they are always glad to get it. Suppose, now, the duty of 10 cents per bushel was taken off barley going to the United States, what an advantage it would be to the farming community of this country! Now, we have an opportunity of making terms with the Americans for unrestricted reciprocity. I think it is within our reach, if our Government would only take the matter in hand. I do not wish to make it a question of turning the Government out of power. I am honest in my conviction that the Government should take hold of the matter and give us unrestricted reciprocity. They have discovered that the National Policy has been a failure, and knowing that they should grapple with this great question. By doing so they might keep themselves in power ten years longer, and I would be pleased to sit in Opposition for ten years if they would give us that great boon rather than cross the floor and sit under the National Policy. But if hon. gentlemen opposite do not give the people that for which they ask, and meetings have been held in different parts of the country and resolutions unanimously passed in favor of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, then they will discover when it is too late that they have made a mistake in not taking the advice given them from this side of the House. I know it to be a fact that many of our large and wealthy manufacturers are only waiting for the bars to be taken down to enter the United States market and compete with the Americans on their own ground. They can do it. Give them the opportunity; do not decry the ability of the Canadian manufacturer and workman. History has shown that the freer trade is the larger are the wages received by the workingman. Compare the wages in England and in Germany and you will at once see the difference. Those are the two European nations having different trade policies, Germany being highly protective and Great Britain free trade. Here is a comparison of wages:

Mr. Cook,

| | Gr Britain. | Germany. |
|-------------|-------------|----------|
| Bricklayers | $7.56 | $4.21 |
| Masons | 7.68 | 4.07 |
| Plasterers | 7.80 | 4.23 |
| Carpenters | 7.66 | 4.11 |
| Blacksmiths | 7.37 | 4.25 |
| Oigarmakers | 6.07 | 3.68 |
| Coopers | 7.50 | 3.97 |
| Laborers | 4.70 | 3.11 |
| Saddlers | 6.33 | 3.96 |

In conversing, some time before the question of reciprocity arose, with a prominent Conservative in Toronto, he said to me: The moment you propose that resolution Sir John will haul up the loyal flag and the people will flock to him. The Premier has hauled up the loyal flag, as he has done on many occasions before; but he has got to be a pretty old man and there are a great many young men coming up who cannot be hoodwinked, the young portion of the country cannot be carried by the loyalty cry and will not be hoodwinked by it. I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will raise this question at the general election, because I am satisfied that if that cry is raised we will be the victors. You know the story about the Quaker and the mad dog.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. COOK. The Quaker said: I will not raise my hand against it, but I will give it a bad name, and forever afterwards it will be called the mad dog. The hon. gentleman is going to raise the loyalty cry, and like the Quaker is going to raise the cry of mad dog, hoping that that will bring the people around him; but he is very much mistaken. Let me say a few words about loyalty. Who have been the loyal party? I am descended from the United Empire Loyalists, and I do not yield my loyalty to the leader of the Government or any one else. Hon. gentlemen opposite are loyal so long as it keeps them in place and power and they get the benefit of it. So soon as they see they could, by turning round and hob-nobbing with the United States, gain any advantage, politically, they would do it quicker than any men living, for it is a question of keeping themselves in power. I believe the leader of the Government is desirous of promoting the well-being of the country, but if it stands between him and political success, then the interests of the country will have to give way to political success. Who signed the annexation manifesto? Hon. gentlemen opposite know very well. The leader of the Government knows that he sat in council with some of those men. Who burned the Parliament buildings at Montreal? Why, the Tories. Who rotten-egged the Governor General, Lord Elgin, at Montreal? Why, the Tories. That very mace now lying on the Table before you, Mr. Speaker, has a history. The beaver was stolen from it at the time of the fire in Montreal. Who did it? The men who burned the Parliament buildings and rotten-egged the Governor General, that stole the beaver off the mace. Who was it that hoisted a black flag in Toronto? It was the Tories. Wherever there is anything disloyal you will find a Tory mixed up with it and when there is anything to be carried out that is not loyal it is carried out by the party who are always claiming they are the loyal party in the country.

The House divided on the amendment of Sir Richard Cartwright,

"The net debt of the Dominion of Canada was $140,362,069 on the 30th June, 1878;

"That the net debt of the said Dominion was $228,235,786 on the 31st March, 1888;

"That the total annual expenditure of the Dominion was $23,503,158 for the year ending 30th June, 1878, and $35,658,161 for the year ending 30th June, 1887;

"That the estimated expenditure for the year ending the 30th June, 1889, is $35,421,440, wholly apart from divers known unprovided expenditures which will raise the total amount likely to be expended to at least $37,000,000, being an increase of the net debt to the amount of $88,000,000, and of the total annual expenditure of $13,500,000, in the space of 11 years;

"That the said debt and expenditure have increased in a ratio very far in excess of the increase of the wealth and population of the country during the said interval;

"That the said expenditure is provided for by a system of taxation so adjusted as to press with extreme and unjust severity upon the thrifty and industrious producer, and especially upon all farmers, day laborers, mechanics, artisans, and factory operatives, who are at present subject to a customs taxation on articles necessary to life and comfort, amounting to nearly one thousand per cent. more than that levied upon members of the corresponding classes in Great Britain and Ireland

"That the mischiefs caused by the present system are further aggravated by the very general substitution of specific for ad valorem duties, whereby the injustice of the existing mode of taxation and the unfair preference shown to rich consumers over the less wealthy is at one and the same time increased and concealed, and that it is expedient that the said injustice should be remedied and that the wealthy classes should be compelled to bear their fair proportionate share of the burden of taxation;

"That this House views with alarm the extremely rapid increase of the debt and taxation of the Dominion, especially in view of the fact that there has been contemporaneously a very great reduction in the debt and amount required for necessary taxation by the United States, and that this House is of opinion that any considerable addition to the debt or taxation of the people of Canada will work very great hardship to the great bulk of the population and will tend powerfully to place them in a position of great disadvantage as regards the people of the United States, besides seriously prejudicing their chances of securing improved commercial relations with the people of that country."

YEAS :

Messieurs

| | | |
|--------------------------|----------------------|--------------------|
| Armstrong, | Fiset, | Mills (Bothwell), |
| Bain (Wentworth), | Fisher, | Mitchell, |
| Barron, | Flynn, | Mulock, |
| Béchar, | Gauthier, | Paterson (Brant), |
| Bernier, | Geoffrion, | Perry, |
| Borden, | Gillmor, | Platt, |
| Bourassa, | Holton, | Purcell, |
| Bowman, | Innes, | Rinfret, |
| Brien, | Jones (Halifax), | Robertson, |
| Cartwright (Sir Rich'd), | Kirk, | Rowand, |
| Casey, | Landerkin, | Ste. Marie, |
| Casgrain, | Lang, | Scriver, |
| Charlton, | Langellier (Quebec), | Semple, |
| Choquette, | Laurier, | Somerville, |
| Cook, | Lister, | Sutherland, |
| Davies, | Livingston, | Trow, |
| De St. Georges, | Lovitt, | Tureot, |
| Dessaint, | Macdonald (Huron), | Watson, |
| Doyon, | McIntyre, | Weldon (St. John), |
| Edgar, | McMillan (Huron), | Welsh, |
| Eisenhauer, | McMullen, | Wilson (Elgin), |
| Ellis, | Meigs, | Yeo.—66. |

NAYS :

Messieurs

| | | |
|-------------------|---------------------|--------------------|
| Audet, | Ferguson (Renfrew), | Masson, |
| Bain (Soulanges), | Ferguson (Welland), | Mills (Annapolis), |
| Baird, | Foster, | Moffat, |
| Baker, | Freeman, | Moncreiff, |
| Bell, | Gigault, | Montague, |

Mr. COOK.

| | | |
|----------------------|------------------------|-----------------------|
| Bergeron, | Gordon, | Montplaisir, |
| Bergin, | Grandbois, | O'Brien, |
| Bowell, | Guilbault, | Perley, (Assiniboia), |
| Boyle, | Guillet, | Perley (Ottawa), |
| Brown, | Haggart, | Porter, |
| Bryson, | Hale, | Prior, |
| Burns, | Hall, | Putnam, |
| Cameron, | Henderson, | Reid, |
| Cargill, | Hesson, | Robillard, |
| Carling, | Hickey, | Roome, |
| Carpenter, | Hudspeth, | Ross, |
| Caron (Sir Adolphe), | Jamieson, | Royal, |
| Chapleau, | Joncas, | Shanly, |
| Chisholm, | Jones (Digby), | Small, |
| Oimon, | Kenny, | Smith (Ontario), |
| Cochrane, | Kirkpatrick, | Sproule, |
| Cockburn, | Labelle, | Stevenson, |
| Colby, | Labrosse, | Taylor, |
| Corby, | Landry, | Temple, |
| Costigan, | Langevin (Sir Hector), | Thompson, |
| Coughlin, | Laurie, | Tisdale, |
| Coulombe, | Macdonald (Sir John), | Tupper (Sir Charles), |
| Couture, | Macdowall, | Tupper (Pictou), |
| Curran, | McCulla, | Tyrwhitt, |
| Daly, | McDougald (Pictou), | Wallace, |
| Daoust, | McDougall (O. Breton), | Ward, |
| Davin, | McKay, | Weldon (Albert), |
| Davis, | McKeen, | White (Renfrew), |
| Dawson, | McLellan, | Wilmot, |
| Denison, | McMillan (Vaudreuil), | Wilson (Argenteuil), |
| Desaulniers, | McNeill, | Wilson (Lennox), |
| Desjardins, | Madill, | Wood (Brockville), |
| Dickinson, | Mara, | Wood (Westmoreland), |
| Dupont, | Marshall, | Wright.—117. |

Amendment negatived.

House resolved itself into Committee on the resolutions.

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved :—

Resolved, That the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, whenever it appears to his satisfaction to be desirable in the public interest so to do, either reduce or remove entirely or in part, the export duties provided for by section six of the Act respecting the duties of customs, and by schedule E thereto, or by an Act in amendment thereof.

Resolved, That section nine of the said Act be repealed and the following substituted therefor :—

"9. Any or all the following things, that is to say :—Animals of all kinds, hay, straw, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots), salt, peas, beans, barley and malt, rye, oats, buckwheat, flour of rye, oatmeal, buckwheat flour, butter, cheese, fish of all kinds, fish oil, products of fish and of all other creatures living, in the water, fresh meats, poultry, stone or marble in its crude or unwrought state, lime, gypsum (ground or unground), hewn or wrought burr or grindstones, and timber and lumber of all kinds, unmanufactured in whole or in part, including shingles, clapboards and wood pulp, may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by any Act at the time in force, upon proclamation of the Governor General, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such proclamation when imported into Canada."

Resolved, That section ten of the said Act be repealed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Just state the alteration proposed to make in the existing law.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What articles are left out?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The article of green fruit is left out because they are now there by proclamation.

Mr. MULOCK. Will not the repeal of the Act repeal the proclamation?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, the proclamation has placed them on the free list and nothing would subject them to duty but an Act of Parliament.

Mr. MULOCK. Does not the proclamation depend upon that Act?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not at all.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What are the articles?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am now reading the articles omitted from the old list. Green fruit is omitted, bran is omitted, seeds of all kinds for the same reason that they have been included in the proclamation, that is they are partly free; plants, trees, shrubs, coal and coke, hops, wheat, Indian corn, flour of wheat, flour and meals of any other kind, lard, tallow, salted or smoked meats are omitted, and there are added that are not now in the present list, fish of all kinds.

Mr. MITCHELL. Salted as well as fresh?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, fish of all kinds; also fish-oil, fish products, fresh meats, poultry, wood pulp, stone in the rough, marble in the rough, burr and grindstones, lime and calcined gypsum. I may say that many of those alterations are made in conformity with the Mills' Bill, so that I have adopted the same designations as were used there and have added some articles; for instance, stone in the rough, marble in the rough, grindstones, calcined, gypsum, and poultry, which are included in the Mills' Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. Were not wheat and the produce of wheat in the Bill?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, none of those were in the Bill.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the hon. gentleman's reasons for omitting those articles that he now omits from the statutory offer beginning with bran, if I took him down correctly, and going down to salted meat?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I stated that while you would be prepared as a question of treaty, to put on any number of articles that you might not desire to have made free, because taking the arrangement as a whole you obtain the insertion of other articles that you desire very much. When you come to make those articles free by legislative enactment it became necessary to revise the list and the list would be revised from time to time. I am governed to some extent by the movements made in the Congress of the United States. I considered it not desirable to embrace in this articles which are not embraced in the Mills' Bill, and I have embraced a number that are embraced in that Bill. I think we must now deal with the revision of the system from time to time. While we retain it as a statutory offer, it must be from time to time revised in such a way as to meet the interests of Canada and the wishes of our own Parliament.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is coal in the Mills' Bill?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, Mr. Chairman, I did not feel disposed to take up the time of the House, as gentlemen much more able to discuss the Budget than myself desired to speak and have spoken at considerable length; but I cannot allow this measure to pass without again, as I have done Session after Session, calling the attention of the Government to the fact that wheat and the produce of wheat, and corn and the produce of corn, have been omitted from the list. I have repeatedly on former occasions pointed out the great injustice that is done to the lumbering and fishing classes in my own county by the principle that makes them pay a duty on the food they eat as well as the clothing they wear, and everything that enters into the consumption and maintenance of life. I feel that year after year, when the system of protection is being aggravated very much, that it is an injustice to that class of the community, to allow such an opportunity as this to pass without adding these items to that statutory offer of reciprocity. I am not going to make a speech about it; it is useless. If I did not know it was so hopeless I would take up a good deal of time to prove to this House the injustice, and I would feel it my duty to divide this House on the point. But as I have done it before, and may have an opportunity of doing it again before the Session closes unless the Government revise their decision, I will not take up the time of the committee now. I therefore simply enter my protest against the omission from that statutory offer of these articles, at the present time, when everything looks so favorable to our getting the United States to meet us on a fair reciprocal basis. I think if there is anything that should be put on the free list it is the food of the working classes.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I object to the course the Government are pursuing in this matter from exactly the opposite reason to that stated by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. I think their course is objectionable on several grounds. It is objectionable because I think it is humiliating in this country to be playing this sort of a game with the United States. I object to playing a game when I am playing second with a low card, never have a trump and never get a trick, and that is exactly the position we are standing in with relation to the United States. I also object because I think as a matter of principle any such arrangement, whether by treaty or by statutory enactment is in itself antagonistic to the National Policy. I contend that if we are to carry out the National Policy we must carry it out in its entirety. We cannot add a little bit here, and take off a little bit there, and say we will put this or that on the free list; and at the same time do justice to the great bulk of the community. I merely mention these two grounds, because I think the time must soon come, and the sooner the better, when if the Government are to stand by the National Policy, which this House and the country have supported them in, they must begin by repealing that statutory clause altogether. It may be said that that clause is only permissive; yet so long as we have it on the Statute-book, it is to some extent binding and obligatory upon us. If not, why do we put it there? We must also remember what we seem to have forgotten on this side of the House at any rate, in the debates that have taken place, that this country has not stood still since 1878—that what would have been a perfectly just and reasonable policy at the time of the initiation of the National Policy may naturally be expected to be entirely unreasonable and unsuitable to the present conditions. If the National Policy has done anything during the time it has been in force, it must have created a great many industries, and therefore have placed the country in an entirely different position. Therefore, acting as we are doing now is almost equivalent to saying that the National Policy has not altered the condition of things in this country. I contend that it has altered them, and very much to the better, and it is because I believe in it that I do not wish to see it hampered in its operation by a reciprocity treaty or by any such provision as this, which is in some respects as binding and obligatory as a treaty. For these reasons I object to the course taken by the Government. In pursuing it, I think they will be digging a pitfall into which they will ultimately fall.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I regret that the hon. gentleman should have taken from the list any article that was there before. He has taken off corn and corn meal, and wheat and the flour of wheat. In doing so I think he is making a very great mistake. He is certainly not acting in the interest of the agricultural population of this country. He is leaving on barley; yet when there was no duty at all imposed on American barley coming into this country, none came; the barley went in the other direction. Does he suppose that the Americans are going to act on that statutory offer by taking the duty off barley if he leaves the duty on corn? It is in the interest of the agricultural population, who are raising stock, to have the privilege of obtaining corn from the United States to feed to their stock, because we raise in this country a quantity of that article altogether inadequate to our wants. The hon. gentleman proposes to agree to have free trade with the United States in certain natural products in which the exports are from Canada; but in regard to those articles which Canada imports he does not propose that any statutory offer shall exist. In making that proposition I cannot believe the hon. gentleman to be sincere. It looks like an attempt to put on the Statute-book an offer which he knows will not be accepted. What is he asking the House to do? He is asking it to guarantee the interest of a very large sum to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to remove the restraints that exist against the importation into the United States of the growing products of the North-West, and yet he proposes by removing wheat and wheat flour from that statutory offer to interfere with the freedom of trade between the North-West and the United States. I say that in doing that he is taking a retrograde step. If he is, as he says, in favor of free trade in natural products, why does he remove any natural product from the list? He is either in favor of free trade in natural products or he is not. Why, every Minister who has spoken on the subject has declared himself in favor of free trade in natural products. Then, why remove any natural product from that statutory offer. Take another case. The hon. gentleman told us he was in favor of free trade in coal with the United States. He has told us so repeatedly. But now what does he propose to do? He proposes to take coal out of the statutory offer. He proposes to keep upon the people of Ontario a tax that is imposed upon the people of none of the other Provinces; he proposes to retain this very large tax that falls exclusively upon the people of Ontario. The hon. gentleman knows that he has repeated every Session, and hon. gentlemen behind him have echoed his statement, that the tax on coal does not increase the price of Canadian coal in Canadian markets. But he knows that he has collected nearly $1,000,000 from the people of Ontario on coal alone. There is not a town or city in the Dominion, there is not a town or city in the Province of Ontario, the people of which do not consume coal during five months of the year, and yet the hon. gentleman undertakes to impose a serious tax upon them, which must seriously weigh on their earnings. Why, I have seen myself, during the present winter in London, the children of poor people purchasing 10 cents, 15 cents, or 20 cents worth of coal or wood, and the hon. gentleman proposes to impose a tax upon the fuel which is to keep these people in comfort during the winter season. That is what the hon. gentleman proposes to do. He knows that at present there is a Bill before Congress proposing to remove the duty upon coal, which Bill will probably be carried, and yet, in order that he may avoid removing the tax upon coal, which falls very severely upon the poorer population of the cities—

Mr. MITCHELL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What Bill does the hon. gentleman refer to?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I refer to the proposition that is now before the Congress of the United States.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Any tariff Bill?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What is it?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I cannot tell the hon. gentleman at this moment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I know of no such Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then the hon. gentleman has not taken the trouble to read the American papers.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have followed them closely.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman now is proposing to remove coal from the list in the statutory offer. Why does he do so? If he thinks that there is no proposition to be made by the United States, no mischief, even according to the protectionist's view, can arise from leaving coal there. If there is to be such a proposition, the hon.

gentleman puts it out of his power to place coal on the free list; and I say it is a serious tax upon the poorer population of Ontario. Then the hon. gentleman has referred to the effect of the proclamation that has issued. Of course the proclamation does not remain in force when the statute upon which it rests is repealed. The proclamation falls with the statute. The articles are put upon the free list, but they do not remain there. If they do, there is no provision of the law that the former state of things shall be revived. I do not know whether there is a provision in the hon. gentleman's tariff Bill which provides that the enumerated articles shall be subject to a certain rate of taxation. If so, it is possible that those articles might be so included, but I suppose the hon. gentleman intends to put those articles, upon which the duty has been removed by the proclamation, in the tariff, upon the free list.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They are on the free list now.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman propose to put them on the enumerated free list of the tariff?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They are on the free list by law.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that the proclamation by which they are put there is gone when the statute is repealed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) I say if you repeal section 9, you repeal the proclamation which was carried in virtue of the power given by section 9. There can be no doubt about that. If an article is put upon the free list and there is no statute to interfere, and there is a provision that the former state of things is not to revive, it will remain on the free list. It will require a positive Act to revive the tax once it is removed, but the hon. gentleman knows there is a provision in the law that all enumerated articles—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is not an enumeration of the articles to leave them out of the list.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They will require to be put on the free list and specified in the tariff.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says no. I have not looked carefully into the Act for that purpose, but certainly the reason he has given is not at all adequate. The hon. gentleman says he proposes to follow the Mills' bill. I find that petroleum is put in that Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say that I proposed to follow the Mills' Bill. I said the very reverse.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman said he would leave certain articles out of this Bill, because they were left out of the Mills' Bill, and that he would include certain articles because they were put in the Mills' Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did, but, I did not say I proposed to follow the Mills' Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The statement the hon. gentleman has just made, is wonderfully like the same thing:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is a great distinction between the two. I stated that when you came to deal with this question by legislation, both Governments were left entirely free to pursue the course that their own interest indicated as the best. That is the position I took, and wherever I found in the Mills' Bill an article I wanted to take advantage of and to make free I embraced it in this list, and if I find an article in that Bill that it is not in the interest of this country to have free, I am under no obligation whatever, because I know it was put in the Mills'

Bill purely and simply with the view of considering the interests of the United States market.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the Mills' Bill were going on the line which the hon. gentleman mentioned and without reference to what might be done here, it is very extraordinary, as the hon. gentleman must see, than the articles of corn should be left out. What I was calling the hon. gentleman's attention to was that he might find that while the Americans would be willing to give us a remission of duty upon barley and a number of other articles, the natural products of the country, they might be willing to do so wholly upon the condition that we would be willing to take the duty off corn; yet the hon. gentleman puts it out of his power to accept an offer which on the whole might be advantageous to the country. Even taking the hon. gentleman's view that some of them are more advantageous than others and some may not be advantageous at all standing alone, they might be advantageous taking the whole together. The hon. gentleman has said that his leader has stated that they would like to have reciprocity with the United States in natural products, and I am calling the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that he is seeking, by these provisions, to leave out some of those natural products, the free interchange of which he thinks would be to the advantage of this country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I find myself between two fires. In the first place, my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) objects to our having a statutory clause at all. I must remind my hon. friend that we are not bringing forward a statutory clause, but that, from 1849, in the old Province of Canada, this clause has been on our Statute-book. The Treaty of 1854 enlarged it very much; then, in 1866, the treaty having been abrogated, the clause was again put on our Statute-book, and it was re-enacted in 1867, 1868, 1870 and 1879. So we are not bringing forward the clause now. I am inclined to think that, if it was not already there, we might not be occupied as we are at this moment, but, the clause being on the Statute-book, we are of the opinion that it would not be wise that it should disappear, it would not be wise, at the present time and under the present circumstances, that it should be taken away. I do not hesitate to state to the House my position and my opinion in reference to this subject. I am in favor of having all the products of the farm, the products of the forest, the products of the mine and the products of the sea made free between these two countries. In my judgment, we might adopt the whole of that policy, and I say more, that both parties in this country have professed to desire that for many years. In my judgment, such a policy would be one that might fairly be entered upon with advantage to both countries, but we know that all our efforts to obtain a reciprocity treaty which would make all these products free have entirely failed; and, under those circumstances, the legislature of Canada ever since 1849 have been placing a statutory provision in their laws in regard to a number of articles—not all those which were in the Reciprocity Treaty, not by any means all those articles which would be embraced in the category to which I have alluded in the products of both countries—but they have selected a number of articles to be placed in this position. Now the time has come when it is clearly indicated on the part of the Congress of the United States that they do not intend to deal with fiscal question by any other mode than by legislation, and we find a Bill brought forward in the House of Representatives there which proposes to place certain natural products of this country and of others upon the free list. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) on the other hand, unlike my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), who thinks this provision goes too far, complains that it does not go far enough, and he speaks especially, he says, in the interest of the lumbermen. What is the first clause of the Bill? It is a new enactment which I am asking the House to put on the Statute-book in the interests of the lumbermen. I do not think my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), much as he may object to making some of the natural products free, will say that it would injure the lumbering interests of Canada to obtain free admission for all our lumber to the market of the United States.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Our lumber, but not our sawlogs—that is the point.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the position in which we find ourselves. Here is the great lumber interest of this country which has the prospect of having the market of the United States opened to it free by the Mills' Bill, which I am strongly of opinion will become law during the present Session of Congress. If that is put on the Statute-book of the United States, we would not be able to take advantage of it, because there is a provision which says that no lumber shall be admitted into the United States free from any country which has an export duty on logs. We have an export duty on logs, and the first clause in this Bill is to enable the Governor General in Council to remove that export duty on logs so as to give the great lumber interest of this country free admission into the markets of the United States, if that Bill passes. I have already stated why this measure has been revised. It is one thing, as I have already said, to make a treaty, but it is an entirely different thing to deal with questions of this kind by legislative enactment, and the moment this question is settled, as it undoubtedly is settled by the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, that it is in violation of their constitution to deal with these fiscal matters without legislation passed by both Houses, we have to decide how far we shall go on one side or the other. The United States will decide to put on the free list, as they did in regard to lumber, such articles as they think will conduce to their own interests without any reference to our action. We, from time to time, will revise our list, and deal with our fiscal policy precisely as the Congress of the United States declares it will deal with theirs. We will make such articles free as we think the interests of Canada demand, and we will impose duties on such articles as we think the interests of Canada require. I think that will commend itself to members on both sides of the House. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has referred to coal. He must not forget that this Government without being moved to it by any party anywhere, removed the duty on anthracite coal, which had given us a revenue of $500,000 a year, and the hon. gentleman knows that the Province of Ontario, from which he comes, largely receives the benefit and the advantages of the remission of that duty. The hon. gentleman is perfectly aware that, deriving, as we do a large revenue from coal, it might seriously derange our financial arrangements if suddenly, in relation to that or any other article, an alteration were made, and we were placed in such a position that we would have no option but to make that article free. We have confined this list to such articles as it would be in the interest of Canada to make free, and that will be subject to revision from time to time as, in the judgment of Parliament, it may be found necessary to act in the interests of this country.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. the Finance Minister has referred to my objections to the form of the statutory offer, and he says I referred especially to the lumbermen and to the fishermen, and in that he is correct. He states that the provision in the first part of the Bill covers any advantage which the lumbermen might fairly expect.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say so. I said the first clause was in the interest of lumber and in the interest of salt, which are the two articles the first clause deals with.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. MITCHELL. My hon. friend knows that no proportion of the class of people I have referred to in the Lower Provinces, will derive any benefit whatever from the first clause. Talk about salt. Can they take salt from Western Ontario down to the fishermen along our coast?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not mean to say that; but I meant to correct myself in saying that the first clause dealt entirely with the interest of the lumbermen. I had omitted to state that salt is also included, and that it had no reference to the hon. gentleman's constituents.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am speaking from the standpoint of constituents now, and from the standpoint of a very much larger sphere. I wish to let the hon. gentleman understand that the advantages given, as he claims, to the fishermen by the first section of the Bill providing for salt—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No; the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. I had no reference to advantages to fishermen whatever. The salt industry is entirely an Ontario interest, so far as the action of this Bill is concerned. It had no reference to the fishermen whatever. I merely referred to it as being in the Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman referred by special direction to the objections I took on the ground of the fishermen and lumbermen, and when he spoke of lumber and salt I assumed that he meant to point out the special advantages to be derived by the class of constituents I represent; the fishermen of that section of the country know better than the hon. gentleman that a very large portion of the population of the Maritime Provinces is largely engaged in fishing, and another large portion engaged in lumbering.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And they have all the salt free now.

Mr. MITCHELL. I know they have salt free, but the hon. gentleman put forward the question of salt, and I assume that he referred to that as he did to the question of the lumbermen being benefited by the first clause of that Bill. As to the advantages lumbermen get under that Bill, I do not think it has anything to do with the duty on flour and provisions that are used by men engaged in the lumber business. When I speak of the lumber interest I do not allude only to the men who carry on business in the woods, but I allude to the laboring classes that form so necessary a part of the lumber business, forming forty to one of the class the hon. gentleman refers to, the lumbermen proper. Now, I think it is pursuing a course to be regretted to leave out all these items and also the item of coal; and I think it is pursuing a course not to the advantage of the country. The hon. gentleman speaks of the advantages that have been given to Ontario by the admission of hard coal free. Why should a special portion of this country be selected for special advantages under this Bill? Why should New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, and a considerable portion of Nova Scotia too, be left out of the advantages which free coal would give them? If there is a loss of duty amounting to nearly half a million, by the act of the Government, in the admission of anthracite coal free for the benefit of Ontario, why should not the Maritime Provinces participate in those benefits, by taking the duty off soft coal? My hon. friend will say it would tend to discourage the miners of Nova Scotia. Sir, I was speaking to the manager of one of the leading mines in Nova Scotia the other day, the Spring Hill mine, and I asked his opinion about the effect of free coal. He said he would be glad to see coal free, he wanted no advantage from it; and he pointed out to me why, and his explanation was perfectly satisfactory. I can see no reason whatever why our people should be subjected to the disadvantages which result from the treatment which they have received by the preferences given, as shown in the instance the hon. gentleman has referred to in the case of Ontario and free coal. Now, this treatment has been going on quite long enough. I recollect the subject was brought four years ago before the then Finance Minister, the present Governor of New Brunswick, and an intimation was given very like a half promise that the duty would be taken off cornmeal, and I dare say some hon. gentlemen will recollect it. Now, if the hon. gentleman takes out of this list of statutory articles which they propose to make free, omits from it corn and the produce of corn, wheat and the produce of wheat, and barley and the produce of barley, if the American adopt the Mills' Bill and put them in, he precludes this country from getting the advantages of the powers that these very gentlemen would have the right to exercise under the law now, if these things were included. The hon. gentleman speaks as if we were to follow the United States alone. Why should they only follow the United States? Why should they only follow the Mills' Bill? The hon. gentleman says that if the United States make a certain article free, it is for the interest of Canada that that article should be made free also, that they may come, Session after Session, and take powers to make it free. Why do they not take powers now and reserve to themselves the right only to accept such articles as are in the interest of Canada—and this House would not hesitate to give them the power. That is, in my opinion, the course these hon. gentlemen should pursue, and not pursue that which is evidently their determination, refuse to let the food of the people come in free. It is time this legislation for localities was done away with. I would remind my hon. friend that it has been stated in the press of the United States that there should be a clause—I do not know whether it should be put in the Mills' Bill or whether in a separate Bill, because there is a separate Bill talked of—there should be a clause put in one of these Bills that the free list which it is proposed largely to extend by that or some other Bill, shall not apply to Canada or any country that has certain stipulations against the United States which Canada has to-day. Now, Sir, one of these is fish, and I would like to know if my hon. friend is determined to impose upon the fishermen of our country the exclusion of fresh fish from the markets of the United States?—for that is what that Bill would mean, if there is anything in the statements of the American press. I need not tell my hon. friend that it would mean hundreds of thousands of dollars out of the pockets of the fishermen of the Province of which I have the honor to represent one county. It is a very serious position in which to place the fishermen of our country, in the future, in carrying on their business. I need not tell this House, because a dozen men in this House already know it, that to some counties in the northern portion of New Brunswick, and especially the one I represent, the free markets of the United States for fresh fish are of the greatest importance, and are, perhaps, the source of the living of a large number of people during the winter season in catching fresh fish and sending them through to the United States. But I very much fear, from the tone of the press of the United States, and what is said in relation to the treatment Canada has given them, that we may find ourselves excluded in the article of fresh fish from the markets of the United States, and I would very much regret it.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I have no doubt the Finance Minister is correct when he said that the changes proposed by the American tariff Bill were more with reference to their own interests than to the interest of Canada. But be that as it may, I think it would not be wise for us to close the doors against any proposal looking to the enlargement of the free list between the two countries. Now, the list which is proposed by the present resolution omits some of the important articles which we do not import from the United States, that is to say, animals of all kinds, hay, straw, potatoes, peas and beans, barley, rye, oats, buckwheat, oatmeal, buckwheat, flour, cheese, gypsum, timber, and lumber of all kinds, manufactured wholly or in part, including clapboards and wood pulp. Now, it must be remembered that we do not import any of these articles from the United States at the present moment; therefore putting them on this list is merely with the object of conveying to the country the idea that we are going to be very generous in making an offer to the United States for the free admission into our country of certain articles when these articles are placed on the free list of the United States. The omission of coal and wheat from the free list may, it appears to me, prevent our having the advantage of the Mills' Bill, provided it passes. The hon. gentleman drew attention to the fact that last year we paid, as he said, although I see it is corrected in his revised speech, $1,800,000 on lumber shipped to the United States. If they place that on the free list and other articles which are on the free list at present they should also place coal, which the hon. gentleman says they propose doing, and we should place certain articles, not coal or wheat, on the free list, then I am afraid it might prevent their allowing that clause to go into operation. They might say that unless you admit all those articles free, including coal, coke, wheat and breadstuffs of all kinds, we will not admit lumber and other articles which it is to the interest of this country should be admitted free into the United States. It would, therefore, be wise for the Government to take power, whether they exercise it or not, to be able under certain circumstances that may arise, when the Government may be able to dispense with the revenue which they at present derive from the importation of coal and which I admit is a large item—if the Americans should place coal and other articles on the free list the Government would be able to deal with the matter, if they saw their way clear to do so. If they put it out of their power to deal with it and the Americans pass that Bill enabling lumber and other articles to go in free to the United States, I say they may naturally turn round and say: We are not going to give you what you offer unless you place all those articles on the free list in Canada. It is in that the Finance Minister would do well to amend his proposal and place those articles on the free list, coal and coke and breadstuffs of all kinds, so that they may be able to deal with the matter if occasion should arise by the Americans placing them on the free list, otherwise those interests in which we are concerned in the proposal now before Congress might lose the benefit of free admission of articles into the United States.

Mr. WATSON. I desire to ask the Minister of Finance if it is his intention to include flooring and siding in manufactured lumber.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We say manufactured in whole or in part.

Mr. WATSON. You specified clapboarding. I regret that the Finance Minister has not seen fit to place on the free list the two articles which some of the members for Nova Scotia are afraid unless they are placed on the free list will not be admitted into the United States free. As representing a country that might be supposed to be protected by the duty on wheat, I say that Manitoba regrets as well as New Brunswick does that the duty has not been taken off wheat. The Americans are now coming into the North-West to buy our hard wheat, which has brought 10 cents more per bushel in Dakota this year than in Manitoba. In fact they have sought that wheat in large quantities, notwithstanding the duties, and about 100,000 bushels have been shipped to the United States for seed, with a view to improving the quality of wheat grown there. It is well known that the area for producing hard wheat is rapidly diminishing, and I believe it would be to the interests of Manitoba to place wheat on the free list. A duty on wheat is no protection to any farmer in the Dominion, it simply prevents their selling wheat in the best market available. I also wish to draw the attention of the committee to the duty on coal. I believe if the duty were removed from coal a large part of the North Western States would be supplied with soft coal from mines in the North-West. There has been a large shipment of anthracite coal from Banff mine to California, some 10,000 tons having been shipped already. If we had unrestricted reciprocity a large portion of the North-Western States would be supplied from our North-West coal fields, and if coal were placed on that list we might hope to have unrestricted trade. Another article from which the duty should be removed is potatoes. There have been a hundred carloads of potatoes sent to St. Paul and Chicago during the present season, and some also to St. Louis. It was my intention to have addressed the House on the question of unrestricted trade, but I am able to say that so far as Manitoba is concerned we have nothing to protect and no benefit can be obtained by us from a protective tariff. We are in a position to defy the competition of the world in natural products. Of manufactures we have very little indeed, and we do not wish to have them protected to the injury of the development of our agricultural resources. Manitoba would hail with pleasure the adoption of such a policy as has been introduced by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). We grow the best wheat, we have the largest number of acres in natural products, and if we had free intercourse with the United States, the North West would prosper more than it has in the past. I hope that agricultural products and agricultural implements will be placed on the free list ere long. It is as important for a farmer to obtain cheap implements as it is to protect him in anything for him to grow. The duties paid on certain articles are imposed in the interests of two or three constituencies in Canada. The duty on fruit, which has been referred to, benefits only two or three constituencies. Coal in a like manner. Hon. gentlemen from the east have explained to me that if coal was placed on the free list they would be in a better position than at present. It is unnatural for coal to reach further west than Ottawa. Not a ton of coal from Nova Scotia goes as far west as Toronto. If the Government propose to operate a railway in the interests of the coal miners of Nova Scotia and carry coal free to them, but at the cost of the people at large, it may be done. This policy of free trade should be ratified, and ratified in the very near future.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman seems entirely to misapprehend the scope of this measure. It is not to place anything on the free list. We have not power to put anything on the free list in the manner to which the hon. gentleman has referred, coal or wheat or breadstuffs entering the United States. It is the other way. All this does is to enable us, in case of legislation in the United States making the articles free, to place them on our free list by an Act. The hon. gentleman must not forget, and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) must not forget, that we have had coal on the statutory offer since 1879. The United States have not placed it on their free list. There are only two tariff measures now before Congress and neither the Mills nor the Randall Bill has any reference to coal, corn, wheat, flour or meal.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.). Does the hon. gentleman say Indian meal is not in the Mills' Bill?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say it is not, and while we have had it on our statutory offer since 1879, as well as coal, coke, and meal, and grain, and flour, and potatoes, not one of those articles are in either of the Bills that are before the United States Congress. It has been shown that putting those in the statutory offer has not accomplished anything at all. We have tried that and it has failed. In fact I am inclined to think it has had a very contrary effect. I am inclined to think that putting coal on our statutory offer leads them to the conclusion that it is a great advantage to us to have coal free, and that rather prevents its being put on the free list in the United States. The same thing may be said of wheat and those other articles. I am just as anxious as the hon. gentleman is to see them include potatoes and I hope their Bill may be still amended before it becomes law as to include potatoes, and therefore I am anxious we should be in a position to take advantage of it.

Mr. WATSON.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Do you wish them to include coal and wheat?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have not said that. I said we have had it in the statutory offer since 1879 and neither the Mills' Bill nor the Randall Bill now before Congress propose to make those articles free.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has told us two or three times to-night that those articles were on the statutory offer since 1879. Knowing as he does the hostility to anything like free trade in the United States during that time, he has taken good care not to tell the House what I believe to be, is the change of sentiment, and what others believe to be the change of sentiment in the United States, in the direction of free trade. Notwithstanding the arguments that are made to the contrary, I believe that the free trade sentiment is making its way in the United States, and in view of that fact it is now proposed that we should take off some of the most important items, such as coal and wheat, from the statutory offer. I think the present time is the best chance for our offer being accepted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman is naturally enough in a difficulty. He and his colleagues have brought things to such a pass here, that we are now, according to his own statement, face to face with a considerable difficulty. I understand that the real reason for taking those off is, as he almost admitted, that he cannot dispense with the revenue he receives from them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would not like to lose it without having means to provide for it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am aware that the hon. gentleman by the mode in which they have conducted the public affairs of this country have brought us to the condition in spite of the enormous taxation that we are face to face with a deficit. Under those circumstances, with a known deficit of about a million on the next year, he does not like to face another deficit, of as far as I can judge, a million and a quarter of dollars, if those articles should be placed on the free list. I think that the hon. gentleman is playing with edged tools. I have no doubt that when his proposition comes to be known and discussed, as it will in a short time be known and discussed in the United States Congress, that very much the conclusion will be drawn that has already been drawn and that is that he is carefully eliminating a number of articles which the United States might export to us in considerable quantities, and take from us in return other articles we desire to make free. As my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mitchell) very properly says there was no disposition during the last nine years on the part of the then American Government to relax their highly protective system, but it does seem very expedient to us, to say the least of it, that now that there is good ground to believe that their opinions are altering, that these articles should be left on the free list. The hon. gentleman very materially reduces the scope of the articles which he had formerly proposed to make free, and I am bound to admit that there is force in the objection he took as to the probable loss of revenue. I think that he will find that the action he is now taking will be apt to be construed to our disadvantage and that it will prevent a number of articles which would be greatly to our advantage to put on the free list in the United States, from being put there.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think it is possible that can arise.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the hon. gentleman will find that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would consider it a serious question if I could take that view. I do not think it is possible that any person in Congress can object to the elimination of those articles. How can they take objection when they have refused to accept it for nine years, and when they find that in a number of articles they propose in their Bill to make free we immediately take power for the Governor in Council, the moment their Act becomes law, to make those articles free also?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is just as my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) pointed out. We sell the Americans no Indian corn, as the hon. gentleman well knows. I do not suppose we send a bushel except for the purpose of seed to the United States. On the other hand, everybody knows that but for our arbitrary tariff restriction we would import considerable quantities of corn from the United States. Then, as the hon. gentleman knows, too, we want to get our barley in there free. I think there is great force in the objection made by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that in striking out such an article as grain we may possibly prevent the Americans from admitting such articles as barley free.

Mr. WATSON. I finally comprehend the question and I have this to say, that I believe the Government ought to place such articles on the free list as would induce the Americans to give us reciprocal trade in certain lines.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The offer had no such effect. We have had it there since 1879.

Mr. WATSON. It is only now we could reap advantage from that. As far as we are concerned in the West we had nothing to trade with the Americans, but we find now that notwithstanding the duty they are seeking our potatoes and wheat to-day, and we wish to have those articles they are seeking in the American market placed on the free list if possible. I know that the Minister has not power now, but I wish he would take power to put them on the list, and the American people who are legislating now in the interest of the American citizens would, I am sure, ask power to place them on the free list also. I maintain that the Canadian agriculturist is handicapped by this policy. He has to pay more for his farm implements and he gets less for his farm products than he did before. It has been stated in this House that the farmer does not pay more for his implements than he did before. I know from my knowledge of facts and from my own experience that the Canadian farmer has got to pay a little more than the extra duty on implements, and more than that again in Manitoba, because the excessive freights charged on implements going into that country makes up the difference for the duty. I wish to see the agriculturist legislated for now, and I say legislation has not been in his interest, although that has been contradicted in this House by members, and by members from the North-West too. I hold that the farmer of the North-West, who should be encouraged by this Government in settling that country, is handicapped as compared with the American farmer of to-day. A farmer in Dakota can buy his implements 35 per cent. less than a farmer can in Manitoba, and in some instances it is more than 35 per cent. less, because of the excessive freight to Manitoba. If time would admit I could give you the list of necessaries a farmer requires to settle on a farm in Manitoba, and what he requires to settle on the same farm in Dakota. The balance is in favor of the American farmer by $270. That is the cost of the goods taken from actual figures paid in 1887.

Mr. FISHER. If I understand the hon. Finance Minister, he has taken off certain things which are in the old standing offer, because he does not find them either in the Mills' Bill or in the other tariff Bill before the United States Congress; but I find, notwithstanding this, that there are a lot of things in this offer which are not in the Mills' Bill. The hon. Minister mentioned potatoes as one article which he hoped to see introduced into that Bill before its passage through Congress, and therefore he left potatoes in this standing offer. Do I understand him then to build a hope that what articles he has in this standing offer will be placed in the Mills' Bill before it becomes law, and that we shall have that opportunity to have all these articles free? I did not understand him to say that much.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. FISHER. Then, I ask him why he has taken some articles off, and left some on which are in the same position. I would like him to say why he has left on animals, for instance, which he does not hope to have introduced into that Bill, and taken off such things as wheat, Indian corn, flour, Indian meal or meal of any other grain, lard, tallow, salt meats and smoked, some of which are still left on the free list by the Order in Council lately passed by the Government? The hon. Minister has not explained his reason for picking and choosing between these things at all, and I do not see why he should have taken from this standing offer these particular things. Does he intend it to operate against particular classes in this country, who might enjoy the freedom of the things which are put on the free list? I cannot understand any other reason for his having omitted these articles. I sympathise with the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) who has called attention to the fact that Indian corn and meal and meal of other grains are removed from the chance of being put on the free list. Not only are the fishermen and lumbermen interested in these articles, but a large portion of our farming population as well. The hon. Minister knows perfectly well that Indian corn is not grown in this country to any extent, and we cannot raise it as cheaply as it is raised in the Western States. The farming community, especially in Ontario and Quebec, buy these grains from the Americans for fattening their cattle, which they export and make a profit on. Therefore the duty imposed on corn is a detriment to them, making their meat dear, and putting them at a disadvantage in competing with the Americans in the English market. This is only one article, and I think others would come under the same reasoning. I was surprised to find the hon. Minister so candid as to say that he based this legislation on the legislation which was taking place at Washington. He did not say it in so many words, but he practically acknowledged that he is regulating our tariff by the action of the American Congress. Yet it was only a few days ago that his followers called us disloyal, and applied almost every opprobrious epithet to us, because they said we proposed to give the American Congress some power over our tariff. If it is so disloyal and wrong on our part, how is it possible that it is right in the Finance Minister of Canada to make this proposition? I say the hon. Minister and his colleagues are driven to it by the tortuous and varying policy which they have adopted towards the United States. While at one time, as they did in 1878, they try to threaten the United States into reciprocity, at another time they try to coax them into it to such an extent as they are willing to go, but will not accept anything except what they are willing to give. But just now the hon. Finance Minister stated that he was going to take some of those things from the standing offer so as to intimidate the United States, I understood he went to try and force them to give us a chance of getting some of our articles free into that country. I think the Government's experience in the past in trying to intimidate the United States should show the hon. gentleman that he is not likely to succeed to-day, and I do not imagine that the United States are going to be influenced by his action in this matter. But so far, I have not had any sort of information from the hon. Finance Minister as to the reason he has taken these particular articles out of the standing offer, while he has left others which are exactly in the same category. If he does not explain that, we can only suppose that he has been entirely arbitrary in his selection.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance to a matter of considerable and continually growing importance, with reference to the admission of certain classes of corn into this country free of duty. It is well known that the system known among farmers as ensilage, or green feeding of cattle, is carried on in many parts of Western Ontario as well as in the section I represent. It is produced from green corn, which is taken from the green stalk. This corn is grown from a seed which does not ripen in Canada, and which the farmers have to import. That seed is imported every year in large quantities, and the dairymen and farmers of the country would consider it a very great advantage to be allowed to import that kind of corn free. In the county I represent it is a new business, but last year some 200 bushels were imported for such purposes, and this year I am informed by the dairymen 600 bushels will be imported for seeding purposes, and the success of the dairymen in carrying on that system will depend on the cheapness at which they can obtain that food.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I understood the hon. Minister in the early part of his speech to emphasise that it has been and is now the policy of his party to obtain a treaty which would admit as far as possible the products of the farm, the sea, the forest and the mine from the one country into the other free of duty, and he gave us to understand that that policy was embodied in the old statutory offer. He has now revised that statutory offer, and has introduced a new one omitting certain articles which by proclamation were taken out of the old statutory offer, and are now on the free list; but as my hon. friend behind me has remarked, he has omitted a large number of articles that were in the statutory offer and has limited the general character of that offer very largely. I think the House is entitled to know at greater length why he has done this. The hon. member for Northumberland asked a question on the subject of Indian corn and never obtained an answer. Why was that included in the old statutory offer and omitted in this? If the hon. gentleman is desirous that we should have reciprocity in the natural products, why omit these articles in the statutory offer? I hold the substance of a letter which the First Minister is alleged to have written a year or two ago to a leading statesman in the United States. It is contained in the letter of Mr. J. S. Ritchie, of Acron, Ohio, a gentleman well known in Ottawa, addressed to the Washington National Republican, and in that letter the First Minister stated what the policy of his Government was. Mr. Ritchie says:

"When the first Morrison Bill was under consideration in Congress I received a letter from the Canadian Premier, Sir John A. Macdonald, accompanied by a list of all the articles covered by the above mentioned provision (the standing offer) in her tariff law, and a large number of articles not there enumerated. In that letter he promised that if the Morrison Bill passed and included any or all of these articles in its free list, or admitted them at a lower rate of duty, Canada would at once treat all such articles which were the product of United States in a like manner. I gave that letter to Mr. Hewitt, the present mayor of New York, who was then an active member of Mr. Morrison's committee, and he gave it to Mr. Morrison, who expressed to me great satisfaction with the proposition contained in it. The letter, I believe, is to-day among the papers of the present Ways and Means Committee, and I do not doubt that the offer contained in it is as good as the day it was made."

Mr. FISHER.

The hon. gentleman will see that the expression of belief that Mr. Ritchie gives utterance to is not well founded, because the promise of the First Minister is not kept. A new statutory offer is introduced by the hon. gentleman, which, while it is extended to certain articles not mentioned in the old offer, deliberately omits a number that are mentioned in it. If they were omitted for the purpose of revenue, that reason is indefensible, because the taxation bears very heavily on the poorer classes. I would like to know whether the First Minister has changed his policy or whether he is prepared to adhere to the proposition he made in his letter to Mr. Ritchie. Before the hon. gentleman asks us to carry this resolution, he should explain why the articles in the old offer have been omitted in the new one.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will read over Hansard, he will find there an answer to all that both he and the hon. member for Brome have said. In endeavoring to draw a distinction between a treaty and a legislative enactment, I have endeavored to mark the difference between a broad comprehensive policy entered into by two nations by treaty and a policy of each country deciding to adopt in reference to this matter just what suits its own interests. If the hon. gentlemen are not able to appreciate the distinction, I am afraid it is due to my inability to express what I feel upon the subject, in the mode in which I ought to be able to express it. It appears to me perfectly plain and simple that a policy which would be a sound, a rational and a judicious policy for a country to enter into by treaty covering all the natural products of the country is one thing, and it is another thing when one country declares it will not have a treaty or any reciprocal arrangement whatever, but will from Session to Session be entirely free to act just as its own interests require. That being the case, I view the position from that standpoint. I have never said that I decided to put everything upon our free list that I found the Mills' Bill made free. If the Mills' Bill or if the action of the United States Congress makes free an article which I do not consider it to be in the interest of Canada to make free, I will not put it in this clause. The articles put in this clause are put there to show what, in the judgment and the Parliament of Canada, we intend to take advantage of, should they be made free on the other side. I have put articles in this clause that are not in the Mills' Bill, but I do not confine myself to the articles mentioned in that Bill, because there are other articles which, should they be made free by the legislation of the United States, we would like to take advantage of. There are other articles that might by treaty be dealt with as a matter of deliberate arrangement, but which we would not be prepared at the moment to make free upon the action of legislation over which we have no control. I hope I have made myself intelligible. I have tried to explain everything in the fullest and frankest manner possible, and I hope hon. gentlemen will consent to review the statements I have made when they see them in print, and allow this proposition to pass.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think it is creditable on the part of the hon. the Finance Minister, after the criticisms and suggestions which have been made by hon. gentlemen on this side, to try and lead us from the argument that we have presented. It has been stated that the hon. gentleman intends to put potatoes on the free list, no doubt in the interests of the Maritime Provinces. But on the other hand, he refuses to put corn on the free list. If there is any articles at all shipped from the United States that would be compensated by the free admission of barley to the United States, it is the article of corn. The hon. gentleman well knows that the farmers of Canada paid $20,000 during last year to get their barley into the United States. Now, there is not another item that would be more likely to be traded off for free admission of barley than corn.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We have had barley on our statutory offer since 1879, and barley does not appear in the Mills' Bill or the Randall Bill at all, so that we gained nothing by that. We have had both corn and barley on the offer and neither one nor the other has been made free.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not say that barley is on, and the hon. the Minister is not going to prevent me from making my argument by saying it is not in the Mills' Bill. I say corn is the only item that we might have to trade off in return for barley being admitted into the United States free, and the hon. gentleman has not explained why he has put potatoes on and left corn off.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So far as potatoes are concerned, there was a great doubt as to whether it was in the Mills' Bill. In fact, it was supposed at first that it did include potatoes. But it was found subsequently, by the provisions of the full and complete Bill, that it was considered potatoes would come under the head of vegetables otherwise enumerated, and, therefore, potatoes were not included, but there is a strong reason to hope that, before that Bill becomes law, potatoes will be included. We have had corn and barley on our statute since 1879, and we have had wheat and flour and other articles, and that has produced no effect whatever.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why not continue them?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The reason, as I have stated, is that we propose to deal with these questions from our own standpoint entirely.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has over and over again stated that he has had these articles on the statutory obligations of 1879, but he fails to answer the argument which I advanced against that, and which was referred to also by the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), that we know that, after the repeal of the Washington Treaty, a feeling had grown up in the United States, arising out of the fishery difficulties, which was hostile to any commercial relations between the two countries at all. That feeling has existed pretty well for seven or eight years, and, although the hon. gentleman had that statutory obligation there, the argument which I raise in reply to that is that a change is coming over the people of the United States, that their financial difficulties demand that a very large reduction shall take place on the articles coming into their country, and, judging by the Mills' Bill, a very large quantity of free goods will be admitted. My hon. friend the Finance Minister continually refers to the fact that this statutory obligation has existed since 1879, but he fails altogether to give an explanation why potatoes and coal are not in, and why cornmeal and corn are taken out; he fails to realise the change which has taken place in the sentiment of the people of the United States, and so his answer is no answer at all. He is evading the question.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The reason which the hon. gentleman would be a reason for repealing the Act altogether.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He says he does not think so; then, why does he make the change in regard to these articles, and put articles there which are altogether contrary to the reason which he has given? He puts potatoes there, though he knows they are not in the Mills' Bill, with the hope, as he says, that at some future period or at some time or other the United States Congress will legislate in the direction of free trade.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is good reason to think so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then he should put corn on the list also.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say that I would put corn on, even if they did.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He said he was in favor of free trade in natural products.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I said, as a whole.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But he does not take power to deal with this as a whole. He deals with it piecemeal. Suppose the United States were to put the whole of the natural products on the free list to-morrow, the hon. gentleman does not take power to deal with that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It would be very questionable whether you ought to. I have endeavored to explain that, as a matter of treaty, covering the whole, I would be willing to do this, but I never said that this should be done by legislation, seeing the power of the Congress of the United States to throw our whole financial arrangements into confusion by dealing with three or four articles.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has now repeated what he has said six or seven times before.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may have to repeat it five or six times yet before the hon. gentleman will understand me.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the people of the United States have reciprocity in natural products, they will not enquire whether it is under a treaty or under legislation. The effect is the same.

Mr. BOWELL. It is not the same.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I say it is the same. If that advantage is obtained, it is the same to the people of this country if it is done under legislation as if it is done under a treaty.

Mr. BOWELL. The one is permanent and the other is not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman had better stand up when he wants to speak.

Mr. BOWELL. I am not talking to you.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are interrupting me.

Mr. BOWELL. Very well, I beg pardon. Go on.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says we are not to take power to throw the financial affairs of this country into confusion. He is not likely to do that without sufficient reason, and Congress would have the same reluctance to throw the financial affairs of the United States into confusion. He has not given us any valid reason for doing what he has done. He proposes to put certain articles on the free list which he admits the United States have not yet put on the free list by any Bill which is before Congress, and he has taken off some articles that are included in that Bill. He says he does not know that he would in any case put corn on the free list.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You have said that a great many times.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, it seems to be necessary to repeat it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That statement has been repeated twenty times to-night, and it is one o'clock in the morning.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Quite so, but the hon. gentleman might have concluded this debate several hours ago.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did my best to do so, but the hon. gentleman knows that I could not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The people of this country are in favor of putting all these articles on the free list.

Mr. HESSON. How do you know?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that he is opposed to reciprocity in natural products?

Mr. HESSON. I am, in some of them, certainly.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then the hon. gentleman has been misstating his position this Session, and also in other Sessions, because he has voted to put that provision on the Statute-book which the Minister of Finance is now proposing to repeal. In fact the only hon. gentleman who has had the courage of his convictions, the only hon. gentleman who has spoken on this subject and has stated what he felt, is the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), who says he does not believe reciprocity in natural products would be good for this country. Other hon. gentlemen are acting as if they were in favor of that reciprocity, but they are simply pretending that they are. The Finance Minister has been on each side of this question several times during this Session.

Mr. MULOCK. It may be that the law is as the Finance Minister says. I am not going to enter into any controversy with regard to that, but I hope the Finance Minister will not be offended if I ask the Minister of Justice to give us an assurance on that point. The Customs Act of 1879, section 6, declares that the articles mentioned shall be admitted into Canada free of duty whenever a proclamation issues. Now it is purposed to repeal the proclamation under that clause.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, not the proclamation.

Mr. MULOCK. No, but to repeal the clause on which the proclamation rests, and it is said that the repeal of the clause will not affect the proclamation. I do not propose to argue that point, but that is a question on which I would like the assurance of the Minister of Justice, for whilst that may be law, it is possible there is a doubt. There are certain orders that the Governor in Council can repeal, and others that he cannot repeal. A proclamation standing under that clause, resting upon the clause in question, I take it, is not repealable by the Governor in Council, but if you repeal the clause and leave the Order in Council standing, it may be that the Order in Council may be repealable under some other provision of the law. Now, I would ask the Minister of Justice whether it is quite clear in his mind that the proclamation under which green fruits, and fruit trees, and so on, articles that are not now to be renamed in the substituted clause,—whether it is perfectly clear to his mind that that proclamation cannot be repealable by any other than an Act of Parliament?

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand the position to be this: These articles had a duty imposed on them by statute, and by the same authority, that is, by a statute of this Parliament, power was given to the Governor in Council to make what was practically an enactment upon that subject for the repeal of these duties. Now, in pursuance of the powers given in section 9, the Order in Council was issued, and the proclamation went forth effecting a repeal of the duties which were imposed upon green fruits, and upon certain seeds, plants and shrubs. My view is that from that moment the enactment imposing the duty upon these articles was repealed and cannot be re-enacted except by this Parliament.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. GILLMOR. I regret to discover that the Government are not disposed to place corn upon that statutory offer, because it has not been responded to in the United States. It is very important to New Brunswick and to my own constituency that corn and corn-meal should be admitted free of duty, and during the campaign of the late general election, there was an impression given currency to by my opponents that that small grievance was going to be redressed. I regret to discover that the Government are not so ready to put corn on the free list, even if the States do take duty off corn. I have not heard the Finance Minister say yet that he would respond to that, that he would meet the United States with regard to the duty on corn and cornmeal. I wish he had left it, at least, on the statutory offer instead of removing it. I understand his position is that Government are going to exercise their own judgment as to how far they can accept reciprocity, as long as it is not general, and there is some force in the remarks of the hon. gentleman. But I do think that the duty on corn and cornmeal, even if it is kept on flour, ought to be removed, because you do not protect any industry that is now producing corn in Canada to any extent. I understand that there are two or three counties in Ontario that produce corn, but it is not exported at all from the Maritime Provinces, and we import a large quantity of corn and cornmeal. It is a matter that largely affects the poorer classes. While much of it may be used to feed horses and cattle, a very considerable quantity is also used by the poorer classes of the people. I think you might well have left the moderate duty in your statutory offer. I do not think the people are going to have this duty removed from corn and meal quite as soon as they were led to expect by my opponents during the last campaign. If you would keep it on meal and allow corn to come in free, you would encourage our grist mills. Many of the grist mills you had before are now abandoned, but if you allowed corn to come in free, you would encourage the manufacture of grain into meal. The hon. Minister, who is a leading man in the Maritime Provinces, has intimated or hinted that he does not know whether he would meet the Americans half way, but in the interests of the people of that section of the country I would be very glad if he could meet their wishes in this respect.

Mr. MITCHELL. In relation to the duty on corn, I presume one of the objections the Minister has to its removal is the loss of duty. Now, I do not think the loss of duty would be so much as the hon. gentleman imagines, because I do not suppose any one would ask that the duty should be taken off corn that is used in the country for distilling purposes. What we ask is that it should be taken off corn when it enters into the consumption of the people and for the use of stock.

Mr. FISHER. The Finance Minister said a little while ago that he had over and over again answered the question which the member for Prince Edward Island had put to him. It is true that he has told us that he believes it is in the interests of the country to keep corn off the statutory offer in the future. Now, I would like to know why the Government think it to be in the interest of the country to do so. I would like to know whether it is that they believe that this is an industry which requires protection, or whether they believe it is a fair subject for taxation, or whether there is some particular interest to be conserved of which the Finance Minister has given us no inkling whatever. I have no objection to the Government taking the power to put upon the statutory offer such things as they think in the interests of Canada, but I want to know why they think it is in the interest of Canada that corn should not be put in such an offer. When the hon. member for Bothwell intimated that perhaps the Minister would not put corn upon the free list, even if the Mills Bill did contain it, and that he means to keep it for the sake of the duty, the hon. Minister did not say anything to the contrary. I think he is going back on his own statements that he wants to go as far as he can in the way of reciprocity in natural product.

Mr. HESSON. I confess that I cannot understand the hon. gentleman's reasoning. He has endeavored to make it appear that the exporters of barley from this country do not pay the duty, and that if the Americans took the duty off we would get a higher price for barley. Now, if it will work in one instance, why would it not work in another? If the exporter pays the duty in the case of barley, may it not be possible that he will pay the duty on corn and cornmeal? Did it ever occur to the hon. gentleman in that way?

Mr. FISHER. What do you think yourself?

Mr. HESSON. I have my opinion, and you may study the question out for yourself. But you will see how difficult it is to convince gentlemen who think that we must pay the duty in both instances. It is merely impossible, if we export barley, to pay that duty. Why, then, may not the Americans, in the export of cornmeal, be presumed to pay the duty? They do not produce barley and we do not produce corn. They require our barley and we require their corn. It is perfectly clear that we do not pay in both instances. I know hon. gentlemen opposite always endeavor to prove that on sending products into the American market our farmers pay the duty. It cannot be a reasonable or a logical conclusion to suppose that the people will believe that if this is true in one instance it is not also true in the other instance. I am not in favor of the Government taking into consideration the propriety of taking the duty off grain or flour. It would be a most unwise course, and in the interests of my constituents I will never consent to the removal of the duty from wheat, oats, flour or meal and a great many other articles I could enumerate. Our market in Canada is better than that of the United States for all these articles, and our market has been better since the duty was imposed. That is perfectly certain, and our farmers and business men realise the fact, and while we export our surplus to the old country the United States is not our best market for the articles indicated.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not want to be guilty of any discourtesy to the hon. gentleman, but I may say that I see no object in placing corn in the statutory offer. We have no desire to induce the United States to legislate so as to place corn on the free list. We have no object in doing so. We do not send any corn to the United States. Whenever it is the policy of Parliament to make corn free, then we can make it free, but there is no object in placing it in this offer.

Mr. FISHER. By parity of reasoning the United States might decline to put barley on the free list.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will say at once that the United States will place barley on the free list the moment they come to the conclusion that it is in the interests of their people to do so, and when they do that we shall be in a position to make barley free also.

Mr. FISHER. If the Americans do so for their advantage they do not care whether it is put on the free list or not. Under these circumstances it is no object to us to give power to the Government to put it on the free list.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand the Minister of Finance to state that it is not in the interests of the people, particularly the poorer classes, to put corn on the free list; because that is the only inference I can draw from the objection of the hon. gentleman to placing corn in the statutory offer? If he takes that position we have a distinct issue, and one the country can understand. What I contend in regard to corn is this: It is a food consumed by the poorest classes, and it is grown in only two counties in Western Canada to any moderate extent.

An hon. MEMBER. Half a dozen counties.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is only raised to any extent in about two counties. When we do not raise an article that enters into the food of the poorest class of the population, when it is used by the farmers for food and by the lumbermen and teamsters to feed their horses, it ought not to be taxed. The hon. gentleman says it is not in the interests of Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I put the question: Did I understand you to say that it is not in the interest of Canada?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Whenever Parliament decides.

Mr. MITCHELL. When the Government of the day which controls Parliament decides.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No; Parliament which controls the Government.

Mr. MITCHELL. We hold the reins, but you show us the way to go according to the old song. I contend that the hon. gentleman by his acts, if not by his words, decides that it is not in the interest of Canada to place corn on the free list. If there is one single article discussed that should be on the free list it is corn.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think my hon. friend had better make a clean breast of it before he sits down, and tell the House why the Government of which he was a member placed a duty on corn and cornmeal, which they kept on all the time he was a member of the Government.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is not necessary for the hon. gentleman to apply to one of the minor members of the Cabinet, as Sir Hugh Allan styled us, in the celebrated case which the hon. gentleman knows something about.

Mr. BOWELL. Do you acknowledge that?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, I have the honesty to acknowledge that I was a minor member. I do not know, without referring to the statute, whether the statement made by the hon. gentleman is accurate or not. I certainly did not think that the Government maintained the duty all the time I was in the Government.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am willing to accept the fact that it was so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, it was not so.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am willing to accept the fact. It does not lie in the mouth of the Finance Minister, who occupied a more prominent and important position in that Government, to put such a question before me, which, as the letter of Sir Hugh Allan said, was one of the unimportant members of the Cabinet, who was not a person of sufficient importance to discuss important questions such as those which were discussed by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). As this is a matter of public policy I should like to be certain that I understand the statement of the Minister of Finance. I understood he was in favor of the free interchange of the natural products of the two countries.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. By treaty.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Then I understood the hon. gentleman to say that in the event of the American placing all those articles on the free list he could not say that the Government, so long as he was a member of it, would reciprocate in all those articles, but there might be some to which he might take exception.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I endeavored to draw a broad distinction between a treaty and legislation, between making articles free by treaty and by legislation.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That is an evasion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You may call it an evasion, I do not. I call it a frank, statesmanlike statement.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman is endeavoring to take credit elsewhere for being in favor of an exchange of the natural products of the two countries, but he is guarding himself all the time with this reservation, that unless it comes just in the way to suit himself,—and which he says cannot be given,—he is not going to admit the natural products of the United States so far as he can control it into the Dominion of Canada, although the Congress of the United States may express their willingness and may pass an Act admitting the products of the Dominion of Canada into the United States. If that is his position I wish the hon. gentleman to distinctly understand that we shall know him for the future, because we do not intend to allow him to take advantage of both sides of the question. We shall know henceforth that although the hon. gentleman is expressing his readiness for free exchange of products he is throwing difficulties in the way.

Mr. HESSON. I hope the Finance Minister will hold the position he has always held in this country of fairness and independence, and I do not think that any threat coming from the other side of the House will very likely change his views. In reference to the imposition of duty on corn, I wish to say that there is another consideration besides that for the House. That duty has had the effect of reserving our market for oats and peas and the coarser kinds of grain. Hon. gentlemen cannot help seeing the difference between a treaty and between an Act of legislation in this House. By a treaty we can say to them: If we take off the duty on corn, will you give us an equivalent in another direction? If by an Act of legislation we remove the duty on corn, it means leaving our market exposed to the Americans and getting nothing in return.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It means getting cheaper corn.

Mr. MULOCK. We could get in our barley.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman must take the ground that we are not producing the corn and the cornmeal, and the people must pay the duty.

Mr. MULOCK. Let me ask you one question?

Mr. HESSON. I am sure there is not a gentleman in this House who does not understand the position the Minister takes on this question, as to our legislation here and by one stroke this House wiping out the tariff imposed on this grain, which we have felt in the interests of the country, and which I hope the people of this country will maintain, we will not be leaving our markets exposed to be flooded from the other side. By a treaty we can get something in exchange. They may under a treaty give us their market for free fish if we take the duty off grain, but if you do so by an Act of this House you expose the markets of the whole country simply to gratify gentlemen who will censure the Government afterwards for acceding to their wishes.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Never.

Mr. HESSON. I venture to say it is so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is really a terrible thing to have such a censure pronounced by an old time supporter of the Government on the policy of the Government for the last ten years. Does not the hon. gentleman see that according to his argument nothing could be more absurd than the policy of the Government for the last ten years since this offer has been on the Statute-book?

Mr. JONES (Halifax).

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) if the United States produce anything that can be used in substitution for Canadian grown barley, more particularly the best kinds of beard barley.

Mr. HESSON. I think not.

Mr. MULOCK. Well that answers the question at once as to who pays the duty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Life is too short to settle that question now.

Mr. MULOCK. I know the party on the other side is not agreed as to that question of duty. I heard the member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) insinuating and suggesting that the Canadian people are paying the duty on goods going into the United States. What does the Minister of Finance say on that question?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say anything.

Mr. MULOCK. I remember that in 1878 when the Premier was in Opposition he drew a very beautiful picture of the Canadian farmer paying the duty on barley. Does any one know what was the policy of the Administration on the question we are discussing to-night? Why will they not admit us into their secrets? A little while ago during this very Session, the Premier said that he was not going to allow the Americans to pick and choose, and they had got to go to the whole hog or none. The Premier said that and all his followers said it after him, and the Conservative press in Hamilton, Toronto and Montreal, all said that the Americans must accept the whole statutory offer or nothing at all, but they had hardly finished their tune when the Premier changed his tune.

Mr. MITCHELL. He got a telegram from Washington.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes. I want to ask the Finance Minister if the policy of the party which he represents is going to be changed every day and every hour by some Bill that may be introduced into Congress, and are we to be imitators of the people of Congress, or are we to consider the interests of the people of Canada? If it is in the interests of the people of Canada that we should have enlarged and freer trade relations with the people of the United States in natural products, let us not adopt this narrow policy now proposed, which will, at all events, have the effect of preventing the farming community of Canada obtaining a free market in the United States for some of their cereals; more particularly barley. If that is not what the Minister is aiming at it is where he is going to arrive. He is preventing the American people placing on their Statute-book any offer to Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Ours is to be a sham offer.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, it is practically a sham offer, and there do not appear to be two members on the other side who have the same opinions on the question. The member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) who I suppose is on the borders of going into the Cabinet, now says he is against placing trees on the free list. If that be the case I hope he will vote against the motion.

Gen. LAURIE. I deeply regret to have heard that the Government were not prepared to take into consideration at the present time, the free importation of corn. I fully realise of course that revenue must be raised, but I do sincerely regret that there is no present indication showing of any desire to put corn on the free list.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Vote against it then.

Gen. LAURIE. With regard to voting; when the time for voting comes I shall vote as I think proper. At the same time the Minister of Finance states that it is a matter which rests with Parliament. I wish to say that I shall be most happy to support him in any resolution that he will bring forward when he considers Parliament is ready to deal with this question. I think the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) has expressed the proper view in regard to this question. I do think it is a matter of extreme importance to the people living in our Province that grain should be placed on the free list. I do not think, however, that it is necessary we should have it in those resolutions, because in placing it on those resolutions we would have it on the free list, without any corresponding benefit for it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not at all.

Gen. LAURIE. That is my view at all events.

Mr. BORDEN. I am glad to find my hon. friend from Shelburne (General Laurie) has experienced a change of heart since 1879. In 1879 we had a colonization committee sitting in this House from day to day. That hon. gentleman did not hold the responsible position which he now holds as a representative of a constituency in this Dominion, although he held as he does now, a very high military position. At that time the committee were endeavoring to obtain evidence on which to base a National Policy, and before that committee my hon. friend was called as a witness. A number of questions were put to him as to the effect of a duty on corn and cornmeal on the farming industry of the Province of Nova Scotia, and he replied to one and all of these questions by saying that the duty on cornmeal would not at all be opposed to the interests of any class in the Maritime Provinces. I, as a member of the committee, pressed him on that point. I said that as a representative of a county in the western part of Nova Scotia. I believed that it was very important to the farmers there to have this article free for fattening, but he persisted that it was not. In fact, he said that a duty would stimulate the introduction of coarse grains, which would be quite as good for the farmers as corn. Now, Sir, I find that the hon. gentleman has changed his mind. Is it because he has become a representative of a constituency in Nova Scotia; at any rate, I am glad to find that he has changed his mind, and has come to the support of those who have been for years endeavoring to induce the Government to take the duty off cornmeal. I am glad to find that I, who brought this subject last winter to the attention of the hon. Finance Minister, who kindly promised to take it into his consideration, have in the gallant general an able ally, and I have no doubt that in the near future we shall be able to secure that change we desire, the removal of the duty from cornmeal.

Gen. LAURIE. The hon. gentleman is rather flogging a dead horse. He states that in 1879 I was prepared to advocate a duty on cornmeal. I am now speaking of taking the duty off corn, and I pointed out that the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) had expressed my view, that we might well keep the duty on cornmeal, but take the duty off corn, and so encourage the grinding of corn in our own country.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. Finance Minister stated it was the confirmed policy of both parties in this House to favor reciprocity of trade in natural products. We have certain friends in the United States who are fighting strongly for more extended trade relations between that country and Canada, and I think it is exceedingly unfortunate that at this juncture the hon. Minister of Finance should have considered it his duty to give our friends there a slap in the face.

[Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

45-1888-6

Mr. McMULLEN. He is doing it by taking from the free list an article that we declared to be free of duty, and he is placing us in such a position that we shall not be able to reciprocate if they put it on the free list. I think it is unfortunate that he is taking this retrograde step at such a time.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Without entering into the question of the advisability of interchanging the articles produced here with those produced in the United States, my view is that the present is about the first occasion since this Act of ours has been on the Statute-book, that the American Government have shown any disposition to reciprocate in any of these articles. The Americans, in the Bill before Congress, place a number of articles on their free list, as to which they are willing to reciprocate, and they have left out, not accidentally but by design, certain articles that to my mind, is equivalent to saying, we do not think it is to our interest that those articles should go on the free list; and if that is the American view, the passing of this Act is simply the withdrawing of the balance of those articles which they have said to us they will not reciprocate in, and I think it is the true and statesmanlike position for us to occupy to leave those articles for the further consideration of Parliament.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). There is no doubt that we in the Maritime Provinces are a unit in favor of the removal of the duty on corn, and I believe our people are just about as anxious to have the duty taken off cornmeal.

Mr. GILLMOR. I said that.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). But it seems that for the purpose of protecting a small number of people in Ontario who raise corn, the rest of the Dominion should be saddled with that duty, and at the very time proposals are being made in the United States in favor of reciprocity, we withdraw these items from the standing offer. I have listened attentively to the hon. Minister of Finance as to the difference between a treaty and legislation; but in regard to natural products it seems to me that we should maintain the same position that we did before, if we expect our neighbors to meet us with legislation that may culminate in a treaty. But it seems to me that the Government are taking the present course, either for the purpose of raising a revenue or because it is part of the National Policy that reciprocity must be subordinate to it, although the party supporting that policy profess to be in favor of reciprocity in natural products.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman speaks of this duty as having been levied in the interest of Ontario. It may be that the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec expect to receive some consideration in this matter. But I would ask the hon. gentleman and all the hon. gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces to recollect that the House in years past voted $150,000 to aid the fishermen.

Mr. MITCHELL. My hon. friend from Lambton, deserves commendation for the interest he has taken in an article in which I have taken some interest. If there is an article in which he is deeply interested it is petroleum, and I notice that in the Mills' Bill petroleum is made free. If the Government were to take the duty off that article, they would confer a great boon on the Maritime Provinces and Eastern Canada generally.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. They would not have put it in the Mills' Bill, without good cause.

Mr. FISHER. I would like to endorse the remarks of the hon. gentleman for Prince Edward with regard to seed corn, and I trust the Finance Minister will take it into his favorable consideration.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is a new question and we will consider it.

Motion agreed to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I move that :

Section 10 of the said Act be hereby repealed and that items 592 and 781 of schedule C of an Act respecting the duties of Customs, chapter 33 Revised Statutes of Canada, 1886, be repealed, and the following substituted in lieu thereof.

592. Coffee, green, except as herein provided.

781. Tea, except as hereinbefore provided.

I may state that that change is for the purpose of dropping out what is now quite surplusage—that is section 10 of the Act which has entirely lost its force in consequence of legislation in the United States. It does not affect any change in the tariff.

Mr. WELDON. While I do not dispute the legal view of the Minister of Justice, it seems to me there would be no harm in having a provision that the proclamation continue in force. My own opinion in looking over the matter carefully, is in accord with the view of the Minister of Justice. Still there is some doubt, and it would be better by some clause just to leave that proclamation in force.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are tea and coffee free altogether?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, a duty of 10 per cent. on tea from the United States remains, but this legislation which is surplusage is removed for the purpose of taking away what has lost its significance.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In what way does it lose its significance?

Mr. BOWELL. Having repealed that clause of the law which empowers the Government to impose a duty of 10 per cent. on tea from the United States, it was necessary to change the item in the free list which affected coffee and tea, and which reads as follows:—"Tea from the United States, 10 per cent. ad valorem." Then turn to the free list. you find that coffee and green tea, as provided by section 10, 49 Victoria, chapter 33, is free. The proposition is to strike out the words "by section 10, 49 Victoria, chapter 33. Coffee, green, as hereinbefore provided." That is except as provided by the item to which I first called the attention of the committee. That leaves coffee, green, free, except when imported indirectly from the United States, and precisely the same remark applies to the tea, 781 of the tariff, where it reads the same way: "Tea, except as provided by section 104." Section 10 is repealed, and in order to avoid any difficulty in the interpretation of these clauses hereafter, tea is made free except at hereinbefore provided; that is it comes free from all parts of the world, except when it comes indirectly through the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand that coffee or tea when imported direct from the place of production are free?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. But if they come from Great Britain, France or the United States, they are subject to a 10 per cent. duty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, only when they come from the United States.

Motion agreed to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved :

That the excise duty on spirits manufactured from raw or unmalted grain used in combination, in such proportions as the Department of Inland Revenue prescribes, with malted barley taken to the distillery in bond, shall be the same as that on spirits manufactured exclusively from malted barley.

"That when any substitute for methylated spirits is supplied to any manufacturer in accordance with section 233 of the Inland Revenue Act, the price thereof shall not exceed the actual cost with the addition of 15 per cent.

Mr. FISHER.

I may state to the committee the explanation of that is this: When the Inland Revenue Act was framed only two kinds of spirits were made—first from raw grain and second from malt. The former were allowed to use up to 10 per cent. of malt, though in practice the amount barely exceeded 4 per cent. This was duty-paid malt. The latter used malt entirely and in bond. Hence to put them on a footing of equality 2 cents a gallon extra was charged as spirit duty as an offset to the malt duty levied on the grain distillers. Last year a distillery was started in Halifax, which did not come exactly under either of these definitions, as they proposed to use 15 to 25 per cent. malt and the remainder raw grain. Section 130 of the Inland Revenue Act established a duty on the raw grain spirits at $1.30 a gallon and on the malt spirits at $1.32 a gallon. As the distillery at Halifax used a greater percentage of malt than was allowed to the raw grain distilleries the rate of $1.32 a gallon was established by the Department as the duty on the spirits produced there and this duty has always been collected and the object of the resolution is merely to remove any doubts which may arise as to the proper duty to be collected on such spirits. There is no increase in duty. The duty remains the same, but this removes a doubt that might arise in that connection.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Why does the hon. gentleman specify barley. The spirits made in Ontario are entirely made from Indian corn.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It will not affect that in the least. It only removes a doubt arising from the effect of the different portions of the grain and malt duties.

Mr. MULOCK. I thought there was to be no change in the duties this year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no change in customs duties, but there are two or three in excise.

Mr. MITCHELL. Are there any changes?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If my hon. friend will allow me to read the resolutions, he will see.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have asked a simple question, and I want a civil answer.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The last thing in my mind would be to treat my hon. friend with anything except marked courtesy.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have not had much of that lately from you.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I simply thought that, by reading the resolution, I might give him the information better than I could state it. The first resolution is :

That the excise duty on spirits manufactured from raw or unmalted grain used in combination, in such proportions as the Department of Inland Revenue prescribes, with malted barley taken to the distillery in bond shall be the same as that on spirits manufactured exclusively from malted barley.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the provision if it is made from potatoes?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It does not affect that at all. It does not touch the manufacture from potatoes or from corn.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the Department of Inland Revenue issue a general declaration in reference to these preparations?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There does not seem to be any statutory provision as to the manufacture of alcohol from roots.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is another question. The second resolution is :

That when any substitute for methylated spirits is supplied to any manufacturer in accordance with section 233 of "The Inland Revenue Act," the price thereof shall not exceed the actual cost with the addition of 15 per cent.

The explanation of this resolution is that these methylated spirits have hitherto been manufactured by the bonded manufacturers and the Department of Inland Revenue has had suspicion for a lengthened period that these spirits, the duty on which is 15 cents a gallon, have been largely used for potable and other purposes to which only pure spirits, duty $1.30 a gallon, should be applied. It is intended to withdraw the privilege of manufacturing the methylated spirits from the bonded manufacturers and to place the supply under the control of the Department, who will supply wood alcohol or wood naphtha to varnish makers and others. The 15 per cent. added to the cost is to pay for handling and to prevent the loss which would otherwise accrue from withdrawing the duty collected on the manufacture of methylated spirits.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are you going to undertake the manufacture of alcohol in the Inland Revenue Department?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The details will be fully explained when my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue introduces the Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope you will not object to our discussing the matter on the Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, the fullest explanation will be given then. The third resolution is:

That the excise duty on cigarettes whether the product of foreign or of domestic leaf tobacco, weighing not more than three pounds per thousand, shall be 60 cents on every pound; and on those weighing more than three pounds per thousand, $1.00 per pound.

The explanation of this resolution is that the present inland revenue duty upon cigarettes is the same as on cut tobacco, viz., 20 cents per pound. The duty on cigars is $6 per thousand, weighing say 12 pounds to the thousand, or say 50 cents per pound. The growth of the cigarette business has been seriously threatening the cigar revenue, while costing much more for stamping, &c. It is proposed to raise the duty to 60 cents per pound on ordinary cigarettes and to $1 per pound on those weighing more than 3 pounds per thousand. The customs rate is $2 per pound and 25 per cent.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does that increase the duty on cigars?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No; but on cigarettes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). How much revenue will you get out of it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not a great deal.

Mr. MULOCK. Is this to increase the consumption of cigars?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It will have that effect. The 4th resolution is:

That the excise duty on all cigars, whether the product of foreign or of domestic raw leaf tobacco, when put up in packages containing less than 10 each, shall be $7 per thousand.

The explanation of that is that the present duty is $6 per thousand and the extra dollar per thousand is to pay for the increased number of stamps used upon the smaller packages.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that these resolutions take effect from and after the 2nd day of May.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 2.20 a.m. (Wednesday).

House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Wednesday, May 2, 1888.

No. 46

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 2nd May, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BANK ACTS AMENDMENT.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 119) to amend the Bank Acts, chapter one hundred and twenty of the Revised Statutes. He said: The object of the Bill is to make a further slight change in that portion of the Act which enables certain producers and manufacturers to issue warehouse receipts which will be as security in the hands of the persons loaning money upon them. The provision of the Bank Act enumerates various manufacturers who shall have the right to issue warehouse certificates, manufacturers of timber, and various others, and I propose to add distillers. I may mention that one of the principal reasons for this change is the provision of the statute requiring the gauging of spirits, which makes it necessary that distillers should carry a very much larger stock than they otherwise would do, and it seems reasonable that such large concerns should have the right to issue warehouse receipts.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURT ACTS AMENDMENT.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 120) to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Court Acts chapter one hundred and thirty-five of the Revised Statutes. He said: The object of the Bill is simply to enlarge the right of appeal in reference to British Columbia and the North-West Territories. There is a provision in the present Act with reference to appeals from Maritime Provinces, giving appeals where the amount is above a certain sum, even though the action did not originate in the Superior Court. It is desired to extend that provision to British Columbia, and to provide some system of appeal in reference to the North-West Territories. The provision for appeal which I propose to make with reference to the North-West Territories, is that by leave of the Supreme Court, or of a judge thereof, an appeal may be allowed from the decision of the Supreme Court of the North-West Territories, although the matter may not have originated in the Superior Court.

46-1888-1

RIVER ST. LAWRENCE IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. DAVIES asked, 1. What is the amount of the advances made by the Government to the Harbor Commissioners of Montreal for the Lake St. Peter and River St. Lawrence improvements, up to this date? 2. What is the total amount of interest on such advances? 3. What part of such interest has been repaid by said Commissioners to the Government? 4. What was the expenditure of the Harbor Commissioners for the calendar year 1887, apart from expenditure on capital account? 5. What was their net revenue for same year? 6. Does this expenditure include any, and what expenditure, in the harbor of Montreal? 7. What amount now remains unexpended of the sums authorized by the Act to be advanced the Harbor Commissioners for the completion of the Lake St. Peter channel, and which amount the Government, in the resolution submitted by Sir Charles Tupper, ask for authority to expend? 8. What is the estimated amount yet required to complete the widening and deepening of the channel in Lake St. Peter and the River St. Lawrence?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. 1. The amount of the advances made by the Government to the Harbor Commissioners of Montreal up to this date is $2,725,504.10. 2. The total amount of interest on such advances to the 30th June last was $794,028. 3. All of the interest above referred to has been paid. 4. The expenditure of the Harbor Commissioners for the calendar year 1887, apart from expenditure on capital account, was, according to the statements made by them to the Government, $327,290. 5. Their net revenue for the same year, $289,885. 6. They divide their expenditure as follows:—$220,123 as applicable to the harbor, and $107,187 as applicable to the channel. 7. The amount unexpended of the sums authorised, which the Government asks for authority to expend on the channel, is $279,495.90. 8. The Harbor Commissioners estimate that it will take the whole of this amount and $20,000 additional to deepen the channel to 27½ feet at low water, and that to straighten and widen it so as to make it easier of navigation, would cost say $200,000 more.

QUEBEC HARBOR.

Mr. DAVIES asked, 1. What amount has been advanced by the Government to the the Quebec Harbor Commissioners for the purpose of constructing the Lévis Graving Dock, up to date? 2. What is the total amount of interest accrued thereon, and how much, if any, has been repaid the Government? 3. What amount has been paid towards the sinking fund? 4. What amount has been paid out of capital by the Quebec Harbor Commissioners to the Government for interest and sinking fund on the bonds deposited with the Finance Minister as security for advances made by the Government on account of harbor improvements in Quebec and the tidal dock at the mouth of the River St. Charles? 5. What amount has been actually paid to the Government by the Quebec Harbor Commissioners for sinking fund on their bonds?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. 1. The amount advanced by the Government to the Quebec Harbor Commissioners for the purpose of constructing the Lévis Graving Docks, up to date, is $838,000. 2. The simple interest thereon payable in advance from 17th December, 1878, to 19th April, 1888, amounts to $204,454.32, of which no part has been paid. 3. Nothing has been paid towards the sinking fund on such advance. 4. The amount paid out as capital by the Quebec Harbor Commissioners to the Government for interest and sinking fund, on the bonds deposited by them with the Finance Minister as security for advances made by the Government on account of harbor improvements in Quebec and a tidal dock at the mouth of the River St. Charles, is estimated at $493,706.64. 5. The amount actually paid out of their revenue by the Quebec Harbor Commissioners for sinking fund on the last mentioned bonds, is, so far as can be ascertained, $98,621.59.

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION AT CINCINNATI.

Mr. LAURIER asked, Is it the intention of the Government that Canada should be represented at the Centennial Exposition to be held at Cincinnati, and opened 4th July next?

Mr. CARLING. It is not the intention of the Government to be represented at the Exhibition.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to-morrow to consider the following resolution, namely:—

That in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed and negotiable of the loans authorized by Parliament by any Act heretofore passed, the Governor in Council may raise by way of loan such sum or sums of money, not to exceed, in the whole, the sum of $25,000,000, as may be required for the purpose of paying the floating indebtedness of the Dominion of Canada, and for the carrying on of the Public Works authorised by the Parliament of Canada; such sum or sums of money to be raised in accordance with and under the provisions of that portion of chapter 29 of the Revised Statutes of Canada relating to the public debt, and the raising of loans authorised by Parliament, and the sum so raised hereunder to form part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada. The rate of interest on any loans raised hereunder not to exceed four per cent. per annum.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS AND PAPERS.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I beg to enquire whether the papers to be placed on the Table of the House, with respect to the disallowance of railway charters in Manitoba, have been printed and will be distributed to members before the discussion on the resolutions is entered upon?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We are pressing the printers to have the papers printed immediately, and no doubt they will be distributed without delay.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the Government also bring down papers with respect to disallowance in British Columbia?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Were they asked at the same time?

Mr. LAURIER. Not so far as I am aware, but they would properly belong to the discussion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We will bring them down as well.

Mr. McMULLEN. Up to the present time 92 orders have passed the House for returns since we met on 23rd February. Only 27 returns have been brought down. The Government have intimated their desire to have the business of the House closed in about two weeks, and the condition of business in the meantime, as evidenced by returns brought down, is in such a state that it is impossible for the Opposition to discharge their duties efficiently if they are not supplied with the information asked. I moved a resolution asking for a return of fees paid to counsel in the case of the Queen vs. St. Catharines Milling and Lumber Company, but the return has not yet been brought down. Out of eight orders I moved myself only one return has been brought down, that in connection with the Strathroy post office. Only three returns a week have been submitted. I should like to know whether the Government's intention is to furnish the Opposition with the information they have asked, or not?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The returns are being brought down as rapidly as they are prepared. Some of them require a great deal of work and they cannot be brought down at an earlier period. They are brought down each day as they are ready—I do not know whether they are three, four or five a week. I know I have brought down a number, as other Ministers have done. But the hon. gentleman may rest assured that our attention is given to this matter, that the returns are brought down as rapidly as they are ready, and orders for their immediate preparation have been given in the different departments. However, if the hon. gentleman will send me a memorandum of any particular return he requires, I will make special enquiry about it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I should like the return in the case of the Queen vs. St. Catharines Milling and Lumber Company; also the correspondence in relation to the establishment of a model farm in the North-West.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. If the hon. gentleman will send me a list I will notify the different departments, because the Government are as earnest as hon. members in obtaining these returns as rapidly as possible.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is a little unreasonable in the matter. I moved for a return three or four years and it took two years to bring it down—it was in relation to the Grand Trunk. The hon. gentleman may get the returns next year: he need not hurry.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 60) to amend chapter twenty-seven of the Revised Statutes, respecting the Department of Public Printing and Stationery.—(Mr. Chapleau.)

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolutions adopted in Committee on Ways and Means (May 1st) were read a second time and concurred in.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 121) "An Act to amend chap. 33 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, respecting the duty of Customs."

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 122) "An Act to amend chap. 34 of the Revised Statutes respecting Inland Revenue."

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADVERTISING COUNTERFEIT MONEY.

Mr. THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 108) respecting the advertising of counterfeit money. He said: It may be somewhat useful to the House that I should make a short statement explaining the reason for introducing this Bill, because it is designed to put an end to what has been a very great evil, and is a growing evil in Canada. For some years past persons in the United States who are known as "confidence men" have been in the practice of obtaining in the Mercantile Agencies lists of the names of persons who do business in different parts of Canada, and who are supposed to be of somewhat weak financial standing, and of addressing to those persons circulars in which they intimate to them that for very small sums of money they will furnish them counterfeit notes, either of the Dominion of Canada, or of the United States, and they are accustomed to send on the requisite specimens of the "goods," as they call them, which they are willing thus to sell. Those goods which they thus offer are described by various names. Generally they are called "green goods," or counterfeit notes, and sometimes they are called "cigars" and sometimes "green cigars." Various other cant names of expression are made use of which convey plainly enough to the person receiving the circular the intimation that if he sends his money he will get a supply of counterfeit notes. Although it has not been generally known that this practice prevails to any very great extent, the fact has been ascertained that every week from the city of New York thousands of those circulars are sent into Canada. The result being, that in many cases persons are induced to enter into a correspondence, and the correspondence is followed very frequently by personal negotiations on the part of our people with those confidence men. The plan which is then pursued is this: An applicant for those "green goods" so called goes to a place indicated in the circular and he is shown, for his inspection, a bundle of notes which are in most cases perfectly good and finds that they are of a description which can easily pass current. He pays his money for the bundle of notes which is supposed to be wrapt up in a satchel, to be given to him or to be left at a place where he can call for it. He finds, after he has paid his money and when he seeks to obtain his parcel or his satchel, that rubbish—either sawdust or blank paper—has been inserted in the parcel instead of the notes of which he saw samples. So generally has sawdust been used that the whole business is called under the name of the "sawdust circular business." The fact is that efforts have been made by the police authorities of New York to put a stop to these practices, but the ingenuity of those confidence men is shown by the dexterity with which the efforts of the police have been evaded from time to time. I may say that one of the practices by which the persons engaged in this kind of business attract attention and persuade the public that the notes which they introduce are notes that are easy of circulation, is by inserting from time to time in the American papers false accounts of bank note plates having been stolen from the Treasury, by which the public are given to understand that the production of apparently genuine notes is a very easy matter, and the "goods" as they call them are thereby advertised as being more like to appear genuine and easy of circulation. The business which I have referred to is carried on in many places with occasional variations, but I may say that in some cases the person to whom the circular is addressed sends his money—and generally speaking the remittances are not very large—in answer to the circular, expecting to receive in return counterfeit notes but he often receives no answer at all and the money is thus lost. It is a significant fact that the leading operators in this business in New York are many of them known to be worth from $50,000 to $100,000, and they send from week to week, as I have said before, thousands of those circulars into Canada. It has come to our knowledge within the last two years, that the business has been taken up in Canada, and that in two or three places in this Dominion the same operations are being pursued by swindlers of this description, who have come here for that purpose from the United States. A large number of letters which have been written by persons to whom circulars were thus addressed are in my possession dated from various points in all the Provinces of the Dominion, and indicating the disposition on the part of persons to whom those circulars are addressed, to enter into the nefarious operations which the circular invites them to begin. One of those I may read as a specimen of hundreds. Many of them are from persons engaged in business and who are supposed to be not at all likely to engage in transactions of this kind. This letter is dated February 9th, of last year, and this person says:

"DEAR SIR,—I received your letter a few days ago, and am so busy that I could not attend until to-day.

"Please send me $25 (twenty-five dollars) worth of the goods by return mail, with instructions how to sell them. I am trading with the country people a good deal in the run of a year.

"I mean business. Send the goods as soon as possible and I will send you a post office order by return mail."

This is only one of many hundreds such that are in our possession from various points in the Dominion. Some of these, I regret to say, are signed by persons holding very respectable positions, commercial and otherwise, some of them municipal officers, some of them justices of the peace, several of them public functionaries, from whom one would expect a very different line of business. I may state as an illustration of the extent to which these operations are carried in the United States, and the difficulty of detecting them, that a pamphlet has been issued in Washington on this subject, in which lists are given of the fictitious names which are used by persons engaged in this business. The way in which these lists get into the possession of the police authorities here is that the person engaged in sending these circulars, finds it necessary so often to change his address and his alias, that the letters very often miss him and go to the dead letter office, whence they are transferred to the hands of the police. At one part of this report, two pages closely printed are taken up with the aliases and changed addresses of one man who was engaged in this business; and the writer mentions that another notorious offender had 81 names and addresses, and that another party, whose right name is unknown, now has 136 different aliases. Under these circumstances, and in view of the fact that persons in Canada are engaged in these operations of sending out circulars as well as sending and receiving bogus money, it is proposed by this Bill to make both the sending of circulars and the receiving of the money criminal offences.

Mr. EDGAR. Can the hon. Minister tell us whether the present criminal law is not capable of reaching this class of offenders? Has it never been put into operation against them? Is entirely new legislation required? Perhaps he will also kindly tell us, as there seems to be reciprocity in this business, at any rate, between the United States and Canada, whether there is legislation on the subject on the other side.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think special legislation is required, especially to cover the offence of entering into an agreement. I may say that the Bill now before the House, is very like one which is being adopted in the State of New York. I think the New York Bill does not make it an offence to receive such goods, but otherwise it is similar.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, considered in committee, read the third time, and passed.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 89) to amend the Dominion Elections Act, chapter 8, Revised Statutes of Canada.—(Mr. Thompson.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. THOMPSON. I propose to move a substitute for this clause, making the electoral districts of Algoma, in the Province of Ontario, and Cariboo, in the Province of British Columbia, exceptions to the provision that the nomination of candidates at a general election shall be on a particular day.

On section 2,

Mr. THOMPSON. I propose to substitute for this section the same provision that is contained in sub-section 2 of section 14 of the present Act, but limiting the provision to the electoral districts of Algoma and Cariboo. It changes the Bill in order to make exceptions of those two districts.

Mr. EDGAR. This only applies to general elections. Do the Government not think it would be well to provide that one and the same day should be fixed for bye-elections as well, when there are more than one?

Mr. THOMPSON. That suggestion, I think, is hardly applicable to the present section.

Mr. BARRON. I have an amendment to propose to the proposed amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice, and to which I referred slightly the other day. I think it is an amendment which must present itself favorably to the minds of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. I think it is hardly right or proper that it should be in the power of the Executive, whether it be composed of hon. gentlemen on that side or on this, to bring on the elections when there are vacancies during a recess just when it suits their particular purpose, and perhaps in some cases bring them on rather hastily without due consideration to the interests and rights of the people in any electoral district, or in others so slowly that for some considerable length of time the constituency may be unrepresented. Now, in the amendment I intend proposing to the House, I have endeavored, as far as possible, to follow the spirit, if not the letter, of Imperial legislation, and hon. gentlemen in this House who seek to copy the English practice will be glad to know of that. I find that the practice in England in some respects is not unlike our own. There the Speaker acts upon the receipt of a writ to the effect that a member has been promoted to the House of Lords, or upon the certificate of a judge of an election being voided, or upon the certificate of any two members of a vacancy having occurred. There, under the statute of George IV, I find that a period of fourteen days was allowed to elapse, during which time the Speaker was required to act on receiving notice of a vacancy having occurred in the representation of any constituency. Now, under a subsequent and amending statute, 24-25 Vict.—and to this statute I would like to draw the attention of this House, because it shows the spirit of improving legislation in England—the period of fourteen days was shortened to a period of six days; and if any hon. gentleman will look at the Act, he will see that the preamble recites the fact that it is necessary to shorten the time in order to expedite the bringing on of elections. Well, under that statute the Speaker is required, as he is required with us, immediately after that delay, to issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. Our statute provides also that the Speaker must issue his warrant “forthwith,” but in England I find the practice is to proceed as expeditiously as possible after the warrant reaches the hands of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. That gentleman is at once required, on receipt of the warrant, to issue the writ. In fact, so important is it that he should do so at once, that any neglect of this duty or any delay in the transmission of the writ to the returning officer is made a misdemeanor. Now, there is no such law as that here. As soon as a warrant here reaches the hands of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, very serious delays, as we know, occur, so that I think the amendment I propose must present itself to the favorable consideration of hon. gentlemen in this House, who seek to copy as closely as possible the well established practice followed in the old country. Now, I will proceed to show the serious delays that have occurred here and the undesirability of continuing the practice which has heretofore existed; and I will ask the House to bear with me for a few moments while I show them the delays which have occurred in the issuing of writs in some particular cases, and I shall not go beyond this Parliament to seek for instances. In the case of Yarmouth, the judge certified to the Speaker on the 13th of August, 1887, but the writ did not issue until the 18th of October following. There was thus a delay, because I presume that when the judge certified to the Speaker, the latter complied with the provisions of the statute, which is said that he shall “forthwith”—because “forthwith” is the word used—issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. I presume, therefore, that as soon as he received the judge's certificate, the Speaker acted upon it and issued his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. But, although the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery received the writ, as I presume he did as soon as the Speaker received the certificate from the judge, on the 13th August, 1887, the writ was not issued until the 17th October, 1887, or three months later. The delay, therefore, that took place was, no doubt, due to the Executive, in delaying the issue of the writ for a period of three months, and the election did not take place until the 18th November following. Thus, the people of the electoral district of Yarmouth were unrepresented in the Parliament for a period of four months. Now, take the case of Dorchester. In that case, the judge certified to the Speaker in August, 1887, but the writ was not issued until the 21st December following, being a delay of four months for which the hon. gentlemen opposite have to account. How was it that this period of four months elapsed after the warrant was issued by the Speaker to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery before the writ was issued? And the election only took place on the 7th January, 1887. Thus there was a period of five months during which that constituency remained unrepresented. I think the Government should account for that delay. They should also account for the undue haste exhibited in the case of the Shelburne election. In that case, the judge certified on the 9th November, 1887, and the writ was dated on the 18th November following, so that only a period of nine days elapsed between the time when the Speaker received the certificate from the judge and the issuing of the writ. How is it there was only nine days delay in that case and a delay of five months in the case of Dorchester? The result was that the delay in the case of Shelburne between the time the judge certified to the Speaker and the time the election took place was only one month six days, whereas in the other two cases the delay was four months and five months respectively. Take the case of Gloucester, which is represented by the hon. the Postmaster General. In that case, there was still greater haste displayed, the judge having certified on the 5th October, 1887, and the writ having been issued on the 8th October, 1887, so that it took only three days for the judge's certificate to reach the Speaker and the certificate and the warrant of the Speaker to reach the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and the time between the date of the judge's certificate and the election was only twenty-four days, as compared with four and five months in the first two cases I have given. Then, take the case of the county of Cumberland, in which only one month elapsed between the judge's certificate and the election. Take also the case of Haldimand. In that case the judge certified on the 15th October, 1887, and the writ was dated the 24th October, 1887, so that only nine days elapsed between the date of the judge's certificate and the issuing of the writ, and only 28 days altogether elapsed between the date of the judge's certificate and the election. Take the case of Victoria, N.S. The judge's certificate was dated the 7th October, 1887, and the writ was issued on the 28th October, showing a delay of only eleven days. And the election was held on the 21st November, 1887, thirty-four days thus elapsing between the date of the judge's certificate and the date of the election. Then, take the case of East Northumberland. The judge's certificate was dated on the 16th November, 1887. The writ was issued very hastily, it was issued within twelve days, on the 28th November, and the election was held on the 22nd December, 1887, only thirty-six days elapsing. In the case of Prince Edward county, the certificate of the judge was dated the 9th February, 1888, the writ was issued on the 22nd February, 1888, thirteen days elapsing between the judge's certificate and the date of the writ, and the election was held on the 10th March, that is, thirty days after the judge's certificate. In West Middlesex, the judge's certificate was dated the 20th February, 1888, and it only took two days for that certificate to come to Ottawa by post in order to reach the Speaker's hands, and for the Speaker to issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and for the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to issue his writ for a new election; whereas, in the case of Yarmouth it took three months, and in the case of Dorchester, four months. Then, take the case of L'Assomption. The judge's certificate was dated the 3rd March, 1888, and the writ was issued on the 9th March, six days only elapsing, and the election took place on the 3rd April, 1888, only thirty days elapsing between the date of the judge's certificate and the election. Now, in those cases where the time has been short, it is a very peculiar coincidence that they are electoral districts returning members to support the Government; but, in those cases where great and serious delays have taken place, it is another peculiar coincidence that those are constituencies which send members here to support my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier). If such delay is possible in one case, and such extraordinary haste is used in another case, it is evident that there should be some amendment, and the amendment which I ask the House to adopt is the following:—

Mr. THOMPSON.

In the case of a vacancy happening in the House of Commons by the death of any member, or by a member accepting any office, or by a member resigning his seat, or by reason of the seat of any member being declared void under the Dominion Controverted Elections Act (except as in the next succeeding section is provided for), then and in every such case, the day for the nomination of candidates shall, in the electoral districts of the Province of British Columbia, and in the electoral district of Algoma in the Province of Ontario, and in those of Gaspé and Chicoutimi and Saguenay in the Province of Quebec, be within thirty days after the day when the Speaker or any two members shall have, according to law, addressed his or their warrant, as the case may be, to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for the issue of a new writ to fill the vacancy, and in the other electoral districts of Canada be within twenty days after the day when the Speaker or any two members shall as aforesaid have so addressed his or their warrant.

The committee will see that that section provides for the case of all vacancies arising when the House is not in Session. It provides for the two cases, where the Speaker is required to issue his warrant, or, in the case of his absence or sickness, or when there is no Speaker, for two members to address a warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. That is only in cases where the writ has to be issued by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery on receipt of the Speaker's warrant, but there are cases where a writ has to be issued on the order of the House, and that section, if it went no further, would not deal with the cases where the writ has to be issued on the order of the House. Therefore, I have to ask the committee to adopt another section which I propose shall come immediately afterwards, in order to meet such cases as I have spoken about. Let me, for a moment, speak of the case of Russell, and the case of Kent, in order to show how delays have occurred, and how necessary it is to avoid these delays hereafter in any electoral district. In Russell, the Speaker issued his warrant before the 23rd February, 1888, or he so informed the House. The writ was issued on the 5th April. But, on the 23rd March, the House had ordered the writ to issue on the motion of my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier). It took eight days after this House ordered the writ to issue for the writ to be issued. Why was that delay? Hon. gentlemen sometimes say that they do not know who is to be the returning officer. We could very easily get over that difficulty if the law was altered so as to get permanent returning officers, but surely, when this House orders a writ to issue, it cannot be said that it takes eight days to communicate with the candidate, because I believe that is what they do, as shown by their history in the past, and to find who should be the returning officer. At all events, in Russell it took eight days to issue the writ after the House had ordered that the writ should issue. In Kent we find the same thing. On the 28th February, the House passed a resolution that the report of Mr. Justice Osler should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It took a month for that committee to report to the House, and what was done in that case? That is a delay which should not be allowed to occur again, especially when the House is sitting and the constituency is therefore deprived of representation. However, the committee did report, and the writ was ordered to be issued, but in that case it took ten days for the writ to issue. Kent is not so far away that the Government could not communicate with the gentleman who was running in the Conservative interest, and find out who was to be his returning officer, in less time than that, but it required ten days before that writ was issued. In the case of Russell, the order of this House was practically disobeyed for eight days, and in the case of Kent it was disobeyed for ten days. In order to meet a case of that kind, I propose to ask the committee to adopt this clause:

"When a new writ for an election has to issue upon the order of the House of Commons, then and in every such case the day for the nomination of candidates shall, in the electoral districts of the Province of British Columbia, and in the electoral district of Algoma in the Province of Ontario, and in those of Gaspé and Chicoutimi and Saguenay in the Province of Quebec, be within thirty days after the day when the House of Commons shall have ordered the writ so to issue, and, in the other electoral districts of Canada, shall be within twenty days after the day when the House of Commons shall have so ordered the writ to issue.

I think, if these amendments are adopted by this committee, and by the House, they will be in the general interest of the entire country.

MR. THOMPSON. I am not prepared to say that the hon. member's suggestions may not have a good deal of merit, and that some measure might perhaps be devised to meet what he thinks is an uncertainty as to the time when the writ should issue and the elections should be held; but I do not think he has made out a case for the amendment which he has read. I understand his objection to be, in regard to the elections which have taken place since the general election, that undue delay has taken place in the issue of the writ and the holding of the elections, and his object is to prevent a recurrence of that delay. The hon. gentleman cited, irrespective of the two cases dealt with by the House, eleven cases of bye-elections and in nine of them he had rather to complain of precipitation than of delay. In the cases of Yarmouth and Dorchester, in both of which the vacancy occurred long before there was any probability of a Session of Parliament, he complained of the delay of four months in one case and three months in the other. In the other nine cases the hon. gentleman will remember the statement that in Shelburne there was a delay of but nine days; in Colchester, less than a month's delay; in Cumberland, a month; Haldimand, nine days; Victoria, eleven days; East Northumberland, twelve days, Prince Edward, thirteen days; West Middlesex, two days; L'Assomption, six days. If there was any other, I missed it from not hearing the hon. gentleman. But his statement to the House practically is this, that out of eleven cases with which the Government have had to deal, in nine of them they pursued a course that his amendment would direct us to pursue, and in the other two cases, the vacancies occurred at a time when there was no occasion at all for any haste in holding the elections. The hon. gentleman has stated that it seems desirable to follow the English practice upon this subject, but I think he has not quoted to the House any English statute bearing upon this subject, of the kind which he asks us to adopt. I think there are very good reasons why such a statute does not exist in England, and why it should not be adopted here. One reason appears to me to be this, that if we make the statute rigid, that the election must take place within that period, then the effect of such an enactment is to invalidate the election which does not take place within that period; in other words, to come down to details, that the Speaker should issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and if any misadventure should occur, or any miscarriage, through death of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, or his neglect, or his illness, or through failure of the postal connection, or through neglect of the returning officer, the election should not take place, or the nomination should not take place precisely within the twenty days which the hon. gentleman points out, then no election can take place. If the hon. gentleman does not make it as rigid as that, he has to leave the matter still in the hands of the Government, subject, of course, to the responsibility which the Government has to this House. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be unwise to make the change, and that the hon. gentleman has not made out a case by the illustrations which he has cited.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman, in arguing against the proposition of my hon. friend, has also argued against the principles of the Bill. The same accidents which he says are possible in the cases referred to, in the amendment proposed by my hon. friend, might take place at a general election, and yet we do not refuse to provide for holding all the elections over the country on the same day, and the nominations on the same day, in a general election, because such misadventures may happen. The hon. gentleman says that we have not followed the plan of the English statute. Well, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman seems to overlook the difference between our circumstances and those of the people of England. In the United Kingdom, the Government do not appoint the returning officers, the returning officers are named in the statute; the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery is not controlled or interfered with by the Government that issue the writs. There is a duty imposed upon him by law, and that duty he is called upon to discharge. The hon. gentleman, therefore, will see that the difference between the position of the matter in England and this country arises largely from the action of the Government here in repealing the law which names certain parties as returning officers. The hon. gentleman will also see that the Government have no more right to name returning officers, and to interfere with the freedom of the people in holding an election, than they have to name for the people a candidate whom they shall be called upon to elect. There was a period in the history of England when the Crown named the candidates, and called upon the electors in various parts of the United Kingdom to support the candidates so named. But that is not the law or practice in the United Kingdom at the present time, and it ought not to be the law or the practice here. The hon. gentleman says my hon. friend has not made out a case. Why, my hon. friend pointed out two cases where the writs were delayed for upwards of three months. Now he says that there are only two cases out of some ten or twelve. Why, two cases out of ten or twelve are a very large percentage, quite sufficient to influence the constitution of this House. There is no more reason for the hon. gentleman retaining the power that he possesses under the law, to perpetuate an abuse, or create an abuse which did not before exist, than there is to continue the old abuse of non-simultaneous elections. Sir, they have not simultaneous elections in England at the present time. And why not? Because no abuse has ever grown up. The writs are issued as a matter of course, after Parliament is dissolved. The Crown does not interfere, and can exercise no control over the issue of those writs. No Minister would for a moment be permitted to interfere with the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in the discharge of his duties. Those writs are issued as a matter of course. The elections where the Government is likely to be opposed are just as likely to come on first as those where the Government are likely to be successful in carrying the constituency. So there being no abuse, no change has taken place in the law. Why were elections made simultaneous here? Because the hon. gentleman who now leads the Government used the powers of the Crown in this matter.

Mr. THOMPSON.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, Sir.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says no, but I remember very well when the hon. gentleman, in a general election, held some elections in July and others nearly the first of October. I remember in 1867, when some elections took place in July, and my own election took place on the 17th November, and the elections in Nova Scotia took place on the 19th, when there was no supporter of the Government, except the hon. member who is now Minister of Finance, returned from the Province to support the Administration. I want to know why that was not an abuse? I want to know why, in 1872, when the general election was spread over more than two months, there was nothing to complain of? I want to know why it was not this abuse of the authority of the Crown, this interference with the liberty of the people in the choice of representatives, that did not lead to the demand for simultaneous elections? There can be no doubt whatever on that point, and the hon. gentlemen, driven from their own ground, now undertake to perpetuate an abuse, or create an abuse, of another sort. And why is it? Why, that, although the law provides that the warrant of the Speaker shall issue forthwith under certain circumstances, that a writ shall issue immediately by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, the hon. gentleman undertakes to render that law nugatory and of no force by the usurpation of the power to appoint returning officers. If the hon. gentleman refuses to appoint a returning officer, of course it is impossible for the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to discharge his duty. The House may order the writ to issue, but there is nobody to whom that writ can issue, for the Government have usurped control of the appointments, and it is impossible for the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to discharge his duties. There has been an abuse in that respect. We have had an instance in Kent. Why did the hon. gentleman refer that matter with regard to the election in Kent, and the report of the judge, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections? It was done to secure delay, it was to prevent the writ being issued. They said: We must have the evidence published, we want to know what the case is. I told them that the evidence did not indicate the views expressed by the judge, and the Minister of Justice found it so. They said: We want to know what the evidence is, and the committee must judge. A whole month was consumed in printing the evidence. Then the hon. gentleman said: This committee has no right to review the evidence, and criticise the decision of the judge; they would be sitting in review as an appellate court and over-riding the decision of the judge, and therefore we have no right to look at the evidence and estimate the accuracy or inaccuracy of the judge's conclusion. We must accept his report as a matter of course, as perfectly correct. So the position was taken that while a month was wasted in getting the evidence printed it was not to be looked at when printed. And then the matter came before the House. What then happened? The House ordered the writ to issue forthwith. Was that order obeyed? No. And why not? Because the First Minister and his colleagues, having repealed the law which named the returning officer, as he is named in England, usurped the power to appoint a returning officer to discharge the trust that the law had imposed on them; they failed to advise His Excellency as was their duty to do. When the House and the law says the writ shall issue forthwith, what right has the hon. gentleman to neglect to advise His Excellency to make the appointment at once? The law was set at defiance. Ten days were wasted. There was further procrastination; not until two months had elapsed from the date the vacancy was reported to the House was the writ issued. Yet the hon. gentleman says there is no abuse. Why, there were three months and a half in Yarmouth, four months in Dorchester, and six weeks in Kent, of delay. This is a monstrous condition of things. If the hon. gentleman persists in retaining the power to appoint the returning officer, he should indicate the individual for the five years, or for the continuance of the Parliament, and should appoint a returning officer for a Parliament. If such a course were followed there would be someone to whom the writ could issue. Why should there be Government interference at every turn in every election? The hon. gentleman knows that there has been interference; that there is a meddlesome exercise at every election held; he knows the people are wearied and disgusted with the delay, and that the election in Kent to-day is taking place at a time when every farmer is busily occupied with his spring work. The convenience of the public interests are as nothing in the estimation of the Government, so long as they can manipulate a constituency and use the power they possess for the purpose of party interest. If the Government do not want to accept the amendment of my hon. friend, let the Minister of Justice amend the Bill so as to secure the nomination by the Government of a returning officer during the continuance of the Parliament, and then there can be no meddlesome interference, then the writ will issue as a matter of course in obedience to the law to the party so indicated; but the Government now set the law at defiance. The abuses committed by Charles I, for which he lost his head, were not grosser than those that are being committed by the Government of the country to-day. If the people of this country had not been degraded and debauched by the conduct of the Administration, if their political independence had not been sacrificed by the conduct of the Government, they would no more tolerate such proceedings than the people of England would tolerate the interference of the Crown in matters which concern public affairs. The First Minister knows that he has prevented the free expression of public opinion at the general election from the course taken; he knows that he has prevented the free expression of public opinion in the constituencies where elections have been held since the general elections took place, and that system is being persisted in by the Government setting the law at defiance and refusing to advise the Crown immediately in order that the law itself may be obeyed. My hon. friend made out a strong case in favor of the amendment he has proposed, and the Minister of Justice has not at all answered the objections he made to the law as it now stands. New abuses are being perpetrated, and we seek to have such an amendment to the law as will tie the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite and prevent those abuses being repeated. The proposition is a reasonable one, and the Minister of Justice, with his sense of justice, must be satisfied that there are abuses which should be corrected, and which I do not believe he is disposed to allow if he were in the position to take his own course.

Mr. THOMPSON. I listened to the hon. gentleman's remarks with a great deal of interest and pleasure, but my pleasure would have been increased if he had spoken to the Bill. Let me offer a few words in reply to the hon. gentleman's remarks on a matter which is not referred to in the Bill, the Kent election case, in regard to which the hon. gentleman appears to have utterly forgotten the leading facts on which he based his comments. It is not a fact that the printing of the evidence for the committee occupied one month. The committee were instructed by the resolution of the House to advise the House what course ought to be pursued in view of the report which the learned judge made upon that case. I hold in my hand the evidence on which the committee were asked to advise this House. It occupies 129 closely printed pages, and when the committee met and that evidence was in the hands of the chairman, not a member of the committee had seen it. I admit the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was sagacious enough to be able to come to a resolution as to what advice should be tendered to this House, without reading the evidence.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I had read it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I had not and there were several other members who were in no better position, and they desired before passing judgment to see the evidence. I asked under those circumstances that the evidence be printed, for there was no other way of getting it into the hands of the committee, and instead of the printing taking a month, I venture to say, although I am speaking from recollection, it did not take six days.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is altogether mistaken.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not think one month was consumed from the time of the reference to the committee until they made their report.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Look at the date.

Mr. THOMPSON. The second observation I have to make with respect to the delay is that the decision of the committee in that case was such that delay was inevitable. The decision of the committee was, in view of the report the learned judge had made, that the time which had elapsed without representation of that constituency was sufficient. So that if the committee had reported earlier they would, under any circumstances, have advised a delay in the issue of the writ. The hon. gentleman's next comment on the Kent election case was that we had no right to hold the election to-day, when every farmer was busy with his crops—perhaps a very serious inconvenience, perhaps not a greater inconvenience than holding an election at a time of year when in that county not one-fifth of the voters could go to the polls on account of the condition of the roads. But in any case let me call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the amendment which he supports proposes a fixed date for the election, which cannot be averted or changed, notwithstanding the greatest inconvenience might arise to the community. That is the result of the hon. gentleman's argument with reference to the Kent election case. The hon. gentleman's next argument in favor of the amendment was that the Government have no right to appoint a returning officer at all, yet the amendment does not contain one syllable on that subject, it simply fixes the day within which the election, if an election is to take place, must take place, and it leaves the question of returning officers precisely as it is under the present law. Now, as I have said, if the election does not take place within that period we have to wait, not till after the twenty or thirty days elapsed in some of those cases; not even for the three or four months which seems to have been an intolerable delay by some of my friends opposite; but we have to wait until Parliament shall pass a statute to meet those special cases. The hon. gentleman told me that I was arguing against my own Bill in stating the jeopardy of allowing an election to be entirely defeated by fixing a time within which delays take place. My Bill is entirely silent upon that subject. It has nothing to do with it whatever.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. It does not mention the subject from beginning to end. The Elector Act which I am amending, the hon. gentleman sees, contains provisions with reference to a general election which might be jeopardized, only in relation to that part of it which requires an election to take place on one and the same day throughout the Dominion. And it is only subject to the jeopardies which exist between the issue of the writ and its reaching the hands of the returning officer. Within a certain number of days after he receives the writ he is to have the election, but the amendment proposes that besides that delay and jeopardy arising from the mail, if there should be any miscarriage between the time the warrant issues and the writ issues, the election shall be defeated when it is impossible to hold it.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman stated a moment ago, when he was addressing this House in answer to my friend behind me from Victoria (Mr. Barron), that he had made no case, because out of some ten or eleven bye-elections which had taken place delay had only occurred in the cases of Dorchester and Yarmouth and, that in every other instance the writ had issued without delay. But as there has been delay in two cases there might have been delay in all the other cases as well, and that is exactly what my hon. friend wants to prevent. Why should there be any delay at all in those cases and no delay in the other nine cases. At the present time there is no rule whatever. The writ may be issued at once as soon as the vacancy occurs, or it may be deferred for two or three months. There is only one rule as far as I can understand, and that rule has been put into practice, namely, the convenience of the Government. If it suits the convenience of the Government to withhold a writ it is withheld, and if it suits their convenience to issue it at once it is issued at once. Take the case of Dorchester, for instance. It is well known that they went around from door to door and knocked at this man's door and at that man's door asking if any one would be willing to sacrifice himself on the altar of his party. They found no victim; they waited two or three months and at last they had to let the election go by default and let my hon. friend the present member for Dorchester be elected by acclamation. In the county of Yarmouth they did the same thing, but they found a victim there to sacrifice himself and he was defeated. In the other cases when they found the chances were good, and the result proved their chances were good, they issued the writs immediately. My hon. friend's object is that there should not be a rule in an election for the convenience of the Government, but a rule which would act uniformly to the advantage of the Government or the Opposition, or to the detriment of one or the other. What reason can there be against this? Why not have the law declare that the writ shall issue on a reasonable delay and that there will be no undue favor on one side or the other. The hon. gentleman stated that the amendment of my hon. friend did not contemplate the appointing of returning officers, but the Government have told us again and again that they will keep in their hands the choice of the returning officers and that they will not trust the present officials, who by the nature of their office ought to be returning officers; that they will not trust the registrars or sheriff, because, as was stated some time ago by the Prime Minister, those men being appointed by a hostile Government might be hostile to the Government of the day. I think it is a very bad reason, but we cannot help it, and as it is so we must stand it. I appeal to the sense of justice (if there is any left on the other side), when they have to deal with friend and foe, why not have a uniform law? Why not declare the writ shall issue within a reasonable time? It may be that in one case it would work injuriously to the Government and that in another it would work in their favor, but at all events it would be even justice to all. You can provide for permanent returning officers, when the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery will know at once to whom he should direct his writ, and my hon. friend will be happy to withdraw his amendment if you do that. I do not see any better rule to have uniform justice than the one proposed in the amendment before the House.

Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says there is no such provision in his Bill by which accidents such as he hypothetically stated might arise, in the case of the amendment proposed by my hon. friend being adopted. Why, Sir, the very first clause of his Bill gives rise to the same possibility of misadventure. The Bill says:

"The Governor General shall fix the day for the nomination of the candidates at the election, and shall, at every general election, fix one and the same day for the nomination of candidates in all the electoral districts."

What if the writ should go astray? What if, before the writ reaches Cariboo or some other district, it should be lost? There is the same possibility of misadventure in that case as there is in the case where the time is limited. The time always has been limited. You say all the writs shall be returned before a certain day, when the writs are issued. There is such a provision, and you can make the time long or short, as the law stands now, within which the writs may be returned. Now, the objection of the hon. gentleman in that respect is really no objection at all. Does the hon. gentleman refer to cases in which this power that the Government holds in its hands has been abused? He says there are but two instances mentioned by my hon. friend. I draw his attention to another, the case of the Kent election. The hon. gentleman says there was no delay in the Kent election. The hon. gentleman forgets that a long time elapsed from the time that election was reported and when the evidence was printed. My complaint was this, and I have had sufficient to show that the reason for asking that that evidence should be printed was not a genuine reason, and was not the reason which influenced the Government and their friends in asking that the evidence should be printed. I have stated that the hon. gentleman himself, after that evidence was printed, refused to consider the evidence because he said we were bound by the decision of the judge and we could not go into the question at all, as to whether there had or had not been such corrupt practices as the judge reported. Why, Sir, if we were not at liberty to enquire into that fact there was no object in having that evidence before us, and yet there was a delay of nearly a month in getting that evidence printed. When it was printed the hon. gentleman refused to act upon it, and refused to consider it. When the report was made to this House and it was ordered that a writ should be issued there was still a further delay of ten days, because the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery could find nobody into whose hands that writ could be delivered. The statute says that the writ shall issue forthwith, and yet the Government nullified the provisions of the statute by refusing to name the returning officer. There are two ways in which that difficulty can be got over, that is to accept the amendment of my hon. friend, or let the Government name a returning officer during the continuance of Parliament in every constituency throughout the country. They have named returning officers at last election. Why do they not say: These parties shall be the returning officers until this Parliament is dissolved, and then the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery can issue his writ to that person without the interference of the Government at all. We have pointed out again and again on this side of the House that in England the Crown never interferes with the matter of the appointment of a returning officer, or never interferes with the issue of the writ. The Clerk in England does his duty, as he has sworn to discharge his duty; and as he is not allowed to do his duty, as he has sworn to discharge it, in this country in consequence of the improper interference or negligence of the Government in advising His Excellency to appoint the returning officer. Now let the Government name a returning officer during the continuance of a Parliament, and then the law may be complied with. Then the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery may issue the writ as the law says he shall. While you agree to such a statute, you render it unworkable by reserving to yourself a dispensing power, such a power as one King in England lost his head for pretending to. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but I say it is a gross abuse of the power he possesses; I say it is contrary to the obligation into which he has entered as an adviser of His Excellency the Governor General. Did he not swear to give His Excellency proper and true advice, to carry out the law of the land as it was intended by Parliament it should be carried out; and is it not violating the spirit of that law which says that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall issue the writ forthwith when he refuses to name the man to whom that writ can be issued? Why did you not advise His Excellency to appoint the returning officer the moment Parliament gave the order? We know very well why it was not done—because the hon. gentleman knows on whom he relies. He knows that those who assisted him to put that Act on the Statute-book are ready to wink at the misconduct of the Government on this question; and when we propose an amendment to the law to carry out the purpose of Parliament, he seeks to defeat that proposition, not because it is not reasonable or will not have the effect of securing a fair and just administration of the law, but because it will take away from him the power which he has abused, both in advising His Excellency and in disregarding the order of the House.

Mr. BARRON. The objection made by the hon. Minister of Justice to my proposed amendment is that delays might occur which would render it nugatory. That objection applies as much to his Bill as to my proposition. But the hon. gentleman could not have read the statute which he proposes to amend, for section 15 of it provides:—

“Whenever from unforeseen accident, delays, or otherwise, the proclamation hereinafter mentioned cannot be posted up so as to leave the required delay between the posting up of the proclamation and the nomination day, or whenever any candidate dies after being nominated and before the close of the polls, the returning officer may fix another day for the nomination of candidates.”

That section will still be in force, and if there is any such occasion as the hon. Minister pointed out, the election can still be carried on.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) improved or strengthened his argument by his violence of language. It is very remarkable that whenever we are concerned with the franchise or the appointment of returning officers, he is so strong in his opinion that he threatens us with losing our heads; but when he speaks so strongly, I think he has lost his head already. It is a new reading of history that Charles the First lost his head because a writ was delayed twenty days. The hon. gentleman says the Government have usurped the power of appointing returning officers. Well, it happens that the Government are authorised to appoint returning officers by the law of the land; it happens that it is a duty forced upon the Government by the law of the land, and they would be guilty of breaking their oath if they did not appoint the returning officers.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But you do not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We do recommend the appointment of the returning officers to His Excellency, and His Excellency has been pleased to appoint the returning officers that we recommend in carrying out the law of the land. But it seems to me that it answers no good purpose to enter into a general discussion as to whether the law was right or wrong with respect to the appointment of returning officers on this occasion, or the general principles under which elections are carried on. Now, if the hon. gentleman is anxious to alter the law, let him prepare a Bill and introduce it, and we will discuss it. It is too late this year to discuss it, but there will be four years before a general election, and the hon. gentleman who moves this amendment can make it a portion of that Bill. Meanwhile, I think the hon. gentleman should allow this Bill to go through. The hon. Minister of Justice says that he is not prepared to accept this amendment or to delay his measure for the purpose of making it a portion of it. I think the hon. gentleman, having expressed his views, had better reserve his amendment to be a portion of an Election Act which the hon. gentleman can bring down next Session.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Would the hon. gentleman explain the reason of the delay in the two cases of Kent and Russell.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think it is especially my duty as First Minister to look after the election lists.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Oh, yes, it is.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know whether my hon. friend interfered when he was First Minister. Perhaps my hon. friend thinks it was his duty; it is not mine.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I did not interfere, but I saw that the law was carried out. You did the reverse.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As I understand, the law provides that the writ shall issue forthwith. Everybody knows that the writ has not issued forthwith in a great many cases, for various reasons, and therefore the law is not obeyed. It is a matter of notoriety that in the case of the city of St. John, when its representation was vacated by the decease of my friend, the late Mr. Burpee, five months were allowed to elapse before that vacancy was filled, although the law provides that when the Speaker is notified of a vacancy, the writ should be issued forthwith to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and it is after the writ is in the hands of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery that these delays occur. Then, there are the cases of Haldimand and Chambly. In 1886, when it was desired to test the popular pulse, various reasons were given for delaying the election in Haldimand; it was impossible to have that election until the new voters' lists came into play, and certain serfs of the Crown should be included in it. But, although that was the case in Haldimand, the election in Chambly was hurried on before the new lists were prepared. It seems to me that where accidents of that kind occur, there is the greatest abuse—or if the hon. gentleman objects to that term, there is a remarkable irregularity, to say the least, in the course the Government have seen fit to pursue under an Act, which, as I understand, it, was intended to secure the immediate filling of vacancies, and it was with the same object that my hon. friend's motion was proposed.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It seems to me that this is quite an important question. The only objection the hon. Minister of Justice has offered to the amendment is that by some accident the writ might not arrive in time; but it has been pointed out that section 15 provides for such an occurrence, and, as the hon. member for Bothwell has pointed out, that may occur in the case of a general election. Now, it seems to me the spirit of the Act requires that as soon as the Speaker is notified of any vacancy, according to law, he should at once issue his warrant, so that the vacancy may be filled up. The instant the warrant passes to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, the Government take hold of it, and, under the present system, can delay the election as long as they please. My hon. friend who moved the amendment has not gone beyond the present House, but in 1885, in the case referred to by the hon. member for South Oxford, the warrant of the Speaker was in the hands of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery on the 12th July, 1885. On the 16th July, 1885, enquiry was made in the House of the Government as to whether the writ was issued in that case, and the only answer that the hon. Minister gave was that he would enquire about it, and he was enquiring nearly three months before he decided to issue the writ. It was nearly the end of September before the writ was issued. When, however, a vacancy occurred in the city of St. John, owing to the acceptance of office on the 30th October by the present Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, the writ was issued on that same day for the election in that constituency. It seems to me that the writ should issue within a certain specified time, say twenty days, as named by my hon. friend, after notice being received by the Speaker of a vacancy having occurred or of an election having been voided. Surely the Government could, without difficulty, appoint a returning officer in that time, and they would then carry out the spirit of the Act. We find that in one case the Government were able to name a returning officer within two days, and, therefore, it may be presumed that a delay of twenty days would be ample time for a similar purpose. In that case, there could be uniformity, whereas to-day the Government, when it suits them, may delay the election for an indefinite period, as they did in the two flagrant cases of Yarmouth and Dorchester. The hon. the Minister of Justice says that there was no Session of Parliament in the case of Chambly before the election took place, and that, therefore, the election took place in ample time. But in that case the election was held in July when there was no prospect of any Parliament being held until the following winter; and although the Franchise Act had been passed, the Government did not wait for the electoral list to be revised, but held the election in July, despite the fact, if the contention of the hon. the Minister of Justice is right, that there was not the slightest necessity to do so, because there was no probability of any Session of Parliament being held for some months. It seems to me that in justice to the electoral districts, and to carry out the spirit of the Act, there should be no delay on the part of the Speaker issuing his warrant and at once putting the machinery in motion for the purpose of having an election. Let a reasonable delay be given, and then the responsibility will fall on the Government, and surely, judging from past experience, there ought to be no difficulty in the Government carrying out their duty within the delay suggested by my hon. friend.

Mr. THOMPSON. The objection now is that in Chambly the writs were issued too soon.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Not so.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is really very difficult to satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite. In most cases, they complain of Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

the delay being too long, but now they change their tune; and, after first taunting us with undue delay, they complain of too much haste. I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that this amendment would have compelled the election to be held in Chambly at once, contrary to the argument which my hon. friend has just presented that the Government ought in such a case to wait until the electoral lists were revised. I would just say a word to the hon. member for Bothwell with regard to my contention as to the effect of the evidence in the case of the county of Kent, because I am sure, had he spoken of the matter when it was fresh in his memory, he would not have said that my contention that we should wait for the printing of the evidence was insincere, in view of the fact that when the evidence was printed I held that the finding of the judge was conclusive and could not be reversed by this House. My contention was that we had no right to say from the evidence that the judge's finding was wrong, but that we were bound to read the evidence in order to be in a position to advise the House as to whether the corrupt practices which the judge said had prevailed in the election for that county were of so flagrant a nature that we should disfranchise the constituency. We did refer to the evidence for the purpose of making the report which we made to the House; and if we had not reviewed it, we could not have conscientiously come to the conclusion we did.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman certainly has forgotten the discussion that took place and a portion of his own report. He proposed that we should declare that the constituency had been sufficiently punished by being deprived for a time of representation in this House. I pointed out that the evidence disclosed the fact that the constituency did not deserve to be punished at all, and the hon. gentleman's contentions was that the judge having said there was no reason to believe corrupt practices had extensively prevailed in that constituency, we were bound to accept that statement as true, no matter what the evidence might show. That was the position of the hon. gentleman, and that was his justification for putting that provision in the report, and refusing to accept any amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have said that was my contention, and I say again we are not at liberty to refer to the evidence in an election case for the purpose of revising the decision of the judge, but can only refer to it for the purpose of advising the House whether the corrupt practices that prevailed, prevailed to such an extent as to justify steps to be taken to disfranchise the constituency.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman does not meet my statement squarely. I do not say that we should sit in judgment and review the decision of the judge, but the hon. gentleman embraced in his report the inferential statement that the constituency was corrupt and deserved punishment, but that it had been sufficiently punished by the delay that had already occurred in its representation; and when I pointed out to him that there was not a tittle of evidence to show that the constituency deserved punishment, he said we had no right to look at the evidence in that matter, but to look only at the report of the judge. That was the position he took. Therefore, it was not the evidence that the hon. gentleman was examining in order to make his report, but it was the decision of the judge that the House had before the evidence was printed at all. The hon. gentleman says we are hard to please on this side. He says that we complain about the haste in issuing the writ in Chambly and the delay in issuing it in Haldimand. The hon. gentleman has forgotten the circumstances connected with those elections. The late member for Haldimand died while Parliament was in session, and it was proposed here that the writ should issue. The Speaker issued his warrant, if I remember rightly, and the hon. gentleman, when we asked him why the writ did not issue, declared that there was no necessity for any hasty, that the new voters' lists were being prepared, and that it would be wrong to hold the election before that list was completed. Parliament he said, had by its legislation already declared that the existing voters' list was imperfect, it had altered the qualification of electors, and we must wait for the new list. That was the declaration the first Minister made on behalf of the Government. The Government set the provision of the law at defiance, and justified their course in that matter on the ground that a new voters' list was being prepared, and that, until that list was prepared, there ought not to be an election. That was the hon. gentleman's position. It was either right or it was not right. Some two or three months later, there was a vacancy in Chambly, and the hon. gentleman disregarded the rule which had been laid down in the case of Haldimand, and ordered a new writ to issue at a time when the old voters' list was the only one under which it could take place. Both these cases occurred at the same period of time, and what we are now calling the attention of the Minister of Justice to is the fact that there was one rule and policy adopted in the county of Chambly and another rule and policy in the county of Haldimand. Both of these could not have been right. One or the other rule should have been adhered to, and we now propose to make such a change that the discretionary power the Government possess and have abused as has been shown very clearly, should no longer be left in their hands, and I think it is clear that it ought not to be left in their hands, and I think we are not very hard to please. We point out what the abuse is, and what the remedy is, and we do not want the abuse which occurred in Chambly or the abuse which occurred in Haldimand to be repeated. We wish to see the law amended and made what it ought to be, so that justice may be done and that, when elections are held, they may fairly reflect the public opinion of the constituency.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). My hon. friend the Minister of Justice thought I complained in regard to the election in Chambly. He said that the reason why the elections in Yarmouth and Dorchester were delayed was that there was no Session of Parliament at the time, and there was no necessity for holding an election, but the election in Chambly was held in July, the vacancy having occurred at about the same time as that in Dorchester, but the Government issued the writ in the first case and not in the other.

Mr. THOMPSON. My argument was not that an election should not be held in summer, but that there was no ground for complaint if it was not.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Surely, if the Minister of Justice will not accept this amendment on any other grounds he will when he sees how it must distress the Finance Minister to witness this lack of fixity of purpose on the part of his colleagues.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have not seen it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Surely the hon. gentleman will understand that, when a certain rule was adopted in regard to Chambly, and an entirely different rule prevailed in Haldimand, we had good reason to propose a change. If there was ever any case in which the power and authority of the Government were abused for a party advantage, it was in the different treatment they accorded to Chambly and Haldimand.

Amendment (Mr. Barron) negatived.

On section 7,

Mr. EDGAR. That is the section which was allowed to stand. Is it not proposed to make any alteration in that?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think not. The reason it is allowed to stand is, as I said the other day, because I thought part of the legislation regarding the qualification of farmers' sons and owners' sons, was in the Franchise Act, and I think it is.

On section 9,

Mr. THOMPSON. This section was allowed to stand at the suggestion of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in order to make it clear that there should be no reference to appeals for the purpose of counting the ballots, unless the list of certificates of copies could not be obtained.

On sub-section 3, of section 13,

Mr. THOMPSON. This was allowed to stand at the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition, who thought there should be a trial by the indictment.

Mr. LAURIER. I objected to that section because I thought it was leaving too great powers in the hands of the justices of the peace. As a rule, without any offence to justices of the peace, I would not be disposed to trust them with these very large powers. I believe it would be better to follow the spirit of the Act, and to make the offence punishable as all other offences are punishable under the Act.

Mr. BARRON. It is quite clear that under that section there is no right of appeal whatsoever.

Mr. THOMPSON. I was going to suggest that there is a Bill relating to summary convictions before the House, and in it I will endeavor to provide for an appeal in such cases.

Mr. AMYOT. I beg to move in amendment to this Bill the Bill which I introduced some time ago, Bill No. 2. It is as follows:—

Paragraph (b) of section nine of "Dominion Controverted Elections Act," is hereby amended by striking out the following words after the word "days" in the second line of the said paragraph: "after the day of publication in the Canada Gazette of the receipt of the return of the writ of election by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery," and substituting the following: "after the day fixed for the nomination, in case the candidate or candidates have been declared elected on that day, and in other cases thirty days after the polling day."

My object is to make uniform the delays in contestations, 30 days after nomination day, when the election is by acclamation, and 30 days after polling day when there has been an election. I do not think there can be any objection to this. I do not want to discuss the matter, as the House is fully informed of the facts.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think the hon. gentleman will see on reflection that his Bill is not a safe one. I will read paragraph (b) of section 9 which he proposes to amend:

"The petition must be presented not later than 30 days after the day of publication in the Canada Gazette of the receipt of the return of the writ of the election by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery."

Striking out those words and saying:

"After the day fixed for the nomination, in case the candidate or candidates have been declared elected on that day, and in other cases 30 days after polling day."

Now, it seems to me, from the examination I have given the hon. gentleman's Bill, that if the returning officer, for any reason, delays his return beyond 30 days after nomination day or polling day, he would put it beyond the power of either party to controvert the election.

Mr. AMYOT. The returning officer is bound by law to make his report within a certain delay, which delay is fixed, I think, by the statute. He is bound to do it, and we have never seen an instance where he has not done it.

Mr. THOMPSON. But if he does not do so, he does not deprive any party of his remedy. But it is a very dangerous thing, I think, to allow him to prevent the return from being controverted by petition.

Mr. AMYOT. We can make a special proviso for that, so as, except in cases where the returning officer will not comply with the law, to fix another delay for that case. I think it is fair that the delay for contestation should be the same for all the members. It is not fair to give 40 days or 60 days to one and only 30 days to another. Let us make a uniform delay for every one, and have equal justice.

Mr. MITCHELL. It appears to me that my hon friend's intention in his Bill is very good, and if the working of his Bill is not such as to meet the difficulty, if any difficulty presents itself to the Minister of Justice, he can easily frame a Bill which will carry out what my hon. friend asks for, namely, that every person shall have the same time granted to him to enter a contestation or to meet a contestation. It is very easy to frame a clause to meet the difficulty, if the Minister of Justice feels there is a practical difficulty in what my hon. friend presents. He wishes to avoid the recurrence of what took place at the last general election. It is patent to everyone that gross injustice was done to some members, that some of us were not gazetted for three weeks and some for nearly four weeks, after the returns, and some of them coming in the same day were gazetted in the next Gazette; in other words, there was a fortnight or three weeks of opportunity for contesting the election as against some gentlemen, while most of the ministerial candidates were gazetted almost immediately. If this Bill does not meet the case the Minister of Justice can prepare a clause that will meet the difficulty.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is no difficulty in carrying out the clause as proposed by my hon. friend. The hon. gentleman proposes that the period within which an election may be contested shall be thirty days counting from the day of election. It is contended, however, that it is possible the returning officer might, contrary to law, delay the returns of any particular candidate for thirty days. I do not see how it is possible. The returning officer is sworn to discharge certain duties; he must within a certain number of days declare a candidate elected, then four days are given for an appeal to the county judge for the purpose of having a recount. The whole of the proceedings taken must be taken within less than the thirty days, and, that being the case, such an abuse as the hon. gentleman suggests could hardly arise. Certainly it never could arise if the Government were to allow certain officials to act as returning officers. So far as I know, since the union in 1867 not a single instance has occurred in which the period of thirty days elapsed before some candidate seeking election was declared elected. It may be that if the hon. gentleman wishes to take abundant security further amendment may be required by providing that in any case where the returning officer has failed to declare some candidate elected within thirty days a week or more time may be allowed for petitioning. But certainly thirty days covers a much longer period than is required by law to have one or other candidate declared elected, even where an appeal is made to the judge and a recount is had. If the hon. gentleman thinks the time is not sufficient it might be extended to thirty-five days.

Mr. O'BRIEN. My suggestion is that the time should count, not from the day of election in case of a contest, but from declaration day, when the vote is summed up and the returning officer makes his declaration. That should be the time from which the period allowed for filing a petition should be dated.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think the matter requires to be very carefully considered, and several Acts, both the Election and the Controverted Elections Act, will require to be remodelled to carry out such a principle as has been advocated. I would remind the House of the proceedings after the holding of the poll. We have first of all after polling day the delay before declaration day, the summing up of the votes, the delay of six days and possibly a recount in the meantime as well. The petition is a petition complaining of the undue return. If we are to confine the practice to the Controverted Elections Act, we must give a fair chance to those desiring to petition, and all those proceedings have to be taken within thirty days. The return goes to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, perhaps on the twenty-eighth or twenty-ninth, or even of the thirtieth day, and there is certainly no time to prepare a petition or even to know what the return is against which the party will petition in the short interval remaining unexpired. I stated to the House at an earlier period of the Session that, although I intended to introduce a Bill relating to the Controverted Elections Act and to suggest several important changes—and this is of course an important change, but I refer to other important changes—it was decided that it would be better for several reasons to wait until another Session, and no great harm could accrue by that delay, inasmuch as the probability was that few by-elections would be held in the interim. I will, if the hon. gentleman concurs in the suggestion, let this matter stand until that has been done, the Acts compared and the necessary changes made, and in the meantime I assent to the principle suggested and embodied in the hon. gentleman's Bill for having a fixed time at which all returns shall take effect irrespective of any discretion on the part of any officer whatsoever. As regards the suggestion of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien); that would be quite feasible if it were not that the petition has to be against not the declaration of the returning officer, but against the return which he makes, and which is really not made until at least six days after declaration day. That, however, could be remedied by making a provision to this effect, that on declaration day or within the six days after the returning officer should make such a return, and should make it immediately so public that every person desiring to petition would have ample notice of what the return was, and from that date have a fixed period, and a short period too, in which the election must be protested.

Mr. AMYOT,

Mr. EDGAR. I must congratulate the Minister of Justice on having assented to the principle of the proposed amendment. I would point out, however, that even more changes will have to be made in the law. I do not find anything in the law rendering it obligatory upon the Government to fix any particular day for the return of the writ. There are uncertainties which must be removed. If we are going to fix a day by statute within which the petition against the return must be made, we must begin by fixing a date in the statute within which the return itself must be made.

Mr. AMYOT. In view of the declaration of the Minister and his promise that he will introduce a Bill next Session, I withdraw the amendment.

Bill reported.

FORFEITURES FOR TREASON AND FELONY.

Mr. THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 88) to abolish forfeitures for treason and felony, and to otherwise amend the law relating thereto.

Mr. EDGAR. I surely think the Minister of Justice must see that this Bill interferes in a most marked degree with the rights of the Provinces, because it undertakes to deprive them of their property. In this Bill the Government proposes that the land which by the law to-day when it has been escheated in some cases becomes the property of the Provinces, shall not escheat and shall not become the property of the Provinces. I surely think that cannot be a proper function for this Parliament to assume. It may be said that because it is escheated on account of crime, that that would make some difference. I do not apprehend that it does. I has been decided by the Privy Council in the Mercer case that escheated land goes to the Provinces, because escheats are royalties. It cannot be contented that escheats for crime are not royalties and do not go to the Crown as royalties, and to the Provinces consequently. I know that in the Province of Ontario at any rate, that when before the decision of the Privy Council they were legislating about escheats, they excepted escheats for crime from their legislation; perhaps, having some doubts then as to the law on the subject. I think that those who took the provincial view, thought that escheated land belonged to the Provinces by reason of the tenure of the Crown. When a failure of heirs arose the land would revert on account of the tenure to the Crown. Probably for that reason they left out in the legislation in Ontario at all events, reference to escheats in the case of crime. But, as I said, the Privy Council has distinctly decided that escheats belong to the provinces as royalties. Take section 2 of this Bill. It says:

"Subject to the provisions of this Act and from and after the passing thereof, no confession, verdict, inquest, conviction or judgment of or for any treason or felony or felo de se shall cause any attainder or corruption of blood, or any forfeiture or escheat, provided that nothing in this Act shall affect the law of forfeiture consequent upon outlawry or any forfeiture in relation to which special provision is made by any Act of the Parliament of Canada."

I surely think that is taking away the property of the Provinces, and the Act seems to interfere in another respect most distinctly with provincial rights. There is provision made in this Act for the administration of assets. Section 8 provides:

The Governor in Council may, if to him it seems fit so to do, commit, during pleasure, the custody and management of the property of any convict to an administrator to be appointed in that behalf; and upon any determination of such appointment, either by revocation or by death of any such administrator, a new administrator may, from time to time, be appointed; and every such administrator shall, upon his appointment, be and be deemed to be the successor in law of the former administrator; and all property invested in, and all powers given to such former administrator by virtue of this Act shall thereupon devolve to and become vested in such successor, who shall be bound by all acts lawfully done by such former administrator during the continuance of his office; and the provisions hereinafter contained with reference to any administrator shall, in the case of the appointment of more than one person, apply to such administrators jointly.

Now I think if there is anything that belongs to the Provincial Government at all it is the right to regulate matters of administration, and I think for that reason the Bill in those respects at any rate is not within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. There are portions of it which, however, are different and do not bear on the rights of the Provinces.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not propose this evening to go on with the Bill in the Committee of the Whole House. I will avail myself of the opportunity of going into committee to answer the objections which the hon. gentleman has made. They only relate to certain features of the Bill, and I think I can satisfy the hon. gentleman that the Bill is entirely within our jurisdiction—that we are dealing with the property of the Crown, after having relinquished our right to forfeit—dealing with the property of the criminal in respect to which the Crown has the right of ownership, as we can relinquish the forfeiture for crime. That property, which is of right ours, we shall administer in a certain way for the benefit of the convict himself. That is the principle that underlies these provisions.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Can the Crown restore the forfeiture? I recollect that some years ago in New Brunswick a party was pardoned, and subsequently an Act of the Local Legislature was necessary to restore his property.

Mr. THOMPSON. By this Bill we propose to give up the property.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman, in this second section, misuses the word "escheat." Forfeitures and escheats are two different things. Mr. Blackstone, in his commentaries, points out that when there were allodial estates, and when there could not be any property except in the individual owner, there is nevertheless forfeiture. The doctrine of escheats was of very much later growth; but even in this country in cases for forfeitures for crime, they never could be more than forfeiture of the interest of the party, that is, forfeiture of the interest of the tenant in fee, not forfeiture of the property. The jurisdiction as to escheated property is necessarily in the Local Legislatures; but I think that decision of the Privy Council does include forfeitures as well as escheats. However, that matter can better be considered in Committee than in a discussion on the second reading of the Bill. I merely mention the fact that the hon. gentleman uses the word "forfeiture" properly, but the word "escheats" improperly, in the Bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. By another name it would smell as sweet, and we can change it if necessary. Yet, I am not willing to admit that I use the word improperly, because my authority for it is the English statute, of which this is an exact copy.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But there is this difference, that in the United Kingdom the whole power is vested in one body.

Mr. THOMPSON. That does not affect the use of the word.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). I think the position taken by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) would surprise most lawyers, that this Parliament, in dealing with the criminal law, has not itself power to decide what the penalties shall be, and that by the decision in the Mercer case escheats do not go to the Crown. The hon. member for Bothwell's playing upon the words escheat and forfeiture strikes us as really a mere verbal and technical criticism. These words are certainly used in the ordinary sense, as the hon. gentleman will find them in any law book.

Mr. TISDALE. I think that if this House has the power, it ought to prevent any such cases as the Mercer case occurring again. There were descendants of the man whose property was in dispute. We have a large building in Toronto, which has been erected at the expense of a private individual for the benefit of the Province. I think if this House can do anything to prevent any Province taking property in that way, it should do it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

It being six o'clock, the Committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

UPPER OTTAWA IMPROVEMENT COMPANY.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 20) relating to the Upper Ottawa Improvement Company.

Mr. BRYSON. I desire to ask that this Bill be left over until it is reprinted. Several gentlemen who are absent to-night would like to place themselves on record in relation to this Bill, and at their suggestion I make this request.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). This Bill has been two months before the House. It was fully discussed in the committee, as were all the amendments made to it, and it seems to me that it would be unnecessarily delaying the work to have the Bill stand over.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee (Mr. Small in the Chair).

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This proceeding is irregular. The law provides that the Deputy Speaker, who is called the Chairman of the Committee, shall take the Chair whenever he is in the House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Very well, I will take the Chair.

The Committee passed the several clauses and the preamble of the Bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER called on Mr. Small to take the Chair.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is again irregular. The Deputy Speaker must remain in the Chair; and as he cannot report to himself, the Speaker must be called in. No hon. member can be appointed Chairman of the Committee of the Whole while the Deputy Speaker is in the House, and as the Deputy Speaker cannot report to himself, the Speaker must be called in.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When the Deputy Speaker is in the Chair he cannot very well act as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and then get up and report to himself.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Certainly not, and the Speaker must be here to receive the report. The clerk says that is not the English practice, but look at our own rules which we have made for ourselves. The rule says that the Chairman of the Committee shall be called to the Chair whenever he is present. Now, the Chairman of the Committee is present and is called to the Chair. He, of course, cannot report to himself, but the Speaker must be here in order that he may report to him.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The rule is that the Deputy Speaker, if he is in the House must take the Chair; and once he does so, he can call on any one else to take it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Let us send for the Speaker.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is impossible that the Deputy Speaker should report to himself, and the Speaker is not present. Therefore the Deputy Speaker must call on an hon. member to take his place as Chairman of the Committee in order that he may receive the report of the committee.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The proceeding is altogether irregular, and contrary to our rule.

Mr. SMALL then took the Chair and reported the Bill, which was read the third time and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 102) respecting the Central Ontario Railway Company.—(Mr. O'Brien.)

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Arts, Agriculture and Statistics $ 47,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I wish to state that we propose to drop the item "for expenses in connection with Dominion exhibition, $10,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Why is the hon. gentleman dropping that?

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew.)

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We thought it was not necessary to incur that expenditure this year.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) You are not going to contribute anything to that?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. Why was it put in?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was put in the main Estimates before it had been properly considered, and it was reconsidered afterwards.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would suggest whether it would not be just as well to apply that amount, or more if necessary, to a proper representation of Canada at the Cincinnati Exhibition. The hon. gentleman knows that there are an immense number of Canadians in the United States, and he professes to be anxious to promote trade relations between the two countries.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is only sometimes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And, if he would assist the exhibition of Canadian products at Cincinnati, it would do a great deal towards promoting more intimate commercial relations between the two countries. Of course, if the hon. gentleman is opposed to that, such a policy would be objectionable to him, but, if he is favorable, as he professes, to more intimate trade relations, there is no way in which he could assist it better than by giving an opportunity for Canada to exhibit her products at that exhibition. Even if he or his leader is opposed to that now, they have changed their views so often this Session that perhaps we may expect them to be in favor of it when the time comes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is one difficulty, and that is that we have no authority from the Crown recommending such an expenditure.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Certainly not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You were merely suggesting how we might avoid the difficulty of having this $10,000 left on our hands.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman knows that there is no difficulty whatever in getting the authority of the Crown for this expenditure; and therefore, if he has any better objection to offer, we should know it.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I see that last year, though the amount voted for the care of archives was $6,000, hon. gentlemen expended about $1,200 in excess of the grant. I think the House should have some information upon that.

Mr. CARLING. This amount is for collecting historical records and manuscripts, of which there are now upwards of half a million volumes arranged, bound and ready for reference. The volumes are constantly referred to for settling disputed points. The archivist reports the vote insufficient, and for this reason it is impossible to begin copying documents in Paris. Dr. W. F. Poole, president of the American Historical Society, in his report of a visit to Ottawa in September last, made officially, to the Society of Librarians of North America, describes the Canadian archives as the most valuable collection for historical purposes on the continent.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I am not objecting to his taking this small vote, but I was objecting to the Department spending nearly double the amount that Parliament voted for a specific purpose, and when money is expended in that way, it amounts to this, that it is only a farce for us to go through the form of voting money at all. If we vote a sum of $6,000, and they spend between $10,000 and $11,000, the reason for going into Committee of Supply seems to be rendered nugatory.

Mr. CARLING. I think it is the practice, if any particular vote is over-run, to take the balance from another vote. I believe the money was carefully expended, and, if necessary, I can get the particulars.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I have no doubt that the amount was expended, and I am not objecting to the expenditure, but I am objecting to the principle which is involved. I do not think the hon. gentleman is justified in withdrawing from another sum voted for a specific purpose, any amount to apply to this. The whole principle is wrong. I have no doubt that the money was spent, or it would not be in the Auditor General's report, as it is.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I see that C. C. Chipman is down for $400 in connection with the archives. How does that come about?

Mr. CARLING. That is not in this year.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). No, but last year it was in, and I think it was stated that there was an appropriation of $1,000 extra for this purpose. Yet we find that C. C. Chipman has drawn $400 out of this fund, and perhaps that may be the reason why the expenditure of 1886-87 amounts to so much more than the sum appropriated.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that the arrangement previously was that Mr. Chipman had $400 a year in connection with the supervision of this work on the other side of the Atlantic, and the hon. gentleman will see that it disappears from the vote of this year. It had nothing to do with the $1,000 which was voted to that gentleman, and which was for an entirely different purpose. It was for the very extraordinary duty that has been thrown upon him in connection with the exhibition in London. The $100 was paid to him by the Department of Immigration for the supervision and constant attention to this work in the Archives Branch.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is this Mr. Chipman the gentleman who was in the office of the High Commissioner in London?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, he is the same person.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Then he received his salary under another head as private secretary to the High Commissioner?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, he was not private secretary to the High Commissioner?

Mr. LISTER. What position did he hold?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He held the position of accountant and assistant secretary in the High Commissioner's office.

Mr. LISTER. At what salary?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. At a salary of $1,800, and this was $400 added.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not hear what explanation was given why the vote had been $6,000 and the expenditure $10,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The explanation given by the Minister of Agriculture was that an unusual amount of work was thrown upon the archivist, who was extremely anxious to carry on a considerable amount of work. In fact it has been very extensive indeed. This amount was taken from the bracketed vote, as the hon. member will see, but it was thought as there was sufficient money provided in this resolution, No. 45, to cover the expenditure, we took it so that they could go on with this work that Mr. Brymner was very anxious should be done during the year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think that we have ever considered that when these votes for a distinctly different purpose were bracketed, it was right to transfer one to another. I think it is a very objectionable practice. I have always objected myself to bracketing.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it would be better to avoid it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But where you state distinctly, so much for one purpose and so much for another, then it is very objectionable to remove a vote from one to the other.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no doubt about that, and I have no doubt my hon. friend will see that it does not occur again.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was any authority taken by Governor General's warrant or anything else?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No. It was held by the department that there was enough in the total vote to allow for an excess in one branch, and this amount was taken; but I quite agree that it is not a good practice, and I am quite sure the Minister of Agriculture will see that it does not occur again.

Mr. CARLING. I may tell the hon. member that this was for agriculture and statistics, and I believe it has been a practice in the Department of Agriculture, not only last year, but for many years, and during the time the hon. gentleman was Finance Minister, I am told by the officers of the department that when a sufficient amount was voted and it overran, they would take it for another vote.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not recollect whether the hon. gentleman is right that the abuse may have prevailed before, but I think it is distinctly an abuse. I do not remember at this moment anything of the kind that the Minister of Agriculture mentions, but it may have occurred. Where such things were brought to my notice, I always insisted on a separate vote being taken, but it is possible that one or two occasions may have occurred.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No doubt the practice is contrary to the rule at the present time. The old English practice, of course, was to vote the subsidy in a lump sum. Mr. Downing was the first Chancellor of the Exchequer who introduced the present practice, and from his time down to the present, it has always been the practice, in the English House of Commons, to confine the expenditure to the appropriations made; and the sum that is asked for one purpose cannot be applied to another different purpose.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would ask the Minister of Finance whether these services were performed on the other side of the water, or here in Ottawa?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They were performed on both sides. I may explain to my hon. friend that Mr. Chipman, who was appointed to the position of accountant and assistant secretary of the High Commissioner's office in London, was necessarily required when I was called back to the position of Minister of Finance, remained still charged with the administration of the duties of the High Commissioner's office in London. My hon. friend will see that it was almost indispensable that I should have the services of a gentleman who was thoroughly familiar with the duties in both departments, and consequently I appointed Mr. Chipman my private secretary as Minister of Finance; and it would have been almost impossible for me to carry on, as I have done, the administration of both departments if it had not been for the valuable services of Mr. Chipman. I dare say my hon. friend knows that he is a man of exceptional ability, and of unwearied industry. He has served long in the various departments of the public service, in New Brunswick first, and subsequently in the Railway Department at Ottawa, then in the Finance Department, and then in the Department of Railways and Canals.

There are few gentlemen better acquainted with the duties of these various services. When Mr. Dewar retired he was appointed in his place to the position of accountant and also assistant secretary in the High Commissioner's office. I may say that in that position I had no private secretary. There is no charge for a private secretary in that connection. But when it became necessary for me to return as Minister of Finance, and I was still charged with the duties of administering the office of High Commissioner on the other side, it was absolutely indispensable that I should avail myself of the services of a gentleman who was thoroughly familiar with the duties of both departments.

Mr. COCKBURN. I had happened to be in London during the time of the exhibition, and was brought into very frequent contact with Mr. Chipman, and I can assure the hon. gentlemen opposite that there was no man on that side of the Atlantic who worked harder for the interests of Canada than did Mr. Chipman. I found him early in the morning and late at night, hard at work, and I know from personal knowledge that in the management of some things entrusted to him, he was the means of saving to this country several thousands of dollars. If hon. gentlemen knew his valuable services as well as I do, Mr. Chipman is the last man to whom they would grudge the small amount that is now being voted to him.

Mr. TROW. No doubt Mr. Chipman is a very worthy officer. I found him so. I had the pleasure of being in the office of the High Commissioner, and found him very attentive to his duties, and no doubt a very worthy man. The only fault we find is that he is being paid sums under different headings, and it is difficult to ascertain how much he has been paid. I find he has received $1,799 in Immigration Department.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The $1,800 is his salary as accountant and assistant secretary in the High Commissioner's office.

Mr. TROW. I also find that he has been paid travelling expenses, $170; he received as private secretary, $250; travelling expenses again, $48.56; cab hire, $8.50, and $400 in connection with the archives, making a total of $2,862 already discovered. There may be other items that we have not discovered.

Mr. LISTER. Do I understand the Minister to say that he acted as his secretary while the hon. gentleman has been in Canada?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Since I left the London office. He received $600 a year as my private secretary.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. Minister has given us a very minute description of the ability and services of Mr. Chipman. I am sorry that I do not know of his services. It is quite new to me that he is such a desirable man, although I have no doubt he is a valuable man. Is that the gentleman who is brother-in-law to the present Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, Sir Leonard Tilley?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I am sorry for that, because I would like to put in a word for him on that account. The hon. gentleman has stated that it became absolutely necessary, from the dual position he occupied as High Commissioner and Finance Minister, that he should have a confidential man as secretary. No doubt it was very desirable, that he should have a confidential man as secretary, but it is much to be regretted that my hon. friend should have attempted to occupy these dual positions, otherwise, perhaps, we would have avoided this charge of $600. But I suppose it has been paid, and we cannot get the money back, therefore the less we say about it the better. After the testimony that has been borne to the value of Mr. Chip-man's services in connection with that exhibition, no doubt according to the ideas of the hon. gentleman, they entitle him to some additional remuneration. I can only say that from the first I opposed that enormous vote, which has swollen from the moderate sum which the Finance Minister stated at first to, if I am correct, over $100,000 for that exhibition in London. It is so much money thrown away, and I hope there will be no repetition of such squandering of the public money while the country's finances are in such a deplorable condition.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. gentleman give us my information in regard to the receipts from the Patent Department?

Mr. CARLING. The receipts from that department have increased very much indeed. Last year the gross receipts for patents and trade marks were $76,600, or $13,000 more than the previous year.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.). Will the hon. gentleman explain the manner of obtaining criminal statistics?

Mr. CARLING. The item of $4,000 is required for the collection of criminal statistics from every police court and magistrate in the Dominion, the remuneration being fixed by statute. The cost of the preparation of the returns for the year is included in the expenditure.

Mr. LISTER. Who make the returns?

Mr. CARLING. The police magistrates.

Mr. LISTER. They have only cognisance of the convictions made before themselves. Is there any way of having returns sent by the clerk of the peace in each county?

Mr. CARLING. I understand the returns are made according to a schedule in the Blake Act.

Mr. DAVIES. Partial statistics are of no use, and it is desirable to ascertain whether the present system places the hon. gentleman in a position to obtain statistics for all the Dominion.

Mr. CARLING. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Have the Government given up the idea of contributing the usual amount of $10,000 towards the Dominion Exhibition this year to be held in Halifax?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It is matter for regret that the contribution should have been made by the Government year after year when the Dominion Exhibition was held at other places and that it should now be dropped. It will be a matter of considerable disappointment to the people of Halifax that the exhibition will not be held there this year. They have been making considerable preparations under the expectation that the usual grant would be made, and as it had been held in other places in previous years there was a reasonable expectation that it would be held at Halifax this year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was with extreme regret that the Government dropped the vote; but the hon. gentleman will see that if we are to economise we must commence somewhere, and we felt this was an expenditure which we could, without any very serious injury to the country, forego this year.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Perhaps the Minister would explain the working of the system in connection with health statistics, for which $10,000 is asked. I have been unable to see that this amount is usefully expended. I observe that $10,000 is still asked, although last year only between $6,000 and $7,000 was expended.

Mr. CARLING. These are returns obtained for the different cities and towns in the Dominion from health officers appointed by the municipal authorities. These returns are placed in the records of the department, and a report is issued every year.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Will the Minister tell me how this health officer appointed by the municipality obtains his information? What instructions are given to him by the Government, and what duties are imposed upon him, so that the reports may be somewhat reliable? Are there any directions given to those health officers as to their duties?

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman of course will find that, if he refers to the annual report and the certificates of the medical officers which are in the report issued by the department every year.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Pretty nearly every municipality in the Province of Ontario have boards of health now. Have you given your officers directions to avail themselves of that information, and to get information from those various boards?

Mr. CARLING. An Order in Council was passed some years ago limiting this information to cities and towns of over 5,000 inhabitants, and we avail ourselves of the health officers of the cities and towns for this information.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). It appears to me that we are not getting that information that we ought to, when we are asked to vote $10,000 for this purpose. The Minister knows very well that all the duties those health officers perform are merely by their going to the sextons and copying from the sexton's book the number of deaths or burials that took place there. As far as the department is concerned they perform no other duties whatever and we are asked each year to grant $10,000 for that.

Mr. CARLING. It is true none of those officers are appointed, except the municipality have by resolution appointed a health officer.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). All they do is to go to the sexton and obtain information as to how many were buried there. They may not obtain full information, because people who have died in a particular locality may be buried elsewhere. We might just as well not spend a single dollar, for all the reliability that can be attached to those reports. It is a waste of money, and it is evident that the Government are not making any effort whatever to have this branch made efficient. It has now gone on for a number of years. We were told at first that it was merely experimental, and that it would be in a few years of importance to the country in reference to health statistics. Many thousand dollars have been spent upon it, and I would ask the Government to-day wherein can they point to the benefits accruing from the policy of the department in this respect. I say there are no benefits whatever. The information is of no use to us, because we cannot rely upon it, on account of the manner in which those officers discharge their duties. It would be much better to strike out the item altogether.

Mr. CARLING. The information gathered from those different municipalities is published monthly, and it is very much sought after by the press and published all over the Dominion, giving the death rate of each city and town. I think it is important to have the information. It might perhaps be fuller, but the established rule has been that no place under 5,000 inhabitants could give the information because it had no health officer appointed. If a health officer is appointed in a town of less population, we have not stood strictly to the 5,000, as we are anxious to get the information. I think the amount paid those officers is not extravagant. I see in the town of St. Thomas which the hon. gentleman has the honor to represent, with a population of 10,000 or 12,000 people all that was paid to the health officer during the year was $120.

46-1888-3

Considering this information is gathered from cities and towns all over the Dominion and that the information is most valuable to the people at large, I think it does not cost very much.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The statement of the hon. gentleman shows that what the Province of Ontario is doing for itself with tolerable completeness, the Government here are doing very imperfectly. Of course hon. gentlemen would like any information that would contribute to the general welfare of the health of hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. I may say for their information that Mr. Campbell who formerly represented Kent in this House has been returned by the people of Kent by an increased majority.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I may say that whatever the health officer in St. Thomas gets, be it much or little, he gets more than he earns for the services he renders. It is a notorious fact that those officers are appointed by the municipalities and they perform the duty for the municipalities. They duplicate the information which they collect for the municipalities, and if all that he does is to send to the Government a duplicate of the information he has to render to the St. Thomas Council, I should say he is pretty well paid. I do not know what the Minister of Agriculture may think, but he may be in the habit of giving more liberally than that. Take for instance the officer in Toronto. He receives between $300 and $400, and you do not pretend to tell me that sending a duplicate here is worth that amount? Whether the cost be much or little the information is unreliable and it is not worth what you pay for it. Unless you organise that branch of the Department in a different way you might as well strike out the item altogether.

Mr. LISTER. Are those officers appointed by the Government?

Mr. CARLING. The Government appoint the health officer of the city or town.

Mr. LISTER. I observe here that the returns are very imperfect. I find that the towns of Goderich and Sarnia are not included.

Mr. CARLING. The law provides that a town must appoint a health officer, and if they do not appoint a health officer, we do not appoint one.

Mr. LISTER. We have a health officer in our town.

Mr. CARLING. That has not been reported.

Mr. LISTER. I do not say that one should be appointed, because I agree with the hon. member for East Elgin that this money is thrown away, so far as the information given us is concerned. The amounts charged by the different officers for making these returns vary greatly. In some cases the amount is $100, and in others as much as $300. In Brantford and Woodstock it is $56, while in smaller towns, Galt for instance, the amount is considerably more.

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman must understand that it is according to population.

Mr. LISTER. The amounts are larger in some cases than in other cases where the population is smaller.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I would like the Minister to tell us whether there is a health officer in London.

Mr. CARLING. Dr. Hutchinson, I understand, is the health officer for that city.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the meaning of this item, "Sundry persons, for 18,012 certificates, at 15 cents each, $2,700?" Who gives these certificates, and what do they represent?

Mr. CARLING. They are medical burial certificates. they are paid to the cemetery keepers, who get 15 cents for each medical burial certificate.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I think the Minister must be in error. I think he will find that the 15 cents is the amount paid by the health officer to the sexton on account of a certificate given to him. It may be that some of these sextons get the 15 cents, but I doubt it very much. This is a very large amount of money expended for that purpose, and we have no explanation to show where that $2,700 goes.

Mr. CARLING. I think the hon. gentleman must have seen the report which states that the cemetery keeper get 15 cents per burial.

Mr. LISTER. As I understand, the health officer makes these returns. Why, in addition, should there be this enormous sum paid to get the certificates from the cemeteries?

Mr. CARLING. I do not think it is an enormous sum for these certificates of burial, obtained from all the cities and towns in the Dominion.

Mr. LISTER. It is of little consequence whether it is large or small, but why should it be done?

Mr. CARLING. As a matter of policy, to get the information as accurately as possibly. It has been done for fifteen or sixteen years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does that represent the death rate of these various cities?

Mr. CARLING. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This information would be valuable, no doubt, if it represented accurately the death rate in each of these cities; but I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, who in his professional capacity is an excellent judge, whether it does so. He knows that the cemeteries adjacent to towns and cities are often made use of by a considerable section of country around. Does he know whether this death rate is that of the cities, or is it that of the cities plus a large section of country around them?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I imagine that the death rate represents all the persons buried there, whether belonging to the city or the adjacent country. But the statistics are valuable because as a rule, they present a lower death rate than is found in any other part of the world; and anything that tends to show a low death rate establishes the healthfulness of our towns, and makes them additionally attractive. In that way these statistics have a certain value. I am afraid the appropriation is too small to enable the Minister of Agriculture to obtain as thorough and full information as is desirable. No doubt there cannot be a very great deal accomplished all over the Dominion with this amount of money; but in the absence of a better and more complete system of vital statistics, it furnishes that which persons investigating the relative attractions of different countries attach a good deal of importance to, as an evidence of the healthfulness of our climate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is no doubt the object is a good one, and the information if obtained would prove of some importance. What my hon. friend was asking was a small piece of information which I imagine the hon. Minister could give at once. This $2,700 has been paid to sundry persons for what? I have not been able to gather as yet.

Mr. CARLING. It is paid to the sextons of cemeteries for burial certificates.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What has this to do with the collection of statistics. The doctor gives statistics of the deaths and the causes of death. The sexton in charge of the cemetery has nothing to do with the causes of death. You want to get the population of a town, the number of people who died, and the different diseases of which they died, so as to see what diseases are most prevalent and what the death rate is, in order that some precautions may be taken to reduce the death rate by adopting means to prevent the inroads of any special disease that is more prevalent than others. I do not see therefore why we should pay $2,700 a year in order to get the certificate of a sexton that a certain number of men have been buried in a cemetery.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. CARLING. The certificate furnished by this officer gives the disease which each person died of.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The sexton cannot possibly be able to state the disease except from information he gets from the doctor.

Mr. CARLING. The doctor's certificate certifies the disease of which the person dies and the sexton certifies that he was buried.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Why not also get a certificate from the undertaker?

Mr. WILSON. I think the hon. Minister is laboring under a mistake. In former years, 10 cents or 15 cents was paid to the municipal clerk for each death certificate, and that, in the Province of Ontario, is paid out of the local dues of the municipalities. I cannot say what may be the course pursued in the other Provinces, but it may be that the Minister pays 15 cents for a certificate from the sexton, and that the sexton, in his wisdom, certifies that the man lived to a certain age and died of a certain disease. It has been proved that these certificates are worthless as data on which to form an opinion in reference to the health of any locality.

Mr. LISTER. Will the hon. gentleman strike this out? There is no earthly use for it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). It is the custom among professional men to give a certificate of death stating the age, the disease, and other facts in that connection, for which the medical man receives from the Local Government about 10 cents. Do I understand that the 18,000 deaths given in this return are the actual number of deaths that took place in the whole Dominion or only in those cities where those health officers are appointed?

Mr. CARLING. It indicates the number of deaths in those different cities and towns where there are health officers.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Then the information is of no value, as regards the death rate of the Dominion, because it is only partial information. There are a large number of villages and towns, with a population under 5,000, that have no officers of that kind. It would have been far better and less expensive, as regards Ontario, to take the returns made by the Legislature of Ontario of the births, marriages and deaths in the whole of that Province, instead of taking this return from special centres in it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At all events, we must have this vote, whatever may be the opinions of the House and committee as to the real value of these statistics. This system has been going on for a good many years, and the arrangement cannot now suddenly be closed. No doubt my hon. friend will consider the remarks made by some hon. gentlemen, professional men, whose opinions are worthy of all consideration.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understood the hon. gentleman to say that these statistics were all published in his report. I have looked into it, and I have not been able to find them.

Mr. CARLING. They are in the appendix to the annual report.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to point out to the hon. Minister that although it is true we have recognised the desirability of having health statistics, if they were accurate, it is worse than useless to have inaccurate statistics because they are positively misleading. Now, for several years we have been pressing from this side that some different system should be adopted. My own impression is it would be far better to select a small number of points and to work them thoroughly than to attempt to carry out the system that at present exists. For four or five years, we have been pointing out the desirability of having some new departure in this matter, so that it cannot be said this question is brought up for the first time. It does not seem, however, that we are much nearer to any solution of the difficulty than when we started.

Mr. CARLING. I think we are carrying out the very suggestion the hon. gentleman made to the House of gathering these statistics from the centres of population, and I think the hon. gentleman will find that the information we have from these centres is correct. As the hon. the Minister of Finance has said, perhaps the vote is not large enough, but I am confident we are getting information that can be relied on.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did I understand from the hon. the Minister of Finance just now that these lists of deaths do not really represent the deaths of the several places referred to?

Mr. CARLING. Yes, they do.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understood the hon. the Minister of Finance to say that they represented the number buried in the cemeteries in and adjacent to these several centres.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They cover all the cemeteries in each locality where there is a health officer, and a few of the cemeteries adjacent to these localities.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). The hon. gentleman will see that he had better reduce the vote for that reason. Last year he expended only $7,800. That includes $2,700 which was paid for certificates which are perfectly useless, and in fact, no one knows what they are for. Then, if you take the $2,100 which you are asking more than last year and the $2,700 you have paid for certificates, you might make a saving of $5,000.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). One objection which I see to this vote is that Ontario has a complete system of health statistics, covering the whole country, while the hon. gentleman is collecting only from a few points.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is quoad Ontario alone.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But a large proportion of this expenditure, nearly the whole of it, is for the Province of Ontario, and in regard to that Province all you need do is to examine the reports made by the Province, which are not only in relation to these few places that the hon. gentleman obtains his statistics from, but from every locality, and then you have in a complete form what you are here obtaining in a very incomplete form. Why, then, should we expend this money to obtain imperfect statistics when we can get complete statistics without any expenditure at all? The Provincial authorities have facilities far greater than those which you have to get these returns; and, while it may be proper to carry on this system for those Provinces which have no such law as that which exists in Ontario, to extend it to the Province of Ontario is certainly a work of supererogation.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). As has been stated by my hon. friend from Queens, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), we do not take any exception to the vote for obtaining statistics, but we do object to the way in which the money is expended, and the unsatisfactory results obtained from it. I can see no benefit in getting these statistics from the cities alone. If it is desirable to obtain these statistics at all, they should be obtained from all parts of the country districts as well as from the cities; and, therefore, I think the Government should consider whether, in the interest of the country, we should not have some arrangement whereby the vital statistics of the country generally could be obtained and tabulated and pointed to and relied upon. At present, the information is only derived from the cities. It is imperfect. In the Province of Ontario far better information is obtained than this Government can obtain, because the information of this Government is only obtained from the cities. I think this is hardly worth the expenditure which is made upon it. If the hon. gentleman were to adopt a broader view and obtain the vital statistics from the country generally, it would be different, but, until that is done, I think this is simply a waste of money.

Mr. TROW. I think the Minister in charge of this department should make it imperative in other Provinces to have these statistics returned. In Ontario it is made imperative by the law for the clerk of the municipality to make his returns and to give this reliable information under a penalty on those who neglect to carry out that duty. Some hon. gentlemen has referred to the sextons, but I cannot understand what knowledge the sexton can have. It is a matter of indifference to him whether the coffin is empty or full. He knows nothing about the cause of death. He knows nothing about the matter except in connection with the graveyard.

Mr. LISTER. Does this $10,000 cover the expenditure for registration of births, deaths and marriages, which was $871 last year?

Mr. CARLING. No, it does not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). Is the hon. gentleman asking for an expenditure on that account this year?

Mr. CARLING. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). In reference to this item of outlay towards the establishment and maintenance of experimental farms, $90,000, will the hon. gentleman give us some information as to what has been done here and in other parts of the Dominion? I should like to know something about the farm in the Maritime Provinces, where it is located, what progress has been made, and when he proposes to put it in operation?

Mr. CARLING. A site has been purchased, containing 300 acres, on the Intercolonial Railway, near the town of Nappan.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What have you paid for it?

Mr. CARLING. I think it is $16,000 for the 300 acres.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is that in the county of Northumberland?

Mr. CARLING. It is on the line of the Intercolonial Railway, and it is a very suitable location, as Mr. Saunders reports.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It is in the county of Cumberland?

Mr. CARLING. I suppose it is.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is a place in my county which is spelled Napan.

Mr. CARLING. There are two "p's" in this Nappan.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not suppose it was in my county.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Will the Minister tell us what progress has been made?

Mr. CARLING. None as yet. We have secured the property, and steps are being taken to construct the buildings and to put up the fencing.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Has any person been put in charge of it?

Mr. CARLING. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Who?

Mr. CARLING. Colonel Blair has been appointed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). From whom was the farm purchased?

Mr. CARLING. I think it was from two parties. Mr. Roach was one and I cannot remember the other name.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many farms has the hon. gentleman now got? There is one near Ottawa, there is one in Nova Scotia, how many other farms has he purchased?

Mr. CARLING. There is the Central Farm, the farm in the Maritime Provinces, and a site has been secured in the North-West Territories and one in Manitoba and one in British Columbia.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Five in all?

Mr. CARLING. Five in all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where are the farms situated in Manitoba and the North-West Territories?

Mr. CARLING. The farm in Manitoba is in the vicinity of Brandon, the farm in the North-West Territories is near Indian Head, and the farm in British Columbia is at Agassiz.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where is Indian Head?

Mr. CARLING. It is near the Qu'Appelle Valley.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In reference to the farm in the neighborhood of Brandon, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what is the extent of it, what price he has paid for it, and whom it was purchased from?

Mr. CARLING. I think the farm is a section of 640 acres, and I think the total cost is $9,200.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman remember from whom it was purchased?

Mr. CARLING. I do not at this moment, but I can give him the information to-morrow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should be glad if the hon. gentlemen will also get the exact locality of this Brandon farm.

Mr. CARLING. Yes.

Mr. MULLOCK. I would ask the Minister of Agriculture whether the fencing of the Central Agricultural Farm was a matter of competition, or whether it was done by piece work, and, if so, what it cost per rod?

Mr. CARLING. It was done by contract.

Mr. MULLOCK. What was the cost?

Mr. CARLING. I think it was 15 cents a foot.

Mr. MULLOCK. What kind of a fence is it?

Mr. CARLING. It is cedar posts with barbed wire.

Mr. MULLOCK. Is that the sort of fence the hon. gentleman would recommend as a sample fence to the ordinary agriculturist of Canada?

Mr. CARLING. I do not mean to say it is. But I mean that the central farm is in the vicinity of the capital of the country, it is in a beautiful locality, and it is a permanent fence for the next 20 years. I do not think it is a very expensive fence. I know that some of the neighbors have asked the contractors to put up a similar fence around their property, and they would not do it at the same price.

Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. MULLOCK. I do not think the hon. gentleman will find any farmer in Canada to adopt such an absurd style of fence, and invest such an enormous sum of money in the construction of such a useless article. I venture to say it will not be two or three years before the whole structure will have to be pulled down and built on a different plan.

Mr. CARLING. I am quite sure the hon. gentleman does not understand what he is talking about, because the matter was very carefully considered, and I am sure that there is not a more solid or permanent fence in Canada than that. It was said by others that the frost would heave the fence and throw out the posts, but if the hon. gentleman inspects the fence now, just after the winter, he will find the fence just as solid and substantial as it was before it was made.

Mr. MULLOCK. I mean to say that it is an utter waste of money to go on and invest such a large sum—did I understand 40 cents a foot or 15?

Mr. CARLING. 15 cents a foot.

Mr. MULLOCK. For the erection of such a fence as this. It was not at all necessary. The farm is not situated within three or four miles of this city, and a much less expensive fence would have answered just as well. I again repeat, without referring to the character of the work—for I do not wish to do any injury to the patentee of the wire used—but I venture to predict that the wire used will, in a very short time, be condemned as absolutely unsuitable, the frost will destroy it. Any one knows, after an examination of the material used, that it will not be at all durable. It is a real waste of money, in my opinion.

Aid to Agriculture Societies in the North-West Territories. $10,000

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I see an item of $6,425 for labor. I would like to know how much of this was spent for fencing, and how much for drainage. In a lump sum, we have no idea what each class of work has cost. Then, I see there are three superintendents besides the workmen. What are they employed in doing?

Mr. CARLING. The chief director of the farm is Professor Saunders and he has an agriculturist employed to look after the planting of trees, and the management of the fruit department. I think these were the only two that were employed last year, excepting the laborers. But his salary did not commence until late in the fall. He is now occupying his time in making chemical examinations of different seeds, and other things in connection with the farm.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I see here the name of Mr. McKay, superintendent, the name of Mr. Bedford, superintendent, and William Blair, superintendent, besides a foreman, and a Mr. Hurlburt, as horticulturist. What are they superintending?

Mr. CARLING. Colonel Blair, as I said before has been appointed superintendent of the Maritime Province farm, and we utilise his services in the summer time for two or three months at the central farm until he takes charge of the farm in Nova Scotia. He is a practical farmer, and is to get $1,200. Mr. McKay has been appointed to take charge of the farms in the North West Territories at Indian Head. He is a very superior man, and we utilise his services for two or three months in the same way. He is now at Indian Head and Colonel Blair is in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. McMILLAN. My question is not yet answered. I see there is $6,425 for labor. How much of that goes for clearing and draining the land?

Mr. CARLING. I should be very glad to furnish the hon. gentleman with that information to-morrow, but I cannot give it to him at this moment. To-morrow we will tell him exactly how much has been expended for the purposes he speaks of.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the Minister state, roughly, how he proposes to dispose of this large amount of $90,000—what division he is going to make among the several farms?

Mr. McMILLAN. I see there is an item of $1,076.25 for manure and $606.31 for freight. Now, in this section of country, it may be necessary for the farmer to purchase a certain amount of manure, and as this farm is to serve as a model for the people of Canada, we should know how it is conducted. We all know that in order to manage the farm successfully the manure must be made upon the farm, and used upon the farm, because we cannot make a great deal of profit if we spend a large sum of money in buying manure. There is an opportunity in this farm of ascertaining by experiment what can be done with land that was run down in the direction of renewing its fertility without the aid of manure. Such experiments would be of benefit to the farmers. Unless, however, these experiments are carried out on a proper system they will mean money thrown away. There is just one thing I regret, and that is that there is on the central farm very little, if any, of heavy clay land, such as prevails throughout Ontario, which requires the most scientific farming. A great many of our farmers do not succeed with land of that description, yet if properly farmed it is perhaps the most profitable land we have in the Province. If a large amount of manure is to be brought on the farm, the experiments will be of no benefit to the farmers in the direction of showing what can be done with the land.

Mr. CARLING. The Government selected the farm with a view to obtaining different varieties of soil, and it contains from 35 to 40 acres of heavy clay land such as the hon. gentleman refers to, as well as other different varieties of soil. With respect to manure, we found it necessary to purchase a certain quantity in order to conduct our experiments with seeds and grains. Mr. Booth, a very extensive farmer adjoining the Government farm, purchased last year more manure than we did and paid the same price. The farm is only two and a half miles from the city and it is not very difficult to get manure; of course when we have a large quantity of stock we shall not require to purchase manure. This is not so much a model farm as a farm where experiments are made, and the results are published for the information of farmers throughout the Dominion, especially results as to what can be produced on particular kinds of soil and particular kinds of manure and certain quantities of it. As to the general expenditure I may say that it is expected that this amount, together with the sum in the estimates of the Department of Public Works will complete the purchase and the fencing and building, and leave a small amount for the purchase of stock for the central farm and different farms. This money will be devoted to completing the central farm and the farm in the Lower Provinces, Manitoba, North-West Territories and British Columbia.

Census and statistics. $7,500

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the hon. gentleman explain this item?

Mr. CARLING. We are collecting statistics all the time, and a statistical record is published by the department each year, which has proved of very great use to members of Parliament and to the people of the country.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Is it necessary?

Mr. CARLING. It is a work very much in demand and it contains information that can be relied on.

Mr. LISTER. It contains a great many inaccuracies.

Mr. CARLING. If so, we shall only be too glad to have them remedied if the hon. gentleman can point them out.

Immigration..... $116,389

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture may recollect that a few days ago I put several questions to him with reference to the policy of the Government in regard to necessitous and unfit persons coming to this country. The hon. gentleman at that time gave me to understand that in the judgment of his department there was very little occasion to make any special provisions or take any special precautions against this class of persons. The information which has reached me from various part of the country is this, that a very large number of utterly unfit persons are being dumped on our shores from time to time, and that there is at the present moment something which might be fairly described as a sort of movement on the part of the authorities in the British Islands to dispose of a considerable number of paupers or persons who are only one remove from paupers, by sending them to this country. The hon. gentleman knows that in other countries a great many of these people have been sent back, but I have never heard of any being sent back from Canada. I do know that such cities as Toronto, Kingston and other cities throughout Ontario, and I believe Montreal and other places have a yearly increasing number of such persons who become a charge on public charity. I have received from a gentleman in Toronto a resolution passed by the City Council, and I will read an extract or two from it that may convince the hon. gentleman that, in the opinion of the civic authorities of the largest city in Ontario, there is a good deal of need that the Government should exercise some care in this matter. The resolution is as follows:—

"Whereas during the last winter season, and to a great extent for a number of years past, the demands on the various charitable institutions and of the city authorities for assistance to destitute immigrants have been so great and of such a character that the resources of the civic authorities and others interested in the question of providing relief for the destitute have been seriously overtaxed, and the causes which have led to this state of affairs require our most serious consideration; and whereas according to reliable information received from various sources, and from information received in some cases from the applicants themselves, a great many destitute persons have been sent over to this country by the Poor Law Guardians of Great Britain and the various charitable institutions of that country in order to relieve themselves of the further support of persons who are unable to provide for themselves in their own country; and, whereas we believe that continued efforts are being made by the parties aforesaid to ship to this country during the coming season this very undesirable class of immigrants, to the great injury of this city and the country; therefore be it resolved, That the council of the corporation of the city of Toronto enters its most emphatic protest against the continuance of this practice of shipping to this country a class of people so very undesirable, and who, being unable to provide for themselves in the old country, necessarily become a burden on the charitable institutions of this country, and help to swell the number of inmates in our gaols and asylums."

There is danger there. If the statements made by those gentlemen—and I believe a copy of the resolution was communicated to the Minister of Agriculture—have any foundation in fact, and from what has come under my own observation in other places I am inclined to believe they have a great deal of foundation in fact, there is need that a good deal of care be taken on the part of Government officials to prevent this number of such persons swelling. If the authorities who control English and Irish poor houses are allowed to do this they will scruple very little at sending several thousands of most undesirable emigrants to this country. I am not now speaking of the other question of the desirability of putting an end to assisted passages, because I understand that at last the policy of the Government is to do so, but I am speaking of the necessity of preventing our country from being made a place of deposit for persons who are not able to earn their own living in the mother country. I can tell the hon. gentleman he will find a very considerable degree of danger that unless the strictest precautions be taken many persons of that sort will come h. re.

Mr. CARLING. I think the statements made in the country through the press in reference to pauper immigration have been very much exaggerated. I am quite sure from the statements I possess from our agents in Liverpool, Halifax, Quebec and other different parts of the country, the percentage of pauper immigration is very small indeed. I think it will be found that these statements that have been made through the city council of Toronto that there are a very large number of paupers coming into the country are incorrect, and that those who have had to be supported have been people who were not immigrants but worthless people who flock to the cities from different parts of the country. From all the information I have obtained from the officers of the department as to the parties leaving the old country to come here, the number of unfit persons arriving in this country has been very few indeed. I think the hon. gentleman will find that every precaution has been taken that can be taken to prevent any such class of people from coming into the country and becoming a burden upon the people.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hardly think that is at all a satisfactory answer to the resolution of the corporation of the city of Toronto. I understand this resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. CARLING. That statement, I may say to the hon. gentleman, is a general statement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It says that during the last winter, and to a great extent for a number of years past this has been going on. I am speaking with reference to what the Toronto corporation say. I have observed myself in other places that a very considerable number of persons have been brought into this country substantially by false representations. Not, it may be by authorized agents of the Government, but representations made to them by persons in the employ of various steamship companies, who did not care two straws whether the people were fit to be emigrants or not, but who simply wanted to get a commission on the passage money and swell the receipts of the various steamship lines. That was a great and serious evil, and it was all the more so because we know from our own returns that those people who are brought out, do not stay here but that a great part of them find their way to the States. A residuum of them stays here and that residuum, in other places as well as in Toronto, are neither more nor less than burdens on the charity of the people of Canada. I am not at all satisfied that any efficient precautions are being taken, and the hon. gentleman the other day stated, if I recollect rightly, that nobody had ever been sent back. I say that this kind of people ought to be sent back. I say there is neither rhyme nor reason in allowing paupers from England, Ireland, Scotland or elsewhere to be made a charge on Canada. Of course it is not necessary to require that every healthy, industrious man who comes here should be provided with capital. We cannot do that, but it is necessary to see that decrepid, infirm and unfit persons are not allowed to come here.

Mr. CARLING. I believe a letter has been written to the mayor of the city of Toronto in answer to that circular, asking him to give us the particulars and let us know when those people arrived, and where they came from, so that we can trace them and know if those people were really brought from the old country and dumped upon our shores. I can assure the hon. gentleman that everything that possibly can be done by this Government will be done to prevent any such emigration as he has reference to.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I really do not think that the Minister of Agriculture has given that information which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was entitled to. In reply to the charges made by the corporation of Toronto, a respectable body, a body who had an opportunity of thoroughly investigating the whole facts in connection with the charges they had made, they are coolly told by the Minister: Oh let them make a detailed statement of where those parties came from, how long they have been in the city of Toronto, what are the circumstances in connection with their former habits, and whether they be emigrants or whether they be somebody from the surrounding country? That is hardly treating a respectable corporation like that of the city of Toronto in a fair way. I cannot see how the members representing the city of Toronto should sit here and allow that corporation to receive a slap in the face from a Minister, who as much as says, that they sent false representations to the Government in reference to the city of Toronto. I think the Minister should be a little fairer than that. He should bear in mind that he has three representatives from the city of Toronto, but it might be perhaps that the Minister of Agriculture will say: "Oh, the city of Toronto is not as true and loyally Conservative as it was before in the city council, and therefore a large proportion of the aldermen of the city of Toronto being Reformers we cannot depend upon their statement. When we find one of the first cities in the Dominion of Canada coming here with a memorial of that kind, it is right and fair that the Minister of Agriculture should treat their representations in a different way.

Mr. CARLING. How have I treated them?

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). He asks me how has he treated them. I appeal to the House as to how he has treated them. He says let them make a detailed statement, let them give us in detail the whole facts so that we may examine into the affair. Is the city of Toronto the only place where complaints have come to the Government in reference to the kind of immigrants brought from the old country? It is the same report from every city and municipality almost, from one end of the country to the other. We have been told that there is every precaution used to prevent undesirable immigrants coming here, but the facts belie the statements made by the Government. The facts show that a very large number of those who come out here are not suited in any way for the requirements of Canada, and, therefore, if the Government exercised every precaution they could exercise, I say their manner of conducting the affairs is not successful and they had better adopt some other means. The hon. gentleman says that many of those immigrants in the city of Toronto likely come from the surrounding country. I guarantee that his experience, and the experience of every individual member in this House in the locality in which he resides has been that the greater proportion of those who require aid and assistance are those who have been brought out as immigrants from the old country within the last two years. I have no hesitation in saying, that there are a good many useful citizens who are immigrants, but I do say that the method and the manner in which the hon. gentleman and his predecessors have managed the affairs in reference to immigration has resulted in a class of immigrants coming here that are not suitable. When we find the labor market is entirely overstocked, and that the demand for labor has been decreasing rapidly for some length of time, it is the duty of the Government to come forward and reduce still more the expenditure on this item. Is it necessary that you should keep your large staff of agents in Europe and in Canada, when you now find the city of Toronto petitioning you not to proceed with it any further, because of the enormous number of unsuitable immigrants and the superabundance of labor in the market, why do you not take this item out altogether? It may be said that it is necessary to keep up the same staff in Europe, but we have a High Commissioner there, and we were told that he would perform some of those duties. When we were called upon to grant millions of money to the Canadian Pacific Railway the Government said: Give us the money, let the Canadian Pacific Railway proceed and we will have the best emigration agents that can be had in Europe and we will not be called upon to spend money for emigration purposes. We liberally passed a measure appointing a High Commissioner for Canada in London, and we have made liberal grants to this railroad; and yet we find the Minister of Agriculture bringing from the old country a number of immigrants unsuited in every way to the requirements of the country, and paying large amounts of money for bringing them out. Yet the Government still asks this House to continue to vote large sums of money for this purpose. I say it is a great mistake, and the amount they are now asking ought to be reduced at least one-third. If it is necessary to keep up the High Commissioner's office, well and good. He will not be very comfortable in staying here, and let us use him as an immigration agent in London; he is capable of being a good one. We have no objection to his staying there altogether, at any rate as long as his friends remain in power. Let the money we vote to be used in bringing out a better class of immigrants, those who have small means and who will not be a burden on the country.

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman tried to make out that I said something derogatory of the city of Toronto. I believe the hon. member is a member of the Committee on Immigration, and if I am not misinformed, that committee passed a unanimous resolution to-day asking the city of Toronto to give particulars as to the pauper immigration sent to that city last year. I believe that is correct.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). It is quite correct. The chairman thought he should have the information.

Mr. CARLING. My department has asked for the same information that the Committee on Immigration authorised the chairman to obtain from the City of Toronto. I think the hon. gentleman has made a statement that he should not make in this House. He says we have the same reports from other cities as we have from Toronto with regard to pauper immigration. Well, I happen to be the head of the Department of Agriculture, and I can state that the one sent from Toronto, which is a very indefinite one, is the only resolution the Department has received that I am aware of, petitioning against pauper immigration.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I suppose the hon. Minister will remember that he had a report from Montreal.

Mr. CARLING. I think that was merely a newspaper report. We had nothing official, so far as I am aware, from the city of Montreal; and I think that the hon. member will find that when the city of Toronto and the different cities look into the matter, they will see that the Government has taken every precaution to prevent anything like pauper immigration, and that the percentage of paupers coming into the country is very small indeed. I am sure this matter has been very much exaggerated, and I am afraid it has been done in some places for purposes other than the general welfare of the country.

Mr. McNEILL. I will just state that I am a member of the Immigration Committee, and was present in the committee to-day when the communication from the city of Toronto was discussed by members of the committee belonging to both political parties. The hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) was present when it was decided unanimously, he being a consenting party himself, that this communication should be sent to the authorities of the city of Toronto, asking for information on this subject. If there was any insult offered to the city of Toronto the hon. gentleman was a party to it; but there was no insult intended or thought of. There was a statement made to the effect that a number of people were out of employment in Toronto, and the opinion was expressed that the Department of Agriculture should see that unsuitable immigrants were not brought to the country. After the matter had been discussed for some time, it was decided that nothing could be done until we ascertained something of the numbers of those people out of employment, and where they came from. Therefore it was determined that the authorities of Toronto, who had sent this communication, should be asked to furnish that information; and the hon. member was present at the time consenting to that which he says was an insult. I am astonished at the observations of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. JONES. I am not going to say anything of the character of the immigrants who come to the country, because I am not in a position to express an opinion upon that subject. What I wish to call attention to is that the money voted by Parliament year after year seems to be wasted, or distributed in a manner not calculated to bring any great advantage to the country at large, but seems to be considered as a fund from which the Government may reward some of the papers supporting them throughout the country. If you take up the Auditor General's report, and look at page 112, you will find that payments have been made to almost every Conservative paper, in the Upper Provinces at least, for pamphlets on all imaginary subjects. One is called, "The Immigrant," another "Facts and Figures," another "Across Canada," another, "The Fisheries of Canada," and so on through the list. The payments made in these ways amount to the very large sum of $49,418 which, with $20,000 for paper, makes $69,418 expended in that way. Now that does seem to me to be an expenditure which is unnecessary to such an enormous extent. It would seem that the Government have so much money to dispose of that it is almost too much to ask any employé who draws a handsome salary from the Government to hand these pamphlets to the immigrants as they are coming into the country. I see on page 116 that the sum of $800 was paid to the marine mail clerks for distributing mail pamphlets, or $100 each. It is absurd that these postal clerks on the steamers who are paid by the Government, and whose time is at the disposal of the Government, should require to be paid $100 each for handling a few Government pamphlets to the emigrants on board. This is a sample of the utter recklessness with which the Government disbursed the emigration money. Go through the whole expenditure on immigration, and you will find it consists solely of paying out large sums of money to supporters of the Government for purposes useless, so far as immigration is concerned.

Mr. CARLING. I am sorry the hon. gentleman, when he was in office, did not do away with this grant to the mail clerks on ocean steamers; and I may say that this expenditure has been discontinued. There are no mail clerks now on the ocean steamers.

Mr. JONES. I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman has discovered this was an unnecessary expense, and I will be glad to see him do away with the other expenditure which appears to be a waste of public money. Here is the Hon. Hector Fabre receiving for the Paris-Canada $1,739, and T. Skinner for copies of Canadian Gazette and advertising $2,769. Then there is the income tax on the salaries of the High Commissioner's staff. Well we have voted in this House the income tax on the salary of the High Commissioner, and these gentlemen, I believe, are in the employ of the High Commissioner in London. Mr. C. C. Chipman, I think, is the private secretary of the hon. the Minister of Finance.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). And Mr. Colman, I think, is also in the Department of the High Commissioner in England?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Well, these gentlemen are paid salaries for their work, and I have no doubt they do it well; but if they are entitled to anything more, it should be added to their salaries and not slipped in this way as an income tax. It is not a very large amount, I admit, but every dollar than can be placed in the way of these people, who compose the hon. gentleman's staff, and seems to think the country belongs to them and that they must be rewarded for their political allegiance, is given to them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The salaries paid to-day to the entire staff in the High Commissioner's office is less than it was in 1883 when I took charge of that department.

Mr. COCKBURN. As the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), challenged the members for Toronto to stand up and say something to save that city from the aspersions cast upon it by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, I am very glad indeed to accept the challenge. It seemed to me that the half hour he devoted to attacking the policy and the action of the Minister of Agriculture was devoted to attacking the Minister for doing precisely what the hon. gentleman himself, twelve short hours ago, had been instrumental in doing. It is to be regretted that in a matter so important to all of us as emigration, hon. gentlemen should be so far led astray by party feeling as to make it a party question. I ask the members of this House, in discussing a business matter of this kind, to put aside, if possible, for one short night, their strong political proclivities, and see if we cannot together discuss a question of this kind on its own merits. The speech of the hon. member for East Elgin is not new for us, for we had almost verbatim the same speech last year. The only little point on it that is novel is the attempt to foist on the Minister of Agriculture the charge of dealing harshly with the representations made by the city council of Toronto. Now, while I am quite prepared to stand up for the city of Toronto on all occasions, and especially for two noble wards in that city, at the same time I must say that I see nothing in the action of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture which could lead the member for East Elgin to make the attack he did. What are the facts of the case according to the hon. gentleman's own statement? The city council of Toronto sent to the Minister of Agriculture a certain statement with reference to the character of emigrants who arrived in that city. Like a courteous gentleman he acknowledged the receipt of their communication and courteously said to them: Your statements may be all correct; will you aid me in my tracing the source of this evil, if such evil there be? Will you give me all the information in your power, and let us see if we cannot get at the facts. As far as I can make out, that is the whole gravamen of the charge brought by the hon. gentleman. If the Minister of Agriculture is to be challenged in this House for simply discharging, in a courteous and gentlemanly way, the duties of his office, I do now know how any Government is to be carried on. I trust that hon. gentlemen in future will try to regard this question of emigration, with which the future of our country is so intimately connected, in a plain, simple, impartial spirit, and, for the time being, lay aside the feelings of hostility which are apt to creep up in perhaps other questions of a more general character.

Mr. TROW. I do not think it lies with the hon. member for Toronto to lecture my hon. for Elgin on what he said, for my hon. friend merely asked to be informed of the true state of the affairs in Toronto. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture, we are aware, took proper steps, and I do not know of any plan which he could have adopted better than the one he did adopt to ascertain at once the actual state of affairs in the city of Toronto, and find out whether really an undesirable class of emigrants has been dumped out there by the charitable institutions, or whether they have been brought out by the Immigration Department. At all events, during the winter season, improvident people from many parts of the country, in the rural districts, where work is then scarce, find their way to the towns and cities, where the bowels of compassion of the people are more likely to be moved than in the country sections. Now, if we get proper statistics of the class of which the city council of Toronto has complained, we will then be able to judge what remedy that should be applied. I know sometimes these rumors are very much exaggerated. I recollect when the Mackenzie Administration was in power that it was said there were hundreds in this city in need of employment and on the verge of starvation; and on that occasion, whether hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House aided in the gathering of the large community that met in the railway room or not, 200 or 300 were drummed up and found their way there, demanding bread and soup, and we were accused of having soup kitchens all over the country. Well, the Mackenzie Administration took the step then that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture is now taking, to ascertain the facts of the case, and instead of 200 or 300 being at the point of starvation, there were only 13. Well, the case in Toronto may turn out, as I hope it will, similarly.

Mr. JONES (Halifax).

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Of course I receive with due submission the remarks made by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn). I know he is in the habit of punishing delinquents. He followed that practice for a long time, and I suppose he thinks I am one of those delinquents and that he can use the rod for my punishment. An hon. gentleman near me says that he is an old school-master, and that might account for the punishment he imagined he was to give me. I did not complain of the Minister of Agriculture obtaining his information from the city council of Toronto. What I complained of was—and that is what the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) withheld in order to make a point against me—that the Minister should get up in his place here and make an assertion, without having the information he desired, that very probably the report was not reliable because it may have been wrong in some points. Was I wrong in saying that? Will the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) say that the city council of Toronto made a report which was not reliable? He said that I condemned him for obtaining that information. I did nothing of the kind. If the hon. gentleman would remain in this House and pay attention to what takes place, he would know better, and he would not make that kind of mistake. He says that the speech I made was the same as made a year ago. He has a good memory. He is a wonderful man. I venture to say that he has not looked at a single speech that I made a year ago or six years ago, but he is a wonderful man, he has a wonderful memory, and yet he does not remember what I said a year ago, but, while he has a long memory, what he fails in memory he makes up in assertion. My hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) said that I supported a certain matter in the committee which I did not in the House. I may say to my hon. friend, for his information, that it is not right to say anything about what took place in a committee until the report has been presented to the House. However, I will not object to that. I think it is right that the Chairman of the Committee should send and obtain full proofs, but I complained of the Minister of Agriculture making unfair assertions against the city council of Toronto without proper ground. My hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) said that I could not rise above partisanship. Those hon. gentlemen say they are only going to take half the money for immigration purposes this year that they did last year; but, if you run your eye from top to bottom over the various agencies which they have, you will find the same amount of money voted for them as there was before, as there was at the time when they proposed to spend double the amount of money. What is this for? It is, as everyone knows to keep a large number of these servants employed, and also to give an opportunity to the various presses from one end to the other of this country to print immigration pamphlets, and charge the cost to the Government. No doubt they can come down handsomely at election times, and they should get a consideration for that. No doubt the Minister of Agriculture has received a handsome return in that way from the London Free Press, and we have only to look at that item to find that that paper received nearly $16,000 during the year 1886-87. What was that for? Did that conduce to immigration to any great extent? I do not think it did, at all events to the extent of $16,000. No doubt my hon. friend will say that this was for the purpose of engraving and printing pamphlets, and advertising, and so on. Very likely they did print some pamphlets, but I should think the principal part of the printing would be the enormous profits the proprietors received, and I think the Minister of Agriculture benefited in his election by the assistance which the Free Press has had. You may go over nearly every Conservative paper from one end of the country to the other, and you will find that they have been employed in printing immigration pamphlets. It is a very nice thing. It gets the good will of all these Tory papers. I advise my friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) to consider that immigration is a matter of more importance than to retain the present Government in power, and that the money which is given for immigration purposes is not given for electioneering purposes. If that hon. gentleman would exercise more ingenuity in that matter and would read fewer lectures to me, he might become of more use in this House than he is now. If the Government are candid and sincere, if they desire to retrench, they will commence by reducing the expenditure upon these various offices. How can you explain, when you are taking only half the money, how you require to expend the same amount in each of the offices? Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture could induce the Free Press to print only $8,000 worth next year instead of $16,000. I know it would be hard on the Free Press. It is a good organ. It was a Reform organ at one time, but it was bought over, and now it is to have $16,000 as a substantial inducement to support the Government every year. I have only to repeat that I do not think this money has been in the past expended in the interest of immigration. Judging from the appearance of the various agencies, I do not think that it is intended to expend this money for that purpose in the future. I think it is intended to keep civil servants outside in positions which they have occupied for some time past, and the Government do not desire to remove them; but the country demands a larger retrenchment at their hands in reference to immigration at this time, and I think, when an opportunity occurs, the people will give this Government to understand that they intend to enforce that view upon them.

Mr. McNEILL. As a matter of explanation, I want to say that what I referred to was the fact that the hon. gentleman had accused the Minister of Agriculture of deliberately insulting the city of Toronto while he had spoken of the communication from the city council of Toronto in exactly the terms, or in words in the same sense as those which were used by the head of the Department of Agriculture to-day. There was a consensus of opinion in that committee to the effect which has been expressed by the Minister here to-day, and I said that I was astonished at an hon. member, who had been one of those who held that opinion, coming here a few hours afterwards, and endeavoring to make party capital out of the statement of the Minister of Agriculture, who had stated exactly what the Committee had stated a few hours before. I must say that I was astonished at that, and that I think it is degrading to this House that any hon. member should do so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it is extremely unfortunate that any hon. gentlemen like the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) should so far forget the rules of the House as to bring out before the House what has passed in a Committee, and it is still more unfortunate, if he wants to promote the business of the House, that he should tell another hon. gentleman, like my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Wilson) that he has used language which is degrading to the House. Such remarks as that will not facilitate the progress of the Estimates in the slightest degree. They only lead to disagreeable altercations, and draw our attention away from the point before us. And I am certain that his friends on the Treasury benches will not thank him for taking the conduct of the Estimates out of their hands. Now, I want to call attention to what appears to me an extraordinary charge, one of the items my hon. friend referred to. There is in the Auditor General's report for last year a charge of $15,807 for the London Free Press, and in that there was an item of 322,000 colored posters at 4½ cents. They cannot have been works of art at 4½ cents. It appears to me that that was just another instance of what I must call a most gross waste of public money, for all these 300,000 or 400,000 colored posters amount to just so much rubbish, and nothing else, flung broadcast across the country, for no earthly purpose except to enable a particular newspaper to make a good thing out of the job.

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman should not make that statement without knowing —

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I saw one of the colored posters.

Mr. CARLING. I can tell the hon. gentleman that the London Free Press has a large lithographic establishment, and it is the only newspaper in Canada, I believe, that has one. The posters were published in English, French, German and Norwegian, and distributed all over Great Britain and Europe, and we have statements from our agents in Europe, and from the different steamboat agents, that they were most valuable in drawing the attention of the people to Canada. I am satisfied that nothing has been done that has tended more to attract people towards Canada. Such is the information we have from our agents, and from the agents of the steamboat companies, who have been pressing us to give them further supply. The price paid to the Free Press for these posters was certified by the Queen's Printer as a fair and reasonable price.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I saw one of these posters, and I am bound to say that if it is a fair sample of the 322,000 I will not qualify or withdraw what I stated. I think a most gross waste of public money was committed. But with respect to the whole of this, I am glad to see that the Ministers have cut down the expenditure. I believe that no worse use of public money has been made for many years than to expend it in bringing people to this country whom our own returns show we have not been able to keep here, who have been brought here largely by false pretences—I won't say in all cases on the part of the Minister's agents; but the men who brought these unfortunates here, not for the purpose of doing any good to Canada, but for the purpose of swelling their own commissions. Now, we find in the returns for Manitoba what this amounts to. We found that hundreds of thousands of people were stated, on the authority of the department the hon. gentleman now presides over, to have gone to Manitoba, and when we took the actual census there we found that not one in five of those who were alleged to have gone there, had settled there, or remained there. Now, the danger and the mischief is this: You bring people here by false pretences, and they leave Canada and go to other countries and become, to all intents and purposes, anti-immigration agents. It is a great error and blunder to bring people here who are not wanted here, and that has been done for a long time.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Before that passes —

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Let us get on.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). If my hon. friend was as ready to call the attention of his supporter to the fact that he was discussing a matter not pertinent to the question —

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think he has been answered by the hon. member.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Then, all I have to say is, that as to my remarks being degrading to this House, the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), having so long existed in such an atmosphere as that, is a good judge of degradation. I will therefore allow the matter to pass.

Immigration agent at Victoria, B.C. $1,000

Mr. BAKER. I desire to ask the Minister of Agriculture the same this year that I did last year—if he cannot see his way clear to increasing the salary of the agent at Victoria, B.C. For the last two or three years he has got only $1,000 a year, and I see no reason why he should not get the same salary as is given in other places where the agents gets $1,200 or $1,400. I undertake to say that the duties performed by that officer are as onerous, if not more so, than those performed at Calgary and Medicine Hat.

Mr. CARLING. The agent at London is only receiving $1,000, and the same is given at Halifax and St. John. We are paying no more than $1,000 at Medicine Hat and Calgary. We have not been able to see our way clear to make any change in the salary.

Mr. BAKER. The hon. gentleman will remember that the reason given for paying higher salaries at Brandon, Calgary and other places in the North West, was on account of the high cost of living. The same reason should induce the Minister to increase the salary paid at Victoria, B. C.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Perhaps the better way would be to reconsider the whole list. At Quebec there is an agent, an assistant, and a clerk, receiving altogether $3,800, and there are in addition an interpreter and a messenger. Now, I notice there are eight immigration agents in the North-West. I do not know how far they are necessary, but it appears to me rather an unnecessary expense to have eight agents and four interpreters engaged in the North West, when we hear of so few people settling in that country. I presume the distance is considerable between the various points, but now the railway is running I should imagine the necessity no longer exists for having an agent at each one of those various points.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has overlooked the fact that Quebec is the great central point where the people focus. We have thousands of emigrants coming there, and we must have persons able to communicate with them and give them the needful information at the point where they touch the country. That accounts for the number of officers and the larger charge for Quebec. When we come to the question of the North-West I may say this: These agencies are widely separated, and hon. gentlemen can hardly imagine the vital importance it is to strangers coming into the country to have persons take them by the hand on their arrival giving them information as to how to locate themselves and assist them to settle. There is a reduction of $100,000 in the item, but we could not dispense with the services of these officers if we are going to have immigrants come into the country and hope to keep them here and settle them in a satisfactory way. We must have persons who possess the information and knowledge of the country to take them by the hand on arriving here. I do not think these amounts are too large, nor do I think there are too many of those officers for the purposes for which they are really required.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. TROW. I agree with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) in the statements he has just made. I would not press the giving up of agents in the older Provinces. I can, however, see no use for an agent at Port Arthur, for there is no land adapted for settlement in that locality.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Port Arthur is the landing point for the steamers. These immigrants will mainly go across the lake by steamer, and this vote is for the purpose of providing officers who will receive them on their arrival there, care for them and give them proper advice and assistance. They come here strangers, and I do not think that any person who has had any experience can over-estimate the importance to persons coming into a strange country, of having some one to whom they can apply for advice and assistance, and protect them against being misinformed and misled by interested parties.

Mr. TROW. I may still further say that there may probably be use for an agent at Brandon, as there is a good section of country both north and south, but I think the Government might do away with the agent at Qu'Appelle. As to the agent at Medicine Hat as very little land is taken up there or is likely to be taken up.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Medicine Hat is a place to which miners will naturally resort.

Mr. TROW. Coal miners?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman will find that some years ago buildings were erected at Brandon, Qu'Appelle, Medicine Hat and Calgary. A number of immigrants have gone in at those different points and they took advantage of the immigration buildings for shelter. Of course there must be some officer in charge of each building to look after it and also to see that the immigrants obtain information as to the advantages of each particular section and act as land guides to assist them in securing land for settlement. So far we have found it necessary to have these officers. If later on it is found to be unnecessary I shall be very glad to consider the question of doing away with them; at present, however, we do not see our way clear to do so.

Mr. TROW. I have seen large buildings at those places. I know there was no immigrant at Medicine Hat last fall. In regard to Calgary I do not know of any great quantity of land there except what was adapted for grazing.

Mr. CARLING. There is very good land north of Calgary, in the Red Deer district. A large number of settlers went there last year and a number are going this year. When immigrants reach Calgary we have an agent there to give them information in regard to the district, and of course to the country north of Calgary.

Mr. TROW. There is some force in the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Baker) in regard to the expense of living in that city. I observe that the agent at Victoria receives $1,000 while others receive $1,300. It strikes me from the little experience I had there that a man can live cheaper in either Manitoba or the North-West than in Victoria and that provisions are much higher there than in the North-West or Manitoba. The argument of the hon. gentleman is therefore quite reasonable.

Mr. PERLEY (Assiniboia). I quite agree with the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture with regard to the agencies established at different parts of the North-West. People go there entirely unacquainted with the country and it is necessary to have some officer there to provide accommodation for the new arrivals for the time and assist them in locating on suitable land. Otherwise they would have to obtain the services of some one who might take great advantage of them, while the immigration agent possesses full knowledge of the country and is enabled to give them valuable information in regard to locating. In regard to doing away with the officers, I may say that I have had different applications from sections for officers to be appointed to assist settlers coming in.

Mr. LISTER. New offices?

Mr. PERLEY (Assiniboia). Yes. I have had an application from Whitewood asking that an immigration shed should be built there, and stating that a large number of immigrants had been obliged to lodge in the railway station, and had been entirely at the mercy of the operator for accommodation. In place of doing away with any of the offices already existing, there should be more established for the accommodation of the people. The land is good and our whole country only requires to be known, and it is a very important matter to strangers to have some one to guide them and to look after their interests.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). To keep them in the country.

Mr. PERLEY (Assiniboia). You want to give proper information in regard to location. Strangers do not know where to go when they have to engage in land hunting. The land has to be mapped off, and unless you have somebody to guide you, how are you to make a proper selection? So far as doing away with them is concerned, I think it would be much better for the country to increase the staff.

Mr. LISTER. By how many?

Mr. PERLEY (Assiniboia). In my district by about two more. I only speak for my own district.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says there are not a sufficient number of immigration agents in the North-West and that immigrants are going in now.

Mr. PERLEY (Assiniboia). Yes, Sir.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And more immigration agents are required.

Mr. PERLEY (Assiniboia). Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is a Mr. Adam J. Baker at Qu'Appelle. I suppose that is an important point at which to have an immigration agent. Will the hon. gentleman abolish that as an immigration agency?

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Baker is not an agent at Qu'Appelle.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is he not?

Mr. CARLING. Yes, I have been informed now that he is.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has discovered that he is. Mr. Baker is down here. He has been engaged in canvassing in the county of Russell for the Government candidate, and I suppose his salary is going on and that he is paid travelling expenses from the North-West down here. The House will now see the importance of having immigration agents, and they will understand the importance of the hon. gentleman's suggestion that the Government wants more immigration agents. Of course you could not have got on in those by-elections if you did not have more of those immigration agents.

Mr. MITCHELL. They will want more of them now.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Perley) says there are more of them required in the North-West, but when you appoint them in those districts they are like the non-resident clergy in Ireland, they do not happen to reside in the place for which they have been appointed. Here is Mr. Baker, an immigration agent, drawing his salary, and whose salary has to be provided for next year in the appropriation the hon. gentleman now asks the committee to vote. His travelling expenses will have to be provided, as were the expenses for the private secretary of the Finance Minister, who is sometimes on the other side of the Atlantic and sometimes on this. Those travelling expenses will be very large, but not larger than is necessary, because how could Mr. Baker be engaged in canvassing for Mr. Mackintosh in Russell, when he was appointed for the North-West, if a sufficient appropriation was not allowed to cover his expenses coming from the North-West down here. According to the hon. gentleman's statement there are immigrants going in there and there is no person to guide them. The shepherd has gone and the sheep are being scattered, and they are in danger of being taken over to Dakota, where the wolves will devour the sheep of the hon. the First Minister. The country of course will understand now why it is necessary to make this liberal appropriation, and why although we have scarcely anybody in the North-West now, we should have more immigration agents. The hon. the Minister and his predecessors in office informed us that 155,000 people had gone to that country during the past five years, and when the hon. gentleman looked at the census he could only find 43,000 of them remained. Here are 112,000 of the hon. gentleman's sheep lost, and lost because those shepherds who are so well paid for looking after the sheep, are not there to take care of their flocks. They are down in Russell and they are down in Kent. One of those shepherds received $1,018 for looking after these sheep in Dakota.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that Mr. Smyth.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, that is the shepherd named Smyth. I do not know whether he found any stray sheep down there or not, but at all events he was down in Kent, and he was a candidate and I am glad to know that he was not a very successful candidate. The country will understand the importance now of voting the hon. gentleman's appropriation without further question. I am surprised that the Minister did not ask for more, as is suggested by the hon. gentleman behind him. Why did he not propose to appoint two or three more immigration agents for the North-West, who will not reside there and no doubt the hon. gentleman's supporters on that side would without question have voted the necessary appropriation? Why, Sir, this Government never could have got on unless this committee deals more liberally with them. They cannot keep their flocks in the country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Let us go on.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the hon. gentleman promise to reform?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Oh, yes, I will promise it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will he perform it though. If we have reached the hon. gentleman's conscience—

An hon. MEMBER. Where is that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It may be like the man in Richard III that it is a troublesome thing, and that every man who wishes to get on in the world with convenience and comfort to himself ought to get rid of it. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has come to that conclusion, but I think the country will come to the conclusion that this appropriation is unnecessary to the extent that the hon. gentleman has asked for. When he pays out of the public treasury a man who can be taken 1,500 miles away from the place he is supposed to be serving, to engage as a political hack in an election contest, I think the appropriation could be dispensed with.

Mr. LISTER. There is one thing I would like to say to the hon. gentleman. I suppose Mr. O'Donohue was in the service of this department also. I do not know whether he is an immigration agent or not but I think he is in the pay of the Government.

An hon. MEMBER. He is an extra clerk.

Mr. LISTER. I thought he was in the Immigration Department. Mr. O'Donohue was down in Russell too, and he is canvassing from house to house for the Government candidate. I do not know how that can be, because, if I recollect, last year he spoke in the kindest terms of the First Minister. Probably it is because of what he said about the First Minister last year that he is engaged in this occupation now.

Mr. MITCHELL. What did he say?

Mr. LISTER. I do not like to repeat it. This shows the way that the Government hacks in this country are being paid by the people's money to support this corrupt Administration. They are being paid a salary day after day, and they are employed as Tory hacks throughout this country serving in the interest of the Tory party. Only the other day three respectable young men as ever found a position in this House were dismissed for taking a part in an election against the Government, and yet this honest, honorable, upright Government, which has found so much fault with these translators, permit those miserable, wretched hacks to receive the money of the Government to malign the Opposition, and to misrepresent the position of the Government for the purpose of defeating Opposition candidates. So far as their influence is concerned, the Government has had a lesson to-day, and I think on next Wednesday they will have another lesson. When another general election comes around those gentlemen will find that they will be right here in these benches, and that better men will be occupying their positions of to-day.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). This is no joking matter at all. It shows to what extent public opinion has been debauched in this country, when the Government would dare,—dare I say,—to bring one of their public officers from the North-West to take part in an election in this part of the country. Imagine for one moment the Prime Minister or a member of the English Government doing this. Would they be able to stand 24 hours against the indignation of the people of Great Britain if an hon. member on the opposite side of the House should bring such a charge against them as is being made by the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) against the Administration here to-night. I say no matter whether it was a man of the standing of the present leader of the Government, or Mr. Gladstone, or any other, there would be such a howl of indignation from one end of the country to another, that the party which permitted such things would be swept out of office. There was a time in the history of this country when the hon. gentleman would not have dared to do this either. There was a time at the commencement of Confederation when the public opinion of this House and country would not permit the hon. gentlemen to sit there to and laugh at the statement made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). When he states that the Government have brought one of their own officers, whom the taxpayers of this country are paying to take immigrants by the hand and locate them on the lands of the North-West, and have sent him to be a party hack in an election, I repeat that the public opinion of this country must have descended low indeed, when the hon. gentleman and the Government dare to sit there and treat the observations of the hon. member for Bothwell as they have done. I say no man can look for much from the future of this country if that thing is going to be permitted. If this country is going to occupy as high a place in the world as other countries, there must be a wholesome tone in the public opinion of the country. We are sometimes directed across the border for instances of corruption; but if an act of this kind were committed there, you would find every paper in the country ringing with it. But here we find a Government, which is safe for the present, ready to outrage every sentiment of public principle and honor, and send their officers to interfere in by-elections from one end of the country to the other. I repeat that it is a melancholy fact to the world, and it will be known abroad, that we have descended to such a condition of affairs. Therefore, the Government should now understand that this is no joking matter, that we are not going to sit here and quietly permit the Government to appropriate the funds of this country for the employment of immigration agents or any other agents for political purposes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. CARLING. The statement made by the hon. member for Bothwell is not correct. Mr. Baker has not been brought down from Qu'Appelle by the Government or offered his expenses. He came here of his own accord. He lives in this country, and his friends live in this country, and he asked the Department to give him what is given to all other officers of the Government, leave of absence.

Mr. LISTER. A singular coincidence.

Mr. CARLING. If the agent at Qu'Appelle asks the department for leave of absence, we give it as a matter of course. The officers of my department or any other department are entitled by the law to three weeks holidays each year; and if Mr. Baker asks for holidays and pays his own expenses, I think I would be remiss if I refused to him the privilege that I allow to other officers of the Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know whether the hon. Minister denies that Mr. Baker, an official of the Government, is now taking part in the Russell election.

Mr. CARLING. I am not aware whether he is or not.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I am sorry to have to differ from the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow). I think he is wrong about there being no necessity for an agent at Port Arther, and I agree entirely with the hon. Finance Minister about the importance of having an agent there. It is the place where the immigrants land from the boats and go on the railway on their way to the North-West. More than that, I have been informed by Mr. Connell, the local member for that district, that within twelve miles of Port Arther there is just as fine land as can be found in any part of the country; and we know, from the reports of the commissioner sent out by the Globe Company, that in the Rainy River district there is as fine land as can be found in the Dominion of Canada, and it is of the utmost importance that attention should be drawn to it. With regard to the immigration agents in the North-West and Manitoba, I cannot see why there should be such differences in the salaries paid there compared with those paid in British Columbia. The hon. Minister says that the larger salaries are necessary because the duties there are very onerous. I can understand that in certain seasons of the year it is absolutely necessary that those men should be there. I can understand, from the reports that I have received, that it is absolutely necessary that the immigration agents should be on hand at the present time to meet the immigrants and direct them to the best localities. With regard to the immigration agent at Qu'Appelle, I think his agency is one of the most important, and the most important duty he has to perform is to tell the poor immigrants who are coming in not to go one mile further west in search of farming lands on the Canadian Pacific Railway. With regard to his being absent at the present time, it is a strange thing that he did not take his holidays when there were no immigrants going into the country. Any one can understand that just now, when the busy season is coming on and immigrants are going in, it is of the greatest importance to have a man there to locate the immigrants.

Mr. CARLING. I may tell the hon. gentleman that the agent at Qu'Appelle has provided a substitute at his own expense during his absence.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Well, last year we had a general election, and I know from the very best authority that last year and every year that there has been an election in Russell, that gentleman has been there.

Mr. MITCHELL. He got leave of absence perhaps.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. No doubt he got leave of absence. But it is a strange fact that gentleman always lands down in the county of Russell when an election is coming on. He is said to be one of the best manipulators in the country. Another fact I want to draw attention to is that last year when he was down there, and no doubt paying a substitute at his own expense, the Auditor General's report shows that he received every cent of his salary, $1,400. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) has called attention to the fact, that not only he, but other civil servants are out stumping the country in the interest of the Government. I met Mr. O'Donohue in the county of Russell. It may be said that these gentlemen are not paid while they are there, and I am the last man who will stand up and question the right of any man to express his opinion, whether he is a public servant or not; but what I contend is that something like even-handed justice should be shown—that the law on one side of the House should be the law on the other side of the House too. It is only a few days since two men who hurt the feelings of the Secretary of State and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe were dismissed summarily for the part they took in the elections. What I say is that British fair play and honorable dealing demand that the same law should be meted out to one side of the House as well as to the other, and that men should be dealt with on the same basis on both sides.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. the Minister of Agriculture does not deny that Mr. Baker is the Government immigration agent at Qu'Appelle. He does not deny that Mr. Baker is not in Qu'Appelle, where he said an immigration agent is particularly required at this season. He does not deny that Mr. Baker is here in Russell, engaged in canvassing on behalf of the Government candidate.

Mr. CARLING. I do not know that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Ignorance sometimes is convenient.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He knows it now.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman does not know it, but that does not alter the fact that Mr. Baker is in Russell county, aiding in the canvass for Mr. Mackintosh and doing what he can to secure that gentleman's election. The hon. gentleman nods his head; he approves of that. Well, Mr. Baker cannot be in Russell helping Mr. Mackintosh and in Qu'Appelle at the same time. The hon. gentleman says Mr. Baker has paid an agent to act in his place. Was the Government entrusted Mr. Baker with the power of appointing an immigration agent? Is this the new doctrine that an agent may delegate his powers to another party with the consent of the Government? Is that the rule now?

Mr. CARLING. That is the rule. If an officer at Qu'Appelle or Calgary or Medicine Hat requires leave for a week or two, a substitute is appointed, or he selects one to take his place, but the substitute must be a responsible man.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is it the practice for agents during their absence to appoint and to pay substitutes?

Mr. CARLING. If an agent makes application at any one of those points for leave of absence, and a good man is recommended to fill his place, we will allow him to have his leave of absence.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). At election time.

Mr. CARLING. At any time at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says at all times. When did this practice of appointing agents and paying them at the expense of the regular agents arise? So far as I know, the practice is that when you give a man his holidays you do not charge him for carrying on the work of his office during his absence; and when the hon. gentleman informs the committee that Mr. Baker has employed and paid an agent to act in his behalf, he is stating a fact which shows that he has adopted a different rule from the one which usually applied in the public service. The hon. the First Minister informs the House a few days ago that the Government did not authorize Mr. O'Donohue to go or did not send him to Russell county. Well, the Government did not by Order in Council say that Mr. O'Donohue should go to Russell. The Government, as a Government, did not take any action in that sense; but Mr. O'Donohue is a clerk in the public service and he is not in Russell without the consent of his chief. Mr. O'Donohue is paid as a clerk in the Government service while in Russell, and Mr. Baker is paid as a Government agent while he is also in Russell, both engaged in the same election contest; and both these men are being paid out of moneys to which the Reformers of this country contribute as well as hon. gentlemen on that side. When hon. gentlemen wish to appoint election agents or ask parties to support their friends, they should do it at their own expense and keep their hands out of the public treasury. There is no difference between a mis-appropriation of public funds on the part of a clerk for which he is tried and sentenced to penitentiary and the action of the Government, when they put their hands into the public treasury and pay an officer who is employed in the public service and who should be giving his time to the public service while he is instead doing electioneering work. I say that this whole proceeding is in the last degree discreditable to the Government. I say it is in the last degree discreditable to them that, under the pretence of appointing an immigration agent to look after the interests of the immigrants in a part of the North West, they should pay a man for working in an electioneering contest 1,500 miles away from where his public duties as immigration agent should be discharged were he fulfilling the duties of the office to which he has been appointed. I say that condition of things is intolerable. I say it is impossible that hon. gentlemen opposite should be permitted to go on this way, and if they desire to have the session brought to an end, as we all desire it should, let them take the public moneys honestly and devote them to the purposes for which they are voted. They are not doing that when they employ a man as an immigration agent in the North-West and then send him down to the county of Russell to aid in an election contest, or permit him to go down there for that purpose. In so doing they are mis-appropriating the public moneys; in so doing they are obtaining moneys from the people and the Parliament of this country under false pretences.

Mr. MULLOCK. I am surprised to learn that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture has permitted these abuses to occur in connection with the administration of his department. Of him I had expected something different, but I cannot say as much for his colleagues, and I can only look upon the conduct of the Minister of Agriculture as one of the effects of the company the hon. gentleman is keeping. I quite endorse all that has been said by the hon. member for Bothwell. This is certainly a misapplication of public money; it is certainly a breach of trust on the part of the Minister who is responsible. It is a breach of trust which if it occurred between the hon. gentleman—if he is the Minister who is responsible—in his individual capacity and any one for whom he might be a trustee, would render him liable in his person and estate in any court of competent jurisdiction. That he should, because he happens in this case to be judge as well as a trustee, abuse the position of trust which he occupies, as a trustee of the funds and the law and honor of the country, is discreditable to himself and to the Administration of which he is a member. I will just remind the hon. gentleman of another transaction in connection with his department. I had expected that the Minister of Agriculture, at all events, would have had a due regard for the public funds and for what is right and proper, but when I look over some of his ways of spending the money entrusted to him, I find ground for the opposite opinion. I see that he is now spreading broadcast over the country a pamphlet entitled "The experience and observations of Mr. Webster," who poses as a farmer from Gananoque. I suppose that pamphlet has been ordered by the hon. gentleman and paid for out of his department. This Mr. Webster, I am informed, is also an election agent, although he is in the pay of the Government, and from time to time he is sent out as such. I had the honor of meeting him on several occasions, when he posed as a farmer, and I find his name scattered through the public accounts. The hon. Minister who has evidently taken him under his wing, pays him for his pamphlets, and uses him as an agent of the Government. What must be the position of an Administration which is obliged to fortify itself in this way by misapplying the moneys and abusing the power they are entrusted with. The Government must feel their position very precarious when they resort to practices of this kind. No wonder the voice of the country is loud against them; no wonder that election after election is going against them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh! Oh!

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to know what election there has been lately, since this House has been in Session, which has not gone against the Administration. Although we hear of many hon. gentlemen seeking portfolios, I doubt very much if there is a member of the Cabinet to-day who will resign his seat, for fear that it may not be filled by a supporter of the Administration.

Mr. CARLING. How about West Middlesex? That has been since the general election.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What about the post office in Strathroy?

Mr. MULLOCK. West Middlesex did render a temporary verdict, but we will see how it turns out when it is adjudicated upon. The member for West Middlesex was returned to this House by about the same majority as he had before. The very same day an election was held in Prince Edward, and the candidate who was defeated in 1878, who was elected in 1882, who was elected by a small majority in 1887, was returned to this House by a majority about 200 per cent. larger than that which he received in 1887.

Mr. MITCHELL. What about Missisquoi?

Mr. MULLOCK. Yes, what about Missisquoi, and Hoche-laga, and Maskinongé? Are not these indications of what the public think of this practice; and what about Kent? Of course Kent is present in the minds of those hon. gentlemen to-night, and I hope the result there will warn them that these practices can only have the same result. When a candidate was proposed in Kent, who had the nomination of the party practically in his pocket, while the protest was undetermined, he was appointed to a nominal office, and was given $1,800 of the public money, to do what? To go out of the country at a convenient time. These are scandals that the public are becoming familiar with, but I think the country will soon resent them, and then hon. gentlemen will feel regret that they have not had more regard for the welfare of the country as custodians of the public money and custodians of the public honor.

Mr. MITCHELL. In looking over the details of the expense, I find that C. C. Chipman is put down for $316 in addition to the $2,000 referred to two hours ago, and I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if that gentleman is employed in his department.

Mr. LISTER. $3,200.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, if it was $3,200, here is $316 in addition, which makes $3,516. Is that the same man?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Probably the hon. gentleman does not understand that Mr. Chipman's office is under the Department of Agriculture. All the staff of the High Commissioner's office are under that department.

Mr. MITCHELL. But how does he come to draw over $3,500? That is an enormous salary.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no such salary.

Mr. MITCHELL. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will say that this statement on page 119 of the Auditor General's report is not correct? There we find, under the head of travelling expenses, C. C. Chipman, $170.33. Further down we find, C. C. Chipman, advance on account of contingencies, $146, making $316.33. I do not know how many more items there are for C. C. Chipman. On page 112 of the Auditor General's report, I find that the Quebec Canad an received for publishing 20,000 "North-West of Canada," $727.49; the Brockville Times, 50,000 British Columbia pamphlets, $573.28; the Burland Lithographic Company of Montreal, for maps, and so on, $5,907.26; the Montreal Gazette, 28,000 pamphlets with maps, $746.23; the Scandinavian National Union of Winnipeg, 20,000 Scandinavian pamphlets, $382.50; the Canada Bank Note Company, Montreal, for maps, &c., $847.80—that may be right enough, I dare say—the Quebec Courrier du Canada, 5,000 British Columbia pamphlets, $512.28; the Quebec Cultivateur, 3,000 "Esquisse de la Gaspésie" and "Notes on Gaspé," $1,033.33; Three Rivers La Liberté, "Esquisse Générale du Nord-Ouest," $1,704.70; Notman & Son, Montreal, views of Charlottetown, and so on.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The view of Charlottetown is only 50 cents.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is so, but there is J. H. Brownlee, of Winnipeg, 8,000 maps of Manitoba, $200. Then we have J. Wilson & Co., of Ottawa, stretching and binding 1,000 chromo posters, stretching chromo posters with zinc ends, stretching maps, binding, framing, and so on, $905.20; Quebec Chronicle, 50,000 "Information for settlers in B. C."—which, I presume, means British Columbia, and that appears to be a pretty expensive place—$744.92; Morrisburg Courier, 50,000 "Canada, its extent and resources," $644.77. This is touching the resources of Canada pretty well. Then there is the Montreal Colonisateur Canadien, $1,520; the Montreal Monde, $981.51; Montreal Minerve, 50,000 pamphlets, "Rapport Agostini," $1,784.93; Toronto

Mail—I suppose this was before the Mail learned to speak the truth—

Mr. CARLING. How much did the Herald get?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not see anything here about the Herald.

Mr. CARLING. But the previous year?

Mr. MITCHELL. We might have got something the previous year, but as soon as we had independence enough to speak what we thought, we were mighty soon stopped. Toronto Mail, $10,088.78. Then we have Richardson of Winnipeg, 13,000 "Facts and figures," $624; Mortimer & Co. of Ottawa, lithographing and printing 10,000 maps, and another 10,000 maps, $484.41; S. B. Foote, advertising in Canada, $50; J. A. Carman, of Winnipeg, $75; Toronto Irish Canadian, 100,000 "Across Canada," $718.08; Quebec Journal, 50,000 "To Canada," $949.50; Pembroke Standard, on account of work completed in September, 1887, $.62; Ottawa Le Canada, 1,000 Hungarian circulars and translation, $22.50; Berlin Gospel Banner, 50,000 German pamphlets, $751.60, and then we have the London Free Press, the only instance in the whole lot that I find of a Liberal paper, which receives $15,807.32.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It gets a liberal supply, at any rate.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is not that your paper, Mr. Mills?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, it is on the other side.

Mr. MITCHELL. He gets $15,807; Welland Telegraph, $50,000; German pamphlets, folding, covering, &c., $351; Arthur Buies $200, "Sur le parcours du chemin de fer du Lac St. Jean, $20." I do not object to the hon. gentleman publishing pamphlets and books to inform the public of England and Europe of the advantages of Canada as a country to settle in, but it appears to me that the distribution of the public money in the way of printing is very badly administered. I think it is a little selfish of them to keep it all among the Tory press, and I think there is an amount of trash published in some of these pamphlets that is perfectly worthless. We know the object. It is to subsidise them, and we know that the sum that is paid in advertising, to say nothing of other expenses connected with the Department of Agriculture, is utterly out of proportion to the amount of the benefit received. Sir, I am glad to see the Government have dropped out $100,000 on account of assisted passages. I think we have been spending money most recklessly in that way, and we have no advantages to the communities in which we live. I think now the Government ought to go on and to a large extent cut off the expenses for these useless publications. I do not mean to imply that all the persons who write pamphlets do not render some service, but there is a great deal of trash circulated in connection with this department that is outrageous.

Mr. LISTER. So far as these pamphlets are concerned, with the exception of one, that of Mr. Lynch, on dairying, the rest are simply trash. They are prepared simply for the purpose of giving money to the friends of the Government; and so far as the newspapers are concerned, they are simply subsidised in the interest of the Government. I challenge the Minister to point out a single Tory newspaper from Prince Edward Island to British Columbia that is not subsidised by this Government. Why, Sir, if they want coal away down in Prince Edward Island, they advertise it in the British Columbia papers, and in the Regina Leader. Why, Sir, a gentleman who sits in this House as member for one of the Assinaboias, appears in the Public Accounts as having received something like $5,000 last year. No wonder he could take a trip on the continent. He says he went to the continent, and he told us that he was at some university. He has travelled on the continent at the expense of the people of this country, for which he is giving them nothing at all. Now, the hon. gentleman talks about the election. I think he had better have said nothing about the West Middlesex election. Does he not know that they dangled a post office before the people of Strathroy for months before the elections? Does he not know that every Tom, Dick and Harry who had a lot of land in Strathroy were promised that the Government were going to buy their lot at an enormous price? Does he not know that every contractor in the town was led to believe that he was going to get a contract for this building, and that everybody who had anything to do in the village, was going to be appointed clerk of works. No wonder that West Middlesex went against the Liberals this time, but wait until the next election comes, and we will show you a trick or two. Does anybody suppose that these two men, O'Donohue and Baker, who have worked for the Government in Russell, if they were Liberals, and had worked against the Government, would have remained in its service a single day? No, Sir, they would have been dismissed like the French translators. The Premier and one or two of his friends go round and say to the Speaker, dismiss that man without trial. That is British justice and fair play for you! But as long as a man is working for the Government he can go home and leave his business when he ought to be at his post in the department, and go back and forth pursuing his nefarious work in promoting the election of the Government candidate. There may be a day of reckoning for this gentleman, who may find that the position he has held, under these circumstances, at all events, is not a very safe position. How differently hon. gentlemen treat Liberals. I had occasion only the other day to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General the case of an honorable and responsible citizen who was postmaster down in Arkona in my county, and because they wanted to have his place for a political hack and supporter of theirs they dismissed him without a trial. They preferred no charge, they had no investigation, there was nothing wrong with the office, and that man was summarily dismissed, and his crime was the crime of being a member of the Liberal party of this country. They tell us that his books were in disorder. But he denies it in his letter to me. He says there was nothing against him; no charge ever made, no wrong ever took place in the office, and the statement made by the Government that he was dismissed for cause is falsified by the fact that the man who has received his position was promised the appointment of postmaster for months before the dismissal of Mr. Evarist. That is the way Liberal officeholders in this country are treated by this Government. That is the way that worthy officeholders are treated by hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir, they must not be surprised if, when a change of Administration takes place, these wrongs are righted. There will be a fearful day of reckoning for these men who have violated the position they occupy, who have proved themselves to be unfit to be in the public service. They must not be surprised if they are slaughtered right and left when a change of Government takes place. The public service of this country cannot be kept in the position it ought to be, unless all public servants cease to be partisans, and cease to interfere in elections.

Mr. BAKER. I still wish to ask the Minister of Agriculture if I may have any reason to hope that the agent at Victoria will have his salary increased.

Mr. CARLING. I can only say that if I find that the duties of that office have been very much increased, I will take an increase of his salary into favorable consideration.

Salaries of the London Office in England $7,554

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is this to be voted again this year? The hon. gentleman is not accepting any salary?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It has nothing to do with my salary.

Mr. MULOCK. I am glad to have an opportunity of saying a good word for an official of this House. I wish to offer my testimony to the manner in which Mr. Colmer, of the High Commissioner's Office in London, has discharged his duties. I have had an opportunity of knowing personally how he treated the people from Canada, and I have found his conduct in that regard entirely satisfactory.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may take this opportunity of saying that it would be impossible to find in any department of the public service, a more energetic, industrious, and painstaking officer than Mr. Colmer. The total salary paid with this increased vote is less than it was in 1883 when I first took charge of the office.

Mr. McMILLAN. I see there are three different officials who are paid the same salaries, the agents at Liverpool, Dublin and Glasgow, but each pay a different amount of income tax, namely, $137, $86.62 and $30.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The income tax is so much per cent. upon the salary, and when the salary is larger of course the income tax is greater. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the salaries are not alike.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it necessary, now that we have decreased assisted immigration expenditure by over $100,000 or about two-fifths of the whole expenditure, that all these officials in Europe and Great Britain should be maintained?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is impossible to immediately change the staff. These officers have been placed in those positions, and they will have to discharge the duties to the office precisely the same as before. I may say with regard to the Liverpool office that Mr. Dyke, who is an extremely able and assiduous officer, is charged with a large amount of work in connection with continental immigration. Persons on his staff are corresponding in different languages with persons in Germany, Norway, and Switzerland, and other countries, and therefore, so far as regards the Liverpool office, which is the principal point of departure for European emigrants to this country, must be maintained. You cannot dispense with it, because you have reduced the amount of assisted passages; in fact we would rather require to increase the efforts of the agencies in Liverpool, Glasgow and Dublin with a view to attract agriculturists with capital to this country. I do not think if the hon. gentleman will give the subject his attention he will come to the conclusion that it would be wise that, because we are effecting a saving of $100,000 a year in assisted passages, we should do away with our officers, but on the other hand we should rather increase our efforts to obtain such immigrants as will not be able to pay their own passages but will possess sufficient capital to enable them to become useful and valuable settlers in developing our country.

Mr. MITCHELL. The explanation given by the hon. gentleman is a very reasonable one.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). I find that Mr. Dyke's salary is $2,100, Mr. Graham's salary $1,300, Mr. Connolly's $1,000, instead of all the salaries being equal, as has been alleged. The hon. gentleman was looking at the amounts for travelling expenses, which is a different matter. The income tax is so much per cent. on the salary, and the statement of the Minister of Finance was therefore perfectly correct.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) What agencies does the hon. gentleman propose to retain?

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Dyke at Liverpool, $2,100; Mr. Graham at Glasgow, $1,300; the agent at Belfast, $1,000; Mr. Connolly at Dublin, $1,000; agent at Bristol, $500, and an agent at Switzerland, $800.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I find the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) in quite mistaken in regard to the income tax payments. The same amount of income tax has not been paid by officers with the same salaries, the difference in one case being 86 to 27, and in another case 50 to 28.

Mr. CARLING. There is a receipt for each of the items certified by the Auditor General.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will bring the Auditor General's statement which will show that the amounts stated are perfectly correct.

Mr. MULOCK. Are the agents in Europe remunerated for their actual time while travelling?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are $4 a day allowed for travelling expenses.

Mr. LISTER. Whether they travel or not?

Mr. MULOCK. This agent has his fixed salary, and $1,460 are allowed him for travelling expenses, as we see by reference to the Auditor General's report, that is $4 a day for the 365 days in the year. I suppose that during the most of his time he is engaged in his office at Liverpool.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is not exactly so. He frequently makes trips to Norway and Sweden and parts of the continent of Europe to see the various agents and persons with whom he is in constant correspondence.

Mr. MULOCK. I hardly think that is a good way to remunerate him. He receives a certain amount as salary and he receives $1,460 more in order to keep him from loss in case he travels. You are remunerating him in a way that conflicts with the public interest. If it is in the public interest that he should travel, he should be paid for travelling, but by the way in which you are remunerating him now you make it to his interest not to travel. I presume that it is more expensive for him to travel than to remain in Liverpool and if he receives $1,460 whether he travels or not, and it is more expensive to travel than to remain in Liverpool, he will stay in Liverpool. I think he should be paid his expenses when he travels, and then only.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is something in the remarks of the hon. gentleman. This practice was established several years ago and when a practice is established in remunerating a public officer hon. gentlemen well know how difficult it is to change it.

Mr. DAVIES. There is a great difference between the travelling expenses of some of the agents. The agents at Liverpool and Glasgow are allowed $4 a day as travelling expenses and Mr. Connolly in Dublin is only allowed $2.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is in relation to the importance of the position he occupies.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) The man in Dublin would seem to be just as important as the man in Glasgow.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I see that in another part of the accounts, Mr. Dyke gets $450 more for travelling expenses.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Finance seems to admit that this is not a sound way of paying those travelling expenses, but he does not hold out any hope that he will correct it. What has fallen from the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) shows the necessity of establishing a proper basis by paying a fixed salary, and if he travels by paying him for travelling.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no doubt but this is a subject worthy of careful consideration.

Mr. MITCHELL. I see Christmas gratuities in Mr. Dyke's items, $12.54. It is a small item, but it is a strange principle to establish to give gratuities and charge it in the public accounts.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) What is the saving made in the item for contingencies for Canadian agencies? I see that you saved $9,000 on this year's grant.

Mr. CARLING. The amount last year was $30,000. This report is based on the actual expenditure for last year.

Gen. LAURIE. While on the item for immigration expenses I should like to ask is it probable that any better accommodation will be afforded at Halifax to immigrants waiting there before they are taken out west? I do not know whether it comes under the Department of Agriculture or of Railways, but the immigrants have no other accommodation at present than a freight shed, and it is very severe on women and children coming in an inclement season of the year that they have no place to obtain warmth and food. It does seem to me that accommodation should be provided for them rather than leave them as they are now among the sheds.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have been in a place there which is to accommodate the immigrants and which is at the head of the wharf. It is not very spacious it is true, but at the same time it must not be forgotten that there is no object in having arrangements made to keep immigrants there a long time. We do not want to have them there an hour if we can help it. The trains come down on the spot and they are on their way, after a short time. The accommodation is not very ample, but there is a house at the head of the wharf to give them temporary shelter while the trains are being got in readiness to take them away.

Mr. KENNY. My hon. friend the member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) is slightly in error. There is a room there which communicates with the shed in which the emigrants land, but inasmuch as last year, I think, some 13,000 immigrants were landed in Halifax, I do not believe the accommodation is sufficient for this large and increasing number. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will take that matter into consideration, whilst there is some accommodation there it is quite insufficient for the growing traffic.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if any portion of this $50,000 is to be applied towards assisting immigrants who come to Canada?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, not any.

Mr. MULOCK. No public money is to be expended in that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No. At present the question has not been finally decided with reference to children who are brought out by charitable institutions; by Dr. Barnardo and other persons, who have established with their own money homes in this country, in which the children are cared for until they are finally placed in a satisfactory position. The country has had no other charge and there has been a small assistance, I think I am right in saying of $2, given for each of those children.

Mr. CARLING. Over 1,000 were brought out last year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Two or three thousand dollars is the entire expense and that has not been withdrawn.

Mr. MULOCK. Am I correct in understanding from the Minister of Finance that the Government has decided that they will not in any way contribute towards paying for immigrants.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not a shilling.

Mr. MULOCK. The only question in point is the question of $2 for each of those children?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

46-1888-5

Mr. MITCHELL. While this subject is before the House I wish to give an expression of opinion about the allowance for those children. I entirely approve of an allowance to a moderate extent to assist those people who bring out those children. I do not think because we condemn aid being given to those immigrants generally that the same applies to benevolent societies or individuals who at their own expense bring out children. I do not think this country would object to a small contribution such as this for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) It depends on the children they bring out.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say as to that that the investigation has been most satisfactory. I believe it has been found that 95 per cent have been well selected and are all that could possibly be desired.

Mr. JONES. I think the hon. Minister of Finance was right in his statement that the immigrants remain only a short time at Halifax when they land there. My firm being agents for the Dominion line, by which a large number of immigrants come during the winter months, I have been able to watch the modus operandi, and he is quite correct in saying that we always endeavor to get them away as soon as possible, and they seldom remain there more than a few hours, in fact only long enough to have their baggage examined. There is a room there for their accommodation, but at times it is hardly sufficient for them, and we sometimes have to obviate the difficulty by keeping them on the steamers until the trains are ready. There is a house opposite the depot for the accommodation of immigrants, I do not know anything about it, and would not be understood as saying a word against it; but some of the clergymen in Halifax, who had an idea that liquor was sold in that house, started an immigrants' home opposite the deep water terminus, where the immigrants would be under the charge of people belonging to the different churches, and would be carefully looked after. I understand that the people in charge of this home have made an application to the Minister, and if the Government would make an arrangement with them, they could rely on the immigrants being carefully looked after, and kept away from temptation. The accommodation we have we manage to get along with, but it would be better if we had a little more.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I think the hon. the Finance Minister stated that the Government had not yet decided whether they would give any assistance to those societies which are bringing out children. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) said he thought it was right and proper that aid should be rendered to them. I think the Government should seriously consider whether it would be in the best interest of the people of Canada to assist the majority of those children who are brought here. I have had frequent opportunities for a number of years of seeing and examining those who have been brought out by various institutions, and I have no hesitation in saying that they are not a desirable class out of whom to make citizens of this Dominion. I think the Minister stated that careful inspection was made to see that only proper children were brought out. I should like to know what arrangements are made for doing that. I do not know of any regulations of the department providing for any proper inspection of these children before they leave the old country. Many of these children are the offspring of a class of people whom we would not like to become citizens amongst us; many of them are diseased, and I think it should be seriously considered whether it would be wise to allow them to be scattered throughout the country, to mingle and associate with the children of our own people. I certainly think that the Government ought to decide either to exercise every diligence in the selection of these children or else not to render any further aid to that class.

Mr. TROW. I dissent entirely from the view expressed by my hon. friend. In the town of Stratford there is an institution, established by Miss Macpherson, to which she has brought hundreds of children, and they are not there twenty-four hours until they are placed in good, comfortable positions for life among the farmers in the neighborhood, and thus far I have not heard of more than two out of the thousands she has brought who have not proved to be respectable citizens. I think these children from 12 to 14 years of age are the most desirable class of immigrants we can get. We have been freed from the expense of raising them until they are prepared to take positions in life for themselves, and the farmers are always anxious to obtain them.

Gen. LAURIE. It fell to my lot to place about 500 of these children, and I think the best proof that they gave satisfaction is the fact that as successive parties came out the applications for them increased so much that I had four or five applications for each one that came out, for I inferred that the people would not apply for them unless they were a desirable class. I watched over them and inspected them for a certain number of years, and while a certain number were not satisfactory, the great mass of them were satisfactory. I have watched the careers of many of them since and they have become valuable citizens.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Notwithstanding what my hon. friend from South Perth has said, I have seen many of these children as they grow up, and I consider that they are not such a class as we ought to have in our midst. They are a class brought frequently from the poorhouses and the slums of the cities of the old country.

Mr. TROW. No.

Mr. WILSON. My hon. friend says no, but he knows nothing about it; he has had no opportunity of witnessing the diseases that are prevalent among many of those brought from the old country. If we wish to sow the seeds of disease among the people of this country, we will continue bringing that class. My hon. friend desires that we should do so. I have no objection as far as he is concerned, but I desire to protect the rest of the community; and I say that my experience has been that many of those brought here should not have been permitted to remain in this country. These children, of course, are not to blame. Their diseases are inherited from their parents; but the Government would be justified if they would devise some means by which a selection would be made and we would be spared the infliction of the immigration of poorhouse children.

Mr. TROW. The experience of my hon. friend must be very limited, for the simple reason that there is not an institution for the reception of these children probably within 100 miles from where he resides, and he would not have an opportunity of considering their character in the isolated constituency he represents.

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice that a considerable amount has been expended for the examination of these children. I find eight items on page 117 and two items on page 118.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman state this, because the hon. member for East Elgin will find there is a careful examination made.

Mr. WILSON. Perhaps if the hon. the Finance Minister would take an opportunity to see many of those children, he would have the same opinion with regard to them as I have. It is not my desire to make any attack or to misrepresent things in the least. But I have had the opportunity of examining into the condition of those children, and

Mr. WILSON (Elgin).

I know what I am speaking. As regards the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Trow) to the effect that there is no institution for these waifs within 100 miles of where I reside, that statement comes fittingly from one who speaks of mountains thousands of miles high, and I do not pay much attention to it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I remember speaking last year on this subject with a police magistrate in Chatham, where a considerable number of these children, principally girls, were left; and I think he told me that in the course of six months, there was not one of them that had not been before his court. I think, therefore, the subject is one that ought to receive the careful consideration of the Government.

Mr. MULOCK. Before this resolution is carried, I would ask the Finance Minister if he would call an early meeting of the Public Accounts Committee to examine into the cases of Mr. Baker and Mr. O'Donohue, and find out the exact circumstances under which they absented themselves from duty to take part in an election contest. Perhaps Friday would suit the convenience of the hon. gentleman. This is a matter which we cannot pass over in silence. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture has given a very unsatisfactory explanation, and we are bound to find out how it is these public servants have been allowed to desert their posts in order to perform other duties.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That has nothing to do with Public Accounts.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). It has a great deal to do with them. This Mr. Baker left an important post to canvass in Russell, and a most unsatisfactory explanation has been given by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. CARLING. In what way?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). Either he is absent on leave or he is not. If absent on leave for the purpose of electioneering, his action is most disgraceful to all the parties concerned. If the hon. gentleman has been deceived by Mr. Baker—

Mr. CARLING. I have not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). There can be no more important enquiry before the Public Accounts Committee than the enquiry into the circumstances under which a man receiving public pay is neglecting his duty and engaging in an electioneering contest. If this kind of thing is to go on and there should be a change of Government, none of these men can hope to retain their places longer.

An hon. MEMBER. That will be a long time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). Perhaps so. But even if this Government continues in office, I am sure the better men supporting it do not wish to see public servants neglecting their duties to take part in a political contest. As far as we are concerned on this side, we are prepared to enter our protest against it, and will make that protest very effective, if it ever falls in our power to do so. I desire these public servants to know that if they choose to make themselves political hacks and canvass for Government supporters in an electioneering contest, they must do it at their own risk, and I desire to know how far the Minister of Agriculture has lent himself to such conduct.

Gen. LAURIE. If a public servant happened to be canvassing in behalf of a supporter of the Government, I would like to know what position the hon. gentleman would take?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). The hon. gentleman surely did not hear the debate which took place the other day on the dismissal of some gentlemen who were not even officers of the Government, but were officers of the House, because they ventured to take part in an electioneering contest against the Government, while those who took part on the Government side were retained.

Gen. LAURIE. I regret to say that I know of a great many public servants who worked very hard in favor of an opponent of the Government in a late contest in which I was engaged.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman had the advantage of the Government steamer to carry his voters all along the coast.

Gen. LAURIE. I have already stated that is not the fact.

Mr. GILLMOR. I have sat here for two or three years listening to this discussion. I think that the question which is now occupying the attention of the committee is a serious one. Of course, the salary is not a very large one, but I would have been glad to have heard some of the members of the Government express an opinion with reference to this small matter. If it is their policy to encourage officials who are paid out of the public treasury to leave their post of duty in order to assist in elections, and to run throughout the Dominion, they should announce it. I do not think they can approve of it. I have listened to the charges which have been made. There is very little political capital to be made out of that sort of thing, but there is a principle involved, and I would be pleased to hear members of the Government disclaim any intention of using their officials, who are paid out of the taxes of the people, who are paid out of the public purse, in this way. I think it is wrong, and I would be glad to hear some members of the Government disclaim this sort of thing. It ought not to be, no matter what party is in power. I could occupy the time of the committee much longer, but I do think it is important for this country that we should have at least as much political morality as it is possible to have, and I think this is political immorality and ought not to be encouraged, and I do not think the Government can approve of this sort of thing. It would please me to hear them say it is wrong and should be discontinued, and to hear them say they will discontinue this sort of thing.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It occurs to me that the question put by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) comes at the wrong time and in the wrong place. We are at present discussing the Estimates and not the conduct of the Government. If the hon. gentlemen opposite choose to bring up a charge against the Government, let them do it at the right time, and we will be prepared to meet it. As to the question of my hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) I may say, in reference to this Mr. Baker, whose case I never heard of until to-night, that I think the statement of the Minister of Agriculture ought to be perfectly satisfactory. He says that Mr. Baker applied for leave of absence and obtained it, that he got the same leave of absence which was given to other officers, that he found a substitute to do his work, that substitute being satisfactory to the department for the performance of his duties during his leave of absence; and the Minister of Agriculture says that how Mr. Baker was employing his time he does not know. That was the answer of the Minister of Agriculture, and no other answer could be given. He did not know any more in reference to Mr. Baker.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Then he cannot read the papers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I read the papers, and I never heard Mr. Baker's name until it was mentioned by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills).

Mr. MULOCK. We are now engaged in voting a sum of money to pay Mr. Baker's salary for the ensuing year, and I think it is very pertinent to that question to decide whether he has been discharging his duties in such a way as to move this committee to continue their payments. There are some four or five thousand civil servants in the service of this Government, and perhaps this kind of action might go a little further, because we have seen some interference with civil servants in certain cases. Sometimes we have seen them removed from their positions, and in others we have seen them compelled to take part in elections on behalf of the Government. If the First Minister does not regard this inquiry as being limited, let him go a little further. I am not at all satisfied as to the circumstances under which some of these men have been dismissed. For instance, there were those three Irishmen who were dismissed from the canal at the instance of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). I believe he is blameable for not protecting them if he is not for obtaining their dismissal. That, perhaps, is a matter which is not germane to this point, but it ought to be cleared up. In regard to the matter now before us, if the Minister takes the ground that, as a committee, we are not entitled to do this, surely as a committee we can make a representation to the House, and that should be that A. G. Baker, or whatever his name is, was employed as immigration agent at Qu'Appelle, that he was stationed at Qu'Appelle, that at the present time the immigration business is very brisk at Qu'Appelle, that he has had some experience in managing that business, and that his business there ought to call for him to discharge the duties of his office, and that the interests of the country imperatively demand that the duties attaching to that office should be attended to, and that they will not admit of delay or of being performed by a person incompetent to perform them; and therefore no person should be allowed to vacate that office at such a critical moment, except under the greatest possible urgency. I ask the hon. the Minister of Agriculture whether this civil servant submitted to him the name of his successor who was supposed to be able to perform these duties.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He did not know that he was the agent.

Mr. MULOCK. The First Minister says he did know, but he says the Minister of Agriculture passed upon the qualifications of the substitute.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, I did not. What I said was that the appointment of the substitute was satisfactory to the department. I do not know whether it was satisfactory to the Minister or not.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not know whether the Minister runs the department or the department runs the Minister, but I assume that any hon. Minister will understand his own business, and I do not think that even the First Minister, who has had great experience as head of a department, will admit that he was not responsible for everything that took place in his department. I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he knew what were the qualifications of this substitute of Mr. Baker before he granted leave of absence to that agent. Did he consider for a moment that this was not the time to grant leave of absence, and that it should only be granted under great urgency, such as a family bereavement or something of that kind, which would justify the Minister, if he were willing to do so, in recommending a change in the Department at that time. If that is not so, the Minister of Agriculture has been derelict in his duty. If everything is satisfactory, the committee will, of course, disclose it, but, if the hon. gentleman gives out that the only excuse was to enable this gentleman to go to some constituency and manipulate votes there and secure the Minister of Agriculture and his colleagues in office, that would not be a sufficient ground for the leave being granted. I think we must first find out whether this officer has discharged his duty properly, whether he was justified in leaving his office, either by the circumstances or by permission; and not till then should we vote money to continue him in office.

Mr. CURRAN. With reference to the statement made by the last speaker in connection with this man, and which he has taken an opportunity on three different occasions to repeating in this House, although I stated that the allegations he had made on two former occasions were untrue, as he has again repeated to night the statement about three Irishmen being discharged from the public service in Montreal, whose discharge I might have prevented, I may as well make, once for all, a formal statement with regard to that matter. The report originated with a young man who was employed on the Montreal Herald, and was utterly without foundation. In the first place, there were no men discharged, either Englishmen, Irishmen, Scotchmen, Frenchmen, or men of any other nationality, from any public service in the city of Montreal, and I had nothing to do with such discharge, if it took place, and I know it did not. On the contrary, when this statement appeared in the newspapers and was copied into one or two other papers in this city and elsewhere, I stood up in my place and stated that if any such discharge had taken place, it was without my knowledge or consent, and that I would give the papers in question an opportunity of proving their assertion. I went to Montreal, and I there enquired from the superintendent of the canal what had taken place. These three men were alleged to have been discharged from the canal works because they had taken part in an election against me. I found that no such men were in the employ of the canal office at all. There are a certain number of laborers employed in the canal office every year to take charge of the locks. The superintendent of the canal informed me that certain parties had told him that during the course of the election three men who were in the habit of being engaged in the spring, were taking a very active part in the election against me, and that he went and told them that it was very much better for them, as they did not know what Government would be in power, to give their votes as they thought proper, but to take no other part in the election. It appears that the three men whom he had thus notified applied for work at the opening of the season, and he told them to come to me and get a letter of recommendation, and he would give them work. That was all that was said. Two of these men come to me and asked for letters of recommendation, which I immediately gave them, and he immediately gave them work. The third man never applied to me for a letter, and I confess I never ran after him to give him one. If he had come to me he would have had the letter just the same as the others. Now, I will read what the papers who had published this statement about me said afterwards. In the first place the Montreal Herald, in a very manly way, came out in the following language:—

"Some time ago, before the animosities of the late general election had subsided there appeared in the Herald an article in which Mr. J. J. Curran, member for Montreal Centre, was alluded to as the enemy of Irish Home Rule and a coercionist. He is represented as having made use of the political position to oppress a number of Irish laborers in this city. We deem it our duty to state how much we regret that the article in question should have found its way into our columns and lest its publication may have in any degree injured that gentleman in the esteem of his fellow-countrymen, we desire to add that the charges were unfounded in so far as they related to Mr. Curran. We differ from Mr. Curran on many questions of Dominion politics, yet we willingly acknowledge that he is a sincere friend of the Irish cause and an upright Canadian politician."

That was published on the 14th September, 1887, and I think disposed of the question in so far as I was concerned. I have stated exactly how far the superintendent of the canal was concerned, also. Then the Montreal Post, who had been most bitter against me all along, copied the article of the Herald and published a very strong article on its own account, in which it stated:

Mr. MULOCK.

"The article of the Herald which occasioned the above apology having been reproduced in the Post and True Witness, it is only fair that the management of those papers should publish the disavowal. On the other hand, they also published strictures on the member for Montreal Centre, and to end if possible all causes of dispute with that gentleman they deem it proper to make the following statement: The Herald says that Mr. Curran is an upright Canadian politician. The management agree with that paper. He is an honorable and an honest man. The charges made against him in this paper relative to coercing poor laboring men were, they now believe, unfounded and the management regret any such allegations having been made.

"The management of the Post are therefore prepared to admit that when a difference of opinion comes it is possible to advocate the views of either side without having recourse to epithet. The management of this paper feel that some of the language made use of by their writers gave Mr. Curran good cause of complaint and they desire to make the amende honorable in this connection."

This was published both in the Post and True Witness, on September 29, 1887. Another paper published in this city also apologised for having reproduced the statement in question. Now, all these things must have been known to the hon. member who has just spoken. When I got up in the House I gave the most emphatic denial to the allegations that he made. Still, he persisted in them. He was requested to withdraw this statement, but he would not withdraw it. Now, I have only one thing to say, that any man who says that I have ever, on any occasion, oppressed anybody, or sought to deprive them of any position which they hold under the Government, or might hope to hold under it, because that man or men had opposed me in an election, is a liar, in the plainest language.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CURRAN. I say any man who says so, is a liar.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CURRAN. What is the order about? I say so here, and I will say so anywhere else. Now, I hope that this thing has come up for the last time, because I shall consider it a personal insult if it is again hurled against me, after the manner in which I have disproved the allegation. As I said, the papers in question came out in a most manly way and exonerated me in every respect, and from that day to this I have been well treated by them, I believe. But certainly there is no excuse for such reiterated attacks upon me in a matter that is utterly without foundation; and if all the other allegations made here with reference to public employes are of the same nature, this House can judge of their value.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is the second time the hon. member for Montreal has chosen to read that article in the Herald.

Mr. CURRAN. I never read it before in the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. You referred to it, then, last Session.

Mr. CURRAN. No, I could not refer to it last Session, because it had not been written then.

Mr. MITCHELL. In the beginning of the Session, you did.

Mr. CURRAN. Not at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, I certainly understood so.

Mr. CURRAN. I stated in answer to the hon. member who spoke a moment ago, that this article had appeared in the Herald, but I had not the article about me just then to read.

Mr. MITCHELL. I know you referred to it, at all events.

Mr. CURRAN. Yes, I did.

Mr. MITCHELL. As the hon. gentleman has made a statement, I may just as well make one too. This article was written without my knowledge, and the first I saw of it was in the press. It was written by a gentleman who then managed my paper, and when I saw the article I at once asked that gentleman—I need not mention his name, gentlemen on the other side know who it is.

An hon. MEMBER. The Empire?

Mr. MITCHELL. The Empire, if you like. I asked him what the meaning of the article was what was the foundation for making such statement against a man of Mr. Curran's position and standing. He said he had the best authority for it, that he had sent down to verify the statements of the men—the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Curran) spoke of three, to the best of my recollection the number was six. My manager told me they had been not exactly discharged but had been refused employment on the canal. They had been employed from season to season, some of them for years, and when they went to get employment at the opening of this season they were informed that before they could be employed they would have to get permission from Mr. Curran. My manager informed me that he had verified the facts and the men had come to the office and asserted it over and over again and they were prepared to prove it. When Mr. Curran brought an action against the Herald I said: If those facts can be established I will defend it, and I did defend the action, till I got an intimation that the matter could be very easily settled. I believed there was every grave doubt as to whether under the libel law of Quebec the proof of the truth of the statement was always a defense, and when I came to consult my lawyer, who was a very prominent Conservative, I discovered that there were very grave doubts whether, even if every fact be proved as stated in the paper, I would not still be mulcted in damages. Mr. Curran having very handsomely offered to settle the matter if an acknowledgment was made, my lawyer said I had better do it and get rid of it. I at once said to my lawyer: If that is the case I will do it. I will say this, that Mr. Curran said more than that, namely, that he would not even charge the costs against the Herald if he had not a partner who was entitled to have his costs in the matter, when he found that it was done without my knowledge or information. I said to my lawyer under these circumstances: We will pay Mr. Curran his costs and make such an acknowledgment of error as you think desirable—and Mr. Curran prepared it himself, he will acknowledge it. And that at the time I said to my lawyer: Well, it is going pretty far, but we have done him some injury and I am willing to make the utmost recompense to him for it. Under those circumstances I gave Mr. Curran that explanation for publication, if he chose to use it. It was objectionable to me somewhat, expressing as it did an opinion about his private character, but at the same time I felt that, when I was doing it, it was better not to do it half way but to go the whole length and satisfy Mr. Curran. I want to say this to Mr. Curran, that every man connected with the editorial staff, and there are several of them, was indignant to think with a case which they thought clear I should have been so foolish as to settle it. I have had some little experience with actions for libel since I became connected with a newspaper. I know what the troubles are. I got into an action in which there were ten different allegations of defense, each of which would have laid me open for an action for damages. The partner of our worthy Speaker brought an action against the Herald in that case, brought us into court, and one of the allegations was of rather a serious character, the case being in connection with a young immigrant woman. She subsequently emigrated to Vermont. I had to send to Vermont for her, and although I proved every one of the ten allegations except one, which had to be proved by that young woman, the old woman who brought the action hurried her away and I was never able to get sight of her again. Judge Jetté, who presided at the court, postponed the final evidence for several days, knowing we had brought this young woman there and that she had disappeared, but the result was that because we were not able to prove the tenth allegation, although we had proved nine, I had to pay $400 damages to the worthy Speaker's partner. That was a little experience for me. My lawyer told me, as I have said, that even if I proved the facts to be as stated it was very questionable under the Quebec law whether that would free the Herald from damages; I said I did not believe any such thing in regard to the law. I happened to have another suit in the court, of a political character, and I got out of it on appeal on account of the declaration not having been properly drawn. I have thus had some experience of the effect of the libel law in the Province of Quebec. I made up my mind that it was better to eat a little crow than to pay large lawyers bills, and when I did make up my mind to eat the leek I did not go half way in the matter; and as Mr. Curran knows, when he prepared the letter and submitted it to my lawyer and my lawyer submitted it to me, I said: It goes rather too far, but I will sign it and pay the bill and the hon. member and myself have been friends ever since. I merely state these facts in order to explain how Peter Mitchell came to eat the leek, for he does not very often do it.

Mr. CURRAN. It is perfectly true that the apology was prepared by Mr. McMaster and myself.

Mr. MITCHELL. By yourself chiefly.

Mr. CURRAN. On the other hand I do not wish the hon. gentleman to be under a false impression, and I may say here that whatever may be the defects in the Quebec law, if the hon. gentleman is sure of what he has stated I am perfectly prepared to waive the whole question as to damages. If he imagines he can prove anyone part of the statement made against me as true, I state in the presence of this House that I am prepared to say that he shall not be mulcted in any damages and let him go on with the suit. I am prepared to establish that I had nothing to do with this matter, and that the statement I have made is true in every respect.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not say you had.

Mr. CURRAN. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that it was because he was afraid he might not be able to prove it on some one or other point.

Mr. MITCHELL. No, I did not say that. I had given my experience as to what had been done in another case.

Mr. CURRAN. That seems to have led the hon. gentleman to adopt the course he did adopt, as I thought in a very manly way, in this matter. As I have said, there was no man discharged. It may have been a very tyrannical thing on the part of the superintendent of the canal to say to those men go and get a letter of recommendation from Mr. Curran. I do not think it is, because a great many come to me for letters, and although I give them, I cannot always get them work. I gave the letters the very moment the men came and I would have given it to the third man if he had come also.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Curran may have misunderstood me. What I did wish to convey to him and to this House, was that I knew nothing of the facts myself. The libel, if it was a libel, was committed before I knew anything about it. As to the facts I endeavored to get them verified after the event, as my manager had verified them, as he said before. I told him to verify them again, and he assured me that the facts which he was prepared to prove were, that those six men, not three if my recollection serves me right, who were in the habit of going as a matter of course in the spring of the year and getting employment as they had employment before, when they did apply they were told by the manager of the canal that they would have to get a letter from Mr. Curran before they could get employment. That is what those men told my manager, as my manager told me, and he was prepared to verify that and he was very indignant with me for taking the course I did.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think it is quite germane to the whole debate that the suggestion of my hon. friend should be entertained, because this discussion places the hon. the Minister of Agriculture in a very equivocal position. The hon. the Minister says that Mr. Baker recommended to him or to the department a person to look to his office during his absence and that this was satisfactory to the department. The hon. gentleman forgot that when Mr. Baker's name was mentioned by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) at the commencement of the discussion, he did not remember that Mr. Baker was an officer of his department at all. I would ask him how he can state now that Mr. Baker could have made this satisfactory arrangement for the conduct of his business?

Mr. CARLING. I did not say that I did not remember that he was an officer of the department. I said that I thought he was the agent at Brandon and not Qu'Appelle.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he was not aware that he was an officer at all, and when he consulted with his deputy he found that he was. However this is just a part of the programme that has been played for a long time. It was played in Halifax during the local election when an officer of the Customs Department who had enjoyed a summer holiday, on his return from his holiday and when the local election was going on, the collector received orders from the department here at Ottawa to give him leave of absence during the election and he was despatched to Guidore with fishing bounty cheques, to be distributed so as to influence the electors to vote against the provincial secretary. That gentleman's name is Mr. Morris. His salary has since been advanced, and he was used during the whole of that election with the fishing bounty cheques in his pocket, working by orders of the Department of Ottawa. It is part of the same system that Mr. Baker is carrying on in the county of Russell.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know Mr. Morris' trip to Nova Scotia, to which the hon. gentleman refers, but when he makes the statement as broadly as he has done, that Mr. Morris was sent down there to work against the Local Government by the department at Ottawa, he tells what is not correct and what it is impossible for him to prove.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I can prove it.

Mr. BOWELL. I say you cannot prove it.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I say I can.

Mr. BOWELL. I give no opinion as to the gentleman to whom he refers obtaining leave at that time. I am not in a position at this moment to state whether it is correct or not, but I do deny that that gentleman or any other gentleman was sent down by the department at Ottawa to electioneer against any local candidate or any Dominion candidate either.

Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I say he was, and I know it.

Mr. BOWELL. I say he was not, and I know better.

Mr. MULOCK. The member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) says that no men were discharged from the canal service. That is, of course, a technical way of getting out of the difficulty. The facts are, as I understand, that the men in question had been appointed from year to year, and while they only worked during the season of navigation, yet their appointments were considered as permanent as that of any other person in the public service. To say, therefore, that they were not discharged, if when the season was about to come round again they were refused to be allowed to proceed with their work as usual, is trifling with the real substance of the question. However, the member from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) admits that an employé of this Government, the superintendent of the canal, chose to resort to the extraordinary course of intimidating three of the electors of Montreal Centre.

Mr. CURRAN. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. MULOCK. And that the superintendent of the canal informed those three men that if they took a prominent part in the elections they would be dismissed, or, what is the same thing, that their services would be discontinued. Now, the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) can settle this matter between himself and the canal superintendent. I presume the superintendent knew there was an election on, when he said that, and I presume he was concerned very much in promoting the election of the member for Montreal Centre, and I very much doubt if there was not some hint or other given to the superintendent about the promotion of the election in Montreal Centre. I would, under these circumstances, attach very little importance to the withdrawal and the apology that appeared in the Montreal Herald. I admit that to the sentiments expressed in the Montreal Herald should attach very much great weight as disclosing very fully the gentlemanly demeanor and the principle of the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), because no one knows those better than the member for Montreal Centre himself who wrote it. But the circumstances under which they were prepared as has been stated here and under which they were published in the Herald I hardly think can be cited as good evidence for the member for Montreal Centre. We come right back to the fact that three men, three Irish Catholics—perhaps six, but at all events three—were driven from the public service because they chose to exercise the rights of freemen. That is the transaction. The member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) when he knew that wrong was done and when two of those men, perhaps from their necessities, were humiliated and compelled to come to him to ask him to get justice, knew that there was another suffering, but he had not the courage or the manliness to go to that independent man and see that he was reinstated in his office. He knew that man was unjustly treated, and I charge him with the whole responsibility. I say he is trifling with the facts when he endeavors to escape from the dilemma and when he says: I the representative of the Irish Catholic people of this country in this House chose to stand on my high position as representative of Montreal Centre, and when two of those men came and humbled themselves before me and begged for food I did not refuse them; but one other who was manly enough, courageous enough, and Irish enough to refuse to humble himself before me, I from my high pedestal refused to step down and extend a hand to him. That is the attitude of the representative of the Irish people of Canada in the House of Commons of Canada. I hold him responsible for every bit of it. I do not take back one word of it. I charge him with the guilt of it, and no apology will come from me, let him use all the dignified and classical terms he may choose to apply to me. I say he is responsible for it.

Mr. TROW. I rise to order. What has this to do with the item under consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. I think this is irregular. I would have stopped it before if my attention had been called to it.

Mr. CURRAN. I will refrain from saying anything, as I do not think the gentleman is worthy of any answer. Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1.20 a.m. (Thursday).

Printed by McLEAN, ROGER & Co., Parliamentary Printers, Wellington Street, Ottawa.

House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Thursday, May 3, 1888.

No. 47

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 3rd May, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 123) to amend the Criminal Procedure Act, chap. 174 of the Revised Statutes. He said: The object of this Bill is to make two changes in the procedure relating to the law of criminal libel. In the first place, it is proposed to enact that the place of trial in criminal procedure for libel against the publisher of a newspaper shall be within the Province in which the newspaper is published, the publishing office of the paper. In the second place, it is proposed to establish that the crime of libel shall be like that of perjury and two or three other offences, in respect of which it is provided in the Criminal Procedure Act that proceedings by indictment must be preceded by a preliminary investigation before a magistrate, unless the indictment is on the fiat of the Attorney General of the Province, or the judge before whom the indictment is preferred.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand, from the hon. gentleman's explanation of the Bill, that he does not propose to include any clause to have reference to the exercise by courts of arbitrary power of imprisonment for constructive contempt.

Mr. THOMPSON. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I rise merely for the purpose of giving the hon. gentleman notice that it is my intention, at an early and convenient opportunity, to bring before the House for discussion the proceedings arising out of the imprisonment of John J. Hawke, editor of the Moncton Transcript, for alleged constructive contempt of the New Brunswick Court; and probably before that discussion is disposed of, the hon. gentleman, if he sees the feeling of the House is in that direction, may make up his mind that it is desirable to enlarge the scope of the present Bill by making it refer to proceedings of that kind, and limiting, if such is the wisdom of the House, the arbitrary power which seems to be vested in the judges, as seen in the action of those gentlemen in question. I do not propose to discuss the matter now, but merely to give the hon. gentleman notice that I will bring forward the matter.

Mr. THOMPSON. I thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice, but I shall esteem it a greater favor if he informs me at a subsequent time when he proposes to bring the matter forward, because I shall have to make enquiries at a distance.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COPYRIGHT ACT.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 124) to amend the Copyright Act, chapter 62 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. He said: The effect of this Bill will be to adopt in Canada the provisions of the Berne convention relating to copyright.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LANDS.

Mr. WATSON asked, What amount of lands retained by the Dominion Government as provided for in 49 Victoria, chapter 9, is situated within the Province of Manitoba? Also, what amount of said lands have been retained west of the boundary of the Province of Manitoba and east of 3rd Meridian?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The negotiations with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the defining of the lands which are to be retained under the Act mentioned have been proceeding, and they will be completed as soon as possible after the passing of the resolution respecting the company's land grant now before Parliament.

Mr. WATSON asked, 1. Whether the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has made a selection of all lands granted to it under clause 11 of Canadian Pacific Railway contract? 2. What amount of said lands have been selected within the boundary of the Province of Manitoba? 3. What amount of said lands have been selected between the western boundary of the Province of Manitoba and 3rd Meridian?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. 1. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company have selected nearly 7,000,000 acres of the lands granted under clause 11 of the Canadian Pacific Railway contract. 2. The area of lands selected within the boundaries of Manitoba is, in acres 1,818,330. 3. The area of lands selected between the western boundary of Manitoba and the 3rd Initial Meridian is, in acres, 2,989,440.

Mr. LAURIER asked, 1. What number of acres is there of unsold lands which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company propose to receive by deed of bargain and sale to trustees under sub-section c of the Resolutions now before the House? 2. What portions of such lands lie within the Railway Belt? 3. How many acres of those lands are there in Manitoba, and how many in the Territories, east of the 3rd Meridian? 4. How many acres have been sold by the company, paid for, and the deeds completed? 5. How many acres have been sold, but the sales are still incomplete? How much paid on the same, and how much remains due, and when and how payable?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am able to answer one of these questions, but not the whole satisfactorily, as the information must be obtained from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I have asked the company to provide the information and I expect it any moment.

Mr. LAURIER. Perhaps you will answer the questions to-morrow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If you please.

LIGHTHOUSE ON STAG ISLAND.

Mr. MONCRIEFF asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to construct and establish a lighthouse on Stag Island, in the River St. Clair?

Mr. FOSTER. The department has been gathering information and making enquiries with respect to the necessity of establishing a lighthouse on Stag Island, and the matter is now under consideration. At the time the Supplementary Estimates come down I shall be able to answer the hon. gentleman definitely.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT STRATHROY.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Has a site been selected for the proposed public buildings at Strathroy? If so, where is the location? Has any, and what progress been made towards the erection of such public buildings?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The site has not yet been selected.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the House do resolve itself into Committee, to-morrow, on the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that there shall be payable, in respect of his attendance at each Session of the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories, to each elected member thereof, an indemnity of $500, and to each legal expert, for the like attendance, an indemnity of $250, in addition in each case to his actual travelling expenses, subject to a proportionate reduction for each day's absence from a sitting of the Assembly, the amount of such reduction and of such travelling expenses to be ascertained in such manner as the Governor in Council prescribes; that there shall be payable to the Speaker of the said Legislative Assembly an annual salary of $500, and to the Clerk of the said Assembly, acting also as Secretary to the Lieutenant Governor, an annual salary of $2,000; and that all such payments shall be made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This, of course, relates to the House of Assembly in the North-West Territory. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he has considered the propriety of placing at the disposal of the Governor and Legislature of the North-West Territory the same grant as that which the Provinces receive in proportion to their population; leaving to them to appoint their own clerk, regulate their own affairs, and to spend the money so given, in the way that they think best in the public service. The hon. gentleman knows at the present time that this assembly has really no funds with which to carry on the business of legislation, except such as the Government here may place at its disposal. If there was an account opened with the Territory, the moment a Legislature is established and money placed at their disposal, when they come to be admitted as a Province of course the whole sum so received by that means could be taken into consideration. It always seemed to me, that that would be the rational way to deal with them whenever they had a legislative assembly. I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman has considered the subject, and whether he proposes to invite parliamentary action in the matter? It will be conceived that it would be a little more reasonable, in conferring on them the power of legislation and representation, that they should have funds with which to carry on their operations.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This discussion will arise more properly on the second reading of the Bill. I will say to my hon. friend that we do not propose to put in any such vote for this year. The territories are not quite without revenue, as the hon. gentleman knows, and I have no doubt they dispose of that revenue to the best advantage of the territories. Those revenues are very small, certainly, and I am quite ready to admit the merits of the suggestion of the hon. gentleman. The idea is to make as little change as possible until they have a purely elective assembly representing the people. They will be obliged, after the elections, to meet very soon, and to consider what the wants of the country and what administrative action here they think would be most satisfactory for that country. The measure before the House is intended merely to carry out the principle, with all due respect to their suggestions for the future. From time to time we have had a series of resolutions passed by the mingled council, in which parties were nominated and parties elected. Those are contradictory in themselves and cannot be supposed really to represent the feelings of the people. We propose to make no appropriation of a sum to be disposed of by the Governor, there including the Legislature, until they have really a Local Legislature and ascertain what their own ideas are on the subject.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Of course I do not propose to enter into a discussion, and I am making only a suggestion now. Those people are contributing their proportion to the taxes of the country at the present time. In all the Provinces a certain portion of the revenue, so much per capita, is paid over to the Provinces as provincial revenue for provincial purposes. My remarks had reference to the intention of the Government when the hon. gentleman's Bill is adopted, and the Legislature made completely elective. It does not seem to me, and I do not say it with a view to promoting controversy, that it is a matter of negotiation to know how much they are entitled to. As a matter of right they should be entitled to the same amount per capita, revenue for local purposes, as in the Provinces, and which should be accounted for at the time of Union.

Motion agreed to.

THE RAILWAY ACT.

Mr. THOMPSON (for Mr. POPE) moved House into Committee on Bill (No. 24) to amend and consolidate the Railway Act.

On section 2, sub section p,

Mr. MULOCK. This clause, defining the word "near," refers to the proximity of one railway to another. Would it not be advisable to define the word with reference to some point as well? In Acts of incorporation the word "near" is used to define the route taken; but I do not know how any court could determine whether any railway was exceeding its powers when it is authorized to go to or near a point. In this vast continent that might mean many miles away. While I do not wish to embarrass any company, I think it would be well to give some statutory definition of the word "near" under such circumstances.

Mr. TISDALE. It is easy to define the word, having regard to the relation of one railway to another; but if we try to define it in relation to the routes of railroads, it seems to me we should defeat the object the hon. gentleman has in view, because "at or near" any point, describing a route, will depend on all the circumstances. No difficulty has arisen from the want of such a definition, that I am aware of. Sometimes a court would hold that a quarter of a mile was near, and in other cases they might hold that two miles was near.

Mr. MULOCK. Or fifty miles.

Mr. TISDALE. No.

Mr. MULOCK. Where will you draw the line?

Mr. TISDALE. The courts will always draw the line according to the circumstances, and give a reasonable construction to the word, as they do in other cases. But I think if we define the word in a railroad Act, we would create greater difficulties than now exist.

Mr. MULOCK. Suppose a railway was incorporated to build to or near a certain town which may be near a certain other town. It might be within five or ten miles of the other town, and the engineering difficulties might be precisely the same in both cases. There might be no such circumstances as the hon. gentleman suggests to enable the court to determine how the word "near" should be construed. I do not think it is right to incorporate a railway company, giving it the utmost freedom in the choice of a particular route, thus causing one municipality to compete with another, and perhaps obliging it, by force of circumstances, to give a large bonus to bring the line within its neighborhood. If the route is not defined by the Act of incorporation, you give the company practically a roving commission, enabling it not only to commit the abuse I speak of, but perhaps to affect existing rights. Therefore I am satisfied that it is in the public interest that we should not incorporate these companies at large. I would suggest this. Every railway company under the general Act, has power to build branches six miles in length, and I think the word "near" might be defined here to mean not more than six miles. In the North-West, where there is a vast prairie country, engineering difficulties would not arise to aid the court in determining the meaning of the word. Suppose a company were incorporated to build a road in the North West near to a certain town. In that vast country fifty miles are equivalent to not more than five or ten miles in the older Provinces. Surely a company should not have the power to choose a location as wide as fifty miles; but what would enable a court to determine whether it was exceeding its powers or not?

Mr. EDGAR. I think it is just as easy for a court to determine when one railway comes near another as it is when a railway comes near a point; and I think it is quite as necessary to define the meaning of the word "near" in the latter as in the former. Not a Session passes in which a number of Bills are not put through the Railway Committee saying that the railway shall commence at or near a town or city or a certain point. This certainly leaves a great deal of doubt as to the distance intended, and I think that both for the general purposes of a public railway and for the legal effect of such a provision, some definition of distance, say four, five or six miles, should be covered by the words "at or near." I would suggest to add to this clause as it stands, "and near to a point or municipality when some part of it is within five or six miles thereof."

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not think it is quite so easy to define the word "near," in relation to the construction of a railway, as it is in relation to its operation. The definition would have to be of an entirely different character. When we are defining the word "near" in this sub-section, we are dealing with a knowledge of the traffic and things of that kind, in relation to which proximity must be pretty close, but when we come to deal with the word "near" in relation to the termini of a railway, as the hon. member for York mentioned, a very much larger limit must be given. Then, take a charter in which it is provided that a railway shall be built from a point beginning at or near a certain town. There would then be a good deal of practical difficulty in defining that word, because we would be giving a material limitation to a large number of charters which Parliament has passed.

Mr. MULOCK. It would not be retroactive.

Mr. THOMPSON. In relation to those railways which have not been commenced, it probably would. The limitation of six miles in some cases would hardly do. Some of the statutes, for instance, are for lines not six miles in length, and it would defeat the statute altogether if we were to apply this limit to such lines. The whole thing depends on the country through which a line passes, and the kind of termini it has. The hon. gentleman's suggestion, however, deals with a particular subject, which we can consider later, if he thinks the matter is of sufficient importance.

On subsection 7,

Mr. THOMPSON. In this section I do not think there is any change in the law; it is only a little more full.

Mr. WELDON. I would suggest to add the words "or other erection" after "railway bridge."

Mr. THOMPSON. I will add those words.

Mr. BARRON. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if it would not be well to define the meaning of the word "railway," as including the lessees of a railway. I have found in my professional practice that the Grand Trunk Railway, as lessee of the Midland Railway, have escaped all liabilities from injuries resulting from overhead bridges, by reason of not being met by this particular Railway Act. I find that the sections referring to overhead bridges in this new Bill are almost similar to the sections in the old Railway Act. The word "operate," however, if new, may cover this objection. The hon. gentleman will remember that the other night we discussed the necessity of providing that all railways leasing other roads should be liable for damages resulting from overhead bridges, such as did result in the case of the Niagara Central.

Mr. THOMPSON. I did consider this question. The hon. gentleman was kind enough to show me the case, and it seemed to me that provision ought to be made, and if we find it is not clear in the Bill that such provision is made, we will attend to that suggestion.

Mr. MULOCK. Why except Government railways? Are they not held liable as common carriers?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, but we have a special Act for them.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does that Act provide in the same way as this?

Mr. THOMPSON. It regulates the liability of the Government as a common carrier.

On section 4,

Mr. WELDON. Can we compel local railways, built under local charters, to come under this Act? They are not works at all under the control of the Government of Canada, but they are entirely under the control of the Local Legislatures, and are subject to such provisions as the Local Legislatures may pass. This Act, however, brings them in for certain purposes under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament, and, if they can be brought in for one purpose, they can for all. Unless these are for the general advantage of Canada, they are altogether without the purview of this Legislature.

Mr. THOMPSON. That clause is the same as the other, excepting that the other is contained in two provisions, owing to the Bill being in two parts, and this is merely throwing the two provisions into one, but, if the hon. gentleman thinks that it is of any importance, we will let that section stand.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The hon. gentleman knows that only the other day an information was filed against a railway in New Brunswick, and my attention was called to this matter in that way, and it struck me that it was a question whether we had any power to make any work which was within the control of the Local Legislature of the Province, liable to this Act, because, if you can do that in one case, you may make them liable to the whole of the provisions of the Consolidated Railway Act. I think that, as long as these railways are under local legislation, the Local Legislature is paramount in dealing with them.

Mr. THOMPSON. The intention is only to bring them under our jurisdiction in regard to matters in which we certainly have jurisdiction, such as offences, penalties and statistics. However, we will let it stand.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No doubt we can bring these railways under the jurisdiction of this Legislature in certain matters, but I think we have gone far beyond our jurisdiction already in declaring certain railways to be for the general advantage of Canada, though they have been constructed under local authority. I think that there is no doubt that, when these questions are argued in the courts, our action will be declared to have been ultra vires, and I do not think we should go any further in that direction.

On section 8,

Mr. THOMPSON. This is simply to provide that certain members of Council shall be members of the Railway Committee ex officio. The present law provides in section 58 that the Governor General may appoint such members as he thinks fit to be members of the Railway Committee, but this clause declares that the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Justice shall be ex officio members of the Railway Committee of Council.

Mr. TISDALE. I think that when the quorum is only two one should be the Minister of Justice. Of course, if the whole of the members are there, it is all right, but we ought to have the Minister of Justice always there.

Mr. THOMPSON. We may go back to that question hereafter.

On section 10,

Mr. MULOCK. I would call the attention of the Minister to sub-section c of this clause. It appears to give the Railway Committee power to fix the liabilities of companies transgressing the provisions of sub-sections a and b, section a dealing with the rate of speed at which railway trains may be run. Now, it might be held that was the only liability the railway company incurred. Of course the Minister does not intend it should have such a meaning as that. A railway running its train beyond this speed, through a thickly-populated section, might cause damage far in excess of anything for which section c provides a remuneration. Therefore I think it would be well to qualify section c, so that shall not interfere in any way with the liability of the company in any court for damages for which it might be liable.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have no objection to that. It is a mere copy, however. I propose this as a sub-section:

"The imposition of any such penalty shall not lessen or affect any other liability which any company may have incurred."

On section 11,

Mr. EDGAR. With reference to that clause, which seems to be largely new, perhaps the Minister can point out what provisions are based upon the recommendation of the Railway Committee?

Mr. THOMPSON. No, I cannot, from any memorandum I have here. If the hon. gentleman desires, we will let that clause stand for the present.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to recall the attention of the Minister to the amendment we have just made in section 10. I think we should use the word "person," in—stead of the word "company," so as, for instance, to meet the case of an engine-driver abusing his power and disobeying orders, resulting in loss of life or damage, for which he might be personally liable.
Mr. WELDON (St. John).

Mr. THOMPSON. Very well; I accept the suggestion.

On section 20,

Mr. MITCHELL. Will not this section be required to be amended so as to make it consistent with section 17?

Mr. THOMPSON. No, I think not, as construed together. They will have a right to review their own order, but no other tribunal would.

Mr. MULOCK. When does it become final?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is final as soon as it is made.

Mr. EDGAR. There is no appeal except to itself.

Mr. THOMPSON. There is no objection to making a change. I propose that it read: "shall, subject to the provisions of sub-section 17, be final."

Mr. EDGAR. It is a question whether four weeks public notice of the regular annual meeting is not more than is necessary. Special general meetings should be well notified, but general annual meetings are fixed by statute.

Mr. THOMPSON. Are not those the provisions of the Model Bill?

Mr. EDGAR. I do not think so.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think so.

Mr. TISDALE. Under the Model Bill it was found this Session that there was no power to call a special meeting, and the idea is to have one class of notice for all classes of meetings.

Mr. EDGAR. I think four weeks is too much notice for an ordinary annual meeting.

Mr. THOMPSON. Let it stand, please, and I will consider it.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think it better to have a uniform rule with regard to giving notice of those meetings, and I should be in favor of having this clause passed.

Mr. TISDALE. Four weeks is not too much for important meetings, such as the issue of bonds. All the large companies give that notice, and many of them six weeks. I think it is better to have the clause adopted.

On section 44,

Mr. MITCHELL. I think that there should be a rule that the proxies at meetings should be held by shareholders only.

Mr. TISDALE. Why?

Mr. MITCHELL. Because I do not think that outsiders should be allowed to come in and discuss questions.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). In banks outsiders are now allowed to hold proxies.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not think it is usual for proxies to be put in the hands of anybody but shareholders, but if a shareholder wishes to appoint his counsel, I do not see why he should not be allowed to do it.

Mr. TISDALE. It has always been the law and it has always worked well. The people may not notice those little changes and some company may hold a meeting which might be illegal on account of this.

Mr. MULOCK. Is there anything in the Act saying that the head of a municipality should be admitted as a shareholder? Suppose a municipality took stock, the municipality of course could not all be present, but it might be represented by its head.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will look into that question and see.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will you enquire as to whether the proxies should be held by shareholders or not?

Mr. THOMPSON. I would like to take the opinion of the House on that matter.

Mr. MITCHELL. You might consider it when you are amending the Act.

Mr. THOMPSON. I shall.

On section 49,

Mr. CHARLTON. Why is it necessary to exclude stockholders holding less than twenty shares from the board of directors?

Mr. TISDALE. Twenty shares is the qualification adopted by the Railway Committee in the Model Bill. The committee thought that anyone who was not interested to that extent should not fill so important a position.

Mr. EDGAR. I suppose that this section only applies to cases where no provision is made in a special Act for a similar sum.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. LANGEЛИER (Quebec). I think a provision should be introduced which would prevent a director acting as security for a contractor. In many cases the security is the real contractor.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will insert that provision.

On section 60,

Mr. WELDON. Are those words "absence or illness" not too general? What do they mean?

Mr. THOMPSON. They mean that when the president is away, the vice-president shall act in his place.

Mr. WELDON. The question might be raised as to the authority of the vice-president, as to whether the president was really absent or not. I would suggest to leave those words out.

Mr. THOMPSON. Then you would give the vice-president authority to act even when the president is there, and difficulty might ensue.

Mr. TISDALE. This is the wording of the old law, and no difficulty has arisen under it. The president is head, and in his absence the vice-president. It simply means that when the head is there he must do the work, but that when absent the vice-president has his powers.

Mr. THOMPSON. I propose to add the words "or in case of a vacancy in the office of the president."

On section 62,

Mr. HALL. I do not see any necessity for making the date of the annual balancing of accounts the 30th day of June, because there are many companies whose books are balanced, under their charters, on other dates.

Mr. THOMPSON. The object is to have the accounts closed at such a time that we can get the statistics in time for the meeting of Parliament.

Mr. MITCHELL. It appears to me the object is very desirable, because it is well to have uniformity.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It will cause a great deal of inconvenience and difficulty to many companies if they should be compelled to change the date at which their financial year closes. Many of them make their annual statements on the 31st December.

Mr. MITCHELL. It will cause inconvenience only for one year, and will enable us to receive the statistics in proper time, and create uniformity.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Some of the companies, by their special Acts, are obliged to make up their accounts at a different date. Many of them must hold their annual meeting in May and make their accounts up to the 31st December. You might as well compel insurance companies to change the date of their annual meetings and statements of account.

Mr. MACKENZIE. We have done that.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Not with every insurance company.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not think this provision could apply to any company which has a special provision in its Act, and it is impossible to get the returns in time for Parliament, unless we have a uniform date. One of the recommendations of the Commission was that there should be a uniform date, and it is impossible to fix that uniform date at any other than the 30th June.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the statement has to be made up to the 31st December, it makes only the difference of half a year, and that will not entail any serious inconvenience.

On section 69,

Mr. HALL. It is a very unusual thing that dividends should be declared by the shareholders. As a rule, the dividends are declared by the directors. I suppose the object of this is that the dividends should only be declared from the profits that might be made, and I think it might be provided that the directors should only declare dividends on the clear profits of the undertaking.

Mr. THOMPSON. This is the exact section which was in the old Act, but I will consider the matter.

Mr. MULOCK. I would suggest that the word "clear" should be struck out, and the word "net" should be substituted.

Mr. MITCHELL. It appears to me that that clause goes a little too far. It says:

"At the annual meeting of the shareholders of the company, a dividend shall be declared out of the clear profits of the undertaking, unless such meeting decides otherwise."

Why should the power be given to the meeting to decide otherwise? Surely we are not going to give power to the meeting of the shareholders to declare a dividend out of capital?

Mr. THOMPSON. It simply gives them power to refuse to declare a dividend.

Mr. MITCHELL. This section really gives them power to provide for a dividend out of the capital.

Mr. TISDALE. Section 71 provides for that case.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I think this clause should be amended so as to read that the dividend may be declared out of the net profits, and leaving out all after the word "unless."

Mr. WELDON (St. John). According to this, they can only declare a dividend once a year, while some companies declare a dividend every six months.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. That is true.

Mr. CHARLTON. Would it not be well to insert the word "only" after the word "shall"?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think the intention of the Act is to prevent the directors making a fortuitous dividend arising out of special circumstances, and to prevent the irregular declaration of dividends, and to prevent the directors, without consulting the shareholders as to what dividend shall be declared, making such a dividend.

Mr. HALL. Why are these more applicable to railway companies than to banks or any other joint stock companies?

In those companies, the directors always declare the dividend.

Mr. THOMPSON. The operations of railway companies are more expensive than others, such as banks, but, of course, I am in the hands of the committee in regard to this matter.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I see that this clause provides only for an annual dividend, and, supposing the annual meeting fails, no dividend can be declared that year.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. The Grand Trunk has a semi-annual meeting at which it declares dividends.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Why should you not say that a dividend might be declared at an annual or special general meeting of shareholders?

Mr. TISDALE. It seems to be the policy that directors shall not declare dividends without the consent of the shareholders. That has been the law, and I cannot see any reason for changing it. The Grand Trunk Railway Company has special legislation for that purpose, but I think it would be a mistake to do the same thing in regard to other railway companies. If that is done, you must authorise semi-annual meetings instead of annual meetings. I think we should be careful to see that these companies have money in the banks out of which to pay for labor, and for accidents, and all that sort of thing, and, as a rule, with regard to most of our railway companies, there is no occasion for semi-annual meetings to declare dividends, because there are no dividends to declare.

Mr. MITCHELL. The only instance I know of where semi-annual dividends are declared is the Grand Trunk Railway. The other railways are only authorised to declare dividends annually. I do not see that it is necessary to declare semi-annual dividends on any of these railways. I would suggest that the section should be so amended as to read that:

"At the annual meeting of the shareholders of the company, a dividend shall be declared only out of the net profits of the undertaking."

And leave out the words "unless such meeting decides otherwise." I think that would meet the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The way in which the clause now reads is:

"At the annual meeting of the shareholders of the company, a dividend may be declared out of the net profits of the undertaking."

Mr. MITCHELL. That will do.

On section 71,

Mr. LANGEЛИER (Quebec). I do not know whether there is any penalty for the infringement of this clause. If there is not, it will be nugatory.

Mr. THOMPSON. This makes it illegal, but it would be very difficult to inflict a penalty when it is the act of the whole company at an annual meeting of the shareholders.

Mr. MULOCK. Would it not be possible to provide some means of enforcing this section? It says that the directors shall not pay a dividend on the stock until the undertaking has been completed and opened to the public, and then they may pay interest at the rate of 6 per cent. Supposing the directors violate this provision of the law, what will you do? The clause says:

"The directors may, in their discretion, until the railway is completed and opened to the public, pay interest at any rate not exceeding 6 per cent. per annum."

If the proprietors pay more than 6 per cent., they should be held liable, and I suggest that they should be made liable for any excess, without any prejudice to the right to recover from the parties receiving the same.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will make a note of that.

Mr. HALL.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. We also ought to have the time specified when the railway is to be completed. I do not think any railway in Canada is really completed, and therefore there is no definite time specified.

On section 73,

Mr. MULOCK. Would it not be proper to provide restrictions against shareholders disposing of stock which they have not paid up, where good shareholders may rid themselves of liability by transferring their stock to men of straw? Under the Joint Stock Companies' Act, there is a provision to meet such a case as that. Under that Act, if I remember rightly, the directors are not allowed to permit the transfer of stock that is not paid up in full, to other than substantial persons, or persons who are generally reputed to be substantial persons; and if they violate the provisions of that Act, they are liable. I would suggest that provision of the Act might be well incorporated here.

Mr. THOMPSON. Would it restrict the transfer of shares very much?

Mr. MULOCK. I mean to say that when a man subscribes for stock and pays up, say, 10 per cent. upon it, and owes 90 per cent., he ought not to be at liberty to transfer that stock to a man of straw and leave other persons, who were induced to come in on the faith of his transaction, to meet the whole liability. I think there should be a limitation of transfer.

Mr. THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman will look at section 75—I think that meets the case.

Mr. MULOCK. That only deals with the transfer of stock on which there is no arrears.

Mr. THOMPSON. But suppose an individual takes 50 shares in a railway company, on which there is a call of 80 per cent., the rest may never be called up, and would the hon. gentleman make these shares never transferable?

Mr. MULOCK. No; you must not quarrel with me, but with Parliament that has laid down the principle under the Joint Stock Companies' Act. It is one thing for them to be in arrears, that is, to be overdue, and it is another thing to have liability that has not been called up at all. Now, the Joint Stock Companies' Act provides that a shareholder cannot rid himself of his contingent liability, however remote it may be, except with the consent of the directors, and the directorate must not give that consent. I ask that the same safeguard be put in here for the protection of the honest shareholder.

Mr. THOMPSON. Very well, we will let that stand for the present.

Mr. TISDALE. I do not think we need to waste any sympathies over the railway companies. I think the shareholders are in much more danger of being induced to take stock than are the railway companies to suffer. I think any gentleman who has any knowledge of the way railway companies are organised in this country, knows that there is much more danger of the shareholder being victimised, than of the company being imposed upon by allowing the shareholder freely to transfer his share. The Joint Stock Companies' Act, and the subjects it covers, are entirely different matters from railway companies. I think the hon. gentleman's grievance is entirely theoretical. It would certainly be a very inconvenient law to limit the transfer of shares. The ordinary law is that you must pay your calls in order that a company may go into effect. Now, the Joint Stock Companies' Act deals with a different class of subjects, small companies of all sorts, engaged in mercantile transactions, where business men carry on business for themselves. When railway companies are organised the general public are invited to subscribe, and they do subscribe, and they cannot transfer their shares unless they pay calls. You subscribe to stock, and the law says that if the company impose a call, that shall be paid, otherwise the shares are free to be transferred. I think it would be a great mistake in the interests of the construction of railways, and it would rather be putting the boot on the wrong leg, to give railway companies more power over people subscribing stock than they have now.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not seeking to protect railway companies particularly, but to prevent injustice. We are now on the eve of a great boom in railway building, particularly of short lines in the North-West, and these railways incur liabilities particularly to creditors, and the provision I suggest would be, in the first instance, in the protection of creditors. We have no right to allow partners to escape their liability. These shareholders are limited partners by virtue of the Act, and the general law of partnership applies, that partners are liable to pay the creditors of the concern. In this case they are only liable to the extent of their shares. They undertake to pay at some time or other a certain sum of money. The shareholders may not choose to make calls, there may be arrears in regard to the liability, but the liabilities exist, and if unpaid the creditors can proceed against the shareholders and recover payment. To allow solvent shareholders to transfer stock and escape liability renders it possible to commit a fraud upon creditors. Then again it would leave shareholders, who perhaps did not have the consent of the directors, liable to pay in full, whereas other shareholders might be allowed to escape. I think it is proper that such a provision as I have suggested should be introduced.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). If you put such a clause in the Act you will very soon have very few stockholders.

On section 75,

Mr. LANGEIER (Quebec). This section should be struck out, as it is infringing on the powers of the Local Legislatures. We have no right to determine what is personal and what is real estate; that is a question of property and civil rights.

Mr. THOMPSON. All property and civil rights in railways are under our control. As regards railways, we have a right to legislate over property and civil rights, as being within our jurisdiction and not within the jurisdiction of any other Legislature. We can absolutely forfeit or do anything we please with railways under our control, and it is only as to them this Act applies.

Mr. LANGEIER (Quebec). This section has nothing to do with the railway itself. It is more than doubtful if we have the right to determine that certain property with which we have power to deal is real or personal property. It is of great consequence, not at this moment perhaps, because I think the law is the same in all the Provinces of the Dominion. We have in the civil code of Quebec a declaration that shares in railways are personal property; but supposing the Legislature of Quebec thought proper to change that, I think it would apply to railways as well as to anything else. This question is of great consequence, on account of the law concerning marriage settlement. Under our law there is a community of property between the parties, and in that community is included every kind of personal property. It would raise a very serious question, supposing the Legislature of Quebec should make a law declaring that railway shares are real property.

Mr. THOMPSON. I admit, of course, that we should not interfere with the rights of property unnecessarily, but it must be remembered that all the other seventy-two sections have dealt with the question of property and civil rights. If we hesitate as to our power on that subject we surely must reconsider our position as to the transfer of shares and the declaration of dividends, and everything of the kind. But the hon. gentleman will see the consequences that will ensue. If the doctrine can be sustained that it is only for the Provincial Legislatures to say whether these shares are real or personal property, this result would follow, that the Provincial Legislature might declare them to be real estate, or interest in real estate, and then they would not be transmissible in the way prescribed, and every provision of the Bill as to the rights of shareholders would have to be altered. It is inevitable that the power must rest entirely here, and we should deal with railway shares as being personal property.

Mr. LANGEIER (Quebec). I do not dispute that question of civil rights necessarily incident to railways can be dealt with by this Legislature. I do not, however, see the bearing of this determination of the nature of railway property as regards the building of a railway. What necessity is there, when we are legislating on railways, to say what the nature of railway property shall be?

Mr. THOMPSON. It seems to me most material to the construction and working of a railway that the interests of the shareholders shall be personal property, and that only. If we are to treat them as owners of interest in real estate, they may at any moment interfere with the operation of the railway, and claim a division of the property, and their shares would be transmissible to their heirs, and a new set of shareholders would come in in that way. It is vitally connected with the exercise of the necessary control over the companies which are authorised to construct railways under our control. I would be sorry to be disposed to interfere unduly, but it seems to me to be necessary.

Mr. LANGEIER (Quebec). I will point out the difficulty which this may bring about. It is this: Personal property is a word used in English law, but we have not that word in our Quebec law. If you state that railway property will be personal property, it will raise a difficulty in our Province, where the law is not the same as in the other Provinces.

Mr. THOMPSON. I now see the particular point of the hon. gentleman's objection. It may need another word added to describe the kind of personal property it would be in the Province of Quebec; and I will therefore let the section stand, with that view.

On section 83,

Mr. TISDALE. I see that that clause is changed materially, although it does not show it in the printing. There is a portion of the old clause left out, as regarding the power to sell shares, which may affect railway companies already incorporated. It is a question whether those powers should be taken from the companies that are already organised. Some of those companies from time to time do sell shares that are not altogether paid up. I think the Canada Southern, and the Grand Trunk, and possibly the Canadian Pacific Railway, have a large amount of capital stock yet unsubscribed, and under the former Railway law they would have a perfect right to sell this, while according to the present Bill they would be deprived of that right. Formerly this unsubscribed stock could be sold, or they could make loans for it. On ordinary small railways it would not matter very much; still I would like to know if there is any objection to that power being retained. It would seem to me that there is an objection to its not being retained in the case of companies now incorporated, and I should think we ought to be careful how we should deprive them of rights they have had up to this time.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not see what is the use of retaining that provision.

Mr. TISDALE. Formerly they could sell or pledge the stock.

Mr. EDGAR. Not unless it is subscribed.

Mr. TISDALE. Yes, they could get subscriptions for it. It struck me it must have been put in the Railway Act for some object, and I think we should be careful in making such a radical change.

Mr. EDGAR. I think it is far better the way it is in the Bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think the view of the Minister of Railways was that it was too large a power to give to directors, to sell or pledge unsubscribed stock.

Mr. TISDALE. I have not heard that any railway companies object to this provision, but I know that in times past some of them have used that power to raise money. We know the Grand Trunk at one time sold several millions of that sort of stock, and, by what the hon. gentleman opposite says, I think the committee have hardly got the correct idea about the matter. There is a very material difference between people buying at 20 cents on the dollar, and subscribing so that they will have to pay 100 cents on the dollar. I might be willing to buy $10,000 and to pay $1,000, but I would not want to pay $10,000 and be liable to be assessed for a hundred, when it is only worth 10 cents. As you will see by the stock quotations, the companies deal in this by millions. I remember well when Parliament authorised the Grand Trunk to enlarge their capital stock, and they sold it at 10 cents on the dollar and realised a great deal of money, because it tempted people to buy it in the hope that it would be worth something. Though this was a very large power under the general Railway Act, we should be careful that we do not put ourselves in the position of legislating away companies' rights.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is not my hon. friend fighting a phantasm. I do not think the illustration he has given occurs at all in relation to this particular section. The section says:

"The directors may sell, either by public auction or private sale, and in such manner and on such terms as to them seem meet, any shares so declared to be forfeited, or may pledge such forfeited shares for the payment of loans or advances made or to be made thereon, or for the payment of"—

That is, only shares subscribed.

Mr. THOMPSON. What he complains of is that the provisions of the late law are left out, which enables the sale of unsubscribed stock by the directors.

Mr. TISDALE. After the word "forfeit" is left out several words, "Any shares remaining unsubscribed of the capital of the company and they shall be allowed to pledge for loans of money." That is a serious change and might affect some rights of those companies very largely.

Mr. HALL. I think it ought to be left out so far as general powers are concerned. The illustration the hon. gentleman gave of the Grand Trunk was by special legislation and under special circumstances. We can always give that power under similar special circumstances. I think the power is wisely left out of this Bill, of giving the company permission to sell their stock at less than its par value.

Mr. TISDALE. I do not think the special legislation the hon. gentleman referred to went so far. The special legislation authorised the company to increase their capital, and I think they sold it under this power of the general Railway Act.

Mr. HALL. They ought to have had special legislation for both.

Mr. THOMPSON. It does seem to me that power like that should be specially given. Those special powers are often overlooked by people who become shareholders. It is unsafe to entrust power like that to every class of directors.

Mr. TISDALE.

On clause 86,

Mr. MULOCK. I would point out that if you allow a shareholder to transfer his stock, on which there are no arrears, and on which he is liable to creditors, you allow him to escape from the provisions of that Act. The shareholder who is liable at the time ceases to be liable if you allow him to transfer. Section 86, pretending to give security to the creditor, can be defeated under the provisions of a prior section.

On section 88,

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think you should have added the words, "Which shall be open to the inspection of shareholders."

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, I think that might be done.

On section 89,

Mr. THOMPSON. The Act at present provides that 10 per cent. of the capital stock must be expended on the construction of the railway within three years. It is proposed by this Bill to change the amount to 25 per cent. and to reduce the time to two years.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does that affect any special charter already granted?

Mr. THOMPSON. No.

Mr. EDGAR. It seems to me that this is rather hard, because a large amount raised from bonds or otherwise may be expended, although 25 per cent. of the capital stock may not be expended within two years, and if not the powers of the company cease. I think if this were put into effect it would cause the forfeiture of almost every charter, because the system is to do the work by Government subsidy and the issue of bonds, and it is very seldom that 25 per cent. of the stock is expended in ten years, much less in two years. I think 10 per cent. would probably be enough.

Mr. THOMPSON. Ten per cent. would probably be too low. We might make it 15 per cent. instead of 25.

Mr. MULOCK. Would it not be better to make this a percentage of the cash paid, because capital stock embraces a great deal that is given away for nothing.

Mr. THOMPSON. If you said the cash, that would mean nothing at all.

Mr. MULOCK. Suppose a company had $1,000,000 capital stock, and gave away $800,000 of it; there would only be $200,000 which represented cash.

Mr. THOMPSON. We should make it so that it is impossible to give away that much stock.

Mr. MULOCK. Every special Act allows stock to be given away in that way.

Mr. THOMPSON. It would be subject to this provision, which would make that unworkable.

Mr. EDGAR. As I understand, this provision will only apply to cases where there is no time limit fixed by a special Act?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

On section 90, sub-section d,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Suppose a railway company was desirous of crossing an Indian reserve, which is not held in fee simple, but in common, how would it obtain the power?

Mr. THOMPSON. The title could be given with the assent of the Crown,

On sub-section e,

Mr. EDGAR. Surely this section, which permits a company to remove trees which stand within six rods from either side of the railway, or which are liable to fall across the railway track, cannot be intended to apply to the open country, because it would include trees in a man's orchard.

Mr. THOMPSON. If they fell on the track.

Mr. EDGAR. It includes all trees. If you strike out the word "or" it will be all right.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I think there ought to be some provision that if the timber that is felled by the railway company is converted to their use, they ought to pay for it.

Mr. TISDALE. That is covered further on.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I hope it is, because the companies take timber and convert it into bridges, and refuse to pay the proprietors.

Mr. MITCHELL. There may be hardships about that. I have heard of a railway company going through a country and taking trees which were nothing but rampikes only about the size of a man's leg, and the owner made a claim on the company for using some of these rampikes for ties. We know that if certain obligations are placed on the railways they may be taken advantage of by some of these proprietors.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. MITCHELL. There was a claim once put in for something of that kind—but I will spare the hon. gentleman's blushes, and not go on.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I confess I have not heard anything from the hon. gentleman that removes the objection against placing the railway companies in any different position from that which they will occupy under the amendment I suggest. I do not know to whom the hon. gentleman refers. He should have told the committee when he went so far as he did.

Mr. MITCHELL. I shall certainly do so if you wish.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). But no matter whether those trees to which he refers were, in his opinion, of little value or not, they were the property of somebody else, and they should not have been converted by the company to their own use without compensating the proprietor. However, I am not speaking with regard to this particular subject, because I do not think it should have been alluded to by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), but I say that when trees are removed from the vicinity of a railway by the railway company and used in the construction of the railway, or for any other purpose, the value of those trees should be paid to the adjoining proprietor.

On sub-section g,

Mr. INNES. I would like to call the attention of the House to the large powers this section gives a railway company in respect of the closing up of roads, or making permanent embankments. You will notice by this section that it gives the company the power to make an embankment, and to close up a road or a road allowance. Of course section 91 provides that the company shall leave the road as nearly as possible as it was before, but we know well that in many cases railway companies exercise rather arbitrary powers in that respect. Section 92 provides for compensation, but in the case of municipalities it is very difficult indeed to assess the damages, because no individual is concerned. I think the section should be modified so as to be as much as possible in the interest of municipalities. There is a case in point in the corporation of Guelph, of which the hon. member for Renfrew knows. When the Grand Trunk was constructed, a good many years ago, they made a large embankment of 20 feet across the road allowance, and that road has never been made, and the company has never made an under-crossing. The matter is now in litigation. It is just possible, according to the terms of the clause, that the Railway Committee may make the under-crossing, but it provides here for inclined planes, and these may be of such a nature as to render the crossing in a sense useless or impassable. I think the clause should be modified in some way so as to conserve the rights of the municipality as much as possible, and to provide that these crossings shall be of such a nature that they will be useful. It should also provide for proper compensation to municipalities.

The Committee reported.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee on the Bill. On section 90, sub-section g,

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. member who called attention to the necessity for making a provision in favor of municipalities as regards the interference with embankments, aqueducts and bridges, will, I believe, acquiesce in the view that the company should have these powers. I have made a note of his suggestion that the municipality should have such protection, but in the meantime there can be no objection to this clause passing.

Mr. INNES. Do you mean both with regard to the proper crossing and with regard to the compensation?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. EDGAR. In this clause, the word "permanent" is quite new. I fancy it is taken from the English Act, but that makes a serious difference in the law as it has existed hitherto, because this gives power to the railway company to construct a permanent embankment across a roadway. That is entirely unusual, under our practice.

Mr. THOMPSON. As we go on, the hon. gentleman will find that there is a provision that, if the level of the highway is to be altered, the consent of the municipality has to be obtained, and if that consent cannot be obtained, it goes to the Railway Committee.

Mr. INNES. I think it is left altogether to the Railway Committee, and the power is taken out of the hands of the municipality.

Mr. EDGAR. That is in regard to running along a highway. I would like to ask if it is proposed to allow a railway company to obstruct a navigable stream?

Mr. THOMPSON. They cannot obstruct any navigable streams without the approval of the Governor in Council, under the Acts respecting the navigation of rivers.

Mr. EDGAR. Should not the power given under sub-section h be subject to the approval of the Railway Committee?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think the hon. gentleman will find that it is so.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to ask whether, under this clause, a railway is entitled to make all these obstructions in any direction without coming under the subsequent sections? Apparently, in regard to the permanent location of the road, its profile and alignment, the Railway Committee has control, but I think that in regard to these temporary proceedings they ought to have some control also.

Mr. HALL. I think some power should be given to a railway company in regard to highways. There is sufficient provision for Government control under sections 183, 184 and 185 of the general Act.

Mr. EDGAR. That is in regard to permanent construction, but this is only temporary.

Mr. LAURIER. These permanent powers taken under sub-section h, seem to be in conflict with clause 91, because the latter reads:

"The company shall restore (as nearly as possible) to its former state, any river, stream, water-course, high way."

Now, sub-section h, on which we are now, contemplates that the company shall have power to alter. I suppose the word "permanently" has been added since. It could not have been the original intention.

Mr. THOMPSON. A highway, for instance, is to be restored as nearly as possible to its former state. It cannot be restored to its former place if it has been diverted.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes, but if the alteration is to be made permanent how can it be restored to its former condition?

Mr. THOMPSON. The highway can be completed as well as it was before, or as nearly as possible.

Mr. LAURIER. The section now reads:

"Divert or alter, temporarily as well as permanently, the course of any such river, stream, water-course or highway."

Then clause 91 says:

"The company shall restore (as nearly as possible) to its former state, any river,"

And so on. Does not the hon. gentleman see a contradiction?

Mr. THOMPSON. It would be so, excepting for the words "as nearly as possible." I think that is about as closely as we can get for a provision of that kind.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think it is doubtful whether we can give such power. Of course they can do so in the English Parliament, because there is no other body having jurisdiction, but here there are Local Legislatures under which all the property of the country is situated, and while we are authorised to incorporate a railway company, we cannot insist upon giving to that company any other powers than those which are necessary to its existence. We cannot do what we might do, if property and civil rights were under our jurisdiction. If a Province were to say, for instance, that a railway should grade the track in a particular way, that would apply to railways of the Dominion, or it might apply just as well to railways of the Province. If a railway of the Province could exist when such powers are being exercised, so could a Dominion railway, and we could not protect the Dominion railway against the public policy of a Province.

Mr. THOMPSON. We cannot legislate on the subject of railways at all, if the hon. member's views are correct. We cannot invade the rights of property by allowing a company to take any lands, and if we cannot give them the right over land, the railway cannot be built.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). My statement is, and it is in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, that if you have power to create a railway corporation, you have power to confer upon it all powers that are necessary to the existence of that corporation.

Mr. THOMPSON. And to enable it to carry out its undertaking.

Mr. EDGAR.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But cannot go beyond that. Suppose you were to authorise a railway company to build a road, and they located along some river or water-way which would seriously interfere with the drainage of a large section of the country. I say you could not do that. That is my contention; and you could no more do that than a Local Legislature could deny you the right to create a railway corporation. Property and civil rights being vested in the Local Legislature, of course, do not deprive this Parliament from creating a corporation where such corporation comes within the exceptions in the 92nd section of the British North America Act. But surely you cannot give a railway corporation powers beyond that. For instance, you could not say that a railway corporation shall not drain its lands in the same way as any other portion of the municipality affecting the public health; you could not say that if a railway corporation were to create a particular nuisance, you had the right to say, by legislation here, that it should not be called upon to drain those lands in some other way. That is under the jurisdiction of another body, and they have just the same right to legislate with regard to the conduct of the company created by this Legislature as they have with regard to the conduct of any citizen within the Province.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am afraid we cannot convince each other on these doctrines.

On section 101,

Mr. EDGAR. Do they decide who shall receive the compensation?

Mr. THOMPSON. In connection with the preceding clause I suppose it would be all right. It is just adopting the words of the Act amending the Indian Act of last Session.

On section 130,

Mr. LANGEIER (Quebec). I would suggest the propriety of changing this provision, which requires the map and the book of reference to be deposited in the office of the Clerk of the Peace, and make it the office of the Registrar, which is much more accessible to the general public, I think, in all the Provinces.

Mr. EDGAR. Besides, the Clerk of the Peace has no vault or safe place for keeping these plans, which are valuable and should be preserved for future reference. But the registry offices always have vaults.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, I think it should be the registry office.

On section 150,

Mr. LAURIER. This section provides that if the opposite party neglects to give notice to the company that he accepts the sum offered by it, or does not give the name of the person whom he appoints as arbitrator, the judge shall on the application of the company, appoint a person to be sole arbitrator. This seems to me to be rather arbitrary, as it would put the proprietor in that case altogether at the mercy of the sole arbitrator.

Mr. THOMPSON. We will let that stand.

On section 159,

Mr. LAURIER. This clause provides that the arbitrator may be a person professionally employed by either party. Is not that contrary to the general principle, that no one should be arbitrator who is interested in the suit or has expressed an opinion on it.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is the same as the law at present, and was really made in the interest of the property owner. The fact is that property owners, in nine cases out of ten, select some personal or professional friend as their arbitrator, but who is really an advocate, and the party on the other side does the same; then a third party, if they do not agree, is appointed to judge between the two.

Mr. EDGAR. The practical result of this is, as I know from professional experience, that the Railway Company employs one man who is a skilled surveyor as their arbitrator, and he, understanding the case, does not call in the number of witnesses that one not cognizant of the facts would. The other side selects their arbitrator on the same principle, and thus a great saving is made in the expenditure which would be entailed by calling in a large number of witnesses. Then, if these two disagree, they call in a third party.

Mr. THOMPSON. It looks unsound in principle, but it works really well after all.

On section 164,

Mr. THOMPSON. This section changes the percentage from double the amount mentioned under the notice served under section 146, to 25 per cent.

Mr. WELDON. On a small amount of land, 25 per cent. would be very little.

Mr. LANGEЛИER (Quebec). Better leave the law as it is.

Mr. THOMPSON. Well, we will say 50 per cent.

On section 169,

Mr. LANGEЛИER (Quebec). I would call the attention of the Minister of Justice to one great inconvenience which has arisen under the old clause. Our judges have decided in several cases, that no compensation can be awarded for witnesses, because, as they said, the witnesses must appear voluntarily. I have known cases where the parties have succeeded as against the railway company, but had to pay hundreds of dollars for witnesses, because the judges held that the witnesses appeared voluntarily, and that, therefore, the allowance to them could not be taxed. I think there should be some provision that the party that loses should pay the witnesses. Of course I am speaking of the law in the Province of Quebec, which is exactly the same as this clause, and it is under that that the judges have taken this position. I know, in my own practice, that a client of mine had to pay $250 for witnesses, though he won his case.

Mr. THOMPSON. We will insert the words "including a proper allowance to witnesses."

On section 173,

Mr. LANGEЛИER (Quebec). That does not state how long notice shall be given before the application.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think the General Manager should be inserted, as well as the other officers.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, we will insert that, and make the notice ten days.

Mr. EDGAR. Why is the last part of the old clause left out?

Mr. THOMPSON. That is provided for in section 176.

On section 175,

Mr. THOMPSON. This is intended to enable the Railway Committee to provide for the safety of trains passing over crossings in regard to which the Railway Committee are authorized to provide for the intersection. At present, the Railway Committee have only the power to approve or disapprove of the crossing, and sometimes, when the Committee ask that certain precautions shall be taken in regard to the crossing, they are told that they have no jurisdiction, and they can only get the control by refusing to agree to allow the crossing until the parties are willing to adopt the precautions. That is very inconvenient, and, therefore, this provision is made.

Mr. EDGAR. Does that arise in reference to the difference between the Grand Trunk and the Ontario and Quebec Railways.

Mr. THOMPSON. No, I think not. I did not hear that fully, but I have seen cases where this difficulty has arisen.

On section 176,

Mr. SHANLY. As this clause is somewhat cognate to sections 11 and 102, which have been allowed to stand, and as this section is a new one, I hope the Minister will allow it also to stand.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will agree to allow it to stand, as it is cognate to other clauses which are standing, but it is not new. It is simply a recasting of sub-section 13 of section 6.

Mr. SHANLY. In the expropriation of one company's property by another, that has not hitherto been the law. It is provided for in section 102, which has been allowed to stand, and therefore I ask that this should be allowed to stand also.

On section 177,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I cannot help thinking that this is an objectionable section, and that it is in all probability, beyond our jurisdiction. This section undertakes to control all crossings of railways, whether these are incorporated by the Provincial Legislatures or by the Parliament of Canada. Now, while we have a right to control corporations constituted by the Parliament of Canada, I do not think we have any authority to exercise jurisdiction over other corporations that have an equal right to existence, and an equal right to be protected against regulations and interference by a body that did not create them. Certainly the power to regulate or control implies the power to destroy, and the Bill here might establish regulations that would be so vexatious or so burdensome as completely to destroy the profitable character of roads that were incorporated by the Provinces; in fact they might make such regulations as would induce every railway corporation to seek to become a corporation of the Dominion, rather than of any one of the Provinces. I was not in the House during the Session that the Minister of Finance (I think it was) passed the Bill that usurped control over nearly all the railways of this country. This is the first time the subject has come up since that period, and I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment to the provisions of the British North America Act upon this subject.

Mr. THOMPSON. Will the hon. gentleman allow it to stand for the present? We can discuss it more fully hereafter.

On section 183,

Mr. EDGAR. With reference to that clause, a very radical change is made in it. The old law provided that whenever a railway was carried along an existing highway, as distinguished from crossing it, the consent of the proper municipal or local authority thereof should be first obtained. I do not think the Railway Committee of the Privy Council should be substituted for that local authority.

What means can they possibly have for knowing about the local interests affected by running railways along highways in every municipality where they may be constructed? It is not one of the class of cases that I think it is at all proper for the Railway Committee to undertake, and it is one that the municipalities have been accustomed to deal with.

Mr. THOMPSON. We will let that stand.

Mr. O'BRIEN. This subject is worthy of a good deal of consideration, and I think the time has come when the people of this country ought to have more protection against railways than they now have. It will be utterly impossible for the Railway Committee to deal with the various cases which will require to be adjudicated upon. There seems to be a conflict between this clause and the 187th clause. This clause says:

"A railway shall not be carried along an existing line of highway."

But shall merely cross it. Clause 187 says:

"Whenever any portion of a railway is constructed, or authorised to be constructed, upon, or along, or across any street, or other public highway."

Clause 183 makes no provision whatever for any restriction being put upon railways as to the manner in which they shall cross highways. Then clause 187 provides, as I understand it, that no railway shall be constructed along or across any street or public highway at the railway level, without previously obtaining the consent of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. Well, that that would be all right if it was practicable, but how in the world can the Privy Council undertake to deal with the numberless cases throughout the Dominion where protection is required for the public? I am sure every member of this House must have within his own knowledge a number of cases where life and property are in danger every day in the week by railway crossings. I know one case of a crossing on the Northern railway, which is practically within the yard of the Northern railway, where there is not a day that life is not in danger. It may be said that this is the business of the municipality, but the municipalities have never yet, in any case that I am aware of, taken the matter up, and it is very certain that the Railway Committee cannot act, because the labor imposed upon them would be interminable. There should be some speedy and expeditious way of having these questions properly adjudicated, so that a railway shall not be permitted to cross a highway in a manner dangerous to life or property. Now, such a state of things as exists in the case I alluded to, and in several other cases within my knowledge, would not be tolerated in any other country. Any one who has travelled in England knows that, even upon branch lines upon which there is the least traffic, either by road or by railway, such a thing as a level crossing without some protection to the public is not permitted under any circumstances. But here we allow railways with long trains to go back and forward over crossings without affording any protection whatever, and the public have just to take their chance. The only protection they have is the privilege that, if a man is injured, he can bring suit against the company for damage, but that is a very poor compensation for the loss of life. I think the Government ought to deal with that class of cases. It has been supposed hitherto that it was so important to get railways built, that we should not interfere with their freedom of action in such matters, and that it was better to run a certain amount of risk than to put railways to the immense expense which they must incur if they provide proper protection. I do not think this 187th clause can be acted upon. I should like to know how, in cases such as I alluded to, and such as must be within the knowledge of this House, how it is possible that a Railway Committee of the Privy Council can give us redress? It is one of those cases in which, it being nobody's business to act, and in which a remedy cannot be obtained without a great deal of expense, nobody undertakes it, so that we go on from year to year with an increased traffic, and the railways furnish no protection to life and property. I do think it is something that ought not to be tolerated any longer, and it is not tolerated in any other country in the civilised world.

Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. EDGAR. I think that we should get section 183 amended as suggested. We want more protection to the public against railways. The whole of the plans and profile of the railway must be first submitted for the approval of the Railway Committee, before they can do anything. That is the safeguard, and it is a check on the companies. I propose that we should go back to the old provision that a railway shall not be carried alongside a road unless leave is obtained from the municipal or local authority.

Mr. HALL. It is idle to compare the condition of affairs in this country with that in England. It is said that there is no country where this state of things exists except Canada; in the United States level crossings are the rule, rather than the exception. It is idle to expect that we can have overhead and under-crossings; we are obliged to have level crossings in nine cases out of ten. The provision inserted is a very wise one. It would be unwise to go back and give power to municipalities to dictate as to how crossings shall be made. We might just as well tell individuals that they need not give up their lands to railways unless they are compensated according to the terms they choose to ask. Municipalities would impose crossings on railway companies which they could not comply with. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council will safely guard the public interests, and it is a better tribunal resort than the one existing under which railway construction was first commenced in this country. The change is a wise one and it is in the general interests of the people.

Mr. O'BRIEN. No one has interfered, and the evil still exists. I do not say that we can get under or overhead crossings at every concession line; but some authority should have interfered in this matter long ago. Under this Bill there is no interference, for it will be impossible for the Privy Council to take up all these cases. How are the people going to travel from remote parts, even of Ontario, to Ottawa, to see the Privy Council, in such a case as I have in mind this moment? I am not, I repeat, proposing that the company shall be obliged to make crossings at every concessional line, but there are a number of cases where gates should be erected.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a point as to which I can confirm the statements made by the hon. gentleman who has last spoken. I recollect extremely well that in Kingston, within two or three miles, eleven or twelve deaths occurred from the dangerous state in which railway crossings were left for many years. It was only after an enormous number of remonstrances and delegations had been sent to Ottawa, at very considerable expense, that the Railway Committee were at last, I believe, induced to take action. I doubt whether even at this moment the several crossings to which I allude have been put in proper shape. I dare say the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly) will recollect the rather notorious crossing at Collins' Bay, where as many as ten lives were lost in the last twelve or fourteen years, and other crossings in the same vicinity where also lives were lost, and the crossing at Cataraqui Road going out of Kingston. The appeal to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council is a very tedious, expensive, and unsatisfactory proceeding. Very often the Ministers are away, very often it is difficult to obtain appointments at convenient times for delegations, and bringing people to Ottawa from a great distance necessarily involves a heavy expense. I should like to hear the opinion of the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly). I know, as a matter of fact, not mere cases of inconvenience, but cases of very serious risk to lives of all persons who cross the railway track to occur, and if any means can be devised for giving some remedy, it is exceedingly desirable it should be done, even if we have to arm the judges of the land with some discretionary power to deal with the evil.

Mr. SHANLY. I quite remember the crossings to which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has referred. They were peculiarly dangerous; but I do not suppose that he, any more than the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), intends to propose that all level crossings shall be done away with, because, in this country, it would be utterly impossible to provide overhead or under-crossings. But, at the two places referred to by the hon. member for South Oxford, the crossings were peculiarly dangerous from the short turn in the road. In cases of that kind I think it should be insisted on that overhead crossings be constructed. I rather think in one of those cases, that of Cataqui Road, the danger has been removed lately, or, at least, it has been proposed to provide an overhead crossing. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) finds fault with the system of level crossings, especially in the vicinity of railway stations, but he does not tell us a remedy. If we do not refer the matter to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, it is not to be supposed that that body can take cognisance of these dangerous crossings; but, when reported to them, this would be done. The Railway Committee is the general court of appeal in these matters, and they could inspect crossings complained of through their officers. In the case of old-established crossings the municipalities might very fairly be asked to assist the railway companies in making the necessary improvements. Some of the earlier crossings were not dangerous until population increased and the roads were more used. Still I think the appeal is properly placed in the hands of the Privy Council, because they would have to deal, not only with cases of level crossings, but with regard to the other subjects covered by the clauses of this Bill in which they are made sole judges. In those instances the same objection might be taken, and it might be contended that some other authority should be established other than the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. I think the clause as it stands is fairly protective. The appeal, I repeat, should be in the hands of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. I do not think it is right or just that such matters should be left in the hands of municipalities, in regard to which I do not speak too harshly when I say that they are not, as a general rule, inclined to make very just arrangements.

Mr. COOK. In cities and towns I think gates might be erected at level crossings. We have an instance in Toronto in connection with Parkdale, where a great many accidents occurred. The Privy Council had been applied to frequently, but they would not move in the matter until, finally, there was an accident by which there was valuable life lost, and then the Privy Council gave the privilege to build the subway, and it was built. On King street there is a crossing for about eight tracks, and that has been in a disgraceful condition for a number of years. Accidents occur there frequently, and finally a fatal accident having occurred, the Privy Council insisted upon the railway authorities in the city building a subway there. The railways run through the town of Parkdale and in some places the crossings are very dangerous; one place particularly so, because of a curve in the road, and a high grade, where the trains come with great speed, and in this place, to my own knowledge, accidents have frequently occurred. In places like this the railway companies should be compelled to put up gates, and it would not be very expensive. I believe that the public should be protected a little more than they are, and I believe, with the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), that it is too expensive and too difficult to appeal to the Privy Council in such cases. It is too difficult to move the Privy Council when a railway company is concerned. Railways are great corporations, and they have very great influence. I do not care whether it is the hon. gentlemen who are occupying the Treasury benches to-day, or whether other gentlemen, are in power, but I know to my own knowledge that both sides are influenced largely by those corporations. Therefore, I think it would be in the interest, not alone of the Privy Council and of the members of the Privy Council, but of the country at large, that those influences should be removed, and that there should be a general Act by which the public would be fairly protected. The public of this country are not protected as they should be protected from those railway corporations, and I think it is about time that this House should study the public interest. I believe that the Privy Council would find it much to their advantage to see that the public are protected against those great railway corporations.

Mr. SHANLY. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken and with the hint which has fallen from my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), that in cities and towns there should be gates on the crossings. I am not so familiar with western Canada, but in Montreal it is never thought of having a level crossing without a gate. If they have none in Toronto, I can say that at the Parkdale crossing they have done a great deal better, they have made an excellent under-crossing, in that instance, when the municipality had come to the aid of the railways.

Mr. O'BRIEN. How long did it take to get that done?

Mr. SHANLY. I do not know that, but it ought to be remembered that when those roads were first constructed they were scarcely dangerous at all, and that they only become more dangerous as the population increases. That is the case with the Parkdale crossing, and as I was the first person that constructed it I ought to know something about it. When it came to be a great thoroughfare, and instead of being as formerly, a country crossing, it was actually in the city, the necessity came for giving increased protection. I remember the case, for I was applied to by some Toronto people for my opinion. As well as I remember, the Privy Council took notice of it. They had a meeting with the railway authorities, who divided the expense and made an excellent safe crossing, better than gates could be. I know that the King street crossing is a dangerous one, and I know that it is in contemplation now to do something the same with it as was done in the case of the Parkdale crossing.

Mr. COOK. Oh, yes; it is under way now.

Mr. SHANLY. From having been a crossing in the open common it became a crossing in the middle of the city. I am still of the opinion that the Privy Council is the proper court of appeal in those matters.

Mr. DESJARDINS. The hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly) has alluded to Montreal, and says that all the railway crossings in the streets are provided with gates. He does not know perhaps that outside the limits of the city proper, there are densely populated localities where the railways cross numerous streets, and where there are no gates to provide for the security of the people. He knows probably that every year we have to deplore the loss of many lives on account of the want of proper cautions on the part of the railway companies. I think it would be better if we had a clause in the Act which would immediately provide, instead of leaving it to the Railway Committee, that wherever a railway line goes across a densely populated town or district, the law would compel the company to build gates immediately and provide necessary safeguards against accidents. This would be moving in the direction that my friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) had indicated. Take, for instance, the town of St. Henri, in the western portion of Montreal city, which has 2,000 of a population. The inhabitants of that town have applied several times to the Grand Trunk for gates to be put on the streets where the railway line crosses, and they have also applied here, but as yet there are no proper safeguards against accidents there. It is my opinion that the law should provide immediately that whenever a railway crosses the street of a town or a village where the population is dense that gates should be put there. If this were done those accidents which we deplore would be avoided, and it would meet the object which we have in view.

Mr. SHANLY. I quite agree with my hon. friend that some of the suburban towns around Montreal have become, to all intents and purposes, cities. I am entirely in favor of having gates or safeguards being used where there is a large population; and not only am I in favor of it, but I would make it imperative that gates and keepers should be provided for those crossings.

Mr. DENISON. In Toronto the citizens have complained for a great many years of these level crossings not being protected. There are a great many level crossings in Toronto, and I know of only two instances in which there are gates. If anything can be done in this Railway Bill to protect the citizens of towns where there are large populations, I think it should be done.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My attention has been called over and over again to the very great indifference of the railway corporations, one and all, to the destruction of human life. The fact appears to be that when accidents to life happen the survivors are ready enough to bring claims against the railway companies for compensation; and, generally speaking, the railway companies, to do them justice, are willing to consider those claims and make settlements; but it is nobody's business to take steps to prevent the recurrence of such accidents, and the consequence is that year after year a succession of fatal accidents occur at particular crossings. Now, if this matter is going to be left to the discretion of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, it appears to me that the Railway Department should also be called on to investigate every case of death which takes place at a crossing. That might well be made a part of the functions of that department; and in such cases, it should be the duty of the Government, as the natural protectors of the lives of the people of this country, to see that effective steps are taken as far as possible to prevent the recurrence of similar disasters. There is no use in leaving the matter to private parties, because they will not exert themselves further than to obtain compensation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I quite agree with the observations of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). If this Bill does not provide, it ought to provide, that in every case of death caused by a railway, the Government ought to make an investigation.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Why wait for death?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Or in any serious accident to the person; for these accidents almost invariably result in death. I think the Railway Committee should investigate such cases and have a report, because that is the first necessary step towards taking such measures as will prevent the recurrence of such accidents, and the Railway Committee should be clothed with power, not only to make the investigation, but to apply the remedy.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am quite prepared to endorse what the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has said on this question. In my own riding there are many places where there is very great risk of the loss of life almost every day, not only from crossings, but from trains running close to roadways. If the municipalities are not given power to do something in the way of insisting on railways putting up high fences so as to prevent teams being frightened, and caused to run into ditches or against fences, and upsetting the vehicle to which they are attached, these accidents will undoubtedly continue to happen. In some cases the railway companies have put up snow fences, and have carried them close to the crossing, so that a person driving cannot see a train coming until he is right upon the crossing. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to advocate changes for the protection of cities, but my hon. friend from Muskoka and myself are here to advocate such changes as are necessary for the protection of life in the country districts as well. I hold that the municipalities should not be prevented from compelling a company to erect fences along the line where it runs beside a public road. If the matter were left to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, as the hon. Minister of Finance suggests, and if every constituency were compelled to bring before them the same number of accidents that happen in my constituency, they would not be able to investigate all the cases that would come before them. I quite agree with what the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly) says about level crossings. It is impossible at present to do without them in Canada, but I think that any hindrances, such as fences and shrubbery, should be removed, and I think the municipalities should have power to enforce their removal; and where the railway companies erect snow fences in winter close up to the crossings, they ought at least to be taken down during the summer. If the public have to come before the Privy Council with all such complaints, when there are perhaps forty or fifty crossings in each county, it would be quite impossible for the Privy Council to deal with all these cases. I do not see that a better arrangement could be made than to allow the municipalities to stipulate what protection should be afforded in the interest of the travelling public.

Mr. DESJARDINS.

Mr. SHANLY. Will you guarantee the municipal councils being reasonable?

Mr. McMULLEN. I quite admit that in some cases they might be unreasonable. At the same time, there should be something done to protect the public from these accidents which are continually happening, and which will continue to happen unless some change is made.

Mr. BRIEN. In the town from which I come there is one of the worst crossings in Canada, where accidents are constantly happening. A year ago last winter a young man with a bobsleigh ran upon it, when a train came along, and he was thrown on one side and the bobsleigh on the other. The railway fences are built up close to the crossing, so that one is on the crossing before he can see the train coming. Last summer a poor unfortunate fellow, while attempting to drive across, had his horse killed and his own head taken off. Action was taken against the railway corporation, who were, of course, quite willing to settle. The law provides that trains must travel through the town only six miles an hour, but they almost invariably travel at a more rapid rate, especially in shunting. I think it would be in the interest of railway companies themselves if some provision were made by which the public could be protected. The corporation or city council have made application to the railway company two or three times to do so, year after year, and invariably there reply has been that if the corporation will pay the man, the company will furnish him. That is equivalent to treating the corporation with contempt, and I think that now is the proper time to adopt some provision by which the public would be protected.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think it was Sydney Smith who said that if a director were tied in front of every engine, accidents would be less likely to occur. Many members of this House visit my country place, and every time they do so they run very great risks, as there are three very dangerous crossings on the way. Only the other night, on my way home, I had to wait half an hour for an engine to pass up and down over the crossing on the Gatineau road. No serious accidents have as yet occurred, but no doubt if this thing continues, some very serious accident will some day occur. On the road to Aylmer we have two very bad crossings, and I quite agree with the hon. member for Muskoka that country people ought to be protected quite as well as the city people, and that railway companies should be bound to provide against serious accidents resulting from these unguarded crossings. I hope the Government will see its way to do this, because this is really an important matter.

Mr. SHANLY. Would you advocate that for every level crossing?

Mr. WRIGHT. I would, certainly, for every level crossing in the county of Ottawa.

Mr. THOMPSON. This is, no doubt, a very important portion of the Bill, and it is well it should receive the utmost attention, I am quite willing, in accordance with the request made, to allow the clause to stand over for future consideration; but I would ask the hon. members who have given this matter some attention this evening, to examine again the clause in connection with the existing practice and the difficulties which have arisen under that practice, and I think they will find that this section is a change in the direction of providing for the public safety. Whether it is adequate or not will remain to be considered, but it is, I think, a decided improvement in that direction. The discussion of this particular clause commenced by the suggestion that we were taking away the power of control from the municipalities, and that under the existing law there could be no crossing over a highway without the consent of the municipal authorities. In the first place, we must provide, as has been suggested by my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Shanly), for the arbitrary refusal of the municipality, because that is not provided for in the existing law; but, as regards the control of the municipality being sufficient for the purposes of public safety, hon. gentlemen will observe, on reflection, that it is under that system all the present difficulties and negligencies have occurred. While the law provides that there shall be an absolute veto in the hands of the municipal council, so little control has been exercised by the municipalities, that not only have the necessary safeguards never been taken, but that the matters in dispute have never been brought before the Railway Committee for adjudication. The present law works, as I understand it, practically in this way: No railway crossing on a level shall be made, and no railway shall run along the public highway without the consent of the municipal authorities. A railway is built with or without that consent. Generally speaking, no doubt, that consent has been obtained. Since I have been a member of the Railway Committee, in only one case, and that in the Province of Quebec, has a municipal authority objected to a crossing, and the matter had to come before the Railway Committee, and then the public interest was safeguarded to the fullest extent. In nearly all other cases, the consent has been given practically out of the general desire which municipal authorities have to give every facility to railway companies; and they pay but little regard to the chances of accidents, when those chances are balanced by the danger of the railway being diverted to some other locality. In other cases, the consent is taken for granted, and there is no control in such cases in the hands of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council at all, unless some other question arising, it becomes necessary for the company to get its crossing confirmed; and it is only after the railway has once been constructed with the consent of the municipality or that consent having been taken for granted, that by the occurrence of some circumstances such as conflicting interests, the matter comes before the Privy Council at all. Now the change we propose to make is this: We say that a railway cannot be built, even if the municipal authorities consent, across or along a public highway unless the approval of the Railway Committee is first obtained; so that it will not be a question of depending upon the municipal authority for the safeguard which they have never insisted on having down to the present time, but it will be a question of providing that a railway company shall not make the crossing until they come before the Railway Committee, where we will have an opportunity of hearing all the contentions made and when we will have the advice of our own engineer, and thus be able to see that the public interests are guarded. I do not think that the Railway Committee is so inaccessible or so expensive a tribunal in cases of this kind as the hon. member for Muskoka has suggested. I have sat upon it in two cases which were presented in relation to railway crossings, one being the case in Toronto, which the hon. member for Muskoka has mentioned. In that case, representations were made by the mayor on one side, and on the other side by the counsel for the railway company, and I do not think that any witnesses were examined. I do not think that the discussion occupied half an hour, and I am sure that the expenses incurred did not reach $40. In half an hour a decision was made that gates should be put upon the crossing, and I understand that that decision is being carried out. If it is not, under the provisions of this Bill, it can be very speedily enforced, because an order of the Railway Committee will be made a rule of court, and be made very compulsory by summary proceedings. Only one or two other cases have occurred in which the Railway Committee have been asked to intervene, either by the municipalities or any other person, as regards gates across highways, and in those cases the gates have been ordered to be put up; but, generally speaking, the difficulty has not been in consequence of the expense of the committee or the difficulty of getting it to meet, or the cost of its proceedings, because its proceedings are very inexpensive, but it is owing to the utter negligence of the municipal authorities, which are far more under the influence of the railway corporations than the Railway Committee can possibly be, in bringing that matter before that committee at all. In the first place we have to be careful that we do not give a control to the municipal authorities, which will be absolutely arbitrary, and, in the next place, we must provide that some better and more independent authority than the municipal shall have the regulation of the question before the crossing is made. However, I am at present willing to let the clause stand.

Mr. McMULLEN. I may say that it would be well to provide in this Bill that at all crossings in rural sections, railway companies should be required to protect the crossings by removing trees or shrubbery, or anything of that kind that is growing up upon their land, and that prevent people approaching the crossings from seeing the approach of an engine or train. I know of some sections where the railway companies have never tried to remove the shrubbery growing up on their land, and which becomes a complete hedge, hiding the place of the crossing, especially where there is a deep cut. If this Bill would provide that in rural districts the railway companies must remove such impediments to the view, a good reform would be effected. I think there should be some provision that the railway should be required to remove anything which tends to prevent a party travelling along the line of the railway from seeing the approach of the train. I know that trees or bush grow up, and the railway company should remove them, whether they are on their own property or even on private property, so that parties who are crossing the track should have an opportunity to see the train when it is approaching the crossing. I know of several cases in my own county where the shrubbery has grown to such an extent that it hides the train, and in several cases it has caused a loss of life.

On section 191,

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Am I to understand that the company is to be made liable only if it does not make provision for the passing of farmers' carts over the railway? Very frequently it is found better to make the crossing under the railway, but there seems to be no provision for that.

Mr. THOMPSON. We will insert the words which will make it read "under or over the same."

On section 193,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understand the object of this section is to have means adopted which are found necessary for the protection of trains crossing bridges. It is proposed to have the floor of the bridge so constructed and maintained as to be a closed floor instead of there being large open spaces, so that if a locomotive is derailed it cannot crush down between the sleepers. It is also proposed to have a V shaped block next to the rail in order to prevent cars striking against the bridge. It is a technical matter, and the importance of it will be seen by every one.

Mr. SHANLY. I quite agree that this is a technical matter and I think the sub-section had better be omitted. We are proposing to insert a specification in this section, but we may get a better system before long. It will be quite sufficient if it is provided that the trains shall not run on a bridge unless such bridge is approved by the Minister. The sub-section will simply complicate the matter and may lead to trouble.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite so. The sub-section is all right at this moment; but a better system might be discovered afterwards, and the plans might then be varied as improvements are made.

Mr. EDGAR. I suppose it is meant to be enforced against all railways after six months?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, it gives six months to enable the companies to conform to the provision.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have drawn the following clause to cover the point:

"No company shall run its trains on any bridge unless such bridge is constructed and maintained with the safeguards approved by the Minister. This section shall not apply to any bridge already constructed until six months after the bringing of this Act into force."

On section 194,

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Some further provisions should be made in regard to the fencing of railways. There is a provision already for fencing against adjoining proprietors, and section 196 provides certain penalties for neglect in such cases. In Ontario, municipalities have power to permit the running at large of cattle upon public highways. The railways are constructed in certain portions of my county without having any fences erected along the line for long distances and no cattle guards at the public highway crossing, and some of the municipalities where the road is not fenced have authorised a by-law permitting cattle to run at large on the highways. In many instances these cattle stray on the railway track and are killed, partly because of the non-fencing of the track and partly because of the non-construction of cattle-guards at the public highway crossings. I know that instances occurred in my county during last summer where a large number of cattle were killed belonging to people who could not afford the loss. When compensation was applied for the companies sheltered themselves behind the common law, which provides that as the cattle were on the railway line at the time they were killed the owners were not entitled to compensation. What I want to provide for, if it can be provided for, is to make some provision in cases where municipalities have passed by-laws permitting the run of cattle on the highways, that the railway companies shall be required to maintain their fences and cattle-guards, and if they do not do that they shall be liable to damage for cattle killed when they may have strayed on the track from the public highway.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. BARRON. The member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) anticipated me in the very point which I was about to raise. I have had some experience of this very matter in my riding, and at the present time I am asked to bring an action by people whose cattle have been killed by reason of escaping off land over which they had a right to be and to pasture under the by-law of the municipality allowing them to run at large. I rather fear that under the law as it is those people who have lost their cattle will have no remedy. We know it is only as against the adjoining property that the railroad has got to fence, and they have already refused to fence in many instances except in so far as to protect the cattle escaping from the farm of the particular men who wish to have an action brought. It seems to me that sections 194 and 195 are somewhat defective, because section 195 refers to the fencing mentioned in 194 and says that "such fencing shall be done within three months after the construction of the railroad as against the occupier." That applies to the case where the land is already occupied. Section B applies to the case where it is not already occupied and it requires the railway company to fence it within three months after it is occupied. There is no means of giving an occupier any remedy in law for not fencing unless the occupier first of all gives notice requiring the railway company to fence. I do not think that is right. I think that the occupier of land should have an action of damages without first of all giving the railroad company notice to fence.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not quite comprehend where the difficulty arises. As I understand the member for North Renfrew, he takes the case of the railway crossing which the company has neglected properly to fence, and cattle are killed at the railway crossing. If they had escaped from the owner's property to the highway and had been destroyed for want of proper fencing of the railway, the company of course would be liable, but the company sets up a defence that they are killed on the railway crossing having first escaped from their owner's property and being wrongfully on the highway, and that although the company were wrong in not having those fences up, the cattle were wrong in being there. I would refer the hon. member to section 200 which requires them to fence the crossings.

Mr. LISTER. It is not the case of farm crossings at all.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand that.

Mr. LISTER. As the law now is all the railway company is bound to do is to fence against adjoining owners. The difficulty arises where they have not fenced as against the adjoining owners and where cattle belonging to people, owned by persons other than the adjoining owners, escape on the railway track over on fenced land. What I learned from my hon. friend is: If the municipality allows those cattle to be free commoners and enacts a by-law by which they cease to be trespassers allowing them to run over on enclosed lands, then if the company has neglected to fence they should be held responsible in the same way as if they are owners of the adjoining land. Of course, the law, so far as crossings are concerned, is plain enough.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Though the law expressly requires railway companies to put on cattle-guards on the level crossings, and if they do not and if cattle stray on the tracks, or even on the crossings, and get upon the railway line, from the fact of there being no cattle-guards, then the defence is set up that those cattle are trespassers, and although they are there by the law of the municipality, that they have no right to be on the public highway. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) contends with us that the railway company should be bound to fence against the trespassing of those cattle on their line. I think it is a manifest duty that they owe to the public in every populated portion of the country that they should fence their lines. What I want to get into this law, if I can, is a provision that will require them to do so, and if they neglect their manifest duty, that they should be made to suffer.

Mr. WATSON. This is a very important point, and especially important in Manitoba and the North-West. A great many farmers there have suffered loss on account of fences not being erected along the lines of railway, and by cattle being killed upon the track off their own property, just as the member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) and the member for Renfrew (Mr. White) have explained. These cattle do not get on to the crossings, but the railroad running through a section of a prairie country on which cattle are allowed to run at large, they get on the railway track where the company does not fence the track, and the result is that numbers of cattle are killed, and the settler whose cattle are destroyed, finds it almost impossible to receive compensation. I hope the Minister will amend the law in such a manner as will compel the railroad company to fence the railroad through the cities or municipalities, and to protect cattle where they are allowed to run at large. It is the duty of the railroad company to protect their lines and the Government should insist upon it. Of course, I quite understand that when a railroad runs through twenty or thirty miles of unsettled country, it would be harsh to ask the companies to fence those lands.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In a thickly settled country you want fences?

Mr. WATSON. Yes, and if the land is not occupied and the farmer is allowed to have his cattle run at large.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They ought not to allow them to run at large; it is very dangerous to life.

Mr. WATSON. It would be almost impossible to compel a man to fence his cattle in. It is much more reasonable to say that the railway company should fence the railway track.

Mr. SHANLY. There is one view in the case that my hon. friends from Renfrew (Mr. White) and Lambton (Mr. Lister) have not touched upon. My hon. friend from North Renfrew (Mr. White) seems to be particularly careful of the lives of cattle, but he should remember that in this free commoner business the lives of people travelling by trains are in peril by cattle being allowed to run at large. While I am entirely in favor of railway companies providing proper cattle-guards, I think it should be insisted upon by some law or other that cattle in a populous and settled country should not be allowed to run at large. No matter how good the cattle-guards may be even where high fences are constructed, you will occasionally find places where the cattle will get on the railway, if they are allowed to roam at large; and it is much more important to consider the danger to the people in the trains where the cattle are killed than the cattle themselves.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is very important that the quality of the fence should be considered, because if the fence is not of such a quality as to prevent cattle and other animals getting through, and on to the track, loss of life may occur from the trains coming into collision with them. Many of the railways have fences that are wholly inadequate to prevent cattle, sheep and pigs from getting through them. For instance, many of the fences consist of wire hung on posts twelve or fourteen feet apart, and frequently there is no boards on the top of the posts, so that the animals can easily make their way over or through the wires. It is a great hardship to farmers and to people living in towns to prevent their cattle running at large. In many towns there are commons, and the municipal by-laws permit the cattle to run at large, and sometimes the cattle get on the station grounds, owing to the station grounds not being enclosed. I know of a case in which a cow was killed by getting on to the station grounds, and the company declined to pay for the cow on the grounds that she was running at large. If there is anything in the contention that a cow coming in contact with a train is liable to throw the train off and destroy human life, it is of vital importance that the company should not be allowed to neglect to construct such fences as will prevent cattle getting on the track. The quality of the fence is not sufficiently laid down in the Bill. If the railway company erect a wire fence, it should be compelled to place a board on the top of the posts, and if the company neglects to construct a proper fence, it should be held responsible for the accidents which occur in consequence. I know of a number of cases in which cattle got through improperly constructed fences and were killed, and their owners were not compensated, on some pretext or other. It is impossible for a farmer to go to law against a railway company, for the company appeals and appeals, and on some technical ground the farmer is defeated. It is the duty of this House to have the fence well defined in this Act. That is apart from the other question. I want to see human life protected, and in order that it should be protected the railway companies should be compelled to erect good fences which cattle will not be able to pass through, and thus throw the train off the track and endanger human life.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). In the Province of New Brunswick there is this difficulty, not in the cultivated portions, but in the woods. The farmers in the spring turn the cattle in the woods, and they get on the railway in spite of every precaution. If the cattle are to be allowed to run at large, the company would have to fence its road from one end to the other. Then, in some portions of the Province the occupiers of land do not want the railway fenced, because the fence takes up a large portion of land, and they prefer to crop it close up to the track. We have to consider the life of the public in these cases, and if the cattle are allowed to stray on highways in proximity to a railway, it is almost impossible to run a railway without some accidents occurring; and the question is whether in the interest of the public, cattle should not be prevented from running on highways which cross railroads. How can you make a company responsible in cases where the occupiers prefer not to have the land fenced? There should be consideration for the railway as well as the cattle in these cases.

Mr. McNEILL. I think if it is possible to keep the cattle off the line over all the rest of its course, they can be kept off the line so far as the highways are concerned. There is no doubt that in many parts of the country which are partially settled, it is of great importance to the settlers that they should have the opportunity of turning their cattle into the woods and along the roadsides, and it seems to me that it is a piece of almost high-handed tyranny on the part of railway companies to refuse to take the trouble of having the highway guarded against cattle in those districts as well as in other parts of the country.

Mr. SHANLY. How are you going to secure the highway if the cattle are running.

Mr. McNEIL. By cattle-guards. As my hon. friend will see, the point that the hon. member for Renfrew has made is this, that there are cases where these cattle-guards are not as well constructed as they ought to be and where there are none at all, and the cattle straying from the roads on to the railways are killed.

Mr. SHANLY. If the cattle are running at large, they may be killed actually on the railway line. The cattle-guard may be perfect, and still the cattle may be collected on the highways at the crossing and there be killed, and perhaps kill the railway passengers.

Mr. McNEILL. Of course it is possible that they may get on the road and stand just on the crossing, but that is very unusual. It is generally when the cattle get on the line and are collected in places within the fences and cannot get away, that accidents occur. When the cattle are standing on the highway at the crossing and a train comes along, all they have to do is to walk out of the way, and that they do. As soon as the engineer sees the cattle he blows his whistle, and they move on. It is not on the crossings that accidents occur, but it is on the line through the crossings not being fenced.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is in the cut.

Mr. McNEILL. It is in the cut and along the line. It is most important an arrangement of this kind should be made. I must emphasise again my statement that it is of the greatest possible importance, in sparsely settled districts, that farmers should have the benefit of their cattle feeding in the woods and along the roads, and I do not see why they should be prevented having this benefit, simply because railway companies do not choose to be at the expense of fencing their lines as they should.

Mr. MITCHELL. You can easily see the difference between the gentlemen who represent the population and wealth of cities, such as the hon. member for the city and county of St. John, and gentlemen who represent rural constituencies like the hon. member for North Bruce. I happen to represent a constituency which is a mixture of rural and urban, and I have had a good deal of experience in the matter of cattle being killed on railways. I must say I entirely differ from the hon. member for the city and company of St. John (Mr. Weldon), and I agree in the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman who so ably represents the British Empire when he speaks on that subject, and who in this case is representing the farmers. I suppose I have had occasion to plead before the Railway Department of this country as often and get as little as almost any member of this House, and I have heard these legal objections raised there which have been raised by some hon. gentlemen opposite. I have had occasion to ask for compensation for cattle, horses, colts and cows killed on the Intercolonial Railway, and the only animal I ever got paid for was the widow Murphy's cow after a long and arduous fight. I believe it is the duty of railway companies and of the Government which owns a railway to fence their lines both in settled districts and in districts which are only comparatively settled. In the latter the farmers have to allow their cattle to feed upon the unoccupied territory of their neighbors, and the hon. member for North Bruce has correctly represented the condition of things in relation to that matter. I will just say to the representative of the Intercolonial Railway that it would be very well if the Government will keep the fences in repair after they had put them up. As the chief manager of that enterprise is in the House, I hope he will see that the fences in the county of Northumberland are better maintained than they have been for some time past. There ought to be some provision in this Bill by which railway proprietors, whether corporations or governments, should be compelled to fence, not only through thickly settled districts but also through partially settled districts, especially as in the latter the farmers must utilise their unenclosed land to pasture their cattle during the summer.

Mr. McNEILL.

Mr. EDGAR. There seems to be two points on which this discussion has taken place. One is the necessity of fencing a railway from the adjoining land. Now there is a very distinct and good provision for that in the first part of section 94; then, the other point is the necessity of having sufficient cattle-guards at all highway crossings to prevent the cattle getting upon the railways from the highways. That is provided for by sub-section b of section 194, in very clear terms, I think.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). But if the railway company does not put them in, what then?

Mr. EDGAR. Those two provisions seem to be clear and sufficient as to those two purposes.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The fences should be made higher.

Mr. EDGAR. Apart from that, there are those two provisions. Now, however, how are they enforced? I would like the hon. the Minister of Justice to explain section 195. Is it in his view necessary that the adjoining proprietor should give in all cases six months' notice in writing to the railway before the railway is liable for not fencing. I cannot make out from that section whether it is necessary that the notice should be given, and whether the delays referred to in the first part a and b, render the railway liable without a notice in writing. I think section 13 of the old Act renders it necessary that notice in writing should be given before the railway company is liable, because the old Act mentions these delays, and then it says "and after the company has been so required to give notice." I observe that in this section the draftsman of the Bill has left out the word "and," so that it does not seem to require that the notice is necessary in writing in addition to the delay. I think it would be a most scandalous thing if that were allowed, that no railway company should be liable for damages to the adjoining proprietor if his cattle were killed, unless he had given six months' notice. I am glad to see that this Bill appears to change that provision, and I hope the committee will accept it so far. But, supposing that improvement is made, how is the remedy to be enforced? The railway is liable, but it is only liable to the occupants of the land in respect to which the fences are defective, and the occupants, as in cases that have been mentioned, of all other land through which cattle may stray on to the track, over land which does not belong to the owners of the cattle, are left without legal redress. I think that matter ought to be considered. I think, if the company is bound to make and maintain these fences, it should be liable for the loss of all cattle straying upon their track through these fences where they are defective.

Mr. WHITE. Where there are no fences erected at all, what would you do then?

Mr. EDGAR. Of course I am assuming that there are fences erected, and I think some means should be adopted in that case to make the company liable for damages.

Mr. SHANLY. You would not propose to compel the company to keep all the farm gates closed?

Mr. EDGAR. I am very glad to see the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly), with his great practical knowledge taking part in this discussion.

Mr. SHANLY. Supposing the cattle strayed on to the track through the carelessness of a farmer?

Mr. EDGAR. That case is not in question, because section 201 says that anyone who leaves a gate open is liable to the company for all sorts of damages, but why should the company not be forced in all cases to make a good lawful fence. I think they should be made liable for damages if they are not.

Mr. SHANLY. That is, in a settled country. You would not want them to fence round Lake Superior, for instance?

Mr. EDGAR. It must be remembered that it is not only the cattle that are lost, and it is not only the loss to the farmer which has to be considered. I think we ought to make it absolutely clear and distinct that the railway companies, in settled counties at least, must be forced by some means to keep up these fences, and I do not think that the ridiculous provisions in the former Act, requiring notice in writing to be given, should be entertained for a moment.

Mr. WHITE. Are you speaking of the Act of 1883?

Mr. EDGAR. I am speaking of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. WATSON. I would make a suggestion to the Minister of Justice to add these words in sub-section c.

"If the company is required in writing by the occupant or by the municipal county."

I think that would suit most people, and certainly most people in the west, because I would not ask the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Manitoba and the North-West Company in those portions of their line where they have to run through an unsettled country, where there is no danger of cattle straying on the track, to go to this expense, but, when municipal council is giving the power, I do not think any municipal council would act unfairly to a railway company. I know of instances where some settlers had three or four head of cattle killed. They appealed to the county court, and were awarded the value of the cattle, but the railway company appealed to a higher court, and the settlers had to stop because they had not the means to go on further. If the railway company were notified, I do not think that any one could object.

Mr. McNEILL. I think that notice should be given before the railway is constructed, or before it is completed.

Mr. SHANLY. I think the suggestion of my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Watson) is a very good one, that the maintenance of the fences should be insisted upon when the municipality desires their continuance.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am not altogether in favor of that, because there are many places where there are no organised townships, were it would not apply.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I agree fully with the remarks of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), and also with those of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). In counties where people are settling and where the settlers themselves are new, it is a necessity that their cattle should be allowed to run at large. I speak with knowledge, and even with authority on this matter, because I began life on a new farm, and everyone who knows anything in regard to farming knows that a new settler has no choice, but that his cattle must be allowed to run at large. If the railway, therefore, is not to have its track enclosed, it simply prohibits the new settler from keeping cattle at all. The hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly), if I understood him aright, said that the same danger existed in regard to railway crossings.

Mr. SHANLY. Not to the same extent of course.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If we take the surveys which have been made in the Province of Ontario, we find that that danger is one to five hundred, and anyone who has observed the habits of cattle knows that there is nothing like a railway or a turnpike road where they will seek to lie down, to escape from flies or other nuisances; and I think the motion of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) meets the difficulty as well as it is possible for this House to meet it. I think the House ought to make the safety of the people the first consideration, and it is certain that there is no more fruitful source of accidents on railways than animals lying upon the road. I therefore hope that the Minister of Justice will adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson.)

Mr. THOMPSON. The suggestion will go further than, I think, the hon. gentleman intends. It would enable the municipal council in unsettled places, to fence on both sides of the line of railway, and I think the clause had better be allowed to stand.

Mr. WATSON. I do not think a municipal council would be unfair in dealing with a railway company. I think it would be perfectly safe to allow the council to decide as to whether there was any danger of cattle straying upon the road, and they might make arrangements with the railway company, in case of accidents, to pay the damages. But it is very annoying to a settler to know that his cattle are liable to get on a railway track, and he cannot recover damages if they are killed. I do not think there would be any injustice in asking a railway company to fence the land, when notified to do so by the owner or occupant, or by the municipal council.

Mr. WHITE. I would go somewhat further than my hon. friend. I think he will remember a discussion that took place here some five years ago in regard to fencing railways, in which I took the ground that railway companies ought to fence their roads without any notice from the adjoining proprietors; and I intend, if these clauses are allowed to stand, and when they come up again to renew that proposition, that railway companies shall be required to fence against the adjoining properties without any notice being required to do so. I quite agree with the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Shanly), that the protection to human life ought to be of paramount importance to this House, and I think that only strengthens the argument I have presented in favor of the proposition that railway companies should be obliged to fence their roads, not only for the purpose of protecting settlers from the loss of their cattle, but also for the protection of human life. Let me point out an instance that occurred in my county last year. In the township of Head, a considerable portion of the land was unfenced, and representations were made to the railway company by myself and by the municipal authorities, asking them to fence the road along this portion of their line, some four miles in extent, where there was a considerable settlement, but where the land is not of very rich quality, and consequently the settlers are not very well off. After we made these representations the company promised time and again that they would erect the fences; but they neglected to do it, and the consequence was that not less than 30 head of cattle were killed in that short distance, during last season, and no redress could be had from the railway company at all. When application was made for payment they replied that they did not believe they were liable, as the cattle had not strayed on the railway from the lands of the adjoining proprietors; and so these poor people, who were in the enjoyment of their rights, and were allowing their cattle to run at large, and in conformity with the by-law passed under the Municipal Act of the Province of Ontario, and who were not improperly employing the land from which the cattle strayed upon the track, were prevented from obtaining a single dollar of compensation for the damages they had suffered. No only that, but, as I have already stated, there are three or four crossings in that township, two at all events, that I am aware of, and I believe four, upon which there are no cattle-guards erected, so that if cattle strayed from the highway, at these points to which I refer, there would be nothing to prevent them from going on the track, that is, in the way of cattle-guards. So I think that some provision ought to be made to carry out the idea I suggested, and if the Minister of Justice proposes to allow any of these clauses to stand, I would ask him to allow to stand all those clauses relating to fences, for future consideration.

Mr. THOMPSON. We will allow them to stand.

On section 201,

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Under this section, in case for instance, a farmer had a crossing on his farm, and through the negligence of a servant, his cattle happened to get upon the track and an accident occurred, according to this section, he might be called upon to pay an enormous sum, which would ruin the unfortunate farmer, when, perhaps, he was really not personally to blame.

Mr. THOMPSON. We have adopted a provision in the Bill which entitles every farmer to a crossing, and entitles him to have gates for the passage of vehicles. Surely it is necessary, in the public interest, that he should keep these gates closed. The company cannot be expected to keep them closed, because, they are entirely for his own use. If the provision is strict against the farmer, it is so in consequence of the necessity, on his part, of exercising care to prevent accidents.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). My hon. friend supposes the case of an accident occurring upon the railway through the negligence of the farmer's servant, in allowing the gates open. I think he desires that you should attach a sufficient penalty to the farmer, without entirely ruining him, through no fault of his own.

Mr. SHANLY. It should be remembered that the farmer's negligence may almost ruin a railway; the destruction may amount to tens of thousands of dollars, not to speak of the loss of life that might occur. It should be made a terror to farmers to leave their gates open.

Mr. WATSON. Make the penalty not less than $20 nor more than $500. It might be a hardship to make the farmer responsible for the whole damage.

Mr. SHANLY. That is absurd, because the farm would not pay the damage, in most cases.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is the provision of the law at present.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No serious difficulties have arisen yet; no such cases have occurred.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin.) We may not have had any up to the present time, but we have no guarantee that they will not occur.

Mr. McNEILL. I venture to suggest that in the present state of scientific knowledge and inventive power if a premium were offered by the Government, and probably the railway companies would be willing to join in, as it would be very advantageous to them, some invention would be made by which a flag would be allowed to drop, say, eight or ten rods from the railway crossing, as the train was coming forward. I should think by the use of electricity this might be done without much difficulty. At night this might be done by using another kind of signal such as turning a red light in place of a green one. This is a matter of such enormous importance to the public that it might be as well for the Government to take it into consideration and see if something of the kind might not be done.

On section 25,

Mr. WATSON. I would suggest that a price not to exceed a certain amount per mile, should be fixed for passenger fares. In some cases the railroads charge 4 and 5 cents per mile. I think 3 cents per mile is generally conceded to be fair.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew.)

Mr. THOMPSON. Those rates are all subject to the control of the Governor in Council.

Mr. EDGAR. Was there any limit to the rate in the old Act?

Mr. THOMPSON. No.

Mr. EDGAR. If it is not in the general Act it is in many special cases.

Mr. WATSON. The old Act subjected it to the regulation of the Governor in Council and railroads were allowed to charge 4 or 5 cents per mile. I think we ought to fix by legislation the rate of toll not to exceed 3 cents per mile.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Are there any rates above that?

Mr. WATSON. I do not know this year, but last year I know the Canadian Pacific Railway charged 4 and 5 cents a mile; west of Brandon 4 cents and west of Burton 5 cents.

Mr. SHANLY. The Grand Trunk rate is $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents by statute; that is to say it is two pence per mile in the original charter which is equal to $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents.

Mr. WATSON. Make this $3\frac{1}{2}$ or $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents and have a limit.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That might have the effect of preventing the construction of railways in many unsettled localities where they are a great benefit to the settlers.

Mr. SHANLY. It is better not to make a rate in partially settled countries like the North-West where there are few people to make the road pay. I think it is better to leave it to the Governor in Council to make the rate.

Mr. WATSON. I find that the Governor in Council legislates in the interest of railroads and not in the interest of the public.

On section 235,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). This requires the company, on the demand of any person, to make known any special rates which they have given. Suppose they refuse to give the information, something is required to compel them to give it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Well, we will let this stand, and I will look at the Interstate Act.

Mr. CHARLTON. Are these clauses modelled on the Interstate Commerce Law?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

On section 274,

Mr. HALL. I would suggest that the words "or across" should be added, because I have seen a prosecution fail on that ground.

Mr. O'BRIEN. That would be a very unreasonable regulation. If a railway runs through a man's farm, is that to prevent his crossing the track?

Mr. EDGAR. A man has to go across the track very often.

Mr. HALL. Railway companies never enforce the provision unless there is a wilful violation of the law, but there are cases in which the companies are prevented from stopping the public from crossing the track, though it is dangerous to the public themselves, and I think they should have the power to do that.

Mr. EDGAR. They have it already. They can stop trespassers on railway land.

Mr. THOMPSON. There are many cases where lands have been severed by a railway, and you would not propose to prevent persons crossing the track there. The provision the hon. gentleman suggests would be very severe.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It would defeat itself by its severity.

On section 282,

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think there ought to be some provision by which persons who purchase a railroad under the foreclosure of a mortgage ought to be able to become a corporation and obtain the franchises, because it is doubtful if a purchase under a deed of foreclosure passes the franchises. An Act was passed in New Brunswick last year to enable the persons who purchase under a deed of foreclosure or a deed of sale to become a corporation.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think it is very undesirable that railway companies should be incorporated by letters patent.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). This very day there is a railway to be sold, and there can be no incorporation until next year.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will make a note of the point.

On section 288,

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Would it not be advisable to introduce a clause providing that parties should give notice to a railway company when they claim damages, on the same principle that notice has to be given to revenue officers? Sometimes these actions are brought on speculation. Frequently no notice is given to the railway companies, and the first thing they know a writ is served.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think parties usually try to get some compensation from the road before they bring the action.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). No, they do not. The first thing they know the writ is served. In the State of Maine a notice has got to be given to the railway, and the particulars have to be given, upon which a claim is made for damage, before the action is brought.

Mr. MASSON. I think the limitation of six months is too short. The last speaker says that often the first notice a railway company gets is the writ. That may be the case sometimes. I know cases where a railway have got the notice, and then pretending to promise a settlement, they waste time until the limitation expires, and then the company refuses a settlement, and the unfortunate man has to suffer a loss. I would suggest that the time be lengthened to a year, or that notice of action should be sufficient to prevent the limitation running. I think the object of the short limitation is to allow the company to have notice within reasonable time, while the means of obtaining evidence for their defence are available, and not allow the claim to get stale when they would be at a loss to discover evidence. I believe that to be the reason for which the limitation is so short. I think that notice in writing within six months would be sufficient, and it would then give time for negotiating a settlement.

Mr. THOMPSON. As regards the notice of action, the difficulty is that so many technicalities surround it, that practically, in four cases out of five, actions fail where notice of action is required.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). All that is needed is a simple notice to the company on the part of the claimant that he intends to bring an action, and to give some information to the company as to the particulars of the action. I know that in the State of Maine, notice is required, and if it is required here, I think it might be extended to 12 months instead of 6—so many days' notice, and then extend the time within which the action may be brought. I propose to join protection to the railway companies with further protection to the public. Six months is undoubtedly a very short time to let a suit clear a railway company.

Mr. THOMPSON. If we intend to insert a provision of this kind, it will have to be very carefully drawn, and we should let the clause stand.

On section 294,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You do not propose to make the employé responsible, but only the person who sells him the liquor?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the employé drinks enough to become intoxicated, he becomes guilty of a misdemeanor.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Suppose a conductor stops at a station and goes in to take lunch, and takes a glass of beer?

Mr. THOMPSON. Spirituous or intoxicating liquors.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Beer is intoxicating.

Mr. THOMPSON. I did not know that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It depends upon how much you take.

Mr. THOMPSON. If there is to be a prohibition, it must be strict, and we can only draw the line at spirituous or intoxicating liquors.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think to have perfectly sober men on a train is of very great importance. I do not see why we should not prohibit a person, when on duty, from taking it, as well as to prohibit a person from selling it.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Suppose that party did not know that this man was engaged upon the road, and sells him a glass of liquor, would he then be liable for a fine?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If nobody sells or gives it to him, he will not take it.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is just the same as the prohibition against selling to minors. Persons who are engaged in a business which we restrict must take the risk of violating the law.

Mr. DAVIN. I desire to call attention to what I consider a very grave circumstance. In the North-West Territories we have, or had up to the time I left, conductors and brakemen running from Donald to Swift Current and from Brandon to Swift Current, and I have seen conductors dropping asleep. They had been up the best part of two days and one night on that run. This causes danger to life, for the whole train depends on the wakefulness of those men. I will not comment on the cruelty to the men. By clause 293 we declare that "every person who is intoxicated while in charge of a locomotive engine or while acting as conductor to any car or train of cars is guilty of a misdemeanor." The reason why you punish him for being intoxicated is because his intoxication unfits him to discharge his duties, and if conductors have to run from Donald to Swift Current by the time he is within 100 miles of Swift Current the average conductor will be not wakeful enough to attend to his duties.

Mr. SHANLY. What is the distance?

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know the exact distance at the present moment. It will take the best part of two nights and a day, and that is too long a time for the men to be at work on duty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That there and back?

Mr. DAVIN. No; direct.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Surely not.

Mr. DAVIN. I rather think so.

Mr. SHANLY. It must be a very slow train.

Mr. DAVIN. I believe the train leaves Donald sometime in the night and it will get into Swift Current the day following. If the conductor has to get up in the night, get on board the train, run a whole day, and it will be night before he gets into Swift Current. I have seen the men dropping asleep. They come in and sit in the "Pullman" for a moment and their eyelids fall. I have spoken to them; I have written to Mr. Van Horne; I also sent an account of what I saw to the Railway Committee, for I think it is a serious matter.

Mr. SHANLY. How many miles a week does the company get out of them?

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know. The fact is as I state it. From Brandon to Swift Current is not so long a run, but I apprehend it is too long. They leave Brandon at about half past one or two o'clock and get into Swift Current the next day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is a very important question.

Mr. SHANLY. It is a question as to the number of miles a week the company get out of the men. Somebody must do the night work.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Is it the intention of the Government to embody in this consolidation the Bill introduced by Mr. McCarthy in reference to protecting railway employés?

Mr. THOMPSON. Some parts of it I propose to add when the House goes into committee again.

Mr. DAVIN. The question I apprehend is not how many hours of work you get out of them, but how many hours continuously can a man stand it. That is the real question. There cannot be the least doubt, I can assure the Government that this is required in the interest of the public, in the interests of human life, and I would say even in the interests of the railway companies, because they will one day or other have an accident and the result of that accident will cost them, by many times more than if they had adopted this regulation.

Mr. SHANLY. They have too few conductors you claim?

Mr. LANGEVIER (Quebec). On behalf of my hon. friend the member for York (Mr. Mulock) who has been compelled to leave before the committee had finished their work, I would call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that the hon. member said to me that last year when several amendments were moved by him to the Act respecting the sale of railway passenger tickets he moved the following amendment:

"Every railway company liable to redeem any such ticket, which refuses to redeem the same when so presented, shall forfeit to the holder thereof a sum equal to ten times the amount payable for its redemption, which sum shall be recoverable, at the suit of the holder against such company, in any court of competent jurisdiction."

The member for York (Mr. Mulock) tells me that that amendment was left out with a promise from the Minister of Railways that it would be incorporated in the consolidation of the Railway Act which was to be introduced this Session. I see that it is not incorporated in this Bill and he says the amendment is an important one. I do not think it has any great application in the Province of Quebec. Since some of the amendments passed last year, compelling railroad companies to redeem their own tickets when they are not used to the end, the railway companies have refused to do so, or they have placed such conditions on the redemption that it makes it practically impossible to redeem them. The result is that the value of the tickets are lost, or they are sold at a loss by those who are the buyers of them. I would not be prepared to support the amendment as proposed last year compelling railway companies which refused to redeem the tickets to pay ten times their value. I think the penalty is rather too high. We might say they would pay double the value of the ticket or some other figure. I wish to draw the attention of the Minister to the statement of the hon. member that there was a distinct promise made last year by the Minister of Railways that this would be incorporated in the consolidation which was to be made this year.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think the hon. gentleman was mistaken about there being a distinct promise. The Minister of Railways did promise that this year there would be a consolidation Bill introduced, and stated that would be the time to consider the matter. If the amendment has been overlooked in the drafting of this Bill I will see that it is considered. In relation to what the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) says also I will see that that matter is considered before the House goes into committee again.

Committee rose and reported.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does the hon. gentleman propose to take to-morrow?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Some of the Bills, and then go into Supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can you say exactly which Bills?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot say exactly now.

Mr. EDGAR. When will the House go into committee again on this Railway Bill?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not to-morrow.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.50 a.m. (Friday).

Gov.Doc. Canada. Parliament. House of Commons
Can [Debates on reciprocity and the fisheries
P treaty. 1888].

116727

University of Toronto Library

DO NOT REMOVE THE CARD FROM THIS POCKET

